Newberry, an early business man of Chicago, who left half of his estate (aggregating over $2,000,000) for the purpose. The property bequeathed was largely in real estate, which has since greatly increased in value. The library was established in temporary quarters in 1887, and the first section of a permanent building was opened in the autumn of 1893. By that time there had been accumulated about 160,000 books and pamphlets. A collection of nearly fifty portraits—chiefly of eminent Americans, including many citizens of Chicago—was presented to the library by G. P. A. Healy, a distinguished artist, since deceased. The site of the building occupies an entire block, and the original design contemplates a handsome front on each of the four streets, with a large rectangular court in the center. The section already completed is massive and imposing, and its interior is admirably adapted to the purposes of a library, and at the same time rich and beautiful. When completed, the building will have a capacity for four to six million volumes.

NEWBERRY, Walter C., ex-Congressman, was born at Sangerfield, Oneida County, N. Y., Dec. 23, 1835. Early in the Civil War he enlisted as a private, and rose, step by step, to a colonelcy, and was mustered out as Brevet Brigadier-General. In 1890 he was elected, as a Democrat, to represent the Fourth Illinois District in the Fifty-second Congress (1891-93). His home is in Chicago.

NEWBERRY, Walter L., merchant, banker and philanthropist, was born at East Windsor, Conn., Sept. 18, 1804, descended from English ancestry. He was President Jackson's personal appointee to the United States Military Academy at West Point, but was prevented from taking the examination by sickness. Subsequently he embarked in business at Buffalo, N. Y., going to Detroit in 1828, and settling at Chicago in 1833. After engaging in general merchandising for several years, he turned his attention to banking, in which he accumulated a large fortune. He was a prominent and influential citizen, serving several terms as President of the Board of Education, and being, for six years, the President of the Chicago Historical Society. He died at sea, Nov. 6, 1868, leaving a large estate, one-half of which he devoted, by will, to the founding of a free reference library in Chicago. (See Newberry Library.)

NEW BOSTON, a city of Mercer County, on the Mississippi River, at the western terminus of the Galva and New Boston Division of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway. Population (1890), 445; (1900), 703.

NEW BRIGHTON, a village of St. Clair County and suburb of East St. Louis. Population (1890), 868.

NEW BURNSIDE, a village of Johnson County, on the Cairo Division of the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway, 63 miles northeast of Cairo. Population (1890), 650; (1890), 596; (1900), 468.

NEW DOUGLAS, a village in Madison County, on the Toledo, St. Louis & Western Railroad; in farming and fruit-growing region; has coal mine, flour mill and newspaper. Population (1900), 469.

NEWELL, John, Railway President, was born at West Newbury, Mass., March 31, 1850, being directly descended from "Pilgrim" stock. At the age of 16 he entered the employment of the Cheshire Railroad in New Hampshire. Eighteen months later he was appointed an assistant engineer on the Vermont Central Railroad, and placed in charge of the construction of a 10-mile section of the line. His promotion was rapid, and, in 1850, he accepted a responsible position on the Champlain & St. Lawrence Railroad. From 1850 to 1856 he was engaged in making surveys for roads in Kentucky and New York, and, during the latter year, held the position of engineer of the Cairo City Company, of Cairo, Ill. In 1857 he entered the service of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, as Division Engineer, where his remarkable success attracted the attention of the owners of the old Winona & St. Peter Railroad (now a part of the Chicago & Northwestern system), who tendered him the presidency. This he accepted, but, in 1864, was made President of the Cleveland & Toledo Railroad. Four years later, he accepted the position of General Superintendent and Chief Engineer of the New York Central Railroad, but resigned, in 1869, to become Vice-President of the Illinois Central Railroad. In 1871 he was elevated to the presidency, but retired in September, 1874, to accept the position of General Manager of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railroad, of which he was elected President, in May, 1883, and continued in office until the time of his death, which occurred at Youngstown, Ohio, August 25, 1894.

NEWHALL, (Dr.) Horatio, early physician and newspaper publisher, came from St. Louis, Mo., to Galena, Ill., in 1827, and engaged in mining and smelting, but abandoned this business, the following year, for the practice of his profession; soon afterward became interested in the publication of "The Miners' Journal," and still later in "The Galena Advertiser," with which Hooper Warren and Dr. Philleo were associated.

In 1830 he became a Surgeon in the United States Army, and was stationed at Fort Winnebago, but retired from the service, in 1832, and returned to Galena. When the Black Hawk War broke out he volunteered his services, and, by order of General Scott, was placed in charge of a military hospital at Galena, of which he had control until the close of the war. The difficulties of the position were increased by the appearance of the Asiatic cholera among the troops, but he seems to have discharged his duties with satisfaction to the military authorities. He enjoyed a wide reputation for professional ability, and had an extensive practice. Died, Sept. 19, 1870.

NEWMAN, a village of Douglas County, on the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Railway, 52 miles east of Decatur; has a bank, a newspaper, canning factory, broom factory, electric lights, and large trade in agricultural products and livestock. Population (1890), 990; (1900), 1,166.

NEWSPAPERS, EARLY. The first newspaper published in the Northwest Territory, of which the present State of Illinois, at the time, composed a part, was "The Centinel of the Northwest Territory," established at Cincinnati by William Maxwell, the first issue appearing in November, 1793. This was also the first newspaper published west of the Allegheny Mountains. In 1796 it was sold to Edmund Freeman and assumed the name of "Freeman's Journal." Nathaniel Willis (grandfather of N. P. Willis, the poet) established "The Scioto Gazette," at Chillicothe, in 1796. "The Western Spy and Hamilton Gazette" was the third paper in Northwest Territory (also within the limits of Ohio), founded in 1799. Willis's paper became the organ of the Territorial Government on the removal of the capital to Chillicothe, in 1800.

The first newspaper in Indiana Territory (then including Illinois) was established by Elihu Stout at Vincennes, beginning publication, July 4, 1804. It took the name of "The Western Sun and General Advertiser," but is now known as "The Western Sun," having had a continuous existence for ninety-five years.

The first newspaper published in Illinois Territory was "The Illinois Herald," but, owing to the absence of early files and other specific records, the date of its establishment has been involved in some doubt. Its founder was Matthew Duncan (a brother of Joseph Duncan, who was afterwards a member of Congress and Governor of the State from 1834 to 1838), and its place of publication Kaskaskia, at that time the Territorial capital. Duncan, who was a native of Kentucky, brought a press and a primitive printer's outfit with him from that State. Gov. John Reynolds, who came as a boy to the "Illinois Country" in 1800, while it was still a part of the "Northwest Territory," in his "Pioneer History of Illinois," has fixed the date of the first issue of this paper in 1809, the same year in which Illinois was severed from Indiana Territory and placed under a separate Territorial Government. There is good reason, however, for believing that the Governor was mistaken in this statement. If Duncan brought his press to Illinois in 1809—which is probable—it does not seem to have been employed at once in the publication of a newspaper, as Hooper Warren (the founder of the third paper established in Illinois) says it "was for years only used for the public printing." The earliest issue of "The Illinois Herald" known to be in existence, is No. 32 of Vol. II, and bears date, April 18, 1816. Calculating from these data, if the paper was issued continuously from its establishment, the date of the first issue would have been Sept. 6, 1814. Corroborative evidence of this is found in the fact that "The Missouri Gazette," the original of the old "Missouri Republican" (now "The St. Louis Republic"), which was established in 1808, makes no mention of the Kaskaskia paper before 1814, although communication between Kaskaskia and St. Louis was most intimate, and these two were, for several years, the only papers published west of Vincennes, Ind.

In August, 1817, "The Herald" was sold to Daniel P. Cook and Robert Blackwell, and the name of the paper was changed to "The Illinois Intelligencer." Cook—who had previously been Auditor of Public Accounts for the Territory, and afterwards became a Territorial Circuit Judge, the first Attorney-General under the new State Government, and, for eight years, served as the only Representative in Congress from Illinois—for a time officiated as editor of "The Intelligencer," while Blackwell (who had succeeded to the Auditorship) had charge of the publication. The size of the paper, which had been four pages of three wide columns to the page, was increased, by the new publishers, to four columns to the page. On the removal of the State capital to Vandalia, in 1820, "The Intelligencer" was removed thither also, and continued under its later name, afterwards becoming, after a change of management, an opponent of the scheme for the calling of a State Convention to revise the State Constitution with a view to making Illinois a slave State. (See Slavery and Slave Laws.)

The second paper established on Illinois soil was "The Shawnee Chief," which began publication at Shawneetown, Sept. 5, 1818, with Henry Eddy—who afterwards became a prominent lawyer of Southern Illinois—as its editor. The name of "The Chief" was soon afterwards changed to "The Illinois Emigrant," and some years later, became "The Shawneetown Gazette." Among others who were associated with the Shawneetown paper, in early days, was James Hall, afterwards a Circuit Judge and State Treasurer, and, without doubt, the most prolific and popular writer of his day in Illinois. Later, he established "The Illinois Magazine" at Vandalia, subsequently removed to Cincinnati, and issued under the name of "The Western Monthly Magazine." He was also a frequent contributor to other magazines of that period, and author of several volumes, including "Legends of the West" and "Border Tales." During the contest over the slavery question, in 1823-24, "The Gazette" rendered valuable service to the anti-slavery party by the publication of articles in opposition to the Convention scheme, from the pen of Morris Birkbeck and others.

The third Illinois paper—and, in 1823-24, the strongest and most influential opponent of the scheme for establishing slavery in Illinois—was "The Edwardsville Spectator," which began publication at Edwardsville, Madison County, May 23, 1819. Hooper Warren was the publisher and responsible editor, though he received valuable aid from the pens of Governor Coles, George Churchill, Rev. Thomas Lippincott, Judge Samuel D. Lockwood, Morris Birkbeck and others. (See Warren, Hooper.) Warren sold "The Spectator" to Rev. Thomas Lippincott in 1825, and was afterwards associated with papers at Springfield, Galena, Chicago and elsewhere.

The agitation of the slavery question (in part, at least) led to the establishment of two new papers in 1822. The first of these was "The Republican Advocate," which began publication at Kaskaskia, in April of that year, under the management of Elias Kent Kane, then an aspirant to the United States Senatorship. After his election to that office in 1824, "The Advocate" passed into the hands of Robert K. Fleming, who, after a period of suspension, established "The Kaskaskia Recorder," but, a year or two later, removed to Vandalia. "The Star of the West" was established at Edwardsville, as an opponent of Warren's "Spectator," the first issue making its appearance, Sept. 14, 1822, with Theophilus W. Smith, afterwards a Justice of the Supreme Court, as its reputed editor. A few months later it passed into new hands, and, in August, 1823, assumed the name of "The Illinois Republican." Both "The Republican Advocate" and "The Illinois Republican" were zealous organs of the pro-slavery party.

With the settlement of the slavery question in Illinois, by the election of 1824, Illinois journalism may be said to have entered upon a new era. At the close of this first period there were only five papers published in the State—all established within a period of ten years; and one of these ("The Illinois Republican," at Edwardsville) promptly ceased publication on the settlement of the slavery question in opposition to the views which it had advocated. The next period of fifteen years (1825-40) was prolific in the establishment of new newspaper ventures, as might be expected from the rapid increase of the State in population, and the development in the art of printing during the same period. "The Western Sun," established at Belleville (according to one report, in December, 1825, and according to another, in the winter of 1827-28) by Dr. Joseph Green, appears to have been the first paper published in St. Clair County. This was followed by "The Pioneer," begun, April 25, 1829, at Rock Spring, St. Clair County, with the indomitable Dr. John M. Peck, author of "Peck's Gazetteer," as its editor. It was removed in 1836 to Upper Alton, when it took the name of "The Western Pioneer and Baptist Banner." Previous to this, however, Hooper Warren, having come into possession of the material upon which he had printed "The Edwardsville Spectator," removed it to Springfield, and, in the winter of 1826-27, began the publication of the first paper at the present State capital, which he named "The Sangamo Gazette." It had but a brief existence. During 1830, George Forquer, then Attorney-General of the State, in conjunction with his half-brother, Thomas Ford (afterwards Governor), was engaged in the publication of a paper called "The Courier," at Springfield, which was continued only a short time. The earliest paper north of Springfield appears to have been "The Hennepin Journal," which began publication, Sept. 15, 1827. "The Sangamo Journal"—now "The Illinois State Journal," and the oldest paper of continuous existence in the State—was established at Springfield by Simeon and Josiah Francis (cousins from Connecticut), the first issue bearing date, Nov. 10, 1831. Before the close of the same year James G. Edwards, afterwards the founder of "The Burlington (Iowa) Hawkeye," began the publication of "The Illinois Patriot" at Jacksonville. Another paper, established the same year, was "The Gazette" at Vandalia, then the State capital. (See Forquer, George; Ford, Thomas; Francis, Simeon.)

At this early date the development of the lead mines about Galena had made that place a center of great business activity. On July 8, 1828, James Jones commenced the issue of "The Miners' Journal," the first paper at Galena. Jones died of cholera in 1833, and his paper passed into other hands. July 20, 1829, "The Galena Advertiser and Upper Mississippi Herald" began publication, with Drs. Horatio Newhall and Addison Philleo as editors, and Hooper Warren as publisher, but appears to have been discontinued before the expiration of its first year. "The Galenian" was established as a Democratic paper by Philleo, in May, 1832, but ceased publication in September, 1836. "The Northwestern Gazette and Galena Advertiser," founded in November, 1834, by Loring and Bartlett (the last named afterwards one of the founders of "The Quincy Whig"), has had a continuous existence, being now known as "The Galena Advertiser." Benjamin Mills, one of the most brilliant lawyers of his time, was editor of this paper during a part of the first year of its publication.

Robert K. Fleming, who has already been mentioned as the successor of Elias Kent Kane in the publication of "The Republican Advocate," at Kaskaskia, later published a paper for a short time at Vandalia, but, in 1837, removed his establishment to Edwardsville, where he began the publication of "The Corrector." The latter was continued a little over a year, when it was suspended. He then resumed the publication of "The Recorder" at Kaskaskia. In December, 1833, he removed to Belleville and began the publication of "The St. Clair Gazette," which afterwards passed, through various changes of owners, under the names of "The St. Clair Mercury" and "Representative and Gazette." This was succeeded, in 1839, by "The Belleville Advocate," which has been published continuously to the present time.

Samuel S. Brooks (the father of Austin Brooks, afterwards of "The Quincy Herald") at different times published papers at various points in the State. His first enterprise was "The Crisis" at Edwardsville, which he changed to "The Illinois Advocate," and, at the close of his first year, sold out to Judge John York Sawyer, who united it with "The Western Plowboy," which he had established a few months previous. "The Advocate" was removed to Vandalia, and, on the death of the owner (who had been appointed State Printer), was consolidated with "The Illinois Register," which had been established in 1836. The new paper took the name of "The Illinois Register and People's Advocate," in 1839 was removed to Springfield, and is now known as "The Illinois State Register."

Other papers established between 1830 and 1840 include: "The Vandalia Whig" (1831); "The Alton Spectator," the first paper published in Alton (January, 1834); "The Chicago Democrat," by John Calhoun (Nov. 26, 1833); "The Beardstown Chronicle and Illinois Bounty Land Advertiser," by Francis A. Arenz (July 29, 1833); "The Alton American" (1833); "The White County News," at Carmi (1833); "The Danville Enquirer" (1833); "The Illinois Champion," at Peoria (1834); "The Mount Carmel Sentinel and Wabash Advocate" (1834); "The Illinois State Gazette and Jacksonville News," at Jacksonville (1835); "The Illinois Argus and Bounty Land Register," at Quincy (1835); "The Rushville Journal and Military Tract Advertiser" (1835); "The Alton Telegraph" (1836); "The Alton Observer" (1836); "The Carthaginian," at Carthage (1836); "The Bloomington Observer" (1837); "The Backwoodsman," founded by Prof. John Russell, at Grafton, and the first paper published in Greene County (1837); "The Quincy Whig" (1838); "The Illinois Statesman," at Paris, Edgar County (1838); "The Peoria Register" (1838). The second paper to be established in Chicago was "The Chicago American," whose initial number was issued, June 8, 1835, with Thomas O. Davis as proprietor and editor. In July, 1837, it passed into the hands of William Stuart & Co., and, on April 9, 1839, its publishers began the issue of the first daily ever published in Chicago. "The Chicago Express" succeeded "The American" in 1842, and, in 1844, became the forerunner of "The Chicago Journal." The third Chicago paper was "The Commercial Advertiser," founded by Hooper Warren, in 1836. It lived only about a year. Zebina Eastman, who was afterwards associated with Warren, and became one of the most influential journalistic opponents of slavery, arrived in the State in 1839, and, in the latter part of that year, was associated with the celebrated Abolitionist, Benjamin Lundy, in the preliminary steps for the issue of "The Genius of Universal Emancipation," projected by Lundy at Lowell, in La Salle County. Lundy's untimely death, in August, 1839, however, prevented him from seeing the consummation of his plan, although Eastman lived to carry it out in part. A paper whose career, although extending only a little over one year, marked an era in Illinois journalism, was "The Alton Observer," its history closing with the assassination of its editor, Rev. Elijah P. Lovejoy, on the night of Nov. 8, 1837, while unsuccessfully attempting to protect his press from destruction, for the fourth time, by a pro-slavery mob. Humiliating as was this crime to every law-abiding Illinoisan, it undoubtedly strengthened the cause of free speech and assisted in hastening the downfall of the institution in whose behalf it was committed.

That the development in the field of journalism, within the past sixty years, has more than kept pace with the growth in population, is shown by the fact that there is not a county in the State without its newspaper, while every town of a few hundred population has either one or more. According to statistics for 1898, there were 605 cities and towns in the State having periodical publications of some sort, making a total of 1,709, of which 174 were issued daily, 34 semi-weekly, 1,205 weekly, 28 semi-monthly, 238 monthly, and the remainder at various periods ranging from tri-weekly to eight times a year.

NEWTON, the county-seat of Jasper County, situated on the Embarras River, at the intersection of subsidiary lines of the Illinois Central Railroad from Peoria and Effingham; is an incorporated city, was settled in 1828, and made the county-seat in 1836. Agriculture, coal-mining and dairy farming are the principal pursuits in the surrounding region. The city has water-power, which is utilized to some extent in manufacturing, but most of its factories are operated by steam. Among these establishments are flour and saw mills, and grain elevators. There are a half-dozen churches, a good public school system, including parochial school and high school, besides two banks and three weekly papers. Population (1890), 1,428; (1900), 1,630.

NEW YORK, CHICAGO & ST. LOUIS RAILWAY (Nickel Plate), a line 522.47 miles in length, of which (1898) only 9.96 miles are operated in Illinois. It owns no track in Illinois, but uses the track of the Chicago & State Line Railroad (9.96 miles in length), of which it has financial control, to enter the city of Chicago. The total capitalization of the New York, Chicago & St. Louis, in 1898, is $50,222,568, of which $19,425,000 is in bonds.—(HISTORY.) The New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad was incorporated under the laws of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois in 1881, construction begun immediately, and the road put in operation in 1882. In 1885 it passed into the hands of a receiver, was sold under foreclosure in 1887, and reorganized by the consolidation of various eastern lines with the Fort Wayne & Illinois Railroad, forming the line under its present name. The road between Buffalo, N. Y., and the west line of Indiana is owned by the Company, but, for its line in Illinois, it uses the track of the Chicago & State Line Railroad, of which it is the lessee, as well as the owner of its capital stock. The main line of the "Nickel Plate" is controlled by the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway, which owns more than half of both the preferred and common stock.

NIANTIC, a town in Macon County, on the Wabash Railway, 27 miles east of Springfield. Agriculture is the leading industry. The town has three elevators, three churches, school, coal mine, a newspaper and a bank. Pop. (1900), 654.

NICOLAY, John George, author, was born in Essingen, Bavaria, Feb. 26, 1832; at 6 years of age was brought to the United States, lived for a time in Cincinnati, attending the public schools there, and then came to Illinois; at 16 entered the office of "The Pike County Free Press" at Pittsfield, and, while still in his minority, became editor and proprietor of the paper. In 1857 he became Assistant Secretary of State under O. M. Hatch, the first Republican Secretary, but during Mr. Lincoln's candidacy for President, in 1860, aided him as private secretary, also acting as a correspondent of "The St. Louis Democrat." After the election he was formally selected by Mr. Lincoln as his private secretary, accompanying him to Washington and remaining until Mr. Lincoln's assassination. In 1865 he was appointed United States Consul at Paris, remaining until 1869; on his return for some time edited "The Chicago Republican"; was also Marshal of the United States Supreme Court in Washington from 1872 to 1887. Mr. Nicolay is author, in collaboration with John Hay, of "Abraham Lincoln: A History," first published serially in "The Century Magazine," and later issued in ten volumes; of "The Outbreak of the Rebellion" in "Campaigns of the Civil War," besides numerous magazine articles. He lives in Washington, D. C.

NICOLET, Jean, early French explorer, came from Cherbourg, France, in 1618, and, for several years, lived among the Algonquins, whose language he learned and for whom he acted as interpreter. On July 4, 1634, he discovered Lake Michigan, then called the "Lake of the Illinois," and visited the Chippewas, Menominees and Winnebagoes, in the region about Green Bay, among whom he was received kindly. From the Mascoutins, on the Fox River (of Wisconsin), he learned of the Illinois Indians, some of whose northern villages he also visited. He subsequently returned to Quebec, where he was drowned, in October, 1642. He was probably the first Caucasian to visit Wisconsin and Illinois.

NILES, Nathaniel, lawyer, editor and soldier, born at Plainfield, Otsego County, N. Y., Feb. 4, 1817; attended an academy at Albany, from 1830 to '34, was licensed to practice law and removed west in 1837, residing successively at Delphi and Frankfort, Ind., and at Owensburg, Ky., until 1842, when he settled in Belleville, Ill. In 1846 he was commissioned a First Lieutenant in the Second Regiment Illinois Volunteers (Colonel Bissell's) for the Mexican War, but, after the battle of Buena Vista, was promoted by General Wool to the captaincy of an independent company of Texas foot. He was elected Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives at the session of 1849, and the same year was chosen County Judge of St. Clair County, serving until 1861. With the exception of brief periods from 1851 to '59, he was editor and part owner of "The Belleville Advocate," a paper originally Democratic, but which became Republican on the organization of the Republican party. In 1861 he was appointed Colonel of the Fifty-fourth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, but the completion of its organization having been delayed, he resigned, and, the following year, was commissioned Colonel of the One Hundred and Thirtieth, serving until May, 1864, when he resigned—in March, 1865, receiving the compliment of a brevet Brigadier-Generalship. During the winter of 1862-63 he was in command at Memphis, but later took part in the Vicksburg campaign, and in the campaigns on Red River and Bayou Teche. After the war he served as Representative in the General Assembly from St. Clair County (1865-66); as Trustee of the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb at Jacksonville; on the Commission for building the State Penitentiary at Joliet, and as Commissioner (by appointment of Governor Oglesby) for locating the Soldiers' Orphans' Home. His later years have been spent chiefly in the practice of his profession, with occasional excursions into journalism. Originally an anti-slavery Democrat, he became one of the founders of the Republican party in Southern Illinois.

NIXON, William Penn, journalist, Collector of Customs, was born in Wayne County, Ind., of North Carolina and Quaker ancestry, early in 1832. In 1853 he graduated from Farmers' (now Belmont) College, near Cincinnati, Ohio. After devoting two years to teaching, he entered the law department of the University of Pennsylvania (1855), graduating in 1859. For nine years thereafter he practiced law at Cincinnati, during which period he was thrice elected to the Ohio Legislature. In 1868 he embarked in journalism, he and his older brother, Dr. O. W. Nixon, with a few friends, founding "The Cincinnati Chronicle." A few years later "The Times" was purchased, and the two papers were consolidated under the name of "The Times-Chronicle." In May, 1872, having disposed of his interests in Cincinnati, he assumed the business management of "The Chicago Inter Ocean," then a new venture and struggling for a foothold. In 1875 he and his brother, Dr. O. W. Nixon, secured a controlling interest in the paper, when the former assumed the position of editor-in-chief, which he continued to occupy until 1897, when he was appointed Collector of Customs for the City of Chicago—a position which he now holds.

NOKOMIS, a city of Montgomery County, on the "Big Four" main line and "Frisco" Railroads, 81 miles east by north from St. Louis and 52 miles west of Mattoon; in important grain-growing and hay-producing section; has water-works, electric lights, three flour mills, two machine shops, wagon factory, creamery, seven churches, high school, two banks and three papers; is noted for shipments of poultry, butter and eggs. Population (1890), 1,305; (1900), 1,371.

NORMAL, a city in McLean County, 2 miles north of Bloomington and 124 southwest of Chicago; at intersecting point of the Chicago & Alton and the Illinois Central Railroads. It lies in a rich coal and agricultural region, and has extensive fruit-tree nurseries, two canning factories, one bank, hospital, and four periodicals. It is the seat of the Soldiers' Orphans' Home, founded in 1869, and the Illinois State Normal University, founded in 1857; has city and rural mail delivery. Pop. (1890), 3,459; (1900), 3,795.

NORMAL UNIVERSITIES. (See Southern Illinois Normal University; State Normal University.)

NORTH ALTON, a village of Madison County and suburb of the city of Alton. Population (1880), 838; (1890), 762; (1900), 904.

NORTHCOTT, William A., Lieutenant-Governor, was born in Murfreesboro, Tenn., Jan. 28, 1854—the son of Gen. R. S. Northcott, whose loyalty to the Union, at the beginning of the Rebellion, compelled him to leave his Southern home and seek safety for himself and family in the North. He went to West Virginia, was commissioned Colonel of a regiment and served through the war, being for some nine months a prisoner in Libby Prison. After acquiring his literary education in the public schools, the younger Northcott spent some time in the Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md., after which he was engaged in teaching. Meanwhile, he was preparing for the practice of law and was admitted to the bar in 1877, two years later coming to Greenville, Bond County, Ill., which has since been his home. In 1880, by appointment of President Hayes, he served as Supervisor of the Census for the Seventh District; in 1882 was elected State's Attorney for Bond County and re-elected successively in '84 and '88; in 1890 was appointed on the Board of Visitors to the United States Naval Academy, and, by selection of the Board, delivered the annual address to the graduating class of that year. In 1892 he was the Republican nominee for Congress for the Eighteenth District, but was defeated in the general landslide of that year. In 1896 he was more fortunate, being elected Lieutenant-Governor by the vote of the State, receiving a plurality of over 137,000 over his Democratic opponent.

NORTH PEORIA, formerly a suburban village in Peoria County, 2 miles north of the city of Peoria; annexed to the city of Peoria in 1900.

NORTHERN BOUNDARY QUESTION, THE.

The Ordinance of 1787, making the first specific provision, by Congress, for the government of the country lying northwest of the Ohio River and east of the Mississippi (known as the Northwest Territory), provided, among other things (Art. V., Ordinance 1787), that "there shall be formed in the said Territory not less than three nor more than five States." It then proceeds to fix the boundaries of the proposed States, on the assumption that there shall be three in number, adding thereto the following proviso: "Provided, however, and it is further understood and declared, that the boundaries of these three States shall be subject so far to be altered that, if Congress shall hereafter find it expedient, they shall have authority to form one or two States in that part of the said Territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan." On the basis of this provision it has been claimed that the northern boundaries of Illinois, Indiana and Ohio should have been on the exact latitude of the southern limit of Lake Michigan, and that the failure to establish this boundary was a violation of the Ordinance, inasmuch as the fourteenth section of the preamble thereto declares that "the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact between the original States and the people and States in the said Territory, and forever remain unalterable, unless by common consent."—In the limited state of geographical knowledge, existing at the time of the adoption of the Ordinance, there seems to have been considerable difference of opinion as to the latitude of the southern limit of Lake Michigan. The map of Mitchell (1755) had placed it on the parallel of 42° 20', while that of Thomas Hutchins (1778) fixed it at 41° 37'. It was officially established by Government survey, in 1835, at 41° 37' 07.9". As a matter of fact, the northern boundary of neither of the three States named was finally fixed on the line mentioned in the proviso above quoted from the Ordinance—that of Ohio, where it meets the shore of Lake Erie, being a little north of 41° 44'; that of Indiana at 41° 46' (some 10 miles north of the southern bend of the lake), and that of Illinois at 42° 30'—about 61 miles north of the same line. The boundary line between Ohio and Michigan was settled after a bitter controversy, on the admission of the latter State into the Union, in 1837, in the acceptance by her of certain conditions proposed by Congress. These included the annexation to Michigan of what is known as the "Upper Peninsula," lying between Lakes Michigan and Superior, in lieu of a strip averaging six miles on her southern border, which she demanded from Ohio.—The establishment of the northern boundary of Illinois, in 1818, upon the line which now exists, is universally conceded to have been due to the action of Judge Nathaniel Pope, then the Delegate in Congress from Illinois Territory. While it was then acquiesced in without question, it has since been the subject of considerable controversy and has been followed by almost incalculable results. The "enabling act," as originally introduced early in 1818, empowering the people of Illinois Territory to form a State Government, fixed the northern boundary of the proposed State at 41° 39', then the supposed latitude of the southern extremity of Lake Michigan. While the act was under consideration in Committee of the Whole, Mr. Pope offered an amendment advancing the northern boundary to 42° 30'. The object of his amendment (as he explained) was to gain for the new State a coast line on Lake Michigan, bringing it into political and commercial relations with the States east of it—Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York—thus “affording additional security to the perpetuity of the Union.” He argued that the location of the State between the Mississippi, Wabash and Ohio Rivers—all flowing to the south—would bring it in intimate communication with the Southern States, and that, in the event of an attempted disruption of the Union, it was important that it should be identified with the commerce of the Lakes, instead of being left entirely to the waters of the south-flowing rivers. “Thus,” said he, “a rival interest would be created to check the wish for a Western or Southern Confederacy. Her interests would thus be balanced and her inclinations turned to the North.” He recognized Illinois as already “the key to the West,” and he evidently foresaw that the time might come when it would be the Keystone of the Union. While this evinced wonderful foresight, scarcely less convincing was his argument that, in time, a commercial emporium would grow up upon Lake Michigan, which would demand an outlet by means of a canal to the Illinois River—a work which was realized in the completion of the Illinois & Michigan Canal thirty years later, but which would scarcely have been accomplished had the State been practically cut off from the Lake and its chief emporium left to grow up in another commonwealth, or not at all. Judge Pope’s amendment was accepted without division, and, in this form, a few days later, the bill became a law.—The almost superhuman sagacity exhibited in Judge Pope’s argument, has been repeatedly illustrated in the commercial and political history of the State since, but never more significantly than in the commanding position which Illinois occupied during the late Civil War, with one of its citizens in the Presidential chair and another leading its 250,000 citizen soldiery and the armies of the Union in battling for the perpetuity of the Republic—a position which more than fulfilled every prediction made for it.—The territory affected by this settlement of the northern boundary, includes all that part of the State north of the northern line of La Salle County, and embraces the greater portion of the fourteen counties of Cook, Dupage, Kane, Lake, McHenry, Boone, DeKalb, Lee, Ogle, Winnebago, Stephenson, Jo Daviess, Carroll and Whiteside, with portions of Kendall, Will and Rock Island—estimated at 8,500 square miles, or more than one-seventh of the present area of the State. It has been argued that this territory belonged to the State of Wisconsin under the provisions of the Ordinance of 1787, and there were repeated attempts made, on the part of the Wisconsin Legislature and its Territorial Governor (Doty), between 1839 and 1843, to induce the people of these counties to recognize this claim. These were, in a few instances, partially successful, although no official notice was taken of them by the authorities of Illinois. The reply made to the Wisconsin claim by Governor Ford—who wrote his “History of Illinois” when the subject was fresh in the public mind—was that, while the Ordinance of 1787 gave Congress power to organize a State north of the parallel running through the southern bend of Lake Michigan, “there is nothing in the Ordinance requiring such additional State to be organized of the territory north of that line.” In other words, that, when Congress, in 1818, authorized the organization of an additional State north of and in (i. e., within) the line named, it did not violate the Ordinance of 1787, but acted in accordance with it—in practically assuming that the new State “need not necessarily include the whole of the region north of that line.” The question was set at rest by Wisconsin herself in the action of her Constitutional Convention of 1847-48, in framing her first constitution, in form recognizing the northern boundary of Illinois as fixed by the enabling act of 1818.

NORTHERN HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE, an institution for the treatment of the insane, created by Act of the Legislature, approved, April 16, 1869. The Commissioners appointed by Governor Palmer to fix its location consisted of August Adams, B. F. Shaw, W. R. Brown, M. L. Joslyn, D. S. Hammond and William Adams. After considering many offers and examining numerous sites, the Commissioners finally selected the Chisholm farm, consisting of about 155 acres, 1½ miles from Elgin, on the west side of Fox River, and overlooking that stream, as a site—this having been tendered as a donation by the citizens of Elgin. Plans were adopted in the latter part of 1869, the system of construction chosen conforming, in the main, to that of the United States Hospital for the Insane at Washington, D. C. By January, 1872, the north wing and rear building were so far advanced as to permit the reception of sixty patients. The center building was ready for occupancy in April, 1873, and the south wing before the end of the following year. The total expenditures previous to 1876 had exceeded $637,000, and since that date liberal appropriations have been made for additions, repairs and improvements, including the addition of between 300 and 400 acres to the lands connected with the institution. The first Board of Trustees consisted of Charles N. Holden, Oliver Everett and Henry W. Sherman, with Dr. E. A. Kilbourne as the first Superintendent, and Dr. Richard A. Dewey (afterwards Superintendent of the Eastern Hospital at Kankakee) as his Assistant. Dr. Kilbourne remained at the head of the institution until his death, Feb. 27, 1890, covering a period of nineteen years. Dr. Kilbourne was succeeded by Dr. Henry J. Brooks, and he, by Dr. Loewy, in June, 1893, and the latter by Dr. John B. Hamilton (former Superintending Surgeon of the United States Marine Hospital Service) in 1897. Dr. Hamilton died in December, 1898. (See Hamilton, John B.) The total value of State property, June 30, 1894, was $882,745.66, of which $701,330 was in land and buildings. Under the terms of the law establishing the hospital, provision is made for the care therein of the incurably insane, so that it is both a hospital and an asylum. The whole number of patients under treatment, for the two years preceding June 30, 1894, was 1,797, the number of inmates, on Dec. 1, 1897, 1,054, and the average daily attendance for treatment, for the year 1896, 1,296. The following counties comprise the district dependent upon the Elgin Hospital: Boone, Carroll, Cook, DeKalb, Jo Daviess, Kane, Kendall, Lake, Stephenson, Whiteside and Winnebago.

NORTHERN ILLINOIS NORMAL SCHOOL, an institution, incorporated in 1884, at Dixon, Lee County, Ill., for the purpose of giving instruction in branches related to the art of teaching. Its last report claims a total of 1,639 pupils, of whom 885 were men and 744 women, receiving instruction from thirty-six teachers. The total value of property was estimated at more than $200,000, of which $160,000 was in real estate and $45,000 in apparatus. Attendance on the institution has been affected by the establishment, under act of the Legislature of 1895, of the Northern State Normal School at DeKalb (which see).

NORTHERN PENITENTIARY, THE, an institution for the confinement of criminals of the State, located at Joliet, Will County. The site was purchased by the State in 1857, and comprises some seventy-two acres. Its erection was found necessary because of the inadequacy of the first penitentiary, at Alton. (See Alton Penitentiary.) The original plan contemplated a cell-house containing 1,000 cells, which, it was thought, would meet the public necessities for many years to come. Its estimated cost was $550,000; but, within ten years, there had been expended upon the institution the sum of $934,000, and its capacity was taxed to the utmost. Subsequent enlargements have increased the cost to over $1,600,000, but by 1877, the institution had become so overcrowded that the erection of another State penal institution became positively necessary. (See Southern Penitentiary.) The prison has always been conducted on "the Auburn system," which contemplates associate labor in silence, silent meals in a common refectory, and (as nearly as practicable) isolation at night. The system of labor has varied at different times, the "lessee system," the "contract system" and the "State account plan" being successively in force. (See Convict Labor.) The whole number of convicts in the institution, at the date of the official report of 1895, was 1,566. The total assets of the institution, Sept. 30, 1894, were reported at $2,121,308.86, of which $1,644,601.11 was in real estate.

NORTH & SOUTH RAILROAD. (See St. Louis, Peoria & Northern Railway.)

NORTHERN STATE NORMAL SCHOOL, an institution for the education of teachers of the common schools, authorized to be established by act of the Legislature passed at the session of 1895. The act made an appropriation of $50,000 for the erection of buildings and other improvements. The institution was located at DeKalb, DeKalb County, in the spring of 1896, and the erection of buildings commenced soon after—Isaac F. Ellwood, of DeKalb, contributing $20,000 in cash, and J. F. Glidden, a site of sixty-seven acres of land. Up to Dec. 1, 1897, the appropriations and contributions, in land and money, aggregated $175,000. The school was expected to be ready for the reception of pupils in the latter part of 1899, and, it is estimated, will accommodate 1,000 students.

NORTHWEST TERRITORY. The name formerly applied to that portion of the United States north and west of the Ohio River and east of the Mississippi, comprising the present States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin. The claim of the Government to the land had been acquired partly through conquest, by the expedition of Col. George Rogers Clark (which see), under the auspices of the State of Virginia in 1778; partly through treaties with the Indians, and partly through cessions from those of the original States laying claim thereto. The first plan for the government of this vast region was devised and formulated by Thomas Jefferson, in his proposed Ordinance of 1784, which failed of ultimate passage. But three years later a broader scheme was evolved, and the famous Ordinance of 1787, with its clause prohibiting the extension of slavery beyond the Ohio River, passed the Continental Congress. This act has been sometimes termed "The American Magna Charta," because of its engrafting upon the organic law the principles of human freedom and equal rights. The plan for the establishment of a distinctive territorial civil government in a new Territory—the first of its kind in the new republic—was felt to be a tentative step, and too much power was not granted to the residents. All the officers were appointive, and each official was required to be a land-owner. The elective franchise (but only for members of the General Assembly) could first be exercised only after the population had reached 5,000. Even then, every elector must own fifty acres of land, and every Representative, 200 acres. More liberal provisions, however, were subsequently incorporated by amendment, in 1809. The first civil government in the Northwest Territory was established by act of the Virginia Legislature, in the organization of all the country west of the Ohio under the name "Illinois County," of which the Governor was authorized to appoint a "County Lieutenant" or "Commandant-in-Chief." The first "Commandant" appointed was Col. John Todd, of Kentucky, though he continued to discharge the duties for only a short period, being killed in the battle of Blue Licks, in 1782. After that the Illinois Country was almost without the semblance of an organized civil government, until 1788, when Gen. Arthur St. Clair was appointed the first Governor of Northwest Territory, under the Ordinance of 1787, serving until the separation of this region into the Territories of Ohio and Indiana in 1800, when William Henry Harrison became the Governor of the latter, embracing all that portion of the original Northwest Territory except the State of Ohio. During St. Clair's administration (1790) that part of the present State of Illinois between the Mississippi and Illinois Rivers on the west, and a line extending north from about the site of old Fort Massac, on the Ohio, to the mouth of the Mackinaw River, in the present county of Tazewell, on the east, was erected into a county under the name of St. Clair, with three county-seats, viz.: Cahokia, Kaskaskia and Prairie du Rocher. (See St. Clair County.) Between 1830 and 1834 the name Northwest Territory was applied to an unorganized region, embracing the present State of Wisconsin, attached to Michigan Territory for governmental purposes. (See Illinois County; St. Clair, Arthur; and Todd, John.)

NORTHWESTERN COLLEGE, located at Naperville, Du Page County, and founded in 1865, under the auspices of the Evangelical Association. It maintains business, preparatory and collegiate departments, besides a theological school. In 1898 it had a faculty of nineteen professors and assistants, with some 360 students, less than one-third of the latter being females, though both sexes are admitted to the college on an equal footing. The institution owns property to the value of $207,000, including an endowment of $85,000.

NORTHWESTERN GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY. (See Chicago & Grand Trunk Railway.)

NORTHWESTERN NORMAL, located at Geneseo, Henry County, Ill., incorporated in 1884; in 1894 had a faculty of twelve teachers with 171 pupils, of whom ninety were male and eighty-one female.

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, an important educational institution, established at Evanston, in Cook County, in 1851. In 1898 it reported 2,599 students (1,980 male and 619 female), and a faculty of 234 instructors. It embraces the following departments, all of which confer degrees: A College of Liberal Arts; two Medical Schools (one for women exclusively); a Law School; a School of Pharmacy and a Dental College. The Garrett Biblical Institute, at which no degrees are conferred, constitutes the theological department of the University. The charter of the institution requires a majority of the Trustees to be members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the University is the largest and wealthiest of the schools controlled by that denomination. The College of Liberal Arts and the Garrett Biblical Institute are at Evanston; the other departments (all professional) are located in Chicago. In the academic department (Liberal Arts School), provision is made for both graduate and post-graduate courses. The Medical School was formerly known as the Chicago Medical College, and its Law Department was originally the Union College of Law, both of which have been absorbed by the University, as have also its schools of dentistry and pharmacy, which were formerly independent institutions. The property owned by the University is valued at $4,870,000, of which $1,100,000 is real estate, and $2,250,000 in endowment funds. Its income from fees paid by students in 1898 was $215,288, and total receipts from all sources, $482,359. Co-education of the sexes prevails in the College of Liberal Arts. Dr. Henry Wade Rogers is President.

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY MEDICAL SCHOOL, located in Chicago; was organized in 1859 as Medical School of the Lind (now Lake Forest) University. Three annual terms, of five months each, at first constituted a course, although attendance at two only was compulsory. The institution first opened in temporary quarters, Oct. 9, 1859, with thirteen professors and thirty-three students. By 1863 more ample accommodations were needed, and the Trustees of the Lind University being unable to provide a building, one was erected by the faculty. In 1864 the University relinquished all claim to the institution, which was thereupon incorporated as the Chicago Medical College. In 1868 the length of the annual terms was increased to six months, and additional requirements were imposed on candidates for both matriculation and graduation. The same year, the college building was sold, and the erection of a new and more commodious edifice, on the grounds of the Mercy Hospital, was commenced. This was completed in 1870, and the college became the medical department of the Northwestern University. The number of professorships had been increased to eighteen, and that of undergraduates to 107. Since that date new laboratory and clinical buildings have been erected, and the growth of the institution has been steady and substantial. Mercy and St. Luke's Hospital, and the South Side Free Dispensary afford resources for clinical instruction. The teaching faculty, as constituted in 1898, consists of about fifty instructors, including professors, lecturers, demonstrators, and assistants.

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY WOMAN'S MEDICAL SCHOOL, an institution for the professional education of women, located in Chicago. Its first corporate name was the "Woman's Hospital Medical College of Chicago," and it was in close connection with the Chicago Hospital for Women and Children. Later, it severed its connection with the hospital and took the name of the "Woman's Medical College of Chicago." Co-education of the sexes, in medicine and surgery, was experimentally tried from 1868 to 1870, but the experiment proved repugnant to the male students, who unanimously signed a protest against the continuance of the system. The result was the establishment of a separate school for women in 1870, with a faculty of sixteen professors. The requirements for graduation were fixed at four years of medical study, including three annual graded college terms of six months each. The first term opened in the autumn of 1870, with an attendance of twenty students. The original location of the school was in the "North Division" of Chicago, in temporary quarters. After the fire of 1871 a removal was effected to the "West Division," where (in 1878-79) a modest, but well arranged building was erected. A larger structure was built in 1884, and, in 1891, the institution became a part of the Northwestern University. The college, in all its departments, is organized along the lines of the best medical schools of the country. In 1896 there were twenty-four professorships, all capably filled, and among the faculty are some of the best known specialists in the country.

NORTON, Jesse O., lawyer, Congressman and Judge, was born at Bennington, Vt., April 25, 1812, and graduated from Williams College in 1835. He settled at Joliet in 1839, and soon became prominent in the affairs of Will County. His first public office was that of City Attorney, after which he served as County Judge (1846-50). Meanwhile, he was chosen a Delegate to the Constitutional Convention of 1847. In 1850 he was elected to the Legislature, and, in 1852, to Congress, as a Whig. His vigorous opposition to the repeal of the Missouri Compromise resulted in his re-election as a Representative in 1854. At the expiration of his second term (1857) he was chosen Judge of the eleventh circuit, to fill the unexpired term of Judge Randall, resigned. He was once more elected to Congress in 1862, but disagreed with his party as to the legal status of the States lately in rebellion. President Johnson appointed him United States Attorney for the Northern District of Illinois, which office he filled until 1869. Immediately upon his retirement he began private practice at Chicago, where he died, August 3, 1875.

NORWOOD PARK, a village of Cook County, on the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad (Wisconsin Division), 11 miles northwest of Chicago. Incorporated in City of Chicago, 1893.

NOYES, George Clement, clergyman, was born at Landaff, N. H., August 4, 1833, brought by his parents to Pike County, Ill., in 1844, and, at the age of 16, determined to devote his life to the ministry; in 1851, entered Illinois College at Jacksonville, graduating with first honors in the class of 1855. In the following autumn he entered Union Theological Seminary in New York, and, having graduated in 1858, was ordained the same year, and installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Laporte, Ind. Here he remained ten years, when he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church of Evanston, Ill., then a small organization which developed, during the twenty years of his pastorate, into one of the strongest and most influential churches in Evanston. For a number of years Dr. Noyes was an editorial writer and weekly correspondent of "The New York Evangelist," over the signature of "Clement." He was also, for several years, an active and very efficient member of the Board of Trustees of Knox College. The liberal bent of his mind was illustrated in the fact that he acted as counsel for Prof. David Swing, during the celebrated trial of the latter for heresy before the Chicago Presbytery—his argument on that occasion winning encomiums from all classes of people. His death took place at Evanston, Jan. 14, 1889, as the result of an attack of pneumonia, and was deeply deplored, not only by his own church and denomination, but by the whole community. Some two weeks after it occurred a union meeting was held in one of the churches at Evanston, at which addresses in commemoration of his services were delivered by some dozen ministers of that village and of Chicago, while various social and literary organizations and the press bore testimony to his high character. He was a member of the Literary Society of Chicago, and, during the last year of his life, served as its President. Dr. Noyes was married, in 1858, to a daughter of David A. Smith, Esq., an honored citizen and able lawyer of Jacksonville.

OAKLAND, a city of Coles County on the Vandalia Line and the Toledo, St. Louis & Western Railroad, 15 miles northeast of Charleston; is in grain center and broom-corn belt; the town has two banks and one daily and two weekly papers. Pop. (1890), 995; (1900), 1,198.

OAK PARK, a village of Cook County, and popular residence suburb of Chicago, 9 miles west of the initial station of the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad, on which it is located; is also upon the line of the Wisconsin Central Railroad. The place has numerous churches, prosperous schools, a public library, telegraph and express offices, banks and two local papers. Population (1890), 1,888; (1890), 4,771.

OBERLY, John H., journalist and Civil Service Commissioner, was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, Dec. 6, 1837; spent part of his boyhood in Allegheny County, Pa., but, in 1853, began learning the printer's trade in the office of "The Wooster (Ohio) Republican," completing it at Memphis, Tenn., and becoming a journeyman printer in 1857. He worked in various offices, including the Wooster paper, where he also began the study of law, but, in 1860, became part proprietor of "The Bulletin" job office at Memphis, in which he had been employed as an apprentice, and, later, as foreman. Having been notified to leave Memphis on account of his Union principles after the beginning of the Civil War, he returned to Wooster, Ohio, and conducted various papers there during the next four years; but, in 1865, came to Cairo, Ill., where he served for a time as foreman of "The Cairo Democrat," three years later establishing "The Cairo Bulletin." Although the latter paper was burned out a few months later, it was immediately re-established. In 1872 he was elected Representative in the Twenty-eighth General Assembly, and, in 1877, was appointed by Governor Cullom the Democratic member of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission, serving four years, meanwhile (in 1880) being the Democratic candidate for Secretary of State. Other positions held by him included Mayor of the city of Cairo (1869); President of the National Typographical Union at Chicago (1865), and at Memphis (1866); delegate to the Democratic National Convention at Baltimore (1872), and Chairman of the Democratic State Central Committee (1882-84). After retiring from the Railroad and Warehouse Commission, he united in founding "The Bloomington (Ill.) Bulletin," of which he was editor some three years. During President Cleveland's administration he was appointed a member of the Civil Service Commission, being later transferred to the Commissionership of Indian Affairs. He was subsequently connected in an editorial capacity with "The Washington Post," "The Richmond (Va.) State," "The Concord (N. H.) People and Patriot" and "The Washington Times." While engaged in an attempt to reorganize "The People and Patriot," he died at Concord, N. H., April 15, 1899.

ODD FELLOWS. "Western Star" Lodge, No. 1, I. O. O. F., was instituted at Alton, June 11, 1836. In 1838 the Grand Lodge of Illinois was instituted at the same place, and reorganized, at Springfield, in 1842. S. C. Pierce was the first Grand Master, and Samuel L. Miller, Grand Secretary. Wilkey Encampment, No. 1, was organized at Alton in 1838, and the Grand Encampment, at Peoria, in 1850, with Charles H. Constable Grand Patriarch. In 1850 the subordinate branches of the Order numbered seventy-six, with 3,291 members, and $25,392.87 revenue. In 1895 the Lodges numbered 838, the membership 50,544, with $475,252.18 revenue, of which $135,018.40 was expended for relief. The Encampment branch, in 1895, embraced 179 organizations with a membership of 6,812 and $23,865.25 revenue, of which $6,781.40 was paid out for relief. The Rebekah branch, for the same year, comprised 422 Lodges, with 22,000 members and $43,215.65 revenue, of which $3,122.79 was for relief. The total sum distributed for relief by the several organizations (1895) was $144,972.59. The Order was especially liberal in its benefactions to the sufferers by the Chicago fire of 1871, an appeal to its members calling forth a generous response throughout the United States. (See Odd Fellows' Orphans' Home.)

ODD FELLOWS' ORPHANS' HOME, a benevolent institution, incorporated in 1889, erected at Lincoln, Ill., under the auspices of the Daughters of Rebekah (see Odd Fellows), and dedicated August 19, 1892. The building is four stories in height, has a capacity for the accommodation of fifty children, and cost $36,524.76, exclusive of forty acres of land valued at $8,000.

ODELL, a village of Livingston County, and station on the Chicago & Alton Railway, 82 miles south-southwest of Chicago. It is in a grain and stock-raising region. Population (1890), 908; (1890), 800; (1900), 1,000.

ODIN, a village of Marion County, at the crossing of the Chicago branch of the Illinois Central and the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railways, 244 miles south by west from Chicago; in fruit belt; has coal-mine, two fruit evaporators, bank and a newspaper. Pop. (1900), 1,180.

O'FALLON, a village of St. Clair County, on the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway, 18 miles east of St. Louis; has interurban railway, electric lights, water-works, factories, coal-mine, bank and a newspaper. Pop. (1900), 1,267.

OGDEN, William Butler, capitalist and Railway President, born at Walton, N. Y., June 15, 1805. He was a member of the New York Legislature in 1834, and, the following year, removed to Chicago, where he established a land and trust agency. He took an active part in the various enterprises centering around Chicago, and, on the incorporation of the city, was elected its first Mayor. He was prominently identified with the construction of the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad, and, in 1847, became its President. While visiting Europe in 1853, he made a careful study of the canals of Holland, which convinced him of the desirability of widening and deepening the Illinois & Michigan Canal and of constructing a ship canal across the southern peninsula of Michigan. In 1855 he became President of the Chicago, St. Paul & Fond du Lac Railroad, and effected its consolidation with the Galena & Chicago Union. Out of this consolidation sprang the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company, of which he was elected President. In 1850 he presided over the National Pacific Railroad Convention, and, upon the formation of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, he became its President. He was largely connected with the inception of the Northern Pacific line, in the success of which he was a firm believer. He also controlled various other interests of public importance, among them the great lumbering establishments at Peshtigo, Wis., and, at the time of his death, was the owner of what was probably the largest plant of that description in the world. His benefactions were numerous, among the recipients being the Rush Medical College, of which he was President; the Theological Seminary of the Northwest, the Chicago Historical Society, the Academy of Sciences, the University of Chicago, the Astronomical Society, and many other educational and benevolent institutions and organizations in the Northwest. Died, in New York City, August 3, 1877. (See Chicago & Northwestern Railroad.)

OGLE, Joseph, pioneer, was born in Virginia in 1741, came to Illinois in 1785, settling in the American Bottom within the present County of Monroe, but afterwards removed to St. Clair County, about the site of the present town of O'Fallon, 8 miles north of Belleville; was selected by his neighbors to serve as Captain in their skirmishes with the Indians. Died, at his home in St. Clair County, in February, 1821. Captain Ogle had the reputation of being the earliest convert to Methodism in Illinois. Ogle County, in Northern Illinois, was named in his honor.—Jacob (Ogle), son of the preceding, also a native of Virginia, was born about 1772, came to Illinois with his father in 1785, and was a "Ranger" in the War of 1812. He served as a Representative from St. Clair County in the Third General Assembly (1822), and again in the Seventh (1830), in the former being an opponent of the pro-slavery convention scheme. Beyond two terms in the Legislature he seems to have held no public office except that of Justice of the Peace. Like his father, he was a zealous Methodist and highly respected. Died, in 1844, aged 72 years.

OGLE COUNTY, next to the "northern tier" of counties of the State and originally a part of Jo Daviess. It was separately organized in 1837, and Lee County was carved from its territory in 1839. In 1900 its area was 780 square miles, and its population 29,129. Before the Black Hawk War immigration was slow, and life primitive. Peoria was the nearest food market. New grain was "ground" on a grater, and old pounded with an extemporized pestle in a wooden mortar. Rock River flows across the county from northeast to southwest. A little oak timber grows along its banks, but, generally speaking, the surface is undulating prairie, with soil of a rich loam. Sandstone is in ample supply, and all the limestones abound. An extensive peat-bed has been discovered on the Killbuck Creek. Oregon, the county-seat, has fine water-power. The other principal towns are Rochelle, Polo, Forreston and Mount Morris.

OGLESBY, Richard James, Governor and United States Senator, was born in Oldham County, Ky., July 25, 1824; left an orphan at the age of 8 years; in 1836 accompanied an uncle to Decatur, Ill., where, until 1844, he worked at farming, carpentering and rope-making, devoting his leisure hours to the study of law. In 1845 he was admitted to the bar and began practice at Sullivan, in Moultrie County. In 1846 he was commissioned a Lieutenant in the Fourth Regiment, Illinois Volunteers (Col. E. D. Baker's regiment), and served through the Mexican War, taking part in the siege of Vera Cruz and the battle of Cerro Gordo. In 1847 he pursued a course of study at the Louisville Law School, graduating in 1848. He was a "forty-niner" in California, but returned to Decatur in 1851. In 1858 he made an unsuccessful campaign for Congress in the Decatur District. In 1860 he was elected to the State Senate, but early in 1861 resigned his seat to accept the colonelcy of the Eighth Illinois Volunteers. Through gallantry (notably at Forts Henry and Donelson and at Corinth) he rose to be Major-General, being severely wounded in the last-named battle. He resigned his commission on account of disability, in May, 1864, and the following November was elected Governor, as a Republican. In 1873 he was re-elected Governor, but, two weeks after his inauguration, resigned to accept a seat in the United States Senate, to which he was elected by the Legislature of 1873. In 1884 he was elected Governor for the third time—being the only man in the history of the State who (up to the present time—1899) has been thus honored. After the expiration of his last term as Governor, he devoted his attention to his private affairs at his home at Elkhart, in Logan County, where he died, April 24, 1899, deeply mourned by personal and political friends in all parts of the Union, who admired his strict integrity and sterling patriotism.

OHIO, INDIANA & WESTERN RAILWAY. (See Peoria & Eastern Railroad.)

OHIO RIVER, an affluent of the Mississippi, formed by the union of the Monongahela and Allegheny Rivers, at Pittsburgh, Pa. At this point it becomes a navigable stream about 400 yards wide, with an elevation of about 700 feet above sea-level. The beauty of the scenery along its banks secured for it, from the early French explorers (of whom La Salle was one), the name of "La Belle Riviere." Its general course is to the southwest, but with many sinuosities, forming the southern boundary of the States of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, and the western and northern boundary of West Virginia and Kentucky, until it enters the Mississippi at Cairo, in latitude 37° N., and about 1,200 miles above the mouth of the latter stream. The area which it drains is computed to be 214,000 square miles. Its mouth is 268 feet above the level of the sea. The current is remarkably gentle and uniform, except near Louisville, where there is a descent of twenty-two feet within two miles, which is evaded by means of a canal around the falls. Large steamboats can navigate its whole length, except in low stages of water and when closed by ice in winter. Its largest affluents are the Tennessee, the Cumberland, the Kentucky, the Great Kanawha and the Green Rivers, from the south, and the Wabash, the Miami, Scioto and Muskingum from the north. The principal cities on its banks are Pittsburg, Wheeling, Cincinnati, Louisville, Evansville, New Albany, Madison and Cairo. It is crossed by bridges at Wheeling, Cincinnati and Cairo. The surface of the Ohio is subject to a variation of forty-two to fifty-one feet between high and low water. Its length is 975 miles, and its width varies from 400 to 1,000 yards. (See Inundations, Remarkable.)

OHIO & MISSISSIPPI RAILWAY. (See Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railroad.)

OLNEY, an incorporated city and the county-seat of Richland County, 81 miles west of Vincennes, Ind., and 117 miles east of St. Louis, Mo., at the junction of the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern and the Peoria Division of the Illinois Central and the Ohio River Division of the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Railroad; is in the center of the fruit belt and an important shipping point for farm produce and live-stock; has flour mills, a furniture factory and railroad repair shops, banks, a public library, churches and five newspapers, one issuing daily and another semi-weekly editions. Population (1890), 8,831; (1900), 4,260.

OMELVENY, John, pioneer and head of a numerous family which became prominent in Southern Illinois; was a native of Ireland who came to America about 1798 or 1799. After residing in Kentucky a few years, he removed to Illinois, locating in what afterwards became Pope County, whither his oldest son, Samuel, had preceded him about 1797 or 1798. The latter for a time followed the occupation of flat-boating, carrying produce to New Orleans. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1818 from Pope County, being the colleague of Hamlet Ferguson. A year later he removed to Randolph County, where he served as a member of the County Court, but, in 1820-22, we find him a member of the Second General Assembly from Union County, having successfully contested the seat of Samuel Alexander, who had received the certificate of election. He died in 1828.—Edward (Omenveny), another member of this family, and grandson of the elder John Omenveny, represented Monroe County in the Fifteenth General Assembly (1846-48), and was Presidential Elector in 1852, but died sometime during the Civil War.—Harvey K. S. (Omenveny), the fifth son of William Omenveny and grandson of John, was born in Todd County, Ky., in 1823, came to Southern Illinois, in 1852, and engaged in the practice of law, being for a time the partner of Senator Thomas E. Merritt, at Salem. Early in 1858 he was elected a Justice of the Circuit Court to succeed Judge Breese, who had been promoted to the Supreme Court, but resigned in 1861. He gained considerable notoriety by his intense hostility to the policy of the Government during the Civil War, was a Delegate to the Constitutional Convention of 1862, and was named as a member of the Peace Commission proposed to be appointed by the General Assembly, in 1863, to secure terms of peace with the Southern Confederacy. He was also a leading spirit in the peace meeting held at Peoria, in August, 1863. In 1869 Mr. Omenveny removed to Los Angeles, Cal., which has since been his home, and where he has carried on a lucrative law practice.

ONARGA, a town in Iroquois County, on the Illinois Central Railroad, 85 miles south by west from Chicago, and 43 miles north by east from Champaign. It is a manufacturing town, flour, wagons, wire-fencing, stoves and tile being among the products. It has a bank, eight churches, a graded school, a commercial college, and a weekly newspaper. Population (1890), 1,061; (1890), 994; (1900), 1,270.

ONEIDA, a city in Knox County, on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, 12 miles northeast of Galesburg; has wagon, pump and furniture factories, two banks, electric lights, several churches, a graded school, and a weekly paper. The surrounding country is rich prairie, where coal is mined about twenty feet below the surface. Pop. (1890), 699; (1900), 785.

OQUAWKA, the county-seat of Henderson County, situated on the Mississippi River, about 15 miles above Burlington, Iowa, and 32 miles west of Galesburg. It is in a farming region, but has some manufactories. The town has five churches, a graded school, a bank and three newspapers. Population (1900), 1,010.

ORDINANCE OF 1787. This is the name given to the first organic act, passed by Congress, for the government of the territory northwest of the Ohio River, comprising the present States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin. The first step in this direction was taken in the appointment, by Congress, on March 1, 1784, of a committee, of which Thomas Jefferson was Chairman, to prepare a plan for the temporary government of the region which had been acquired, by the capture of Kaskaskia, by Col. George Rogers Clark, nearly six years previous. The necessity for some step of this sort had grown all the more urgent, in consequence of the recognition of the right of the United States to this region by the Treaty of Paris of 1783, and the surrender, by Virginia, of the title she had maintained thereto on account of Clark's conquest under her auspices—a right which she had exercised by furnishing whatever semblance of government so far existed northwest of the Ohio. The report submitted from Jefferson's committee proposed the division of the Territory into seven States, to which was added the proviso that, after the year 1800, "there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in any of said States, otherwise than in punishment of crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted." This report failed of adoption, however, Congress contenting itself with the passage of a resolution providing for future organization of this territory into States by the people—the measures necessary for temporary government being left to future Congressional action. While the postponement, in the resolution as introduced by Jefferson, of the inhibition of slavery to the year 1800, has been criticised, its introduction was significant, as coming from a representative from a slave State, and being the first proposition in Congress looking to restriction, of any character, on the subject of slavery. Congress having taken no further step under the resolution adopted in 1784, the condition of the country (thus left practically without a responsible government, while increasing in population) became constantly more deplorable. An appeal from the people about Kaskaskia for some better form of government, in 1786, aided by the influence of the newly organized "Ohio Company," who desired to encourage emigration to the lands which they were planning to secure from the General Government, at last brought about the desired result, in the passage of the famous "Ordinance," on the 13th day of July, 1787. While making provision for a mode of temporary self-government by the people, its most striking features are to be found in the six "articles"—a sort of "Bill of Rights"—with which the document closes. These assert: (1) the right of freedom of worship and religious opinion; (2) the right to the benefit of habeas corpus and trial by jury; to proportionate representation, and to protection in liberty and property; (3) that "religion, morality and knowledge, being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged"; (4) that the States, formed within the territory referred to, "shall forever remain a part of this confederacy of the United States of America, subject to the Articles of Confederation and to such alterations therein as shall be constitutionally made"; (5) prescribe the boundaries of the States to be formed therein and the conditions of their admission into the Union; and (6—and most significant of all) repeat the prohibition regarding the introduction of slavery into the Northwest Territory, as proposed by Jefferson, but without any qualification as to time. There has been considerable controversy regarding the authorship of this portion of the Ordinance, into which it is not necessary to enter here. While it has been characterized as a second and advanced Declaration of Independence—and probably no single act of Congress was ever fraught with more important and far-reaching results—it seems remarkable that a majority of the States supporting it and securing its adoption, were then, and long continued to be, slave States.

OREGON, the county-seat of Ogle County, situated on Rock River and the Minneapolis Branch of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, 100 miles west from Chicago. The surrounding region is agricultural; the town has water power and manufactures flour, pianos, steel tanks, street sprinklers, and iron castings. It has two banks, water-works supplied by flowing artesian wells, cereal mill, and two weekly newspapers; has also obtained some repute as a summer resort. Pop. (1880), 1,088; (1890), 1,566; (1900), 1,577.

ORION, a village of Henry County, at the intersection of the Rock Island Division of the Chicago Burlington & Quincy and the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railways, 19 miles southeast of Rock Island. Pop. (1890), 624; (1900), 584.

OSBORN, William Henry, Railway President, was born at Salem, Mass., Dec. 21, 1820. After receiving a high school education in his native town, he entered the counting room of the East India house of Peele, Hubbell & Co.; was subsequently sent to represent the firm at Manila, finally engaging in business on his own account, during which he traveled extensively in Europe. Returning to the United States in 1853, he took up his residence in New York, and, having married the daughter of Jonathan Sturges, one of the original incorporators and promoters of the Illinois Central Railroad, he soon after became associated with that enterprise. In August, 1854, he was chosen a Director of the Company, and, on Dec. 1, 1855, became its third President, serving in the latter position nearly ten years (until July 11, 1865), and, as a Director, until 1877—in all, twenty-two years. After retiring from his connection with the Illinois Central Railroad, Mr. Osborn gave his attention largely to enterprises of an educational and benevolent character in aid of the unfortunate classes in the State of New York.

OSBORN, Thomas O., soldier and diplomatist, was born in Licking County, Ohio, August 11, 1832; graduated from the Ohio University at Athens, in 1854; studied law at Crawfordsville, Ind., with Gen. Lew Wallace, was admitted to the bar and began practice in Chicago. Early in the war for the Union he joined the "Yates Phalanx," which, after some delay on account of the quota being full, was mustered into the service, in August, 1861, as the Thirty-ninth Illinois Volunteers, the subject of this sketch being commissioned its Lieutenant-Colonel. His promotion to the colonelcy soon followed, the regiment being sent east to guard the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, where it met the celebrated Stonewall Jackson, and took part in many important engagements, including the battles of Winchester, Bermuda Hundreds, and Drury's Bluff, besides the sieges of Charleston and Petersburg. At Bermuda Hundreds Colonel Osborn was severely wounded, losing the use of his right arm. He bore a conspicuous part in the operations about Richmond which resulted in the capture of the rebel capital, his services being recognized by promotion to the brevet rank of Major-General. At the close of the war he returned to the practice of law in Chicago, but, in 1874, was appointed Consul-General and Minister-Resident to the Argentine Republic, remaining in that position until June, 1885, when he resigned, resuming his residence in Chicago.

OSWEGO, a village in Kendall County, on the Aurora and Streator branch of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway, 6 miles south of Aurora. Population (1890), 641; (1900), 618.

OTTAWA, the county-seat and principal city of La Salle County, being incorporated as a village in 1838, and, as a city, in 1853. It is located at the confluence of the Illinois and Fox Rivers and on the Illinois & Michigan Canal. It is the intersecting point of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway and the Streator branch of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, 98 miles east of Rock Island and 83 miles west-southwest of Chicago. The surrounding region abounds in coal. Sand of a superior quality for the manufacture of glass is found in the vicinity and the place has extensive glass works. Other manufactured products are brick, drain-tile, sewer-pipe, tile-roofing, pottery, pianos, organs, cigars, wagons and carriages, agricultural implements, hay carriers, hay presses, sash, doors, blinds, cabinet work, saddlery and harness and pumps. The city has some handsome public buildings including the Appellate (formerly Supreme) Court House for the Northern Division. It also has several public parks, one of which (South Park) contains a medicinal spring. There are a dozen churches and numerous public school buildings, including a high school. The city is lighted by gas and electricity, has electric street railways, good sewerage, and water-works supplied from over 150 artesian wells and numerous natural springs. It has one private and two national banks, five libraries, and eight weekly newspapers (three German), of which four issue daily editions. Pop. (1890), 9,985; (1900), 10,588.

OTTAWA, CHICAGO & FOX RIVER VALLEY RAILROAD. (See Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad.)

OUTAGAMIES, a name given, by the French, to the Indian tribe known as the Foxes. (See Sacs and Foxes.)

OWEN, Thomas J. V., early legislator and Indian Agent, was born in Kentucky, April 5, 1801; came to Illinois at an early day, and, in 1830, was elected to the Seventh General Assembly from Randolph County; the following year was appointed Indian Agent at Chicago, as successor to Dr. Alexander Wolcott, who had died in the latter part of 1830. Mr. Owen served as Indian Agent until 1833; was a member of the first Board of Town Trustees of the village of Chicago, Commissioner of School Lands, and one of the Government Commissioners who conducted the treaty with the Pottawatomie and other tribes of Indians at Chicago, in September, 1833. Died, in Chicago, Oct. 15, 1835.

PADDOCK, Gaius, pioneer, a native of Massachusetts, was born in 1758; at the age of 17 he entered the Colonial Army, serving until the close of the Revolutionary War, and being in Washington's command at the crossing of the Delaware. After the war he removed to Vermont; but, in 1815, went to Cincinnati, and, a year later, to St. Charles, Mo. Then, after having spent about a year at St. Louis, in 1818 he located in Madison County, Ill., at a point afterwards known as "Paddock's Grove," and which became one of the most prosperous agricultural sections of Southern Illinois. Died, in 1831.

PAINE, (Gen.) Eleazer A., soldier, was born in Parkman, Geauga County, Ohio, Sept. 10, 1815; graduated at West Point Military Academy, in 1839, and was assigned to the First Infantry, serving in the Florida War (1839-40), but resigned, Oct. 11, 1840. He then studied law and practiced at Painesville, Ohio, (1843-48), and at Monmouth, Ill., (1848-61), meanwhile serving in the lower branch of the Eighteenth General Assembly (1852-53). Before leaving Ohio, he had been Deputy United States Marshal and Lieutenant-Colonel of the State Militia, and, in Illinois, became Brigadier-General of Militia (1845-48). He was appointed Colonel of the Ninth Illinois in April, 1861, and served through the war, being promoted Brigadier-General in September, 1861. The first duty performed by his regiment, after this date, was the occupation of Paducah, Ky., where he was in command. Later, it took part in the capture of Forts Henry and Donelson, the battles of Shiloh, New Madrid and Corinth, and also in the various engagements in Northern Georgia and in the "march to the sea." From November, 1862, to May, 1864, General Paine was guarding railroad lines in Central Tennessee, and, during a part of 1864, in command of the Western District of Kentucky. He resigned, April 5, 1865, and died in Jersey City, Dec. 16, 1882. A sturdy Union man, he performed his duty as a soldier with great zeal and efficiency.

PALATINE, a village of Cook County, on the Wisconsin Division of the Chicago & Northwest-ern Railroad, 26 miles northwest from Chicago. There are flour and planing mills here; dairying and farming are leading industries of the surrounding country. Population (1880), 731; (1890), 891; (1900), 1,020.

PALESTINE, a town in Crawford County, about 2 miles from the Wabash River, 7 miles east of Robinson, and 35 miles southwest of Terre Haute, on the Illinois Central Railway; has five churches, a graded school, a bank, weekly newspaper, flour mill, cold storage plant, canning factory, garment factory, and municipal light and power plant. Pop. (1890), 732; (1900), 979.

PALMER, Frank W., journalist, ex-Congressman and Public Printer, was born at Manchester, Dearborn County, Ind., Oct. 11, 1827; learned the printer's trade at Jamestown, N. Y., afterwards edited "The Jamestown Journal," and served two terms in the New York Legislature; in 1858 removed to Dubuque, Iowa, and edited "The Dubuque Times," was elected to Congress in 1860, and again in 1868 and 1872, meanwhile having purchased "The Des Moines Register," which he edited for several years. In 1873 he removed to Chicago and became editor of "The Inter Ocean," remaining two years; in 1877 was appointed Postmaster of the city of Chicago, serving eight years. Shortly after the accession of President Harrison, in 1889, he was appointed Public Printer, continuing in office until the accession of President Cleveland in 1893, when he returned to newspaper work, but resumed his old place at the head of the Government Printing Bureau after the inauguration of President McKinley in 1897.

PALMER, John McAuley, lawyer, soldier and United States Senator, was born in Scott County, Ky., Sept. 13, 1817; removed with his father to Madison County, Ill., in 1831, and, four years later, entered Shurtleff College, at Upper Alton, as a student; later taught and studied law, being admitted to the bar in 1839. In 1843 he was elected Probate Judge of Macoupin County, also served in the State Constitutional Convention of 1847; after discharging the duties of Probate and County Judge, was elected to the State Senate, to fill a vacancy, in 1852, and re-elected in 1854, as an Anti-Nebraska Democrat, casting his vote for Lyman Trumbull for United States Senator in 1855, but resigned his seat in 1856; was President of the first Republican State Convention, held at Bloomington in the latter year, and appointed a delegate to the National Convention at Philadelphia; was an unsuccessful candidate for Congress in 1859, and chosen a Presidential Elector on the Republican ticket in 1860; served as a member of the National Peace Conference of 1861; entered the army as Colonel of the Fourteenth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry; was promoted Brigadier General, in November, 1861, taking part in the campaign in Tennessee up to Chickamauga, assuming the command of the Fourteenth Army Corps with the rank of Major-General, but was relieved at his own request before Atlanta. In 1865 he was assigned, by President Lincoln, to command of the Military Department of Kentucky, but, in September, 1866, retired from the service, and, in 1867, became a citizen of Springfield. The following year he was elected Governor, as a Republican, but, in 1873, supported Horace Greeley for President, and has since co-operated with the Democratic party. He was three times the unsuccessful candidate of his party for United States Senator, and was their nominee for Governor in 1888, but defeated. In 1890 he was nominated for United States Senator by the Democratic State Convention and elected in joint session of the Legislature, March 11, 1891, receiving on the 154th ballot 101 Democratic and two Farmers' Mutual Alliance votes. He became an important factor in the campaign of 1896 as candidate of the "Sound Money" Democracy for President, although receiving no electoral votes, proving his devotion to principle. His last years were occupied in preparation of a volume of personal recollections, which was completed, under the title of "The Story of an Earnest Life," a few weeks before his death, which occurred at his home in Springfield, September 25, 1900.

PALMER, Potter, merchant and capitalist, was born in Albany County, N. Y., in 1825; received an English education and became a junior clerk in a country store at Durham, Greene County, in that State, three years later being placed in charge of the business, and finally engaging in business on his own account. Coming to Chicago in 1852, he embarked in the dry-goods business on Lake Street, establishing the house which afterwards became Field, Leiter & Co. (now Marshall Field & Co.), from which he retired, in 1865, with the basis of an ample fortune, which has since been immensely increased by fortunate operations in real estate. Mr. Palmer was Second Vice-President of the first Board of Local Directors of the World's Columbian Exposition in 1891.—Mrs. Bertha M. Honore (Palmer), wife of the preceding, is the daughter of H. H.

Honore, formerly a prominent real-estate owner and operator of Chicago. She is a native of Louisville, Ky., where her girlhood was chiefly spent, though she was educated at a convent near Baltimore, Md. Later she came with her family to Chicago, and, in 1870, was married to Potter Palmer. Mrs. Palmer has been a recognized leader in many social and benevolent movements, but won the highest praise by her ability and administrative skill, exhibited as President of the Board of Lady Managers of the World's Columbian Exposition of 1893.

PALMYRA, a village of Macoupin County, on the Springfield Division of the St. Louis, Chicago & St. Paul Railway, 33 miles southwest from Springfield; has some local manufactories, a bank and a newspaper. Population (1900), 813.

PANA, an important railway center and principal city of Christian County, situated in the southeastern part of the County, and at the intersecting point of the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern, the Illinois Central and the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railroads, 35 miles south by west from Decatur, and 42 miles southeast of Springfield. It is an important shipping-point for grain and has two elevators. Its mechanical establishments include two flouring mills, a foundry, two machine shops and two planing mills. The surrounding region is rich in coal, which is extensively mined. Pana has banks, several churches, graded schools, and three papers issuing daily and weekly editions. Population (1890), 5,077; (1900), 5,530.

PANA, SPRINGFIELD & NORTHWESTERN RAILROAD. (See Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railroad.)

PARIS, a handsome and flourishing city, the county-seat of Edgar County. It is an important railway center, situated on the "Big Four" and the Vandalia Line, 160 miles south of Chicago, and 170 miles east-northeast of St. Louis; is in the heart of a wealthy and populous agricultural region, and has a prosperous trade. Its industries include foundries, three elevators, flour, saw and planing mills, glass, broom, and corn product factories. The city has three banks, three daily and four weekly newspapers, a court house, ten churches, and graded schools. Pop. (1890), 4,996; (1900), 6,105.

PARKS, Gavion D. A., lawyer, was born at Bristol, Ontario County, N. Y., Sept. 17, 1817; went to New York City in 1838, where he completed his legal studies and was admitted to the bar, removing to Lockport, Ill., in 1842. Here he successively edited a paper, served as Master in Chancery and in an engineering corps on the Illinois & Michigan Canal; was elected County Judge in 1849, removed to Joliet, and, for a time, acted as an attorney of the Chicago & Rock Island, the Michigan Central and the Chicago & Alton Railroads; was also a Trustee of the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb at Jacksonville; was elected Representative in 1852, became a Republican and served on the first Republican State Central Committee (1856); the same year was elected to the State Senate, and was a Commissioner of the State Penitentiary in 1864. In 1872 Mr. Parks joined in the Liberal-Republican movement, was defeated for Congress, and afterwards acted with the Democratic party. Died, Dec. 28, 1895.

PARKS, Lawson A., journalist, was born at Mecklenburg, N. C., April 15, 1813; learned the printing trade at Charlotte, in that State; came to St. Louis in 1833, and, in 1836, assisted in establishing "The Alton Telegraph," but sold his interest a few years later. Then, having officiated as pastor of Presbyterian churches for some years, in 1854 he again became associated with "The Telegraph," acting as its editor. Died at Alton, March 31, 1875.

PARK RIDGE, a suburban village on the Wisconsin Division of the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad, 13 miles northwest of Chicago. Population (1880), 457; (1890), 987; (1900), 1,340.

PARTRIDGE, Charles Addison, journalist and Assistant Adjutant-General of the Grand Army of the Republic, was born in Westford, Chittenden County, Vt., Dec. 8, 1843; came with his parents to Lake County, Ill., in 1844, and spent his boyhood on a farm, receiving his education in the district school, with four terms in a high school at Burlington, Wis. At 16 he taught a winter district school near his boyhood home, and at 18 enlisted in what became Company C of the Ninety-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, being mustered into the service as Eighth Corporal at Rockford. His regiment becoming attached to the Army of the Cumberland, he participated with it in the battles of Chickamauga and the Atlanta campaign, as well as those of Franklin and Nashville, and has taken a just pride in the fact that he never fell out on the march, took medicine from a doctor or was absent from his regiment during its term of service, except for four months while recovering from a gun-shot wound received at Chickamauga. He was promoted successively to Sergeant, Sergeant-Major, and commissioned Second Lieutenant of his old company, of which his father was First Lieutenant for six months and until forced to resign on account of impaired health. Receiving his final discharge, June 28, 1865, he returned to the farm, where he remained until 1869, in the meantime being married to Miss Jennie E. Earle, in 1866, and teaching school one winter. In 1869 he was elected County Treasurer of Lake County on the Republican ticket, and re-elected in 1871; in January of the latter year, purchased an interest in "The Waukegan Gazette," with which he remained associated some fifteen years, at first as the partner of Rev. A. K. Fox, and later of his younger brother, H. E. Partridge. In 1877 he was appointed, by President Hayes, Postmaster at Waukegan, serving four years; in 1886 was elected to the Legislature, serving (by successive elections) as Representative in the Thirty-fifth, Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh General Assemblies, being frequently called upon to occupy the Speaker's chair, and, especially during the long Senatorial contest of 1891, being recognized as a leader of the Republican minority. In 1888 he was called to the service of the Republican State Central Committee (of which he had previously been a member), as assistant to the veteran Secretary, the late Daniel Shepard, remaining until the death of his chief, when he succeeded to the secretaryship. During the Presidential campaign of 1892 he was associated with the late William J. Campbell, then the Illinois member of the Republican National Committee, and was entrusted by him with many important and confidential missions. Without solicitation on his part, in 1894 he was again called to assume the secretaryship of the Republican State Central Committee, and bore a conspicuous and influential part in winning the brilliant success achieved by the party in the campaign of that year. From 1893 to 1895 he served as Mayor of Waukegan; in 1896 became Assistant Adjutant-General of the Grand Army of the Republic for the Department of Illinois—a position which he held in 1899 under Commander James S. Martin, and to which he has been re-appointed by successive Department Commanders up to the present time. Mr. Partridge's service in the various public positions held by him, has given him an acquaintance extending to every county in the State.

PATOKA, a village of Marion County, on the Western branch of the Illinois Central Railway, 15 miles south of Vandalia. There are flour and saw mills here; the surrounding country is agricultural. Population (1890), 502; (1900), 640.

PATTERSON, Robert Wilson, D.D., LL.D., clergyman, was born in Blount County, Tenn., Jan. 21, 1814; came to Bond County, Ill., with his parents in 1832, his father dying two years later; at 18 had had only nine months' schooling, but graduated at Illinois College in 1837; spent a year at Lane Theological Seminary, another as tutor in Illinois College, and then, after two years more at Lane Seminary and preaching in Chicago and at Monroe, Mich., in 1842 established the Second Presbyterian Church of Chicago, of which he remained the pastor over thirty years. In 1850 he received a call to the chair of Didactic Theology at Lane Seminary, as successor to Dr. Lyman Beecher, but it was declined, as was a similar call ten years later. Resigning his pastorship in 1873, he was, for several years, Professor of Christian Evidences and Ethics in the Theological Seminary of the Northwest; in 1876-78 served as President of Lake Forest University (of which he was one of the founders), and, in 1880-83, as lecturer in Lane Theological Seminary. He received the degree of D.D. from Hamilton College, N. Y., in 1854, that of LL.D. from Lake Forest University, and was Moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly (N. S.) at Wilmington, Del., in 1859. Died, at Evanston, Ill., Feb. 24, 1894.

PAVEY, Charles W., soldier and ex-State Auditor, was born in Highland County, Ohio, Nov. 8, 1835; removed to Illinois in 1859, settling in the vicinity of Mount Vernon, and, for a time, followed the occupation of a farmer and stock-raiser. In August, 1862, he enlisted in the Eightieth Illinois Volunteers for the Civil War, and became First Lieutenant of Company E. He was severely wounded at the battle of Sand Mountain, and, having been captured, was confined in Libby Prison, at Salisbury, N. C., and at Danville, Va., for a period of nearly two years, enduring great hardship and suffering. Having been exchanged, he served to the close of the war as Assistant Inspector-General on the Staff of General Rousseau, in Tennessee. He was a delegate to the Republican National Convention of 1880, which nominated General Garfield for the Presidency, and was one of the famous "306" who stood by General Grant in that struggle. In 1882 he was appointed by President Arthur Collector of Internal Revenue for the Southern District, and, in 1888, was nominated and elected State Auditor on the Republican ticket, but was defeated for re-election in the "land-slide" of 1892. General Pavey has been prominent in "G. A. R." councils, and held the position of Junior Vice-Commander for the Department of Illinois in 1878, and that of Senior Vice-Commander in 1879. He also served as Brigadier-General of the National Guard, for Southern Illinois, during the railroad strike of 1877. In 1897 he received from President McKinley the appointment of Special Agent of the Treasury Department. His home is at Mount Vernon, Jefferson County.

PAWNEE, a village of Sangamon County, at the eastern terminus of the Auburn & Pawnee Railroad, 19 miles south of Springfield. The town has a bank and a weekly paper. Population (1900), 595; (1903, est.), 1,000.

PAWNEE RAILROAD, a short line in Sangamon County, extending from Pawnee to Auburn (9 miles), where it forms a junction with the Chicago & Alton Railroad. The company was organized and procured a charter in December, 1888, and the road completed the following year. The cost was $101,774. Capital stock authorized, $100,000; funded debt (1895), $50,000.

PAW PAW, a village of Lee County, at the junction of two branches of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway, 8 miles northwest of Earlville. The town is in a farming region, but has a bank and one weekly paper. Population (1890), 635; (1900), 765.

PAXTON, the county-seat of Ford County, is situated at the intersection of the Chicago Division of the Illinois Central and the Lake Erie & Western Railroads, 103 miles south by west from Chicago, and 49 miles east of Bloomington. It contains a court house, two schools, water-works, electric light and water-heating system, two banks, nine churches, and one daily newspaper. It is an important shipping-point for the farm products of the surrounding territory, which is a rich agricultural region. Besides brick and tile works and flour mills, factories for the manufacture of carriages, buggies, hardware, cigars, brooms, and plows are located here. Pop. (1890), 2,187; (1900), 3,036.

PAYSON, a village in Adams County, 15 miles southeast of Quincy; the nearest railroad station being Fall Creek, on the Quincy and Louisiana Division of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway; has one newspaper. Population (1900), 465.

PATSON, Lewis E., lawyer and ex-Congressman, was born at Providence, R. I., Sept. 17, 1840; came to Illinois at the age of 12, and, after passing through the common schools, attended

Lombard University, at Galesburg, for two years. He was admitted to the bar at Ottawa in 1862, and, in 1865, took up his residence at Pontiac. From 1869 to 1873 he was Judge of the Livingston County Court, and, from 1881 to 1891, represented his District in Congress, being elected as a Republican, but, in 1890, was defeated by his Democratic opponent, Herman W. Snow. Since retiring from Congress he has practiced his profession in Washington, D. C.

PEABODY, Selim Hobart, educator, was born in Rockingham County, Vt., August 20, 1829; after reaching 13 years of age, spent a year in a Boston Latin School, then engaged in various occupations, including teaching, until 1848, when he entered the University of Vermont, graduating third in his class in 1852; was appointed Professor of Mathematics and Engineering in the Polytechnic College at Philadelphia, in 1854, remaining three years, when he spent five years in Wisconsin, the last three as Superintendent of Schools at Racine. From 1865 to 1871 he was teacher of physical science in Chicago High School, also conducting night schools for working men; in 1871 became Professor of Physics and Engineering in Massachusetts Agricultural College, but returned to the Chicago High School in 1874; in 1876 took charge of the Chicago Academy of Sciences, and, in 1878, entered the Illinois Industrial University (now University of Illinois), at Champaign, first as Professor of Mechanical Engineering, in 1880 becoming President, but resigning in 1891. During the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago, Professor Peabody was Chief of the Department of Liberal Arts, and, on the expiration of his service there, assumed the position of Curator of the newly organized Chicago Academy of Sciences, from which he retired some two years later.

PEARL, a village of Pike County, on the Kansas City branch of the Chicago & Alton Railroad, 14 miles west of Roodhouse. Population (1890), 928; (1900), 722.

PEARSON, Isaac N., ex-Secretary of State, was born at Centreville, Pa., July 27, 1842; removed to Macomb, McDonough County, Ill., in 1858, and has ever since resided there. In 1872 he was elected Clerk of the Circuit Court, and re-elected in 1876. Later he engaged in real-estate and banking business. He was a member of the lower house in the Thirty-third, and of the Senate in the Thirty-fifth, General Assembly, but before the expiration of his term in the latter, was elected Secretary of State, on the Republican ticket, in 1888. In 1892 he was a candidate for re-election, but was defeated, although, next to Governor Fifer, he received the largest vote cast for any candidate for a political office on the Republican State ticket.

PEARSON, John M., ex-Railway and Warehouse Commissioner, born at Newburyport, Mass., in 1832—the son of a ship-carpenter; was educated in his native State and came to Illinois in 1849, locating at the city of Alton, where he was afterwards engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements. In 1873 he was appointed a member of the first Railway and Warehouse Commission, serving four years; in 1878 was elected Representative in the Thirty-first General Assembly from Madison County, and was re-elected, successively, in 1880 and '82. He was appointed a member of the first Board of Live-Stock Commissioners in 1885, serving until 1893, for a considerable portion of the time as President of the Board. Mr. Pearson is a lifelong Republican and prominent member of the Masonic fraternity. His present home is at Godfrey.

PEARSONS, Daniel K., M.D., real-estate operator and capitalist, was born at Bradfordton, Vt., April 14, 1820; began teaching at 16 years of age, and, at 21, entered Dartmouth College, taking a two years' course. He then studied medicine, and, after practicing a short time in his native State, removed to Chicopee, Mass., where he remained from 1843 to 1857. The latter year he came to Ogle County, Ill., and began operating in real estate, finally adding to this a loan business for Eastern parties, but discontinued this line in 1877. He owns extensive tracts of timber lands in Michigan, is a Director in the Chicago City Railway Company and American Exchange Bank, besides being interested in other financial institutions. He has been one of the most liberal supporters of the Chicago Historical Society, and a princely contributor to various benevolent and educational institutions, his gifts to colleges, in different parts of the country, aggregating over a million dollars.

PECATONICA, a town in Pecatonica Township, Winnebago County, on the Pecatonica River. It is on the Chicago & Northwestern Railway, midway between Freeport and Rockford, being 14 miles from each. It contains a carriage factory, machine shop, condensed milk factory, a bank, six churches, a graded school, and a weekly newspaper. Pop. (1890), 1,059; (1900), 1,045.

PECATONICA RIVER, a stream formed by the confluence of two branches, both of which rise in Iowa County, Wis. They unite a little north of the Illinois State line, whence the river runs southeast to Freeport, then east and northeast, until it enters Rock River at Rockton. From the headwaters of either branch to the mouth of the river is about 50 miles.

PECK, Ebenezer, early lawyer, was born in Portland, Maine, May 29, 1805; received an academical education, studied law and was admitted to the bar in Canada in 1837. He was twice elected to the Provincial Parliament and made King's Counsel in 1833; came to Illinois in 1835, settling in Chicago; served in the State Senate (1838-40), and in the House (1840-42 and 1858-60); was also Clerk of the Supreme Court (1841-45), Reporter of Supreme Court decisions (1849-63), and member of the Constitutional Convention of 1869-70. Mr. Peck was an intimate personal friend of Abraham Lincoln, by whom he was appointed a member of the Court of Claims, at Washington, serving until 1875. Died, May 25, 1881.

PECK, Ferdinand Wythe, lawyer and financier, was born in Chicago, July 15, 1848—the son of Philip F. W. Peck, a pioneer and early merchant of the metropolis of Illinois; was educated in the public schools, the Chicago University and Union College of Law, graduating from both of the last named institutions, and being admitted to the bar in 1869. For a time he engaged in practice, but his father having died in 1871, the responsibility of caring for a large estate devolved upon him and has since occupied his time, though he has given much attention to the amelioration of the condition of the poor of his native city, and works of practical benevolence and public interest. He is one of the founders of the Illinois Humane Society, has been President and a member of the Board of Control of the Chicago Athenæum, member of the Board of Education, President of the Chicago Union League, and was an influential factor in securing the success of the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago, in 1893, serving as First Vice-President of the Chicago Board of Directors, Chairman of the Finance Committee, and member of the Board of Reference and Control. Of late years, Mr. Peck has been connected with several important building enterprises of a semi-public character, which have added to the reputation of Chicago, including the Auditorium, Stock Exchange Building and others in which he is a leading stockholder, and in the erection of which he has been a chief promoter. In 1898 he was appointed, by President McKinley, the United States Commissioner to the International Exposition at Paris of 1900, as successor to the late Maj. M. P. Handy, and the success which has followed his discharge of the duties of that position, has demonstrated the fitness of his selection.

PECK, George R., railway attorney, born in Steuben County, N. Y., in 1843; was early taken to Wisconsin, where he assisted in clearing his father's farm; at 16 became a country school-teacher to aid in freeing the same farm from debt; enlisted at 19 in the First Wisconsin Heavy Artillery, later becoming a Captain in the Thirty-first Wisconsin Infantry, with which he joined in "Sherman's March to the Sea." Returning home at the close of the war, he began the study of law at Janesville, spending six years there as a student, Clerk of the Circuit Court and in practice. From there he went to Kansas and, between 1871 and '74, practiced his profession at Independence, when he was appointed by President Grant United States District Attorney for the Kansas District, but resigned this position, in 1879, to return to general practice. In 1881 he became General Solicitor of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad, removing to Chicago in 1893. In 1895 he resigned his position with the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad to accept a similar position with the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company, which (1898) he still holds. Mr. Peck is recognized as one of the most gifted orators in the West, and, in 1897, was chosen to deliver the principal address at the unveiling of the Logan equestrian statue in Lake Front Park, Chicago; has also officiated as orator on a number of other important public occasions, always acquitting himself with distinction.

PECK, John Mason, D.D., clergyman and educator, was born in Litchfield, Conn., Oct. 31, 1789; removed to Greene County, N. Y., in 1811, where he united with the Baptist Church, the same year entering on pastoral work, while prosecuting his studies and supporting himself by teaching. In 1814 he became pastor of a church at Amenia, N. Y., and, in 1817, was sent west as a missionary, arriving in St. Louis in the latter part of the same year. During the next nine years he traveled extensively through Missouri and Illinois, as an itinerant preacher and teacher, finally locating at Rock Spring, St. Clair County, where, in 1826, he established the Rock Spring Seminary for the education of teachers and ministers. Out of this grew Shurtleff College, founded at Upper Alton in 1835, in securing the endowment of which Dr. Peck traveled many thousands of miles and collected $20,000, and of which he served as Trustee for many years. Up to 1843 he devoted much time to aiding in the establishment of a theological institution at Covington, Ky., and, for two years following, was Corresponding Secretary and Financial Agent of the American Baptist Publication Society, with headquarters in Philadelphia. Returning to the West, he served as pastor of several important churches in Missouri, Illinois and Kentucky. A man of indomitable will, unflagging industry and thoroughly upright in conduct, for a period of a quarter of a century, in the early history of the State, probably no man exerted a larger influence for good and the advancement of the cause of education, among the pioneer citizens of all classes, than Dr. Peck. Though giving his attention so constantly to preaching and teaching, he found time to write much, not only for the various publications with which he was, from time to time, connected, but also for other periodicals, besides publishing "A Guide for Emigrants" (1831), of which a new edition appeared in 1836, and a "Gazetteer of Illinois" (Jacksonville, 1834, and Boston, 1837), which continue to be valued for the information they contain of the condition of the country at that time. He was an industrious collector of historical records in the form of newspapers and pamphlets, which were unfortunately destroyed by fire a few years before his death. In 1852 he received the degree of D.D. from Harvard University. Died, at Rock Spring, St. Clair County, March 15, 1898.

PECK, Philip F. W., pioneer merchant, was born in Providence, R. I., in 1809, the son of a wholesale merchant who had lost his fortune by indorsing for a friend. After some years spent in a mercantile house in New York, he came to Chicago on a prospecting tour, in 1830; the following year brought a stock of goods to the embryo emporium of the Northwest—then a small backwoods hamlet—and, by trade and fortunate investments in real estate, laid the foundation of what afterwards became a large fortune. He died, Oct. 23, 1871, as the result of an accident occurring about the time of the great fire of two weeks previous, from which he was a heavy sufferer pecuniarily. Three of his sons, Walter L., Clarence I. and Ferdinand W. Peck, are among Chicago's most substantial citizens.

PEKIN, a flourishing city, the county-seat of Tazewell County, and an important railway center, located on the Illinois River, 10 miles south of Peoria and 56 miles north of Springfield. Agriculture and coal-mining are the chief occupations in the surrounding country, but the city itself is an important grain market with large general shipping interests. It has several distilleries, besides grain elevators, malt-houses, brick and tile works, lumber yards, planing mills, marble works, plow and wagon works, and a factory for corn products. Its banking facilities are adequate, and its religious and educational advantages are excellent. The city has a public library, park, steam-heating plant, three daily and four weekly papers. Pop. (1890), 6,347; (1900), 8,420.

PEKIN, LINCOLN & DECATUR RAILROAD.

(See Peoria, Decatur & Evansville Railway.)

PELL, Gilbert T., Representative in the Third Illinois General Assembly (1822) from Edwards County, and an opponent of the resolution for a State Convention adopted by the Legislature at that session, designed to open the door for the admission of slavery. Mr. Pell was a son-in-law of Morris Birkbeck, who was one of the leaders in opposition to the Convention scheme, and very naturally sympathized with his father-in-law. He was elected to the Legislature, for a second term, in 1828, but subsequently left the State, dying elsewhere, when his widow removed to Australia.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD. As to operations of this corporation in Illinois, see Calumet River; Pittsburg, Fort Wayne & Chicago; South Chicago & Southern, and Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railways. The whole number of miles owned, leased and operated by the Pennsylvania System, in 1898, was 1,987.21, of which only 61.34 miles were in Illinois. It owns, however, a controlling interest in the stock of the Toledo, Peoria & Western Railway (which see).

PEORIA, the second largest city of the State and the county-seat of Peoria County, is 160 miles southwest of Chicago, and at the foot of an expansion of the Illinois River known as Peoria Lake. The site of the town occupies an elevated plateau, having a water frontage of four miles and extending back to a bluff, which rises 200 feet above the river level and about 120 feet above the highest point of the main site. It was settled in 1778 or '79, although, as generally believed, the French missionaries had a station there in 1711. There was certainly a settlement there as early as 1725, when Renault received a grant of lands at Pimiteoui, facing the lake then bearing the same name as the village. From that date until 1812, the place was continuously occupied as a French village, and is said to have been the most important point for trading in the Mississippi Valley. The original village was situated about a mile and a half above the foot of the lake; but later, the present site was occupied, at first receiving the name of "La Ville de Maillet," from a French Canadian who resided in Peoria, from 1765 to 1801 (the time of his death), and who commanded a company of volunteers in the Revolutionary War. The population of the old town removed to the new site, and the present name was given to the place by American settlers, from the Peoria Indians, who were the occupants of the country when it was first discovered, but who had followed their cognate tribes of the Illinois family to Cahokia and Kaskaskia, about a century before American occupation of this region. In 1812 the town is estimated to have contained about seventy dwellings, with a population of between 200 and 300, made up largely of French traders, hunters and voyageurs, with a considerable admixture of half-breeds and Indians, and a few Americans. Among the latter were Thomas Forsyth, Indian Agent and confidential adviser of Governor Edwards; Michael La Croix, son-in-law of Julian Dubuque, founder of the city of Dubuque; Antoine Le Claire, founder of Davenport, and for whom Le Claire, Iowa, is named; William Arundel, afterwards Recorder of St. Clair County, and Isaac Darnielle, the second lawyer in Illinois.—In November, 1812, about half the town was burned, by order of Capt. Thomas E. Craig, who had been directed, by Governor Edwards, to proceed up the river in boats with materials to build a fort at Peoria. At the same time, the Governor himself was at the head of a force marching against Black Partridge's village, which he destroyed. Edwards had no communication with Craig, who appears to have acted solely on his own responsibility. That the latter's action was utterly unjustifiable, there can now be little doubt. He alleged, by way of excuse, that his boats had been fired upon from the shore, at night, by Indians or others, who were harbored by the citizens. The testimony of the French, however, is to the effect that it was an unprovoked and cowardly assault, instigated by wine which the soldiers had stolen from the cellars of the inhabitants. The bulk of those who remained after the fire were taken by Craig to a point below Alton and put ashore. This occurred in the beginning of winter, and the people, being left in a destitute condition, were subjected to great suffering. A Congressional investigation followed, and the French, having satisfactorily established the fact that they were not hostile, were restored to their possessions.—In 1813 a fort, designed for permanent occupancy, was erected and named Fort Clark, in honor of Col. George Rogers Clark. It had one (if not two) block-houses, with magazines and quarters for officers and men. It was finally evacuated in 1818, and was soon afterwards burned by the Indians. Although a trading-post had been maintained here, at intervals, after the affair of 1812, there was no attempt made to rebuild the town until 1819, when Americans began to arrive.—In 1824 a post of the American Fur Company was established here by John Hamlin, the company having already had, for five years, a station at Wesley City, three miles farther down the river. Hamlin also traded in pork and other products, and was the first to introduce keel-boats on the Illinois River. By transferring his cargo to lighter draft boats, when necessary, he made the trip from Peoria to Chicago entirely by water, going from the Des Plaines to Mud Lake, and thence to the South Branch of the Chicago River, without unloading. In 1834 the town had but seven frame houses and twenty-one log cabins. It was incorporated as a town in 1835 (Rudolphus Rouse being the first President), and, as the City of Peoria, ten years later (Wm. Hale being the first Mayor).—Peoria is an important railway and business center, eleven railroad lines concentrating here. It presents many attractive features, such as handsome residences, fine views of river, bluff and valley scenery, with an elaborate system of parks and drives. An excellent school system is liberally supported, and its public buildings (national, county and city) are fine and costly. Its churches are elegant and well attended, the leading denominations being Methodist Episcopal, Congregational, Presbyterian, Baptist, Protestant and Reformed Episcopal, Lutheran, Evangelical and Roman Catholic. It is the seat of Bradley Polytechnic Institute, a young and flourishing scientific school affiliated with the University of Chicago, and richly endowed through the munificence of Mrs. Lydia Bradley, who devotes her whole estate, of at least a million dollars, to this object. Right Rev. John L. Spaulding, Bishop of the Roman Catholic diocese of Peoria, is erecting a handsome and costly building for the Spaulding Institute, a school for the higher education of young men.—At Bartonville, a suburb of Peoria, on an elevation commanding a magnificent view of the Illinois River valley for many miles, the State has located an asylum for the incurable insane. It is now in process of erection, and is intended to be one of the most complete of its kind in the world. Peoria lies in a corn and coal region, is noted for the number and extent of its distilleries, and, in 1890, ranked eighth among the grain markets of the country. It also has an extensive commerce with Chicago, St. Louis and other important cities; was credited, by the census of 1890, with 554 manufacturing establishments, representing 90 different branches of industry, with a capital of $15,072,567 and an estimated annual product of $55,504,523. Its leading industries are the manufacture of distilled and malt liquors, agricultural implements, glucose and machine-shop products. Its contributions to the internal revenue of the country are second only to those of the New York district. Population (1870), 22,849; (1880), 29,259; (1890), 41,024; (1900), 56,100.

PEORIA COUNTY, originally a part of Fulton County, but cut off in 1825. It took its name from the Peoria Indians, who occupied that region when it was first discovered. As first organized, it included the present counties of Jo Daviess and Cook, with many others in the northern part of the State. At that time there were less than 1,500 inhabitants in the entire region; and John Hamlin, a Justice of the Peace, on his return from Green Bay (whither he had accompanied William S. Hamilton, a son of Alexander Hamilton, with a drove of cattle for the fort there), solemnized, at Chicago, the marriage of Alexander Wolcott, then Indian Agent, with a daughter of John Kinzie. The original Peoria County has been subdivided into thirty counties, among them being some of the largest and richest in the State. The first county officer was Norman Hyde, who was elected Judge of the Probate Court by the Legislature in January, 1825. His commission from Governor Coles was dated on the eighteenth of that month, but he did not qualify until June 4, following, when he took the oath of office before John Dixon, Circuit Clerk, who founded the city that bears his name. Meanwhile, Mr. Hyde had been appointed the first Clerk of the County Commissioners' Court, and served in that capacity until entering upon his duties as Probate Judge. The first election of county officers was held, March 7, 1825, at the house of William Eads. Nathan Dillon, Joseph Smith, and William Holland were chosen Commissioners; Samuel Fulton Sheriff, and William Phillips Coroner. The first County Treasurer was Aaron Hawley, and the first general election of officers took place in 1826. The first court house was a log cabin, and the first term of the Circuit Court began Nov. 14, 1825, John York Sawyer sitting on the bench, with John Dixon, Clerk; Samuel Fulton, Sheriff; and John Twiney, the Attorney-General, present. Peoria County is, at present, one of the wealthiest and most populous counties in the State. Its soil is fertile and its manufactures numerous, especially at Peoria, the county-seat and principal city (which see). The area of the county is 615 square miles, and its population (1880), 55,353; (1890), 70,378; (1900), 88,608.

PEORIA LAKE, an expansion of the Illinois River, forming the eastern boundary of Peoria County, which it separates from the counties of Woodford and Tazewell. It is about 20 miles long and $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles broad at the widest part.

PEORIA, ATLANTA & DECATUR RAILROAD. (See Terre Haute & Peoria Railroad.)

PEORIA, DECATUR & EVANSVILLE RAILWAY. The total length of this line, extending from Peoria, Ill., to Evansville, Ind., is 330.87 miles, all owned by the company, of which 273 miles are in Illinois. It extends from Pekin, southeast to Grayville, on the Wabash River—is single track, unballasted, and of standard gauge. Between Pekin and Peoria the company uses the tracks of the Peoria & Pekin Union Railway, of which it is one-fourth owner. Between Hervey City and Midland Junction it has trackage privileges over the line owned jointly by the Peoria, Decatur & Evansville and the Terre Haute & Peoria Companies (7.5 miles). Between Midland Junction and Decatur (2.4 miles) the tracks of the Illinois Central are used, the two lines having terminal facilities at Decatur in common. The rails are of fifty-two and sixty-pound steel.—(HISTORY.) The main line of the Peoria, Decatur & Evansville Railway is the result of the consolidation of several lines built under separate charters. (1) The Pekin, Lincoln & Decatur Railroad, chartered in 1867, built in 1869-71, and operated the latter year, was leased to the Toledo, Wabash & Western Railway, but sold to representatives of the bond-holders, on account of default on interest, in 1876, and reorganized as the Pekin, Lincoln & Decatur Railway. (2) The Decatur, Sullivan & Mattoon Railroad, (projected from Decatur to Mattoon), was incorporated in 1871, completed from Mattoon to Hervey City, in 1873, and, the same year, consolidated with the Chicago & Great Southern; in January, 1874, the Decatur line passed into the hands of a receiver, and, in 1877, having been sold under foreclosure, was reorganized as the Decatur, Mattoon & Southern Railroad. In 1879 it was placed in the hands of trustees, but the Pekin, Lincoln & Decatur Railway having acquired a controlling interest during the same year, the two lines were consolidated under the name of the Peoria, Decatur & Evansville Railway Company. (3) The Grayville & Mattoon Railroad, chartered in 1857, was consolidated in 1873 with the Mount Vernon & Grayville Railroad (projected), the new corporation taking the name of the Chicago & Illinois Southern (already mentioned). In 1873 the latter corporation was consolidated with the Decatur, Sullivan & Mattoon Railroad, under the name of the Chicago & Illinois Southern Railway. Both consolidations, however, were set aside by decree of the United States District Court, in 1876, and the partially graded road and franchises of the Grayville & Mattoon lines sold, under foreclosure, to the contractors for the construction; 20 miles of the line from Olney to Newton, were completed during the month of September of that year, and the entire line, from Grayville to Mattoon, in 1878. In 1880 this line was sold, under decree of foreclosure, to the Peoria, Decatur & Evansville Railway Company, which had already acquired the Decatur & Mattoon Division—thus placing the entire line, from Peoria to Grayville, in the hands of one corporation. A line under the name of the Evansville & Peoria Railroad, chartered in Indiana in 1880, was consolidated, the same year, with the Illinois corporation under the name of the latter, and completed from Grayville to Evansville in 1883. (4) The Chicago & Ohio River Railroad—chartered, in 1869, as the Danville, Olney & Ohio River Railroad—was constructed, as a narrow-gauge line, from Kansas to West Liberty, in 1878-81; in the latter year was changed to standard gauge and completed, in 1883, from Sidell to Olney (86 miles). The same year it went into the hands of a receiver, was sold under foreclosure, in February, 1886, and reorganized, in May following, as the Chicago & Ohio River Railroad; was consolidated with the Peoria, Decatur & Evansville Railway, in 1893, and used as the Chicago Division of that line. The property and franchises of the entire line passed into the hands of receivers in 1894, and are still (1898) under their management.

PEORIA, PEKIN & JACKSONVILLE RAILROAD. (See Chicago, Peoria & St. Louis Railroad of Illinois.)

PEORIA & BUREAU VALLEY RAILROAD, a short line, 46.7 miles in length, operated by the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company, extending from Peoria to Bureau Junction, Ill. It was incorporated, Feb. 12, 1853, completed the following year, and leased to the Rock Island in perpetuity, April 14, 1854, the annual rental being $125,000. The par value of the capital stock is $1,500,000. Annual dividends of 8 per cent are guaranteed, payable semi-annually. (See Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway.)

PEORIA & EASTERN RAILROAD. Of this line the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Company is the lessee. Its total length is 350½ miles, 132 of which lie in Illinois—123 being owned by the Company. That portion within this State extends east from Pekin to the Indiana State line, in addition to which the Company has trackage facilities over the line of the Peoria & Pekin Union Railway (9 miles) to Peoria. The gauge is standard. The track is single, laid with sixty and sixty-seven-pound steel rails and ballasted almost wholly with gravel. The capital stock is $10,000,000. In 1895 it had a bonded debt of $13,603,000 and a floating debt of $1,261,130, making a total capitalization of $24,864,130.—(HISTORY.) The original of this corporation was the Danville, Urbana, Bloomington & Pekin Railroad, which was consolidated, in July, 1869, with the Indianapolis, Crawfordsville & Danville Railroad—the new corporation taking the name of the Indianapolis, Bloomington & Western—and was opened to Pekin the same year. In 1874 it passed into the hands of a receiver, was sold under foreclosure in 1879, and reorganized as the Indiana, Bloomington & Western Railway Company. The next change occurred in 1881, when it was consolidated with an Ohio corporation (the Ohio, Indiana & Pacific Railroad), again undergoing a slight change of name in its reorganization as the Indiana, Bloomington & Western Railroad Company. In 1886 it again got into financial straits, was placed in charge of a receiver and sold to a reorganization committee, and, in January, 1887, took the name of the Ohio, Indiana & Western Railway Company. The final reorganization, under its present name, took place in February, 1890, when it was leased to the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway, by which it is operated. (See Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway.)

PEORIA & HANNIBAL RAILROAD. (See Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad.)

PEORIA & OQUAWKA RAILROAD. (See Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad.)

PEORIA & PEKIN UNION RAILWAY. A line connecting the cities of Peoria and Pekin, which are only 8 miles apart. It was chartered in 1880, and acquired, by purchase, the tracks of the Peoria, Pekin & Jacksonville and the Peoria & Springfield Railroads, between the two cities named in its title, giving it control of two lines, which are used by nearly all the railroads entering both cities from the east side of the Illinois River. The mileage, including both divisions, is 18.14 miles, second tracks and sidings increasing the total to nearly 60 miles. The track is of standard gauge, about two-thirds being laid with steel rails. The total cost of construction was $4,350,987. Its total capitalization (1898) was $4,177,763, including $1,000,000 in stock, and a funded debt of $2,904,000. The capital stock is held in equal amounts (each 2,500 shares) by the Wabash, the Peoria, Decatur & Evansville, the Chicago, Peoria & St. Louis and the Peoria & Eastern companies, with 1,000 shares by the Lake Erie & Western. Terminal charges and annual rentals are also paid by the Terre Haute & Peoria and the Iowa Central Railways.

PEORIA & SPRINGFIELD RAILROAD. (See Chicago, Peoria & St. Louis Railroad of Illinois.)

PEOTONE, a village of Will County, on the Illinois Central Railroad, 41 miles south-southwest from Chicago; has some manufactures, a bank and a newspaper. The surrounding country is agricultural. Population (1890), 717; (1900), 1,003.

PERCY, a village of Randolph County, at the intersection of the Wabash, Chesapeake & Western and the Mobile & Ohio Railways. Population (1890), 360; (1900), 660.

PERROT, Nicholas, a French explorer, who visited the valley of the Fox River (of Wisconsin) and the country around the great lakes, at various times between 1670 and 1690. He was present, as a guide and interpreter, at the celebrated conference held at Sault Ste. Marie, in 1671, which was attended by fifteen Frenchmen and representatives from seventeen Indian tribes, and at which the Sieur de Lussan took formal possession of Lakes Huron and Superior, with the surrounding region and "all the country southward to the sea," in the name of Louis XIV. of France. Perrot was the first to discover lead in the West, and, for several years, was Commandant in the Green Bay district. As a chronicler he was intelligent, interesting and accurate. His writings were not published until 1864, but have always been highly prized as authority.

PERRY, a town of Pike County; has a bank and a newspaper. Population (1880), 770; (1890), 705; (1900), 642.

PERRY COUNTY, lies in the southwest quarter of the State, with an area of 440 square miles and a population (1900) of 19,830. It was organized as a county in 1827, and named for Com. Oliver H. Perry. The general surface is rolling, although flat prairies occupy a considerable portion, interspersed with "post-oak flats." Limestone is found in the southern, and sandstone in the northern, sections, but the chief mineral wealth of the county is coal, which is abundant, and, at several points, easily mined, some of it being of a superior quality. Salt is manufactured, to some extent, and the chief agricultural output is wheat. Pinckneyville, the county-seat, has a central position and a population of about 1,300. Duquoir is the largest city. Beaucoup Creek is the principal stream, and the county is crossed by several lines of railroad.

PERU, a city in La Salle County, at the head of navigation on the Illinois River, which is here spanned by a handsome bridge. It is distant 100 miles southwest from Chicago, and the same distance north-northeast from Springfield. It is connected by street cars with La Salle, one mile distant, which is the terminus of the Illinois & Michigan Canal. It is situated in a rich coal-mining region, is an important trade center, and has several manufacturing establishments, including zinc smelting works, rolling mills, nickeloid factory, metal novelty works, gas engine factory, tile works, plow, scale and patent-pump factories, foundries and machine shops, flour and saw mills, clock factory, etc. Two national banks, with a combined capital of $200,000, are located at Peru, and one daily and one weekly paper. Population (1870), 3,650; (1880), 4,682; (1890), 5,550; (1900), 6,863.

PESOTUM, a village in Champaign County, on the Illinois Central Railroad, 5 miles south of Tolono. Population (1890), 575.

PETERSBURG, a city of Menard County, and the county-seat, on the Sangamon River, at the intersection Chicago & Alton with the Chicago, Peoria & St. Louis Railway; 23 miles northwest of Springfield and 28 miles northeast of Jackson-ville. The town was surveyed and platted by Abraham Lincoln in 1837, and is the seat of the "Old Salem" Chautauqua. It has machine shops, two banks, two weekly papers and nine churches. The manufactures include woolen goods, brick and drain-tile, bed-springs, mattresses, and canned goods. Pop. (1890), 2,342, (1900), 2,807.

PETERS, Onslow, lawyer and jurist, was born in Massachusetts, graduated at Brown University, and was admitted to the bar and practiced law in his native State until 1837, when he settled at Peoria, Ill. He served in the Constitutional Convention of 1847, was elected to the bench of the Sixteenth Judicial Circuit in 1853, and re-elected in 1855. Died, Feb. 28, 1856.

PHILLIPS, David L., journalist and politician, was born where the town of Marion, Williamson County, Ill., now stands, Oct. 28, 1833; came to St. Clair County in childhood, his father settling near Belleville; began teaching at an early age, and, when about 18, joined the Baptist Church, and, after a brief course with the distinguished Dr. Peck, at his Rock Spring Seminary, two years later entered the ministry, serving churches in Washington and other Southern Illinois counties, finally taking charge of a church at Jonesboro. Though originally a Democrat, his advanced views on slavery led to a disagreement with his church, and he withdrew; then accepted a position as paymaster in the construction department of the Illinois Central Railroad, finally being transferred to that of Land Agent for the Southern section, in this capacity visiting different parts of the State from one end of the main line to the other. About 1854 he became associated with the management of "The Jonesboro Gazette," a Democratic paper, which, during his connection with it (some two years), he made an earnest opponent of the Kansas-Nebraska Bill. At the Anti-Nebraska Editorial Convention (which see), held at Decatur, Feb. 22, 1856, he was appointed a member of their State Central Committee, and, as such, joined in the call for the first Republican State Convention, held at Bloomington in May following, where he served as Vice-President for his District, and was nominated for Presidential Elector on the Fremont ticket. Two years later (1858) he was the unsuccessful Republican candidate for Congress in the Southern District, being defeated by John A. Logan; was again in the State Convention of 1860, and a delegate to the National Convention which nominated Abraham Lincoln for President the first time; was appointed by Mr. Lincoln United States Marshal for the Southern District in 1861, and re-appointed in 1865, but resigned after Andrew Johnson's defection in 1866. During 1862 Mr. Phillips became part proprietor of "The State Journal" at Springfield, retaining this relation until 1873, at intervals performing editorial service; also took a prominent part in organizing and equipping the One Hundred and Ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteers (sometimes called the "Phillips Regiment"), and, in 1865, was one of the committee of citizens sent to escort the remains of President Lincoln to Springfield. He joined in the Liberal Republican movement at Cincinnati in 1872, but, in 1876, was in line with his former party associates, and served in that year as an unsuccessful candidate for Congress, in the Springfield District, in opposition to William M. Springer, early the following year receiving the appointment of Postmaster for the city of Springfield from President Hayes. Died, at Springfield, June 19, 1880.

PHILLIPS, George S., author, was born at Peterborough, England, in January, 1816; graduated at Cambridge, and came to the United States, engaging in journalism. In 1845 he returned to England, and, for a time, was editor of "The Leeds Times," still later being Principal of the People's College at Huddersfield. Returning to the United States, he came to Cook County, and, about 1866-68, was a writer of sketches over the nom de plume of "January Searle" for "The Chicago Republican"—later was literary editor of "The New York Sun" for several years. His mind, becoming impaired, he was placed in an asylum at Trenton, N. J., finally dying at Morristown, N. J., Jan. 14, 1889. Mr. Phillips was the author of several volumes, chiefly sketches of travel and biography.

PHILLIPS, Jesse J., lawyer, soldier and jurist, was born in Montgomery County, Ill., May 23, 1837. Shortly after graduating from the Hillsboro Academy, he read law, and was admitted to the bar in 1860. In 1861 he organized a company of volunteers, of which he was chosen Captain, and which was attached to the Ninth Illinois Infantry. Captain Phillips was successively advanced to the rank of Major, Lieutenant-Colonel and Colonel; resigned on account of disability, in August, 1864, but was brevetted Brigadier-General at the close of the war. His military record was exceptionally brilliant. He was wounded three times at Shiloh, and was personally thanked and complimented by Generals Grant and Oglesby for gallantry and efficient service. At the termination of the struggle he returned to Hillsboro and engaged in practice. In 1866, and again in 1868, he was the Democratic candidate for State Treasurer, but was both times defeated. In 1879 he was elected to the bench of the Fifth Judicial Circuit, and re-elected in 1885. In 1890 he was assigned to the bench of the Appellate Court of the Fourth District, and, in 1893, was elected a Justice of the Supreme Court, to fill the vacancy created by the death of Justice John M. Scholfield, his term expiring in 1897, when he was re-elected to succeed himself. Judge Phillips' present term will expire in 1906.

PHILLIPS, Joseph, early jurist, was born in Tennessee, received a classical and legal education, and served as a Captain in the War of 1812; in 1816 was appointed Secretary of Illinois Territory, serving until the admission of Illinois as a State, when he became the first Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, serving until July, 1822, when he resigned, being succeeded on the bench by John Reynolds, afterwards Governor. In 1822 he was a candidate for Governor in the interest of the advocates of a pro-slavery amendment of the State Constitution, but was defeated by Edward Coles, the leader of the anti-slavery party. (See Coles, Edward, and Slavery and Slave Laws.) He appears from the "Edwards Papers" to have been in Illinois as late as 1832, but is said eventually to have returned to Tennessee. The date of his death is unknown.

PIANKESHAW, THE, a branch of the Miami tribe of Indians. Their name, like those of their brethren, underwent many mutations of orthography, the tribe being referred to, variously, as the "Pou-an-ke-kiahs," the "Pi-an-gie-shaws," the "Pi-an-qui-shaws," and the "Py-an-ke-shaws." They were less numerous than the Weas, their numerical strength ranking lowest among the bands of the Miamis. At the time La Salle planted his colony around Starved Rock, their warriors numbered 150. Subsequent to the dispersion of this colony they (alone of the Miamis) occupied portions of the present territory of Illinois, having villages on the Vermilion and Wabash Rivers. Their earliest inclinations toward the whites were friendly, the French traders having intermarried with women of the tribe soon after the advent of the first explorers. Col. George Rogers Clark experienced little difficulty in securing their allegiance to the new government which he proclaimed. In the sanguinary raids (usually followed by reprisals), which marked Western history during the years immediately succeeding the Revolution, the Piankeshaws took no part; yet the outrages, perpetrated upon peaceable colonists, had so stirred the settlers' blood, that all Indians were included in the general thirst for vengeance, and each was unceremoniously dispatched as soon as seen. The Piankeshaws appealed to Washington for protection, and the President issued a special proclamation in their behalf. After the cession of the last remnant of the Miami territory to the United States, the tribe was removed to a Kansas reservation, and its last remnant finally found a home in Indian Territory. (See also Miamis; Weas.)

"PIASA BIRD," LEGEND OF THE. When the French explorers first descended the Upper Mississippi River, they found some remarkable figures depicted upon the face of the bluff, just above the site of the present city of Alton, which excited their wonder and continued to attract interest long after the country was occupied by the whites. The account given of the discovery by Marquette, who descended the river from the mouth of the Wisconsin, in June, 1673, is as follows: "As we coasted along" (after passing the mouth of the Illinois) "rocks frightful for their height and length, we saw two monsters painted on one of the rocks, which startled us at first, and upon which the boldest Indian dare not gaze long. They are as large as a calf, with horns on the head like a deer, a frightful look, red eyes, bearded like a tiger, the face somewhat like a man's, the body covered with scales, and the tail so long that it twice makes the turn of the body, passing over the head and down between the legs, ending at last in a fish's tail. Green, red and black are the colors employed. On the whole, these two monsters are so well painted that we could not believe any Indian to have been the designer, as good painters in France would find it hard to do as well. Besides this, they are painted so high upon the rock that it is hard to get conveniently at them to paint them." As the Indians could give no account of the origin of these figures, but had their terror even more excited at the sight of them than Marquette himself, they are supposed to have been the work of some prehistoric race occupying the country long before the arrival of the aborigines whom Marquette and his companions found in Illinois. There was a tradition that the figures were intended to represent a creature, part beast and part bird, which destroyed immense numbers of the inhabitants by swooping down upon them from its abode upon the rocks. At last a chief is said to have offered himself a victim for his people, and when the monster made its appearance, twenty of his warriors, concealed near by, discharged their arrows at it, killing it just before it reached its prey. In this manner the life of the chief was saved and his people were preserved from further depredations; and it was to commemorate this event that the figure of the bird was painted on the face of the cliff on whose summit the chief stood. This story, told in a paper by Mr. John Russell, a pioneer author of Illinois, obtained wide circulation in this country and in Europe, about the close of the first quarter of the present century, as the genuine "Legend of the Piasa Bird." It is said, however, that Mr. Russell, who was a popular writer of fiction, acknowledged that it was drawn largely from his imagination. Many prehistoric relics and human remains are said, by the late William McAdams, the antiquarian of Alton, to have been found in caves in the vicinity, and it seems a well authenticated fact that the Indians, when passing the spot, were accustomed to discharge their arrows—and, later, their firearms—at the figure on the face of the cliff. Traces of this celebrated pictograph were visible as late as 1840 to 1845, but have since been entirely quarried away.

PIATT COUNTY, organized in 1841, consisting of parts of Macon and Dewitt Counties. Its area is 440 square miles; population (1900), 17,706. The first Commissioners were John Hughes, W. Bailey and E. Peck. John Piatt, after whose family the county was named, was the first Sheriff. The North Fork of the Sangamon River flows centrally through the county from northeast to southwest, and several lines of railroad afford transportation for its products. Its resources and the occupation of the people are almost wholly agricultural, the surface being level prairie and the soil fertile. Monticello, the county-seat, has a population of about 1,700. Other leading towns are Cerro Gordo (939) and Bement (1,139).

PICKETT, Thomas Johnson, journalist, was born in Louisville, Ky., March 17, 1821; spent six years (1830-36) in St. Louis, when his family removed to Peoria; learned the printer's trade in the latter city, and, in 1840, began the publication of "The Peoria News," then sold out and established "The Republican" (afterwards "The Transcript"); was a member of the Anti-Nebraska Editorial Convention held at Decatur, Feb. 22, 1856, serving on the Committee on Resolutions, and being appointed on the State Central Committee, which called the first Republican State Convention, held at Bloomington, in May following, and was there appointed a delegate to the National Convention at Philadelphia, which nominated General Fremont for President. Later, he published papers at Pekin and Rock Island, at the latter place being one of the first to name Abraham Lincoln for the Presidency; was elected State Senator in 1860, and, in 1862, commissioned Lieutenant-Colonel of the Sixty-ninth Illinois Volunteers, being transferred, as Colonel, to the One Hundred and Thirty-second Illinois (100-days' men), and serving at Camp Douglas during the "Conspiracy" excitement. After the war, Colonel Pickett removed to Paducah, Ky., published a paper there called "The Federal Union," was appointed Postmaster, and, later, Clerk of the United States District Court, and was the Republican nominee for Congress, in that District, in 1874. Removing to Nebraska in 1879, he at different times conducted several papers in that State, residing for the most part at Lincoln. Died, at Ashland, Neb., Dec. 24, 1891.

PIERSON, David, pioneer banker, was born at Cazenovia, N. Y., July 9, 1806; at the age of 13 removed west with his parents, arriving at St. Louis, June 3, 1820. The family soon after settled near Collinsville, Madison County, Ill., where the father having died, they removed to the vicinity of Carrollton, Greene County, in 1821. Here they opened a farm, but, in 1827, Mr. Pierson went to the lead mines at Galena, where he remained a year, then returning to Carrollton. In 1834, having sold his farm, he began merchandising, still later being engaged in the pork and grain trade at Alton. In 1854 he added the banking business to his dry-goods trade at Carrollton, also engaged in milling, and, in 1862-63, erected a woolen factory, which was destroyed by an incendiary fire in 1872. Originally an anti-slavery Clay Whig, Mr. Pierson became a Republican on the organization of that party in 1856, served for a time as Collector of Internal Revenue, was a delegate to the National Republican Convention at Philadelphia in 1872, and a prominent candidate for the Republican nomination for Lieutenant-Governor in 1876. Of high integrity and unswerving patriotism, Mr. Pierson was generous in his benefactions, being one of the most liberal contributors to the establishment of the Langston School for the Education of Freedmen at Holly Springs, Miss., soon after the war. He died at Carrollton, May 8, 1891.—Ornan (Pierson), a son of the subject of this sketch, was a member of the Thirty-second General Assembly (1881) from Greene County, and is present cashier of the Greene County National Bank at Carrollton.

PIGGOTT, Isaac N., early politician, was born about 1792; served as an itinerant Methodist preacher in Missouri and Illinois, between 1819 and 1824, but finally located southwest of Jerseyville and obtained a license to run a ferry between Grafton and Alton; in 1828 ran as a candidate for the State Senate against Thomas Carlin (afterwards Governor); removed to St. Louis, in 1858, and died there in 1874.

PIKE COUNTY, situated in the western portion of the State, lying between the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers, having an area of 795 square miles—named in honor of the explorer, Capt. Zebulon Pike. The first American settlers came about 1820, and, in 1821, the county was organized, at first embracing all the country north and west of the Illinois River, including the present county of Cook. Out of this territory were finally organized about one fourth of the counties of the State. Coles' Grove (now Gilead, in Calhoun County) was the first county-seat, but the seat of justice was removed, in 1824, to Atlas, and to Pittsfield in 1833. The surface is undulating, in some portions is hilly, and diversified with prairies and hardwood timber. Live-stock, cereals and hay are the staple products, while coal and Niagara limestone are found in abundance. Population (1890), 31,000; (1900), 31,595.

PILLSBURY, Nathaniel Joy, lawyer and judge, was born in York County, Maine, Oct. 21, 1834; in 1855 removed to Illinois, and, in 1858, began farming in Livingston County. He began the study of law in 1863, and, after admission to the bar, commenced practice at Pontiac. He represented La Salle and Livingston Counties in the Constitutional Convention of 1869-70, and, in 1873, was elected to the bench of the Thirteenth Judicial Circuit. He was re-elected in 1879 and again in 1885. He was assigned to the bench of the Appellate Court in 1877, and again in 1879 and '85. He was severely wounded by a shot received from strikers on the line of the Chicago & Alton Railroad, near Chicago, in 1886, resulting in his being permanently disabled physically, in consequence of which he declined a re-election to the bench in 1891.

PINCKNEYVILLE, a city and the county-seat of Perry County, situated at the intersection of the Paducah Division Illinois Central and the Wabash, Chester & Western Railways, 10 miles west-northwest of Duquoin. Coal-mining is carried on in the immediate vicinity, and flour, carriages, plows and dressed lumber are among the manufactured products. Pinckneyville has two banks—one of which is national—two weekly newspapers, seven churches, a graded and a high school. Population (1880), 964; (1890), 1,298; (1900), 2,357.

PITTSBURG, CINCINNATI, CHICAGO & ST. LOUIS RAILROAD, one of the Pennsylvania Company's lines, operating 1,403 miles of road, of which 1,090 miles are owned and the remainder leased—length of line in Illinois, 25 miles. The Company is the outgrowth of a consolidation, in 1890, of the Pittsburg, Cincinnati & St. Louis Railway with the Chicago, St. Louis & Pittsburg, the Cincinnati & Richmond and the Jeffersonville, Madison & Indianapolis Railroads. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company controls the entire line through ownership of stock. Capital stock outstanding, in 1898, $47,791,601; funded debt, $48,433,000; floating debt, $2,214,703—total capital $98,500,584.—(HISTORY.) The Chicago, St. Louis & Pittsburg Railroad, embracing the Illinois division of this line, was made up of various corporations organized under the laws of Illinois and Indiana. One of its component parts was the Chicago & Great Eastern Railway, organized, in 1865, by consolidation of the Galena & Illinois River Railroad (chartered in 1857), the Chicago & Great Eastern Railway of Indiana, the Cincinnati & Chicago Air-Line (organized 1860), and the Cincinnati, Logansport & Chicago Railway. In 1869, the consolidated line was leased to the Pittsburg, Cincinnati & St. Louis Railway Company, and operated under the name of the Columbus, Chicago & Indiana Central between Bradford, Ohio, and Chicago, from 1869 until its consolidation, under the present name, in 1890. (See Pennsylvania Railroad.)

PITTSBURG, FORT WAYNE & CHICAGO RAILROAD. (See Pittsburg, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway.)

PITTSBURG, FORT WAYNE & CHICAGO RAILWAY. The total length of this line is nearly 470 miles, but only a little over 16 miles are within Illinois. It was operated by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company as lessee. The entire capitalization in 1898 was $52,549,990; and the earnings in Illinois, $472,238.—(HISTORY.) The Pittsburg, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway is the result of the consolidation, August 1, 1856, of the Ohio & Pennsylvania, the Ohio & Indiana and the Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad Companies, under the name of the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railroad. The road was opened through its entire length, Jan. 1, 1859; was sold under foreclosure in 1861; reorganized under its present title, in 1862, and leased to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, for 999 years, from July 1, 1869. (See Pennsylvania Railroad.)

PITTSFIELD, the county-seat of Pike County, situated on the Hannibal & Naples branch of the Wabash Railway, about 40 miles southeast of Quincy, and about the same distance south of west from Jacksonville. Its public buildings include a handsome court house and graded and high school buildings. The city has an electric light plant, city water-works, a flour mill, a National and a State bank, nine churches, and four weekly newspapers. Pop. (1890), 2,295; (1900), 2,293.

PLAINFIELD, a village of Will County, on the Elgin, Joliet & Eastern Railroad and an interurban electric line, 8 miles northwest of Joliet; is in a dairying section; has a bank and one newspaper. Pop. (1890), 852; (1900), 920.

PLANO, a city in Kendall County, situated near the Fox River, and on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, 14 miles west-southwest of Aurora. There are manufactories of agricultural implements and bedsteads. The city has banks, several churches, graded and high schools, and a weekly newspaper. Pop. (1890), 1,825; (1900), 1,634; (1903, est.), 2,250.

PLEASANT PLAINS, a village of Sangamon County, on Springfield Division Baltimore & Ohio S. W. Railroad, 16 miles northwest of Springfield; in rich farming region; has coal-shaft, bank, five churches, college and two newspapers. Population (1890), 518; (1900), 575.

PLEASANTS, George Washington, jurist, was born in Harrodsburg, Ky., Nov. 24, 1823; received a classical education at Williams College, Mass., graduating in 1842; studied law in New York City, and was admitted to the bar at Rochester, N. Y., in 1845, establishing himself in practice at Williamstown, Mass., where he remained until 1849. In 1851 he removed to Washington, D. C., and, after residing there two years, came to Illinois, locating at Rock Island, which has since been his home. In 1861 he was elected, as a Republican, to the State Constitutional Convention which met at Springfield in January following, and, in 1867, was chosen Judge for the Sixth (now Tenth) Judicial Circuit, having served by successive re-elections until June, 1897, retiring at the close of his fifth term—a record for length of service seldom paralleled in the judicial history of the State. The last twenty years of this period were spent on the Appellate bench. For several years past Judge Pleasants has been a sufferer from failing eyesight, but has been faithful in attendance on his judicial duties. As a judicial officer and a man, his reputation stands among the highest.

PLUMB, Ralph, soldier and ex-Congressman, was born in Chautauqua County, N. Y., March 29, 1816. After leaving school he became a merchant's clerk, and was himself a merchant for eighteen years. From New York he removed to Ohio, where he was elected a member of the Legislature in 1853, later coming to Illinois. During the Civil War he served four years in the Union army as Captain and Quartermaster, being brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel at its close. He made his home at Streator, where he was elected Mayor (1881-1883). There he engaged in coal-mining and has been connected with several important enterprises. From 1885 to 1889 he represented the Eighth Illinois District in Congress, after which he retired to private life.

PLYMOUTH, a village of Hancock County, on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway, 41 miles northeast of Quincy; is trade center of rich farming district; has two banks, electric lights, water-works, and one paper. Pop. (1900), 854.

PONTE DE SAIBLE, Jean Baptiste, a negro and Indian-trader, reputed to have been the first settler on the present site of the city of Chicago. He is said to have been a native of San Domingo, but is described by his contemporaries as "well educated and handsome," though dissipated. He appears to have been at the present site of Chicago as early as 1794, his house being located on the north side near the junction of the North and South branches of the Chicago River, where he carried on a considerable trade with the Indians. About 1796 he is said to have sold out to a French trader named Le Mai, and joined a countryman of his, named Glamorgan, at Peoria, where he died soon after. Glamorgan, who was the reputed owner of a large Spanish land-grant in the vicinity of St. Louis, is said to have been associated with Point de Saible in trade among the Peorias, before the latter came to Chicago.

POLO, a city in Ogle County, at intersection of the Illinois Central and the Chicago, Burlington & Northern Railways, 23 miles south of Freeport and 12 miles north of Dixon. The surrounding region is devoted to agriculture and stock-raising, and Polo is a shipping point for large quantities of cattle and hogs. Agricultural implements (including harvesters) and buggies are manufactured here. The city has banks, one weekly and one semi-weekly paper, seven churches, a graded public and high school, and a public library. Pop. (1890), 1,728; (1900), 1,869.

PONTIAC, an Ottawa chief, born on the Ottawa River, in Canada, about 1720. While yet a young man he became the principal Chief of the allied Ottawas, Ojibways and Pottawatomes. He was always a firm ally of the French, to whose interests he was devotedly attached, defending them at Detroit against an attack of the Northern tribes, and (it is generally believed) leading the Ottawas in the defeat of Braddock. He reluctantly acquiesced in the issue of the French and Indian War, although at first strongly disposed to dispute the progress of Major Rogers, the British officer sent to take possession of the western forts. In 1762 he dispatched emissaries to a large number of tribes, whom he desired to unite in a league for the extermination of the English. His proposals were favorably received, and thus was organized what is commonly spoken of as the "Conspiracy of Pontiac." He himself undertook to lead an assault upon Detroit. The garrison, however, was apprised of his intention, and made preparations accordingly. Pontiac thereupon laid siege to the fort, but was unable to prevent the ingress of provisions, the Canadian settlers furnishing supplies to both besieged and besiegers with absolute impartiality. Finally a boat-load of ammunition and supplies was landed at Detroit from Lake Erie, and the English made an unsuccessful sortie on July 31, 1763. After a desultory warfare, lasting for nearly three months, the Indians withdrew into Indiana, where Pontiac tried in vain to organize another movement. Although Detroit had not been taken, the Indians captured Forts Sandusky, St. Joseph, Miami, Ouiatanon, LeBoeuf and Venango, besides the posts of Mackinaw and Presque Isle. The garrisons at all these points were massacred and innumerable outrages perpetrated elsewhere. Additional British troops were sent west, and the Indians finally brought under control. Pontiac was present at Oswego when a treaty was signed with Sir William Johnson, but remained implacable. His end was tragic. Broken in heart, but still proud in spirit and relentless in purpose, he applied to the former (and last) French Governor of Illinois, the younger St. Ange, who was then at St. Louis, for co-operation and support in another raid against the British. Being refused aid or countenance, according to a story long popularly received, he returned to the vicinity of Cahokia, where, in 1769, he was murdered by a Kaskaskia Indian in consideration of a barrel of liquor. N. Matson, author of several volumes bearing on early history in Illinois, citing Col. Joseph N. Boutrass, an educated half-breed of Kansas, as authority for his statement, asserts that the Indian killed at Cahokia was an impostor, and that the true Pontiac was assassinated by Kinebo, the Head Chief of the Illinois, in a council held on the Des Plaines River, near the present site of Joliet. So well convinced, it is said, was Pierre Chouteau, the St. Louis Indian trader, of the truth of this last story, that he caused a monument, which he had erected over the grave of the false Pontiac, to be removed. Out of the murder of Pontiac, whether occurring at Cahokia or Joliet, it is generally agreed, resulted the extermination of the Illinois and the tragedy of "Starved Rock." (See Starved Rock.)

PONTIAC, an incorporated city, the county-seat of Livingston County. It stands on the bank of the Vermillion River, and is also a point of intersection of the Chicago & Alton, the Wabash and the Illinois Central Railroads. It is 33 miles north-northeast from Bloomington and 93 miles south-southwest of Chicago. The surrounding region is devoted to agriculture, stock-raising and coal-mining. Pontiac has four banks and four weekly newspapers (two issuing daily editions), numerous churches and good schools. Various kinds of manufacturing are conducted, among the principal establishments being flouring mills, three shoe factories, straw paper and candy factories and a foundry. The State Reformatory for Juvenile Offenders is located here. Pop. (1890), 2,784; (1900), 4,266.

POOL, Orval, merchant and banker, was born in Union County, Ky., near Shawneetown, Ill., Feb. 17, 1809, but lived in Shawneetown from seven years of age; in boyhood learned the saddler's trade, but, in 1843, engaged in the dry-goods business, J. McKee Peeples and Thomas S. Ridgway becoming his partners in 1846. In 1850 he retired from the dry-goods trade and became an extensive dealer in produce, pork and tobacco. In 1871 he established the Gallatin County National Bank, of which he was the first President. Died, June 30, 1871.

POOLE, William Frederick, bibliographer, librarian and historical writer, was born at Salem, Mass., Dec. 24, 1821, graduated from Yale College in 1849, and, at the close of his sophomore year, was appointed assistant librarian of his college society, which owned a library of 10,000 volumes. Here he prepared and published the first edition of his now famous "Index to Periodical Literature." A second and enlarged addition was published in 1853, and secured for its author wide fame, in both America and Europe. In 1852 he was made Librarian of the Boston Mercantile Library, and, from 1856 to 1869, had charge of the Boston Athenæum, then one of the largest libraries in the United States, which he relinquished to engage in expert library work. He organized libraries in several New England cities and towns, at the United States Naval Academy, and the Cincinnati Public Library, finally becoming Librarian of the latter institution. In October, 1873, he assumed charge of the Chicago Public Library, then being organized, and, in 1887, became Librarian of the Newberry Library, organizing this institution and remaining at its head until his death, which occurred, March 1, 1894. The degree of LL.D. was conferred on him by the Northwestern University in 1882. Dr. Poole took a prominent part in the organization of library associations, and was one of the Vice-Presidents of the International Conference of Librarians, held in London in 1871. His advice was much sought in relation to library architecture and management. He wrote much on topics connected with his profession and on historical subjects, frequently contributing to "The North American Review." In 1874-75 he edited a literary paper at Chicago, called "The Owl," and was later a constant contributor to "The Dial." He was President of the American Historical Society and member of State Historical Societies and of other kindred associations.

POPE, Nathaniel, first Territorial Secretary of Illinois, Delegate in Congress and jurist, was born at Louisville, Ky., in 1774; graduated with high honor from Transylvania University, at Lexington, Ky., read law with his brother, Senator John Pope, and, in 1804, emigrated to New Orleans, later living, for a time, at Ste. Genevieve, Mo. In 1808 he became a resident of Kaskaskia and, the next year, was appointed the first Territorial Secretary of Illinois. His native judgment was strong and profound and his intellect quick and far-reaching, while both were thoroughly trained and disciplined by study. In 1816 he was elected a Territorial Delegate to Congress, and proved himself, not only devoted to the interests of his constituents, but also a shrewd tactician. He was largely instrumental in securing the passage of the act authorizing the formation of a State government, and it was mainly through his efforts that the northern boundary of Illinois was fixed at lat. 43° 30' north, instead of the southern bend of Lake Michigan. Upon the admission of Illinois into the Union, he was made United States Judge of the District, which then embraced the entire State. This office he filled with dignity, impartiality and acceptability until his death, at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Lucretia Yeatman, in St. Louis, Mo., Jan. 23, 1850. Pope County was named in his honor.—Gen. John (Pope), son of the preceding, was born in Louisville, Ky., March 16, 1822; graduated at the United States Military Academy, 1842, and appointed brevet Second Lieutenant of Topographical Engineers; served in Florida (1842-44), on the northeast boundary survey, and in the Mexican War (1846-47), being promoted First Lieutenant for bravery at Monterey and Captain at Buena Vista. In 1849 he conducted an exploring expedition in Minnesota, was in charge of topographical engineering service in New Mexico (1851-53), and of the survey of a route for the Union Pacific Railway (1853-59), meanwhile experimenting on the feasibility of artesian wells on the "Staked Plains" in Northwestern Texas. He was a zealous friend of Abraham Lincoln in the political campaign of 1860, and was court-martialed for criticising the policy of President Buchanan, in a paper read before a literary society in Cincinnati, the proceedings being finally dropped on the recommendation of the (then) Secretary of War, Joseph Holt. In 1861 he was one of the officers detailed by the War Department to conduct Mr. Lincoln to the capital, and, in May following, was made Brigadier-General of Volunteers and assigned to command in Missouri, where he performed valuable service in protecting railroad communications and driving out guerrillas, gaining an important victory over Sterling Price at Blackwater, in December of that year; in 1862 had command of the land forces co-operating with Admiral Foote, in the expedition against New Madrid and Island No. 10, resulting in the capture of that stronghold with 6,500 prisoners, 125 cannon and 7,000 small arms, thereby winning a Major-General's commission. Later, having participated in the operations against Corinth, he was transferred to command of the Army of Virginia, and soon after commissioned Brigadier-General in the regular army. Here, being forced to meet a greatly superior force under General Lee, he was subjected to reverses which led to his falling back on Washington and a request to be relieved of his command. For failure to give him proper support, Gen. Fitzjohn Porter was tried by court-martial, and, having been convicted, was cashiered and declared forever disqualified from holding any office of trust or profit under the United States Government—although this verdict was finally set aside and Porter restored to the army as Colonel, by act of Congress, in August, 1886. General Pope's subsequent service was performed chiefly against the Indians in the Northwest, until 1865, when he took command of the military division of Missouri, and, in June following, of the Department of the Missouri, including all the Northwestern States and Territories, from which he was relieved early in 1866. Later, he held command, under the Reconstruction Acts, in Georgia, Alabama and Florida (1867-68); the Department of the Lakes (1868-70); Department of the Missouri (1870-84); and Department of the Pacific, from 1884 to his retirement, March 16, 1886. General Pope published "Explorations from the Red River to the Rio Grande" and "Campaigns in Virginia" (1863). Died, at Sandusky, Ohio, Sept. 23, 1892.

POPE COUNTY, lies on the southern border of the State, and contains an area of about 360 square miles—named in honor of Judge Nathaniel Pope. It was erected in 1816 (two years before the admission of Illinois as a State) from parts of Gallatin and Johnson Counties. The county-seat was first located at Sandville, but later changed to Golconda. Robert Lacy, Benoni Lee and Thomas Ferguson were the first Commissioners; Hamlet Ferguson was chosen Sheriff; John Scott, Recorder; Thomas C. Browne, Prosecuting-Attorney, and Samuel Omelveney, Treasurer. The highest land in Southern Illinois is in the north-eastern part of this county, reaching an elevation of 1,046 feet. The bluffs along the Ohio River are bold in outline, and the ridges are surmounted by a thick growth of timber, notably oak and hickory. Portions of the bottom lands are submerged, at times, during a part of the year and are covered with cypress timber. The remains of Indian mounds and fortifications are found, and some interesting relics have been exhumed. Sandstone is quarried in abundance, and coal is found here and there. Mineral springs (with coppers as the chief ingredient) are numerous. Iron is found in limited quantities, among the rocks toward the south, while spar and kaolin clay are found in the north. The chief agricultural products are potatoes, corn and tobacco. Population (1890), 14,016; (1900), 13,585.

PORT BYRON, a village of Rock Island County, on the Mississippi River and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, 16 miles above Rock Island; has lime kilns, grain elevator, two banks, academy, public schools, and a newspaper. Pop. (1900), 732. The (Illinois) Western Hospital for the Insane is located at Watertown, twelve miles below Port Byron.

PORTER, (Rev.) Jeremiah, pioneer clergyman, was born at Hadley, Mass., in 1804; graduated from Williams College in 1825, and studied theology at both Andover and Princeton seminaries, graduating from the latter in 1831. The same year he made the (then) long and perilous journey to Fort Brady, a military post at the Sault Ste. Marie, where he began his work as a missionary. In 1833 he came to Chicago, where he remained for two years, organizing the First Presbyterian Church of Chicago, with a membership of twenty-six persons. Afterwards he had pastoral charge of churches at Peoria and Farmington. While in Chicago he was married to Miss Eliza Chappell, one of the earliest teachers in Chicago. From 1840 to '58 he was located at Green Bay, Wis., accepting a call from a Chicago Church in the year last named. In 1861 he was commissioned Chaplain in the volunteer service by Governor Yates, and mustered out in 1865. The next five years were divided between labors at Brownsville, Tex., in the service of the Sanitary Commission, and a pastorate at Prairie du Chien. In 1870 he was commissioned Chaplain in the regular army, remaining in the service (with occasional leaves of absence) until 1882, when he was retired from active service on account of advanced age. His closing years were spent at the homes of his children in Detroit and Beloit; died at the latter city, July 25, 1893, at the age of 89 years.

POSEY, (Gen.) Thomas, Continental and Revolutionary soldier, was born in Virginia, July 9, 1750; in 1774 took part in Lord Dunmore's expedition against the Indians, and, later, in various engagements of the Revolutionary War, being part of the time under the immediate command of Washington; was with General Wayne in the assault on Stony Point and present at Cornwallis' surrender at Yorktown; also served, after the war, with Wayne as a Brigadier-General in the Northwest Territory. Removing to Kentucky, he served in the State Senate, for a time being presiding officer and acting Lieutenant-Governor; later (1812), was elected United States Senator from Louisiana, and, from 1813 to '16, served as Territorial Governor of Indiana. Died, at the home of his son-in-law, Joseph M. Street, at Shawneetown, Ill., March 18, 1818, where he lies buried. At the time of his death General Posey was serving as Indian Agent.

POST, Joel S., lawyer and soldier of the Mexican War; was born in Ontario (now Wayne) County, N. Y., April 27, 1816; in 1828 removed with his father to Washtenaw County, Mich., remaining there until 1839, when he came to Macon County, Ill. The following year, he commenced the study of law with Judge Charles Emmerson, of Decatur, and was admitted to the bar in 1841. In 1846 he enlisted in the Mexican War, and served as Quartermaster of the Fourth Regiment (Col. E. D. Baker's); in 1856 was elected to the State Senate, and, at the following session, was a leading supporter of the measures which resulted in the establishment of the State Normal School at Bloomington. Capt. Post's later years were spent at Decatur, where he died, June 7, 1886.

POST, Philip Sidney, soldier and Congressman, was born at Florida, Orange County, N. Y., March 19, 1833; at the age of 22 graduated from Union College, studied law at Poughkeepsie Law School, and, removing to Illinois, was admitted to the bar in 1856. At the outbreak of the Civil War he enlisted, and was commissioned Second Lieutenant in the Fifty-ninth Illinois Volunteers. He was a gallant, fearless soldier, and was repeatedly promoted for bravery and meritorious service, until he attained the rank of brevet Brigadier-General. He participated in many important battles and was severely wounded at Pea Ridge and Nashville. In 1865 he was in command in Western Texas. After the close of the war he entered the diplomatic service, being appointed Consul-General to Austria-Hungary in 1874, but resigned in 1879, and returned to his home in Galesburg. From 1882 to 1886 he was a member of the Republican State Central Committee, and, during 1886, was Commander of the Department of Illinois, G. A. R. He was elected to Congress from the Tenth District on the Republican ticket in 1886, serving continuously by re-election until his death, which occurred in Washington, Jan. 6, 1895.

POST, Truman Marcellus, D.D., clergyman, was born at Middlebury, Vt., June 3, 1810; graduated at Middlebury College in 1829, was Principal of Castleton Academy for a year, and a tutor at Middlebury two years, meanwhile studying law. After a winter spent in Washington, listening to the orators of the time in Congress and before the Supreme Court, including Clay, Webster, Wirt and their contemporaries, he went west in 1833, first visiting St. Louis, but finally settling at Jacksonville, Ill., where he was admitted to the bar, but soon after accepted the Professorship of Classical Languages in Illinois College, and later that of History; then began the study of theology, was ordained in 1840, and assumed the pastorate of the Congregational Church in Jacksonville. In 1847 he was called to the pastorate of the Third Presbyterian Church of St. Louis, and, in 1851, to the First Congregational Church, of which the former furnished the nucleus. For a year or two after removing to St. Louis, he continued his lectures on history at Illinois College for a short period each year; also held the professorship of Ancient and Modern History in Washington University, in St. Louis; in 1873-75 was Southworth lecturer on Congregationalism in Andover Theological Seminary and, for several years, Professor of Ecclesiastical History in Chicago Theological Seminary. His splendid diction and his noble style of oratory caused him to be much sought after as a public lecturer or platform speaker at college commencements, while his purity of life and refinement of character attracted to him all with whom he came in personal contact. He received the degree of D.D. from Middlebury College in 1855; was a frequent contributor to "The Biblical Repository" and other religious publications, and, besides numerous addresses, sermons and pamphlets, he was the author of a volume entitled "The Skeptical Era in Modern History" (New York, 1856). He resigned his pastorate in January, 1882, but continued to be a frequent speaker, either in the pulpit or on the lecture platform, nearly to the period of his death, which occurred in St. Louis, Dec. 31, 1886. For a quarter of a century he was one of the Trustees of Monticello Female Seminary, at Godfrey, Ill., being, for a considerable portion of the time, President of the Board.

POTTAWATOMIES, THE, an Indian tribe, one of the three subdivisions of the Ojibwas (or Ojibbeways), who, in turn, constituted a numerous family of the Algonquins. The other branches were the Ottawa and the Chippewas. The latter, however, retained the family name, and hence some writers have regarded the "Ojibbeways" and the "Chippewas" as essentially identical. This interchanging of names has been a prolific source of error. Inherently, the distinction was analogous to that existing between genus and species, although a confusion of nomenclature has naturally resulted in errors more or less serious. These three tribes early separated, the Pottawatomes going south from Green Bay along the western shore of Lake Michigan. The meaning of the name is, "we are making a fire," and the word is a translation into the Pottawatomie language of the name first given to the tribe by the Miamis. These Indians were tall, fierce and haughty, and the tribe was divided into four branches, or clans, called by names which signify, respectively, the golden carp, the tortoise, the crab and the frog. According to the "Jesuit Relations," the Pottawatomes were first met by the French, on the north of Lake Huron, in 1639-40. More than a quarter of a century later (1666) Father Allouez speaks of them as dwellers on the shores of Lake Michigan. The same Father described them as idolatrous and polygamous, yet as possessing a rude civility and as being kindly disposed toward the French. This friendship continued unbroken until the expulsion of the latter from the Northwest. About 1678 they spread southward from Green Bay to the head of Lake Michigan, a portion of the tribe settling in Illinois as far south as the Kankakee and Illinois Rivers, crowding the Winnebagoes and the Sacs and Foxes on the west, and advancing, on the east, into the country of the Miamis as far as the Wabash and the Maumee. They fought on the side of the French in the French and Indian War, and later took part in the conspiracy of Pontiac to capture and reduce the British posts, and were so influenced by Tecumseh and the Prophet that a considerable number of their warriors fought against General Harrison at Tippecanoe. During the War of 1812 they actively supported the British. They were also prominent at the Chicago massacre. Schoolcraft says of them, "They were foremost at all treaties where lands were to be ceded, clamoring for the lion's share of all presents and annuities, particularly where these last were the price paid for the sale of other lands than their own." The Pottawatomes were parties to the treaties at Chicago in 1832 and 1833, and were among the last of the tribes to remove beyond the Mississippi, their final emigration not taking place until 1838. In 1846 the scattered fragments of this tribe coalesced with those of the Chippewas and Ottawas, and formed the Pottawatomie nation. They ceded all their lands, wherever located, to the United States, for $850,000, agreeing to accept 576,000 acres in Kansas in lieu of $87,000 of this amount. Through the rapacity and trespasses of white settlers, this reservation was soon dismembered, and the lands passed into other hands. In 1867, under an enabling act of Congress, 1,400 of the nation (then estimated at 2,500) became citizens. Their present location is in the southeastern part of Oklahoma.

POWELL, John Wesley, Ph.D., LL.D., geologist and anthropologist, was born at Mount Morris, N. Y., March 24, 1834, the son of a Methodist itinerant preacher, passing his early life at various places in Ohio, Wisconsin and Illinois; studied for a time in Illinois College (Jacksonville), and subsequently in Wheaton College, but, in 1854, began a special course at Oberlin, Ohio, teaching at intervals in public schools. Having a predilection for the natural sciences, he spent much time in making collections, which he placed in various Illinois institutions. Entering the army in 1861 as a private of the Twentieth Illinois Volunteers, he later became a Captain of the Second Illinois Artillery, being finally promoted Major. He lost his right arm at the battle of Shiloh, but returned to his regiment as soon as sufficiently recovered, and continued in active service to the close of the war. In 1865 he became Professor of Geology and Curator of the Museum in Illinois Wesleyan University at Bloomington, but resigned to accept a similar position in the State Normal University. In 1867 he began his greatest work in connection with science by leading a class of pupils to the mountains of Colorado for the study of geology, which he followed, a year later, by a more thorough survey of the cañon of the Colorado River than had ever before been attempted. This led to provision by Congress, in 1870, for a topographical and geological survey of the Colorado and its tributaries, which was appropriately placed under his direction. Later, he was placed in charge of the Bureau of Ethnology in connection with the Smithsonian Institute, and, again in 1881, was assigned to the directorship of the United States Geological Survey, later becoming Director of the Bureau of Ethnology, in connection with the Smithsonian Institute in Washington City, where (1899) he still remains. In 1886 Major Powell received the degree of Ph.D. from Heidelberg University, and that of LL.D. from Harvard the same year. He is also a member of the leading scientific associations of the country, while his reports and addresses fill numerous volumes issued by the Government.

POWELL, William Henry, soldier and manufacturer, was born in South Wales, May 10, 1825; came to America in 1830, was educated in the common schools of Tennessee, and (1856-61) was manager of a manufacturing company at Ironton, Ohio; in 1861, became Captain of a West Virginia cavalry company, and was advanced through the grades of Major, Lieutenant-Colonel and Colonel; was wounded while leading a charge at Wytheville, Va., left on the field, captured and confined in Libby Prison six months. After exchange he led a cavalry division in the Army of the Shenandoah; was made Brigadier-General in October, 1864; after the war settled in West Virginia, and was a Republican Presidential Elector in 1868. He is now at the head of a nail mill and foundry in Belleville, and was Commander of the Grand Army of the Republic for the Department of Illinois during 1895-96.

PRAIRIE CITY, a village in McDonough County, on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, 23 miles southwest from Galesburg and 17 miles northeast of Macomb; has a carriage factory, flour mill, elevators, lumber and stock yards, a nursery, a bank, four churches and two weekly papers. Pop. (1890), 812; (1900), 818.

PRAIRIE DU PONT, (in English, Bridge Prairie), an early French settlement, one mile south of Cahokia. It was commenced about 1760, located on the banks of a creek, on which was the first mill, operated by water-power, in that section, having been erected by missionaries from St. Sulpice, in 1754. In 1765 the village contained fourteen families. In 1844 it was inundated and nearly destroyed.

PRAIRIE du ROCHER, (in English, Prairie of the Rock), an early French village in what is now Monroe County, which began to spring up near Fort Chartres (see Fort Chartres), and by 1722 had grown to be a considerable settlement. It stood at the foot of the Mississippi bluffs, about four miles northeast of the fort. Like other French villages in Illinois, it had its church and priest, its common field and commons. Many of the houses were picturesque cottages built of limestone. The ancient village is now extinct; yet, near the outlet of a creek which runs through the bluff, may be seen the vestiges of a water mill, said to have been erected by the Jesuits during the days of French occupation.

PRENTICE, William S., Methodist Episcopal clergyman, was born in St. Clair County, Ill., in 1819; licensed as a Methodist preacher in 1849, and filled pastorates at Paris, Danville, Carlinville, Springfield, Jacksonville and other places—the latter part of his life, serving as Presiding Elder; was a delegate to the General Conference of 1860, and regularly re-elected from 1873 to the end of his life. During the latter part of his life his home was in Springfield. Died, June 28, 1887.

PRENTISS, Benjamin Mayberry, soldier, was born at Belleville, Wood County, Va., Nov. 23, 1819; in 1835 accompanied his parents to Missouri, and, in 1841, removed to Quincy, Ill., where he learned a trade, afterwards embarking in the commission business. In 1844-45 he was Lieutenant of a company sent against the Mormons at Nauvoo, later serving as Captain of Volunteers in the Mexican War. In 1860 he was an unsuccessful Republican candidate for Congress; at the outbreak of the Civil War tendered his services to Governor Yates, and was commissioned Colonel of the Tenth Illinois Volunteers, was almost immediately promoted to Brigadier-General and placed in command at Cairo, so continuing until relieved by General Grant, in September, 1861. At the battle of Shiloh, in April following, he was captured with most of his command, after a most vigorous fight with a superior rebel force, but, in 1862, was exchanged and brevetted Major-General of Volunteers. He was a member of the court-martial that tried Gen. Fitzjohn Porter, and, as commander at Helena, Ark., defeated the Confederate Generals Holmes and Price on July 3, 1863. He resigned his commission, Oct. 28, 1863. In 1869 he was appointed by President Grant Pension Agent at Quincy, serving four years. At present (1895) General Prentiss' residence is at Bethany, Mo., where he served as Postmaster, during the administration of President Benjamin Harrison, and was reappointed by President McKinley. Died Feb. 8, 1901.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS. (See Elections.)

PRESBYTERIAN HOSPITAL, located at Chicago, was organized in 1883 by a number of wealthy and liberal Presbyterians, "for the purpose of affording medical and surgical aid to sick and disabled persons, and to provide them, while inmates of the hospital, with the ministrations of the gospel, agreeably to the doctrines and forms of the Presbyterian Church." Rush Medical College offered a portion of its ground as a site (see Rush Medical College), and through generous subscriptions, a well-planned building was erected, capable of accommodating about 250 patients. A corridor connects the college and hospital buildings. The medical staff comprises eighteen of Chicago's best known physicians and surgeons.

PRESBYTERIANS, THE. The first Presbyterian society in Illinois was organized by Rev. James McGready, of Kentucky, in 1816, at Sharon, White County. Revs. Samuel J. Mills and Daniel Smith, also Presbyterians, had visited the State in 1814, as representatives of the Massachusetts Missionary Society, but had formed no society. The members of the Sharon church were almost all immigrants from the South, and were largely of Scotch-Irish extraction. Two other churches were established in 1819—one at Shoal Creek, Bond County, and the other at Edwardsville. In 1825 there were but three Presbyterian ministers in Illinois—Revs. Stephen Bliss, John Brich and B. F. Spilman. Ten years later there were 80 churches, with a membership of 2,500 and 60 ministers. In 1880 the number of churches had increased to 487; but, in 1890, (as shown by the United States census) there were less. In the latter year there were 405 ministers and 52,945 members. The Synod of Illinois is the highest ecclesiastical court of the denomination in the State, and, under its jurisdiction, the church maintains two seminaries: one (the McCormick) at Chicago, and the other (the Blackburn University) at Carlinville. The organ of the denomination is "The Interior," founded by Cyrus H. McCormick, and published weekly at Chicago, with William C. Gray as editor. The Illinois Synod embraced within its jurisdiction (1895) eleven Presbyteries, to which were attached 483 churches, 464 ministers and a membership of 63,247. (See also Religious Denominations.)

PRICKETT, Abraham, pioneer merchant, was born near Lexington, Ky., came to Madison County, Ill., in 1808; was employed for a time in the drug business in St. Louis, then opened a store at Edwardsville, where, in 1813, he received from the first County Court of Madison County, a license to retail merchandise. In 1818, he served as one of the three Delegates from Madison County to the Convention which framed the first State Constitution, and, the same year, was elected a Representative in the First General Assembly; was also Postmaster of the town of Edwardsville for a number of years. In 1825 he removed to Adams County and laid out an addition to the city of Quincy; was also engaged there in trade with the Indians. In 1836, while engaged on a Government contract for the removal of snags and other obstructions to the navigation of Red River, he died at Natchitoches, La.—George W. (Prickett) a son of the preceding, and afterwards a citizen of Chicago, is said to have been the first white child born in Edwardsville.—Isaac (Prickett), a brother of Abraham, came to St. Louis in 1815, and to Edwardsville in 1818, where he was engaged in mercantile business with his brother and, later, on his own account. He held the offices of Postmaster, Public Administrator, Quartermaster-General of State Militia, Inspector of the State Penitentiary, and, from 1838 to '42, was Receiver of Public Moneys at Edwardsville, dying in 1844.

PRICKETT, David, pioneer lawyer, was born in Franklin County, Ga., Sept. 21, 1800; in early childhood was taken by his parents to Kentucky and from there to Edwardsville, Ill. He graduated from Transylvania University, and, in 1821, began the practice of law; was the first Supreme Court Reporter of Illinois, Judge of the Madison County Probate Court, Representative in the General Assembly (1826-28), Aid-de-Camp to General Whiteside in the Black Hawk War, State's Attorney for Springfield Judicial Circuit (1837), Treasurer of the Board of Canal Commissioners (1840), Director of the State Bank of Illinois (1842), Clerk of the House of Representatives for ten sessions and Assistant Clerk of the same at the time of his death, March 1, 1847.

PRINCE, David, physician and surgeon, was born in Brooklyn, Windham County, Conn., June 21, 1816; removed with his parents to Canandaigua, N. Y., and was educated in the academy there; began the study of medicine in the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York, finishing at the Ohio Medical College, Cincinnati, where he was associated, for a year and a half, with the celebrated surgeon, Dr. Muzzy. In 1843 he came to Jacksonville, Ill., and, for two years, was Professor of Anatomy in the Medical Department of Illinois College; later, spent five years practicing in St. Louis, and lecturing on surgery in the St. Louis Medical College, when, returning to Jacksonville in 1852, he established himself in practice there, devoting special attention to surgery, in which he had already won a wide reputation. During the latter part of the Civil War he served, for fourteen months, as Brigade Surgeon in the Army of the Potomac, and, on the capture of a portion of his brigade, voluntarily surrendered himself that he might attend the captives of his command in Libby Prison. After the close of the war he was employed for some months, by the Sanitary Commission, in writing a medical history of the war. He visited Europe twice, first in 1881 as a delegate to the International Medical Congress in London, and again as a member of the Copenhagen Congress of 1884—at each visit making careful inspection of the hospitals in London, Paris, and Berlin. About 1867 he established a Sanitarium in Jacksonville for the treatment of surgical cases and chronic diseases, to which he gave the closing years of his life. Thoroughly devoted to his profession, liberal, public-spirited and sagacious in the adoption of new methods, he stood in the front rank of his profession, and his death was mourned by large numbers who had received the benefit of his ministrations without money and without price. He was member of a number of leading professional associations, besides local literary and social organizations. Died, at Jacksonville, Dec. 19, 1889.

PRINCE, Edward, lawyer, was born at West Bloomfield, Ontario County, N. Y., Dec. 8, 1832; attended school at Payson, Ill., and Illinois College, Jacksonville, graduating from the latter in 1852; studied law at Quincy, and after admission to the bar in 1853, began dealing in real estate. In 1861 he offered his services to Governor Yates, was made Captain and Drill-master of cavalry and, a few months later, commissioned Lieutenant-Colonel of the Seventh Illinois Cavalry, taking part, as second in command, in the celebrated "Grierson raid" through Mississippi, in 1863, serving until discharged with the rank of Colonel of his regiment, in 1864. After the war he gave considerable attention to engineering and the construction of a system of water-works for the city of Quincy, where he now resides.

PRINCE, George W., lawyer and Congressman, born in Tazewell County, Ill., March 4, 1854; was educated in the public schools and at Knox College, graduating from the latter in 1878. He then studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1880; was elected City Attorney of Galesburg the following year; served as chairman of the Knox County Republican Central Committee in 1884, and, in 1888, was elected Representative in the General Assembly and re-elected two years later. In 1892 he was the Republican nominee for Attorney-General of the State of Illinois, but was defeated with the rest of the State's ticket; at a special election, held in April, 1895, he was chosen Representative in Congress from the Tenth District to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Col. Philip Sidney Post, which had occurred in January preceding. In common with a majority of his colleagues, Mr. Prince was re-elected in 1896, receiving a plurality of nearly 16,000 votes, and was elected for a third term in November, 1898.

PRINCETON, a city and the county-seat of Bureau County, on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, 22 miles west-southwest of Mendota, and 104 miles west-southwest of Chicago; has a court house, gas-works, electric lights, graded and high schools, numerous churches, three newspapers and several banks. Coal is mined five miles east, and the manufactures include flour, carriages and farm implements. Pop. (1890), 3,396; (1900), 4,023. Princeton is populated with one of the most intelligent and progressive communities in the State. It was the home of Owen Lovejoy during the greater part of his life in Illinois.

PRINCETON & WESTERN RAILWAY. (See Chicago & Northwestern Railway.)

PRINCEVILLE, a village of Peoria County, on the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe and the Rock Island & Peoria Railways, 22 miles northwest of Peoria; is a trade center for a prosperous agricultural region. Population (1890), 641; (1900), 735.

PROPHETSTOWN, a town in Whiteside County, on Rock River and the Fulton Branch of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, 45 miles northwest of Mendota; has some manufactures, three banks and two newspapers. Pop. (1890), 694; (1900), 1,143.

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION. (See Minority Representation.)

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH. The pioneer Episcopal clergyman in this State was the Rt. Rev. Philander Chase, who was made Bishop of Illinois in 1835, and was the founder of Jubilee College. (See Chase, Rev. Philander.) The State at present is organized under the provincial system, the province comprising the dioceses of Chicago, Quincy and Springfield. At its head (1898) is the Rt. Rev. William E. McLaren, Bishop of Chicago. Rev. George F. Seymour of Springfield is Bishop of the Springfield Diocese, with C. R. Hale, Coadjutor at Cairo, and Rev. Alexander Burgess, Bishop of the Quincy Diocese, with residence at Peoria. The numerical strength of the church in Illinois is not great, although between 1880 and 1890 its membership was almost doubled. In 1840 there were but eighteen parishes, with thirteen clergymen and a membership of 267. By 1880 the number of parishes had increased to 89, there being 127 ministers and 9,842 communicants. The United States Census of 1890 showed the following figures: Parishes, 197; clergymen, 150, membership, 18,609. Total contributions (1890) for general church and mission work, $373,798. The chief educational institution of the denomination in the West is the Western Theological Seminary at Chicago. (See also Religious Denominations.)

PRYOR, Joseph Everett, pioneer and early steamboat captain, was born in Virginia, August 10, 1787—the son of a non-commissioned officer of the Revolution, who emigrated to Kentucky about 1790 and settled near Louisville, which was then a fort with some twenty log cabins. In 1813 the son located where Golconda, Pope County, now stands, and early in life adopted the calling of a boatman, which he pursued some forty years. At this time he held a commission as a "Falls Pilot," and piloted the first steamer that ascended the Ohio River from New Orleans. During his long service no accident happened to any steamer for which he was responsible, although the Mississippi then bristled with snags. He owned and commanded the steamer Telegraph, which was sunk, in 1835, by collision with the Duke of Orleans on the Mississippi, but, owing to his presence of mind and the good discipline of his crew, no lives were lost. The salient features of his character were a boundless benevolence manifested to others, and his dauntless courage, displayed not only in the face of dangers met in his career as a boatman, but in his encounters with robbers who then infested portions of Southern Illinois. He had a reputation as a skillful pilot and popular commander not excelled by any of his contemporaries. He died, at his home in Pope County, Oct. 5, 1851, leaving one daughter, now Mrs. Cornelia P. Bozman, of Cairo, Ill.

PUBLIC INSTRUCTION, SUPERINTENDENTS OF. (See Superintendents of Public Instruction.)

PUGH, Isaac C., soldier, was born in Christian County, Ky., Nov. 23, 1805; came to Illinois, in 1821, with his father, who first settled in Shelby County, but, in 1829, removed to Macon County, where the subject of this sketch resided until his death, at Decatur, Nov. 14, 1874. General Pugh served in three wars—first in the Black Hawk War of 1832; then, with the rank of Captain and Field Officer in the Fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteers (Col. E. D. Baker's) in the war with Mexico, and, during the Civil War, entering upon the latter as Colonel of the Forty-first Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in September, 1861, and being mustered out with the rank of full Brigadier-General in August, 1864, when his regiment was consolidated with the Fifty-third. He took part with his regiment in the battles of Fort Donelson and Shiloh, and in the operations around Vicksburg, being wounded at the latter. In the year of his retirement from the army (1864) he was elected a Representative in the Twenty-fourth General Assembly, and, the following year, was chosen County-Clerk of Macon County, serving four years.

PUGH, Jonathan H., pioneer lawyer, was born in Bath County, Ky., came to Bond County, Ill., finally locating at Springfield in 1823, and being the second lawyer to establish himself in practice in that city. He served in the Third, Fifth, Sixth and Seventh General Assemblies, and was defeated for Congress by Joseph Duncan (afterwards Governor), in 1831. Died, in 1833. Mr. Pugh is described by his contemporaries as a man of brilliant parts, an able lawyer and a great wit.

PULASKI COUNTY, an extreme southern county and one of the smallest in the State, bordering on the Ohio River and having an area of 190 square miles and a population (1900), of 14,554. It was cut off from Alexander County in 1843, and named in honor of a Polish patriot who had aided the Americans during the Revolution. The soil is generally rich, and the surface varied with much low land along the Cache and the Ohio Rivers. Wheat, corn and fruit are the principal crops, while considerable timber is cut upon the bottom lands. Mound City is the county-seat and was conceded a population, by the census of 1890, of 2,550. Only the lowest, barren portion of the carboniferous formation extends under the soil, the coal measures being absent. Traces of iron have been found and sulphur and copperas springs abound.

PULLMAN, a former suburb (now a part of the South Division) of the city of Chicago, 13.8 miles south of the initial station of the Illinois Central Railroad. The Pullman Palace Car Company began the erection of buildings here in 1880, and, on the 1st of January, 1881, the first family settled in the future manufacturing city. Within the next few years, it became the center of the largest manufacturing establishments in the country, including the Pullman Car Works, the Allen Paper Car Wheel Works and extensive steel forging works, employing thousands of mechanics. Large numbers of sleeping and dining cars, besides ordinary passenger coaches and freight cars, were manufactured here every year, not only for use on the railroads of the United States, but for foreign countries as well. The town was named for the late George M. Pullman, the founder of the car-works, and was regarded as a model city, made up of comfortable homes erected by the Palace Car Company for the use of its employes. It was well supplied with school-houses, and churches, and a public library was established there and opened to the public in 1883. The town was annexed to the city of Chicago in 1890.

PULLMAN, George Mortimer, founder of the Pullman Palace Car Company, was born at Brocton, N. Y., March 3, 1831, enjoyed ordinary educational advantages in his boyhood and, at fourteen years of age, obtained employment as a clerk, but a year later joined his brother in the cabinet-making business at Albion. His father, who was a house-builder and house-mover, having died in 1853, young Pullman assumed the responsibility of caring for the family and, having secured a contract for raising a number of buildings along the Erie Canal, made necessary by the enlargement of that thoroughfare, in this way acquired some capital and experience which was most valuable to him in after years. Coming to Chicago in 1859, when the work of raising the grade of the streets in the business portion of the city had been in progress for a year or two, he found a new field for the exercise of his inventive skill, achieving some marvelous transformations in a number of the principal business blocks in that part of the city. As early as 1858, Mr. Pullman had had his attention turned to devising some means for increasing the comforts of night-travel upon railways, and, in 1859, he remodeled two old day-coaches into a species of sleeping-cars, which were used upon the Alton Road. From 1860 to 1863 he spent in Colorado devoting his engineering skill to mining; but returning to Chicago the latter year, entered upon his great work of developing the idea of the sleeping-car into practical reality. The first car was completed and received the name of the "Pioneer." This car constituted a part of the funeral train which took the remains of Abraham Lincoln to Springfield, Ill., after his assassination in April, 1865. The development of the "Pullman palace sleeping-car," the invention of the dining-car, and of vestibule trains, and the building up of the great industrial town which bears his name, and is now a part of the city of Chicago, constituted a work of gradual development which resulted in some of the most remarkable achievements in the history of the nineteenth century, both in a business sense and in promoting the comfort and safety of the traveling public, as well as in bettering the conditions of workingmen. He lived to see the results of his inventive genius and manufacturing skill in use upon the principal railroads of the United States and introduced upon a number of important lines in Europe also. Mr. Pullman was identified with a number of other enterprises more or less closely related to the transportation business, but the Pullman Palace Car Company was the one with which he was most closely connected, and by which he will be longest remembered. He was also associated with some of the leading educational and benevolent enterprises about the city of Chicago, to which he contributed in a liberal manner during his life and in his will. His death occurred suddenly, from heart disease, at his home in Chicago, Oct. 19, 1897.

PURPLE, Norman H., lawyer and jurist, was born in Litchfield County, Conn., read law and was admitted to the bar in Tioga County, Pa., settled at Peoria, Ill., in 1836, and the following year was appointed Prosecuting Attorney for the Ninth Judicial District, which then embraced the greater portion of the State east of Peoria. In 1844 he was a Presidential Elector, and, in 1845, Governor Ford appointed him a Justice of the Supreme Court, vice Jesse B. Thomas, Jr., who had resigned. As required by law, he at the same time served as Circuit Judge, his district embracing all the counties west of Peoria, and his home being at Quincy. After the adoption of the Constitution of 1848 he returned to Peoria and resumed practice. He compiled the Illinois Statutes relating to real property, and, in 1857, made a compilation of the general laws, generally known to the legal profession as the "Purple Statutes." He subsequently undertook to compile and arrange the laws passed from 1857 to '63, and was engaged on this work when overtaken by death, at Chicago, Aug. 9, 1863. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1862, and, during the last ten years of his life, prominent at the Chicago bar.

PUTERBAUGH, Sabin D., judge and author, was born in Miami County, Ohio, Sept. 28, 1834; at 8 years of age removed with his parents to Tazewell County, Ill.; settled in Pekin in 1853, where he read law, and was admitted to the bar in 1856. At the outbreak of the rebellion he was commissioned, by Governor Yates, Major of the Eleventh Illinois Cavalry, and took part in numerous engagements in Western Tennessee and Mississippi, including the battles of Skiloh and Corinth. Resigning his commission in 1862, he took up his residence at Peoria, where he resumed practice and began the preparation of his first legal work—"Common Law Pleading and Practice." In 1864 he formed a partnership with Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, which continued until 1867, when Mr. Puterbaugh was elected Circuit Court Judge. He retired from the bench in 1873 to resume private practice and pursue his work as an author. His first work, having already run through three editions, was followed by "Puterbaugh's Chancery Pleading and Practice," the first edition of which appeared in 1874, and "Michigan Chancery Practice," which appeared in 1881. In 1880 he was chosen Presidential Elector on the Republican ticket. Died, Sept. 25, 1892. Leslie D. (Puterbaugh), a son of Judge Puterbaugh, is Judge of the Circuit Court of the Peoria Circuit.

PUTNAM COUNTY, the smallest county in the State, both as to area and population, containing only 170 square miles; population (1900), 4,746. It lies near the center of the north half of the State, and was named in honor of Gen. Israel Putnam. The first American to erect a cabin within its limits was Gurdon S. Hubbard, who was in business there, as a fur-trader, as early as 1825, but afterwards became a prominent citizen of Chicago. The county was created by act of the Legislature in 1825, although a local government was not organized until some years later. Since that date, Bureau, Marshall and Stark Counties have been erected therefrom. It is crossed and drained by the Illinois River. The surface is moderately undulating and the soil fertile. Corn is the chief staple, although wheat and oats are extensively cultivated. Coal is mined and exported. Hennepin is the county-seat.

QUINCY, the principal city of Western Illinois, and the county-seat of Adams County. It was founded in 1822—the late Gov. John Wood erecting the first log-cabin there—and was incorporated in 1839. The site is naturally one of the most beautiful in the State, the principal part of the city being built on a limestone bluff having an elevation of 125 to 150 feet, and overlooking the Mississippi for a long distance. Its location is 112 miles west of Springfield and 264 miles southwest of Chicago. Besides being a principal shipping point for the river trade north of St. Louis, it is the converging point of several important railway lines, including the Wabash, four branches of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, and the Quincy, Omaha & Kansas City, giving east and west, as well as north and south, connections. At the present time (1904) several important lines, or extensions of railroads already constructed, are in contemplation, which, when completed, will add largely to the commercial importance of the city. The city is regularly laid out, the streets intersecting each other at right angles, and being lighted with gas and electricity. Water is obtained from the Mississippi. There are several electric railway lines, four public parks, a fine railway bridge across the Mississippi, to which a wagon bridge has been added within the past two years; two fine railway depots, and several elegant public buildings, including a handsome county court-house, a Government building for the use of the Post-office and the United States District Court. The Illinois Soldiers' and Sailors' Home is located here, embracing a large group of cottages occupied by veterans of the Civil War, besides hospital and administration buildings for the use of the officers. The city has more than thirty churches, three libraries (one free-public and two college), with excellent schools and other educational advantages. Among the higher institutions of learning are the Chaddock College (Methodist Episcopal) and the St. Francis Solanus College (Roman Catholic). There are two or three national banks, a State bank with a capital of $300,000, beside two private banks, four or five daily papers, with several weekly and one or two monthly publications. Its advantages as a shipping point by river and railroad have made it one of the most important manufacturing centers west of Chicago. The census of 1890 showed a total of 374 manufacturing establishments, having an aggregate capital of $6,187,845, employing 5,058 persons, and turning out an annual product valued at $10,160,492. The cost of material used was $5,597,990, and the wages paid $2,383,571. The number of different industries reported aggregated seventy-six, the more important being foundries, carriage and wagon factories, agricultural implement works, cigar and tobacco factories, flour-mills, breweries, brick-yards, lime works, saddle and harness shops, paper mills, furniture factories, organ works, and artificial-ice factories. Population (1880), 27,268; (1890), 31,494; (1900), 36,252.

RAAB, Henry, ex-State Superintendent of Public Instruction, was born in Wetzlar, Rhenish Prussia, June 20, 1837; learned the trade of a currier with his father and came to the United States in 1853, finally locating at Belleville, Ill., where, in 1857, he became a teacher in the public schools; in 1873 was made Superintendent of schools for that city, and, in 1882, was elected State Superintendent of Public Instruction on the Democratic ticket, declined a renomination in 1886; was nominated a second time in 1890, and re-elected, but defeated by S. M. Inglis in 1894. In the administration of his office, Professor Raab showed a commendable freedom from partisanship. After retiring from the office of State Superintendent, he resumed a position in connection with the public schools of Belleville.

RADISSON, Pierre Esprit, an early French traveler and trader, who is said to have reached the Upper Mississippi on his third voyage to the West in 1658-59. The period of his explorations extended from 1652 to 1684, of which he prepared a narrative which was published by the Prince Society of Boston in 1885, under the title of "Radisson's Voyages." He and his brother-in-law, Medard Chouart, first conceived the idea of planting a settlement at Hudson's Bay. (See Chouart, Medard.)

RAILROAD AND WAREHOUSE COMMISSION, a Board of three Commissioners, appointed by the executive (by and with the advice and consent of the Senate), under authority of an act approved, April 13, 1871, for the enforcement of the provisions of the Constitution and laws in relation to railroads and warehouses. The Commission's powers are partly judicial, partly executive. The following is a summary of its powers and duties: To establish a schedule of maximum rates, equitable to shipper and carrier alike; to require yearly reports from railroads and warehouses; to hear and pass upon complaints of extortion and unjust discrimination, and (if necessary) enforce prosecutions therefor; to secure the safe condition of railway road-beds, bridges and trestles; to hear and decide all manner of complaints relative to intersections and to protect grade-crossings; to insure the adoption of a safe interlocking system, to be approved by the Commission; to enforce proper rules for the inspection and registration of grain throughout the State. The principal offices of the Commission are at the State capital, where monthly sessions are held. For the purpose of properly conducting the grain inspection department, monthly meetings are also held at Chicago, where the offices of a Grain Inspector, appointed by the Board, are located. Here all business relating to this department is discussed and necessary special meetings are held. The inspection department has no revenue outside of fees, but the latter are ample for its maintenance. Fees for inspection on arrival ("inspection in") are twenty-five cents per car-load, ten cents per wagon-load, and forty cents per 1,000 bushels from canal-boat or vessels. For inspection from store ("inspected out") the fees are fifty cents per 1,000 bushels to vessels; thirty-five cents per car-load, and ten cents per wagon-load to teams. While there are never wanting some cases of friction between the transportation companies and warehousemen on the one hand, and the Commission on the other, there can be no question that the formation of the latter has been of great value to the receivers, shippers, forwarders and tax-payers of the State generally. Similar regulations in regard to the inspection of grain in warehouses, at East St. Louis and Peoria, are also in force. The first Board, created under the act of 1871, consisted of Gustavus Koerner, Richard P. Morgan and David S. Hammond, holding office until 1873. Other Boards have been as follows: 1873-77—Henry D. Cook (deceased 1873, and succeeded by James Steele); David A. Brown and John M. Pearson; 1877-83—William M. Smith, George M. Bogue and John H. Oberly (retired 1881 and succeeded by William H. Robinson); 1883-85—Wm. N. Brainard, E. C. Lewis and Charles T. Stratton; 1885-89—John I. Rinaker, Benjamin F. Marsh and Wm. T. Johnson (retired in 1887 and succeeded by Jason Rogers); 1889-93—John R. Wheeler, Isaac N. Phillips and W. S. Crim (succeeded, 1891, by John R. Tanner); 1893-97—W. S. Cantrell, Thomas F. Gahan and Charles F. Lape (succeeded, 1895, by George W. Fithian); 1897-99—Cicero J. Lindley, Charles S. Rannels and James E. Bidwell. (See also Grain Inspection.)

SOLDIERS' WIDOWS' HOME, WILMINGTON.

RAILROADS (IN GENERAL). The existing railroad system of Illinois had its inception in the mania for internal improvement which swept over the country in 1836-37, the basis of the plan adopted in Illinois (as in the Eastern States) being that the State should construct, maintain, own and operate an elaborate system. Lines were to be constructed from Cairo to Galena, from Alton to Mount Carmel, from Peoria to Warsaw, from Alton to the Central Railroad, from Belleville to Mount Carmel, from Bloomington to Mackinaw Town, and from Meredosia to Springfield. The experiment proved extremely unfortunate to the financial interests of the State, and laid the foundation of an immense debt under which it staggered for many years. The Northern Cross Railroad, extending from Meredosia to Springfield, was the only one so far completed as to be in operation. It was sold, in 1847, to Nicholas H. Ridgely, of Springfield for $21,100, he being the highest bidder. This line formed a nucleus of the existing Wabash system. The first road to be operated by private parties (outside of a primitive tramway in St. Clair County, designed for the transportation of coal to St. Louis) was the Galena & Chicago Union, chartered in 1836. This was the second line completed in the State, and the first to run from Chicago. The subsequent development of the railway system of Illinois was at first gradual, then steady and finally rapid. A succinct description of the various lines now in operation in the State may be found under appropriate headings. At present Illinois leads all the States of the Union in the extent of railways in operation, the total mileage (1897) of main track being 10,785.43—or 19 miles for each 100 square miles of territory and 25 miles for each 10,000 inhabitants—estimating the population (1898) at four and a quarter millions. Every one of the 102 counties of the State is traversed by at least one railroad except three—Calhoun, Hardin and Pope. The entire capitalization of the 111 companies doing business in the State in 1896, (including capital stock, funded debt and current liabilities), was $2,669,164,142—equal to $67,556 per mile. In 1894, fifteen owned and ten leased lines paid dividends of from four to eight per cent on common, and from four to ten per cent on preferred, stock—the total amount thus paid aggregating $25,321,752. The total earnings and income, in Illinois, of all lines operated in the State, aggregated $77,508,537, while the total expenditure within the State was $71,463,367. Of the 58,263,860 tons of freight carried, 11,611,798 were of agricultural products and 17,179,366 mineral products. The number of passengers (earning revenue) carried during the year, was 83,281,655. The total number of railroad employes (of all classes) was 61,200. The entire amount of taxes paid by railroad companies for the year was $3,846,379. From 1836, when the first special charter was granted for the construction of a railroad in Illinois, until 1869—after which all corporations of this character came under the general incorporation laws of the State in accordance with the Constitution of 1870—293 special charters for the construction of railroads were granted by the Legislature, besides numerous amendments of charters already in existence. (For the history of important individual lines see each road under its corporate name.)

RALSTON, Virgil Young, editor and soldier, was born, July 16, 1828, at Vanceburg, Ky.; was a student in Illinois College one year (1846-47), after which he studied law in Quincy and practiced for a time; also resided some time in California; 1855-57 was one of the editors of "The Quincy Whig," and represented that paper in the Editorial Convention at Decatur, Feb. 22, 1856. (See Anti-Nebraska Editorial Convention.) In 1861, he was commissioned a Captain in the Sixteenth Illinois Volunteers, but soon resigned on account of ill-health; later, enlisted in an Iowa regiment, but died in hospital at St. Louis, from wounds and exposure, April 19, 1864.

RAMSAY, Rufus N., State Treasurer, was born on a farm in Clinton County, Ill., May 20, 1838; received a collegiate education at Illinois and McKendree Colleges, and at Indiana State University; studied law with ex-Gov. A. C. French, and was admitted to the bar in 1865, but soon abandoned the law for banking, in which he was engaged both at Lebanon and Carlyle, limiting his business to the latter place about 1890. He served one term (from 1865) as County Clerk, and two terms (1889 and '91) as Representative in the General Assembly, and, in 1892, was nominated as a Democrat and elected State Treasurer. Died in office, at Carlyle, Nov. 11, 1894.

RAMSEY, a village of Fayette County, at the intersection of the Illinois Central and the Toledo, St. Louis & Western Railroads, 12 miles north of Vandalia; the district is agricultural; has one newspaper. Pop. (1890), 598; (1900), 747.

RANDOLPH COUNTY, lies in the southwest section of the State, and borders on the Mississippi River; area 560 square miles; named for Beverly Randolph. It was set off from St. Clair County in 1795, being the second county organized in the territory which now constitutes the State of Illinois. From the earliest period of Illinois history, Randolph County has been a pivotal point. In the autumn of 1700 a French and Indian settlement was established at Kaskaskia, which subsequently became the center of French influence in the Mississippi Valley. In 1723 Prairie du Rocher was founded by the French. It was in Randolph County that Fort Chartres was built, in 1720, and it was here that Col. George Rogers Clark's expedition for the seizure of the "Illinois Country" met with success in the capture of Kaskaskia. American immigration began with the close of the Revolutionary War. Among the early settlers were the Cranes (Ichabod and George), Gen. John Edgar, the Dodge family, the Morrises, and John Rice Jones. Toward the close of the century came Shadrach Bond (afterwards the first Governor of the State) with his uncle of the same name, and the Menards (Pierre and Hippolyte), the first of whom subsequently became Lieutenant-Governor. (See Bond, Shadrach; Menard, Pierre.) In outline, Randolph County is triangular, while its surface is diversified. Timber and building stone are abundant, and coal underlies a considerable area. Chester, the county-seat, a city of 3,000 inhabitants, is a place of considerable trade and the seat of the Southern Illinois Penitentiary. The county is crossed by several railroad lines, and transportation facilities are excellent. Population (1890), 25,049; (1900), 28,001.

RANSOM, (Gen.) Thomas Edward Greenfield, soldier, was born at Norwich, Vt., Nov. 29, 1834; educated at Norwich University, an institution under charge of his father, who was later an officer of the Mexican War and killed at Chapultepec. Having learned civil engineering, he entered on his profession at Peru, Ill., in 1851; in 1855 became a member of the real-estate firm of A. J. Galloway & Co., Chicago, soon after removing to Fayette County, where he acted as agent of the Illinois Central Railroad. Under the first call for volunteers, in April, 1861, he organized a company, which having been incorporated in the Eleventh Illinois, he was elected Major, and, on the reorganization of the regiment for the three-years' service, was commissioned Lieutenant-Colonel, in this capacity having command of his regiment at Fort Donelson, where he was severely wounded and won deserved promotion to a colonelcy, as successor to Gen. W. H. L. Wallace, afterwards killed at Shiloh. Here Colonel Ransom again distinguished himself by his bravery, and though again wounded while leading his regiment, remained in command through the day. His service was recognized by promotion as Brigadier-General. He bore a prominent part in the siege of Vicksburg and in the Red River campaign, and, later, commanded the Seventh Army Corps in the operations about Atlanta, but finally fell a victim to disease and his numerous wounds, dying in Chicago, Oct. 29, 1864, having previously received the brevet rank of Major-General. General Ransom was confessedly one of the most brilliant officers contributed by Illinois to the War for the Union, and was pronounced, by both Grant and Sherman, one of the ablest volunteer generals in their commands.

RANTOUL, a city in Champaign County, at the junction of the main line of the Illinois Central Railroad, with its West Lebanon and Leroy branch, 14 miles north-northeast of Champaign and 114 miles south by west of Chicago. It has a national bank, seven churches, opera house, graded school, two weekly papers, machine shops, flouring and flax mills, tile factories, and many handsome residences. Pop. (1900), 1,207.

RASLE, Sebastian, a Jesuit missionary, born in France, in 1658; at his own request was attached to the French missions in Canada in 1689, and, about 1691 or '92, was sent to the Illinois Country, where he labored for two years, traveling much and making a careful study of the Indian dialects. He left many manuscripts descriptive of his journeyings and of the mode of life and character of the aborigines. From Illinois he was transferred to Norridgewock, Maine, where he prepared a dictionary of the Abenaki language in three volumes, which is now preserved in the library of Harvard College. His influence over his Indian parishioners was great, and his use of it, during the French and Indian War, so incensed the English colonists in Massachusetts that the Governor set a price upon his head. On August 12, 1734, he was slain, with seven Indian chiefs who were seeking to aid his escape, during a night attack upon Norridgewock by a force of English soldiers from Fort Richmond, his mutilated body being interred the next day by the Indians. In 1833, the citizens of Norridgewock erected a monument to his memory on the spot where he fell.

RASTER, Herman, journalist, was born in Germany in 1828; entered journalism and came to America in 1851, being employed on German papers in Buffalo and New York City; in 1867 accepted the position of editor-in-chief of "The Chicago Staats Zeitung," which he continued to fill until June, 1890, when he went to Europe for the benefit of his health, dying at Dresden, July 24, 1891. While employed on papers in this country during the Civil War, he acted as the American correspondent of papers at Berlin, Bremen, Vienna, and other cities of Central Europe. He served as delegate to both State and National Conventions of the Republican party, and, in 1869, received from President Grant the appointment of Collector of Internal Revenue for the Chicago District, but, during the later years of his life, cooperated with the Democratic party.

RAUCH, John Henry, physician and sanitary expert, born in Lebanon, Pa., Sept. 4, 1828, and graduated in medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, in 1849. The following year he removed to Iowa, settling at Burlington. He was an active member of the Iowa State Medical Society, and, in 1851, prepared and published a "Report on the Medical and Economic Botany of Iowa," and, later, made a collection of ichthyologic remains of the Upper Mississippi and Missouri for Professor Agassiz. From 1857 to 1860 he filled the chair of Materia Medica and Medical Botany at Rush Medical College, Chicago, occupying the same position in 1859 in the Chicago College of Pharmacy, of which he was one of the organizers. During the Civil War he served, until 1864, as Assistant Medical Director, first in the Army of the Potomac, and later in Louisiana, being brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel at the close of the struggle. Returning to Chicago, he aided in reorganizing the city's health service, and, in 1867, was appointed a member of the new Board of Health and Sanitary Inspector, serving until 1876. The latter year he was chosen President of the American Public Health Association, and, in 1877, a member of the newly created State Board of Health of Illinois, and elected its first President. Later, he became Secretary, and continued in that office during his connection with the Board. In 1878-79 he devoted much attention to the yellow-fever epidemic, and was instrumental in the formation of the Sanitary Council of the Mississippi, and in securing the adoption of a system of river inspection by the National Board of Health. He was a member of many scientific bodies, and the author of numerous monographs and printed addresses, chiefly in the domain of sanitary science and preventive medicine. Among them may be noticed "Intramural Interments and Their Influence on Health and Epidemics," "Sanitary Problems of Chicago," "Prevention of Asiatic Cholera in North America," and a series of reports as Secretary of the State Board of Health. Died, at Lebanon, Pa., March 24, 1894.

RAUM, (Gen.) Green Berry, soldier and author, was born at Golconda, Pope County, Ill., Dec. 3, 1829, studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1853, but, three years later, removed with his family to Kansas. His Free-State proclivities rendering him obnoxious to the pro-slavery party there, he returned to Illinois in 1857, settling at Harrisburg, Saline County. Early in the Civil War he was commissioned a Major in the Fifty-sixth Illinois Volunteers, was subsequently promoted to a Lieutenant-Colonelcy, and, later, advanced to a Brigadier-Generalship, resigning his commission at the close of the war (May 6, 1865). He was with Rosecrans in the Mississippi campaign of 1862, took a conspicuous part in the battle of Corinth, participated in the siege of Vicksburg and was wounded at Missionary Ridge. He also rendered valuable service during the Atlanta campaign, keeping lines of communication open, re-enforcing Resaca and repulsing an attack by General Hood. He was with Sherman in the "March to the Sea," and with Hancock, in the Shenandoah Valley, when the war closed. In 1866 General Raum became President of the projected Cairo & Vincennes Railroad, an enterprise of which he had been an active promoter. He was elected to Congress in 1866 from the Southern Illinois District (then the Thirteenth), serving one term, and the same year presided over the Republican State Convention, as he did again in 1876 and in 1880—was also a delegate to the National Conventions at Cincinnati and Chicago the last two years just mentioned. From August, 2, 1876, to May 31, 1883, General Raum served as Commissioner of Internal Revenue at Washington, in that time having superintended the collection of $800,000,000 of revenue, and the disbursement of $30,000,000. After retiring from the Commissionership, he resumed the practice of law in Washington. In 1889 he was appointed Commissioner of Pensions, remaining to the close of President Harrison's administration, when he removed to Chicago and again engaged in practice. During the various political campaigns of the past thirty years, his services have been in frequent request as a campaign speaker, and he has canvassed a number of States in the interest of the Republican party. Besides his official reports, he is author of "The Existing Conflict Between Republican Government and Southern Oligarchy" (Washington, 1884), and a number of magazine articles.

RAUM, John, pioneer and early legislator, was born in Hummelstown, Pa., July 14, 1793, and died at Golconda, Ill., March 14, 1869. Having received a liberal education in his native State, the subject of this sketch settled at Shawneetown, Ill., in 1823, but removed to Golconda, Pope County, in 1826. He had previously served three years in the War of 1812, as First Lieutenant of the Sixteenth Infantry, and, while a resident of Illinois, served in the Black Hawk War of 1832 as Brigade Major. He was also elected Senator from the District composed of Pope and Johnson Counties in the Eighth General Assembly (1833), as successor to Samuel Alexander, who had resigned. The following year he was appointed Clerk of the Circuit Court of Pope County, and was also elected Clerk of the County Court the same year, holding both offices for many years, and retaining the County Clerkship up to his death, a period of thirty-five years. He was married March 22, 1827, to Juliet C. Field, and was father of Brig.-Gen. Green B. Raum, and Maj. John M. Raum, both of whom served in the volunteer army from Illinois during the Civil War.

RAWLINS, John Aaron, soldier, Secretary of War, was born at East Galena, Feb. 13, 1831, the son of a small farmer, who was also a charcoal-burner. The son, after irregular attendance on the district schools and a year passed at Mount Morris Academy, began the study of law. He was admitted to the bar at Galena in 1854, and at once began practice. In 1857 he was elected City Attorney of Galena, and nominated on the Douglas electoral ticket in 1860. At the outbreak of the Civil War he favored, and publicly advocated, coercive measures, and it is said that it was partly through his influence that General Grant early tendered his services to the Government. He served on the staff of the latter from the time General Grant was given command of a brigade until the close of the war, most of the time being its chief, and rising in rank, step by step, until, in 1863, he became a Brigadier-General, and, in 1865, a Major-General. His long service on the staff of General Grant indicates the estimation in which he was held by his chief. Promptly on the assumption of the Presidency by General Grant, in March, 1869, he was appointed Secretary of War, but consumption had already obtained a hold upon his constitution, and he survived only six months, dying in office, Sept. 6, 1869.

RAY, Charles H., journalist, was born at Norwich, Chenango County, N. Y., March 12, 1821;

came west in 1843, studied medicine and began practice at Muscatine, Iowa, afterwards locating in Tazewell County, Ill., also being associated, for a time, with the publication of a temperance paper at Springfield. In 1847 he removed to Galena, soon after becoming editor of "The Galena Jeffersonian," a Democratic paper, with which he remained until 1854. He took strong ground against the Kansas-Nebraska Bill, and, at the session of the Legislature of 1855, served as Secretary of the Senate, also acting as correspondent of "The New York Tribune"; a few months later became associated with Joseph Medill and John C. Vaughan in the purchase and management of "The Chicago Tribune," Dr. Ray assuming the position of editor-in-chief. Dr. Ray was one of the most trenchant and powerful writers ever connected with the Illinois press, and his articles exerted a wide influence during the period of the organization of the Republican party, in which he was an influential factor. He was a member of the Convention of Anti-Nebraska editors held at Decatur, Feb. 23, 1856, and served as Chairman of the Committee on Resolutions. (See Anti-Nebraska Editorial Convention.) At the State Republican Convention held at Bloomington, in May following, he was appointed a member of the State Central Committee for that year; was also Canal Trustee by appointment of Governor Bissell, serving from 1857 to 1861. In November, 1863, he severed his connection with "The Tribune" and engaged in oil speculations in Canada which proved financially disastrous. In 1865 he returned to the paper as an editorial writer, remaining only for a short time. In 1868 he assumed the management of "The Chicago Evening Post," with which he remained identified until his death, Sept. 23, 1870.

RAY, Lyman Beecher, ex-Lieutenant-Governor, was born in Crittenden County, Vt., August 17, 1831; removed to Illinois in 1852, and has since been engaged in mercantile business in this State. After filling several local offices he was elected to represent Grundy County in the lower house of the Twenty-eighth General Assembly (1872), and, ten years later, was chosen State Senator, serving from 1883 to 1887, and being one of the recognized party leaders on the floor. In 1888, he was elected Lieutenant-Governor on the Republican ticket, his term expiring in 1893. His home is at Morris, Grundy County.

RAY, William H., Congressman, was born in Dutchess County, N. Y., Dec. 14, 1812; grew to manhood in his native State, receiving a limited education; in 1834 removed to Rushville, Ill., engaging in business as a merchant and, later, as a banker; was a member of the first State Board of Equalization (1867-69), and, in 1872, was elected to Congress as a Republican, representing his District from 1873 to 1875. Died, Jan. 25, 1881.

RAYMOND, a village of Montgomery County, on the St. Louis Division of the Wabash Railway, 50 miles southwest of Decatur; has electric lights, some manufactures and a weekly paper. Considerable coal is mined here and grain and fruit grown in the surrounding country. Population (1880), 542; (1890), 841; (1900), 906.

RAYMOND, (Rev.) Miner, D.D., clergyman and educator, was born in New York City, August 29, 1811, being descended from a family of Huguenots (known by the name of "Raimonde"), who were expelled from France on account of their religion. In his youth he learned the trade of a shoemaker with his father, at Rensselaerville, N. Y. He united with the Methodist Episcopal Church at the age of 17, later taking a course in the Wesleyan Academy at Wilbraham, Mass., where he afterwards became a teacher. In 1838 he joined the New England Conference and, three years later, began pastoral work at Worcester, subsequently occupying pulpits in Boston and Westfield. In 1848, on the resignation of Dr. Robert Allyn (afterwards President of McKendree College and of the Southern Illinois Normal University at Carbondale), Dr. Raymond succeeded to the principalship of the Academy at Wilbraham, remaining there until 1864, when he was elected to the chair of systematic theology in the Garrett Biblical Institute at Evanston, Ill., his connection with the latter institution continuing until 1895, when he resigned. For some three years of this period he served as pastor of the First Methodist Church at Evanston. His death occurred, Nov. 25, 1897.

REAVIS, Logan Uriah, journalist, was born in the Sangamon Bottom, Mason County, Ill., March 26, 1831; in 1855 entered the office of "The Beardstown Gazette," later purchased an interest in the paper and continued its publication under the name of "The Central Illinoian," until 1857, when he sold out and went to Nebraska. Returning, in 1860, he repurchased his old paper and conducted it until 1866, when he sold out for the last time. The remainder of his life was devoted chiefly to advocating the removal of the National Capital to St. Louis, which he did by lectures and the publication of pamphlets and books on the subject; also published a "Life of Horace Greeley," another of General Harney, and two or three other volumes. Died in St. Louis, April 25, 1889.

RECTOR, the name of a prominent and influential family who lived at Kaskaskia in Territorial days. According to Governor Reynolds, who has left the most detailed account of them in his "Pioneer History of Illinois," they consisted of nine brothers and four daughters, all of whom were born in Fauquier County, Va., some of them emigrating to Ohio, while others came to Illinois, arriving at Kaskaskia in 1806. Reynolds describes them as passionate and impulsive, but possessed of a high standard of integrity and a chivalrous and patriotic spirit.—William, the oldest brother, and regarded as the head of the family, became a Deputy Surveyor soon after coming to Illinois, and took part in the Indian campaigns between 1812 and 1814. In 1816 he was appointed Surveyor-General of Illinois, Missouri and Arkansas, and afterwards removed to St. Louis.—Stephen, another of the brothers, was a Lieutenant in Captain Moore's Company of Rangers in the War of 1812, while Charles commanded one of the two regiments organized by Governor Edwards, in 1812, for the expedition against the Indians at the head of Peoria Lake.—Nelson, still another brother, served in the same expedition on the staff of Governor Edwards. Stephen, already mentioned, was a member of the expedition sent to strengthen Prairie du Chien in 1814, and showed great courage in a fight with the Indians at Rock Island. During the same year Nelson Rector and Captain Samuel Whiteside joined Col. Zachary Taylor (afterwards President) in an expedition on the Upper Mississippi, in which they came in conflict with the British and Indians at Rock Island, in which Captain Rector again displayed the courage so characteristic of his family. On the 1st of March, 1814, while in charge of a surveying party on Saline Creek, in Gallatin County, according to Reynolds, Nelson was ambushed by the Indians and, though severely wounded, was carried away by his horse, and recovered.—Elias, another member of the family, was Governor Edwards' first Adjutant-General, serving a few months in 1809, when he gave place to Robert Morrison, but was reappointed in 1810, serving for more than three years.—Thomas, one of the younger members, had a duel with Joshua Barton on "Bloody Island," sometime between 1812 and 1814, in which he killed his antagonist. (See Duels.) A portion of this historic family drifted into Arkansas, where they became prominent, one of their descendants serving as Governor of that State during the Civil War period.

RED BUD, a city in Randolph County, on the Mobile & Ohio Railroad, some 37 miles south-southeast of St. Louis, and 21 miles south of Belleville; has a carriage factory and two flouring mills, electric lights, a hospital, two banks, five churches, a graded school and a weekly newspaper. Pop. (1890), 1,176; (1900), 1,169.

REEVES, Owen T., lawyer and jurist, was born in Ross County, Ohio, Dec. 18, 1829; graduated at the Ohio Wesleyan University, at Delaware, in 1850, afterwards serving as a tutor in that institution and as Principal of a High School at Chillicothe. In 1854 he came to Bloomington, Ill., and, as a member of the School Board, assisted in reorganizing the school system of that city; also has served continuously, for over 40 years, as one of the Trustees of the Illinois Wesleyan University, being a part of the time President of the Board. In the meantime, he had begun the practice of law, served as City Attorney and member of the Board of Supervisors. July 1, 1862, he enlisted in the Seventieth Illinois Volunteers (a 100-days' emergency regiment), was elected Colonel and mustered out, with his command, in October, 1862. Colonel Reeves was subsequently connected with the construction of the Lafayette, Bloomington & Mississippi Railroad (now a part of the Illinois Central), and was also one of the founders of the Law Department of the Wesleyan University. In 1877 he was elected to the Circuit bench, serving continuously, by repeated re-elections, until 1891—during the latter part of his incumbency being upon the Appellate bench.

REEVES, Walter, Member of Congress and lawyer, was born near Brownsville, Pa., Sept. 25, 1848; removed to Illinois at 8 years of age and was reared on a farm; later became a teacher and lawyer, following his profession at Streator; in 1894 he was nominated by the Republicans of the Eleventh District for Congress, as successor to the Hon. Thomas J. Henderson, and was elected, receiving a majority over three competitors. Mr. Reeves was re-elected in 1896, and again in 1898.

REFORMATORY, ILLINOIS STATE, a prison for the incarceration of male offenders under 21 years of age, who are believed to be susceptible of reformation. It is the successor of the "State Reform School," which was created by act of the Legislature of 1867, but not opened for the admission of inmates until 1871. It is located at Pontiac. The number of inmates, in 1873, was 165, which was increased to 324 in 1890. The results, while moderately successful, were not altogether satisfactory. The appropriations made for construction, maintenance, etc., were not upon a scale adequate to accomplish what was desired, and, in 1891, a radical change was effected. Previous to that date the limit, as to age, was 16 years. The law establishing the present reformatory provides for a system of indeterminate sentences, and a release upon parole, of inmates who, in the opinion of the Board of Managers, may be safely granted conditional liberation. The inmates are divided into two classes, (1) those between the ages of 10 and 16, and (2) those between 16 and 21. The Board of Managers is composed of five members, not more than three of whom shall be of the same party, their term of office to be for ten years. The course of treatment is educational (intellectually, morally and industrially), schools being conducted, trades taught, and the inmates constantly impressed with the conviction that, only through genuine and unmistakable evidence of improvement, can they regain their freedom. The reformatory influence of the institution may be best inferred from the results of one year's operation. Of 146 inmates paroled, 15 violated their parole and became fugitives, 6 were returned to the Reformatory, 1 died, and 124 remained in employment and regularly reporting. Among the industries carried on are painting and glazing, masonry and plastering, gardening, knitting, chair-caning, broom-making, carpentering, tailoring and blacksmithing. The grounds of the Reformatory contain a vein of excellent coal, which it is proposed to mine, utilizing the clay, thus obtained, in the manufacture of brick, which can be employed in the construction of additional needed buildings. The average number of inmates is about 800, and the crimes for which they are sentenced range, in gravity, from simple assault, or petit larceny, to the most serious offenses known to the criminal code, with the exception of homicide. The number of inmates, at the beginning of the year 1895, was 812. An institution of a similar character, for the confinement of juvenile female offenders, was established under an act of the Legislature passed at the session of 1893, and located at Geneva, Kane County. (See Home for Juvenile Female Offenders.)

population, as may be seen from figures given below. The earliest Christian services held were conducted by Catholic missionaries, who attested the sincerity of their convictions (in many instances) by the sacrifice of their lives, either through violence or exposure. The aborigines, however, were not easily Christianized; and, shortly after the cession of Illinois by France to Great Britain, the Catholic missions, being generally withdrawn, ceased to exert much influence upon the red men, although the French, who remained in the ceded territory, continued to adhere to their ancient faith. (See Early Missionaries.) One of the first Protestant sects to hold service in Illinois, was the Methodist Episcopal; Rev. Joseph Lillard coming to Illinois in 1793, and Rev. Hosea Riggs settling in the American Bottom in 1796. (For history of Methodism in Illinois, see Methodist Episcopal Church.) The pioneer Protestant preacher, however, was a Baptist—Elder James Smith—who came to New Design in 1787. Revs. David Badgley and Joseph Chance followed him in 1796, and the first denominational association was formed in 1807. (As to inception and growth of this denomination in Illinois, see also Baptists.) In 1814 the Massachusetts Missionary Society sent two missionaries to Illinois—Revs. Samuel J. Mills and Daniel Smith. Two years later (1816), the First Presbyterian Church was organized at Sharon, by Rev. James McGready, of Kentucky. (See also Presbyterians.) The Congregationalists began to arrive with the tide of immigration that set in from the Eastern States, early in the '30's. Four churches were organized in 1833, and the subsequent growth of the denomination in the State, if gradual, has been steady. (See Congregationalists.) About the same time came the Disciples of Christ (sometimes called, from their founder, "Campbellites"). They encouraged free discussion, were liberal and warm hearted, and did not require belief in any particular creed as a condition of membership. The sect grew rapidly in numerical strength. (See Disciples of Christ.) The Protestant Episcopalians obtained their first foothold in Illinois, in 1835, when Rev. Philander Chase (afterward consecrated Bishop) immigrated to the State from the East. (See Protestant Episcopal Church.) The Lutherans in Illinois are chiefly of German or Scandinavian birth or descent, as may be inferred from the fact that, out of sixty-four churches in Chicago under care of the Missouri Synod, only four use the English language. They are the only Protestant sect maintaining (whenever possible) a system of parochial schools. (See Lutherans.) There are twenty-six other religious bodies in the State, exclusive of the Jews, who have twelve synagogues and nine rabbis. According to the census statistics of 1890, these twenty-six sects, with their numerical strength, number of buildings, ministers, etc., are as follows: Anti-Mission Baptists, 2,800 members, 78 churches and 63 ministers; Church of God, 1,200 members, 39 churches, 34 ministers; Dunkards, 121,000 members, 155 churches, 83 ministers; Friends ("Quakers") 2,655 members, 25 churches; Free Methodists, 1,805 members, 23 churches, 84 ministers; Free-Will Baptists, 4,694 members, 107 churches, 72 ministers; Evangelical Association, 15,904 members, 143 churches, 152 ministers; Cumberland Presbyterians, 11,804 members, 198 churches, 149 ministers; Methodist Episcopal (South) 3,927 members, 34 churches, 33 ministers; Moravians, 720 members, 3 churches, 3 ministers; New Jerusalem Church (Swedenborgians), 662 members, 14 churches, 8 ministers; Primitive Methodist, 230 members, 2 churches, 2 ministers; Protestant Methodist, 5,000 members, 91 churches, 106 ministers; Reformed Church in United States, 4,100 members, 34 churches, 19 ministers; Reformed Church of America, 2,200 members, 24 churches, 23 ministers; Reformed Episcopalians, 2,150 members, 13 churches, 11 ministers; Reformed Presbyterians, 1,400 members, 7 churches, 6 ministers; Salvation Army, 1,980 members; Second Adventists, 4,500 members, 64 churches, 35 ministers; Seventh Day Baptists, 320 members, 7 churches, 11 ministers; Universalists, 3,160 members, 45 churches, 37 ministers; Unitarians, 1,225 members, 19 churches, 14 ministers; United Evangelical, 30,000 members, 129 churches, 108 ministers; United Brethren, 16,500 members, 275 churches, 260 ministers; United Presbyterians, 11,250 members, 203 churches, 199 ministers; Wesleyan Methodists, 1,100 members, 16 churches, 33 ministers. (See various Churches under their proper names; also Roman Catholic Church.)

REND, William Patrick, soldier, capitalist, and coal-operator, was born in County Leitrim, Ireland, Feb. 10, 1840, brought to Lowell, Mass., in boyhood, and graduated from the high school there at 17; taught for a time near New York City and later in Maryland, where he began a course of classical study. The Civil War coming on, he enlisted in the Fourteenth Regiment New York Volunteers, serving most of the time as a non-commissioned officer, and participating in the battles of the second Bull Run, Malvern Hill, Antietam, Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville. After the war he came to Chicago and secured employment in a railway surveyor's office, later acting as foreman of the Northwestern freight depot, and finally embarking in the coal business, which was conducted with such success that he became the owner of some of the most valuable mining properties in the country. Meanwhile he has taken a deep interest in the welfare of miners and other classes of laborers, and has sought to promote arbitration and conciliation between employers and employed, as a means of averting disastrous strikes. He was especially active during the long strike of 1897, in efforts to bring about an understanding between the miners and the operators. For several years he held a commission as Lieutenant-Colonel of the Illinois National Guard until compelled, by the demands of his private business, to tender his resignation.

REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS.

The following table presents the names, residence, Districts represented, politics (except as to earlier ones), and length of term or terms of service of Illinois Representatives in the lower House of Congress, from the organization of Illinois as a Territory down to the present time; (D, Democrat; W, Whig; R, Republican; G-B, Greenback; P, Populist).

REYNOLDS, John, Justice of Supreme Court and fourth Governor of Illinois, was born of Irish ancestry, in Montgomery County, Pa., Feb. 26, 1789, and brought by his parents to Kaskaskia, Ill., in 1800, spending the first nine years of his life in Illinois on a farm. After receiving a common school education, and a two years' course of study in a college at Knoxville, Tenn., he studied law and began practice. In 1812-13 he served as a scout in the campaigns against the Indians, winning for himself the title, in after life, of "The Old Ranger." Afterwards he removed to Cahokia, where he began the practice of law, and, in 1818, became Associate Justice of the first Supreme Court of the new State. Retiring from the bench in 1825, he served two terms in the Legislature, and was elected Governor in 1830, in 1832 personally commanding the State volunteers called for service in the Black Hawk War. Two weeks before the expiration of his term (1834), he resigned to accept a seat in Congress, to which he had been elected as the successor of Charles Slade, who had died in office, and was again elected in 1838, always as a Democrat. He also served as Representative in the Fifteenth General Assembly, and again in the Eighteenth (1852-54), being chosen Speaker of the latter. In 1858 he was the administration (or Buchanan) Democratic candidate for State Superintendent of Public Instruction, as opposed to the Republican and regular (or Douglas) Democratic candidates. For some years he edited a daily paper called "The Eagle," which was published at Belleville. While Governor Reynolds acquired some reputation as a "classical scholar," from the time spent in a Tennessee College at that early day, this was not sustained by either his colloquial or written style. He was an ardent champion of slavery, and, in the early days of the Rebellion, gained unfavorable notoriety in consequence of a letter written to Jefferson Davis expressing sympathy with the cause of "secession." Nevertheless, in spite of intense prejudice and bitter partisanship on some questions, he possessed many amiable qualities, as shown by his devotion to temperance, and his popularity among persons of opposite political opinions. Although at times crude in style, and not always reliable in his statement of historical facts and events, Governor Reynolds has rendered a valuable service to posterity by his writings relating to the early history of the State, especially those connected with his own times. His best known works are: "Pioneer History of Illinois" (Belleville, 1848); "A Glance at the Crystal Palace, and Sketches of Travel" (1854); and "My Life and Times" (1855). His death occurred at Belleville, May 8, 1865.

REYNOLDS, John Parker, Secretary and President of State Board of Agriculture, was born at Lebanon, Ohio, March 1, 1820, and graduated from the Miami University at the age of 18. In 1840 he graduated from the Cincinnati Law School, and soon afterward began practice. He removed to Illinois in 1854, settling first in Winnebago County, later, successively in Marion County, in Springfield and in Chicago. From 1860 to 1870 he was Secretary of the State Agricultural Society, and, upon the creation of the State Board of Agriculture in 1871, was elected its President, filling that position until 1888, when he resigned. He has also occupied numerous other posts of honor and of trust of a public or semi-public character, having been President of the Illinois State Sanitary Commission during the War of the Rebellion, a Commissioner to the Paris Exposition of 1867, Chief Grain Inspector from 1878 to 1882, and Secretary of the Interstate Industrial Exposition Company of Chicago, from the date of its organization (1873) until its final dissolution. His most important public service, in recent years, was rendered as Director-in-Chief of the Illinois exhibit in the World's Columbian Exposition of 1893.

REYNOLDS, Joseph Smith, soldier and legislator, was born at New Lenox, Ill., Dec. 3, 1839; at 17 years of age went to Chicago, was educated in the high school there, within a month after graduation enlisting as a private in the Sixty-fourth Illinois Volunteers. From the ranks he rose to a colonelcy through the gradations of Second-Lieutenant and Captain, and, in July, 1865, was brevetted Brigadier-General. He was a gallant soldier, and was thrice wounded. On his return home after nearly four years' service, he entered the law department of the Chicago University, graduating therefrom and beginning practice in 1866. General Reynolds has been prominent in public life, having served as a member of both branches of the General Assembly, and having been a State Commissioner to the Vienna Exposition of 1873. He is a member of the G. A. R., and, in 1875, was elected Senior Vice-Commander of the order for the United States.

REYNOLDS, William Morton, clergyman, was born in Fayette County, Pa., March 4, 1812; after graduating at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1832, was connected with various institutions in that State, as well as President of Capital University at Columbus, Ohio; then, coming to Illinois, was President of the Illinois State University at Springfield, 1857-60, after which he became Principal of a female seminary in Chicago. Previously a Lutheran, he took orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church in 1864, and served several parishes until his death. In his early life he founded, and, for a time, conducted several religious publications at Gettysburg, Pa., besides issuing a number of printed addresses and other published works. Died at Oak Park, near Chicago, Sept. 5, 1876.

RHOADS, (Col.) Franklin Lawrence, soldier and steamboat captain, was born in Harrisburg, Pa., Oct. 11, 1824; brought to Pekin, Tazewell County, Ill., in 1836, where he learned the printer's trade, and, on the breaking out of the Mexican War, enlisted, serving to the close. Returning home he engaged in the river trade, and, for fifteen years, commanded steamboats on the Illinois, Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. In April, 1861, he was commissioned Captain of a company of three months' men attached to the Eighth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and, on the reorganization of the regiment for the three-years' service, was commissioned Lieutenant-Colonel, soon after being promoted to the colonelcy, as successor to Col. Richard J. Oglesby, who had been promoted Brigadier-General. After serving through the spring campaign of 1863 in Western Kentucky and Tennessee, he was compelled by rapidly declining health to resign, when he located in Shawneetown, retiring in 1874 to his farm near that city. During the latter years of his life he was a confirmed invalid, dying at Shawneetown, Jan. 6, 1879.

RHOADS, Joshua, M.D., A.M., physician and educator, was born in Philadelphia, Sept. 14, 1806; studied medicine and graduated at the University of Pennsylvania with the degree of M.D., also receiving the degree of A.M., from Princeton; after several years spent in practice as a physician, and as Principal in some of the public schools of Philadelphia, in 1839 he was elected Principal of the Pennsylvania Institution for the Blind, and, in 1850, took charge of the State Institution for the Blind at Jacksonville, Ill., then in its infancy. Here he remained until 1874, when he retired. Died, February 1, 1876.

RICE, Edward Y., lawyer and jurist, born in Logan County, Ky., Feb. 8, 1820, was educated in the common schools and at Shurtleff College, after which he read law with John M. Palmer at Carlinville, and was admitted to practice, in 1845, at Hillsboro; in 1847 was elected County Recorder of Montgomery County, and, in 1848, to the Sixteenth General Assembly, serving one term. Later he was elected County Judge of Montgomery County, was Master in Chancery from 1853 to 1857, and the latter year was elected Judge of the Eighteenth Circuit, being re-elected in 1861 and again in 1867. He was also a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1869-70, and, at the election of the latter year, was chosen Representative in the Forty-second Congress as a Democrat. Died, April 16, 1883.

RICE, John B., theatrical manager, Mayor of Chicago, and Congressman, was born at Easton, Md., in 1809. By profession he was an actor, and, coming to Chicago in 1847, built and opened there the first theater. In 1857 he retired from the stage, and, in 1865, was elected Mayor of Chicago, the city of his adoption, and re-elected in 1867. He was also prominent in the early stages of the Civil War in the measures taken to raise troops in Chicago. In 1872 he was elected to the Forty-third Congress as a Republican, but, before the expiration of his term, died, at Norfolk, Va., on Dec. 6, 1874. At a special election to fill the vacancy, Bernard G. Caulfield was chosen to succeed him.

RICHARDSON, William A., lawyer and politician, born in Fayette County, Ky., Oct. 11, 1811, was educated at Transylvania University, came to the bar at 19, and settled in Schuyler County, Ill., becoming State's Attorney in 1835; was elected to the lower branch of the Legislature in 1836, to the Senate in 1838, and to the House again in 1844, from Adams County—the latter year being also chosen Presidential Elector on the Polk and Dallas ticket, and, at the succeeding session of the General Assembly, serving as Speaker of the House. He entered the Mexican War as Captain, and won a Majority through gallantry at Buena Vista. From 1847 to 1856 (when he resigned to become a candidate for Governor), he was a Democratic Representative in Congress from the Quincy District; re-entered Congress in 1861, and, in 1863, was chosen United States Senator to fill the unexpired term of Stephen A. Douglas. He was a delegate to the National Democratic Convention of 1868, but after that retired to private life, acting, for a short time, as editor of "The Quincy Herald." Died, at Quincy, Dec. 27, 1875.

RICHLAND COUNTY, situated in the southeast quarter of the State, and has an area of 361 square miles. It was organized from Edwards County in 1841. Among the early pioneers may be mentioned the Evans brothers, Thaddeus

Morehouse, Hugh Calhoun and son, Thomas Gardner, James Parker, Cornelius De Long, James Gilmore and Elijah Nelson. In 1820 there were but thirty families in the district. The first frame houses—the Nelson and Morehouse homesteads—were built in 1821, and, some years later, James Laws erected the first brick house. The pioneers traded at Vincennes, but, in 1825, a store was opened at Stringtown by Jacob May; and the same year the first school was opened at Watertown, taught by Isaac Chauncey. The first church was erected by the Baptists in 1823, and services were conducted by William Martin, a Kentuckian. For a long time the mails were carried on horseback by Louis and James Beard, but, in 1824, Mills and Whet-sell established a line of four-horse stages. The principal road, known as the "trace road," leading from Louisville to Cahokia, followed a buffalo and Indian trail about where the main street of Olney now is. Olney was selected as the county-seat upon the organization of the county, and a Mr. Lilly built the first house there. The chief branches of industry followed by the inhabitants are agriculture and fruit-growing. Population (1880), 15,545; (1890), 15,019; (1900), 16,391.

RIDGE FARM, a village of Vermillion County, at junction of the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis and the Toledo, St. Louis & Western Railroads, 174 miles northeast of St. Louis; has electric light plant, planing mill, elevators, bank and two papers. Pop. (1900), 933; (1904), 1,300.

RIDGELY, a manufacturing and mining suburb of the city of Springfield. An extensive rolling mill is located there, and there are several coal-shafts in the vicinity. Population (1900), 1,169.

RIDGELY, Charles, manufacturer and capitalist, born in Springfield, Ill., Jan. 17, 1836; was educated in private schools and at Illinois College; after leaving college spent some time as a clerk in his father's bank at Springfield, finally becoming a member of the firm and successively Cashier and Vice-President. In 1870 he was Democratic candidate for State Treasurer, but later has affiliated with the Republican party. About 1872 he became identified with the Springfield Iron Company, of which he has been President for many years; has also been President of the Consolidated Coal Company of St. Louis and, for some time, was a Director of the Wabash Railroad. Mr. Ridgely is also one of the Trustees of Illinois College.

RIDGELY, Nicholas H., early banker, was born in Baltimore, Md., April 27, 1800; after leaving school was engaged, for a time, in the dry-goods trade, but, in 1829, came to St. Louis to assume a clerkship in the branch of the United States Bank just organized there. In 1835 a branch of the State Bank of Illinois was established at Springfield, and Mr. Ridgely became its cashier, and, when it went into liquidation, was appointed one of the trustees to wind up its affairs. He subsequently became President of the Clark's Exchange Bank in that city, but this having gone into liquidation a few years later, he went into the private banking business as head of the "Ridgely Bank," which, in 1866, became the "Ridgely National Bank," one of the strongest financial institutions in the State outside of Chicago. After the collapse of the internal improvement scheme, Mr. Ridgely became one of the purchasers of the "Northern Cross Railroad" (now that part of the Wabash system extending from the Illinois river to Springfield), when it was sold by the State in 1847, paying therefor $21,100. He was also one of the Springfield bankers to tender a loan to the State at the beginning of the war in 1861. He was one of the builders and principal owner of the Springfield gas-light system. His business career was an eminently successful one, leaving an estate at his death, Jan. 31, 1888, valued at over $2,000,000.

RIDGWAY, a village of Gallatin County, on the Shawneetown Division of the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway, 12 miles northwest of Shawneetown; has a bank and one newspaper. Pop. (1890), 523; (1900), 839; (1903, est.), 1,000.

RIDGWAY, Thomas S., merchant, banker and politician, was born at Carmi, Ill., August 30, 1826. His father having died when he was but 4 years old and his mother when he was 14, his education was largely acquired through contact with the world, apart from such as he received from his mother and during a year's attendance at a private school. When he was 6 years of age the family removed to Shawneetown, where he ever afterwards made his home. In 1845 he embarked in business as a merchant, and the firm of Peeples & Ridgway soon became one of the most prominent in Southern Illinois. In 1865 the partners closed out their business and organized the first National Bank of Shawneetown, of which, after the death of Mr. Peeples in 1875, Mr. Ridgway was President. He was one of the projectors of the Springfield & Illinois South-eastern Railway, now a part of the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern system, and, from 1867 to 1874, served as its President. He was an ardent and active Republican, and served as a delegate to every State and National Convention of his party from 1868 to 1896. In 1874 he was elected State Treasurer, the candidate for Superintendent of Public Instruction on the same ticket being defeated. In 1876 and 1880 he was an unsuccessful candidate for his party's nomination for Governor. Three times he consented to lead the forlorn hope of the Republicans as a candidate for Congress from an impregnable Democratic stronghold. For several years he was a Director of the McCormick Theological Seminary, at Chicago, and, for nineteen years, was a Trustee of the Southern Illinois Normal University at Carbondale, resigning in 1893. Died, at Shawneetown, Nov. 17, 1897.

RIGGS, James M., ex-Congressman, was born in Scott County, Ill., April 17, 1839, where he received a common school education, supplemented by a partial collegiate course. He is a practicing lawyer of Winchester. In 1864 he was elected Sheriff, serving two years. In 1871-72 he represented Scott County in the lower house of the Twenty-seventh General Assembly, and was State's Attorney from 1872 to 1876. In 1882, and again in 1884, he was the successful Democratic candidate for Congress in the Twelfth Illinois District.

RIGGS, Scott, pioneer, was born in North Carolina about 1790; removed to Crawford County, Ill. early in 1815, and represented that county in the First General Assembly (1818-20). In 1825 he removed to Scott County, where he continued to reside until his death, Feb. 24, 1872.

RINAKER, John L., lawyer and Congressman, born in Baltimore, Md., Nov. 18, 1830. Left an orphan at an early age, he came to Illinois in 1836, and, for several years, lived on farms in Sangamon and Morgan Counties; was educated at Illinois and McKendree Colleges, graduating from the latter in 1851; in 1852 began reading law with John M. Palmer at Carlinville, and was admitted to the bar in 1854. In August, 1862, he recruited the One Hundred and Twenty-second Illinois Volunteers, of which he was commissioned Colonel. Four months later he was wounded in battle, but served with his regiment through the war, and was brevetted Brigadier-General at its close. Returning from the war he resumed the practice of his profession at Carlinville. Since 1858 he has been an active Republican; has twice (1872 and '76) served his party as a Presidential Elector—the latter year for the State-at-large—and, in 1874, accepted a nomination for Congress against William R. Morrison, largely reducing the normal Democratic majority. At the State Republican Convention of 1880 he was a prominent, but unsuccessful, candidate for the Republican nomination for Governor. In 1894 he made the race as the Republican candidate for Congress in the Sixteenth District and, although his opponent was awarded the certificate of election, on a bare majority of 60 votes on the face of the returns, a re-count, ordered by the Fifty-fourth Congress, showed a majority for General Rinaker, and he was seated near the close of the first session. He was a candidate for re-election in 1896, but defeated in a strongly Democratic District.

RIPLEY, Edward Payson, Railway President, was born in Dorchester (now a part of Boston), Mass., Oct. 30, 1845, being related, on his mother's side, to the distinguished author, Dr. Edward Payson. After receiving his education in the high school of his native place, at the age of 17 he entered upon a commercial life, as clerk in a wholesale dry-goods establishment in Boston. About the time he became of age, he entered into the service of the Pennsylvania Railroad as a clerk in the freight department in the Boston office, but, a few years later, assumed a responsible position in connection with the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy line, finally becoming General Agent for the business of that road east of Buffalo, though retaining his headquarters at Boston. In 1878 he removed to Chicago to accept the position of General Freight Agent of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy System, with which he remained twelve years, serving successively as General Traffic Manager and General Manager, until June 1, 1890, when he resigned to become Third Vice-President of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul line. This relation was continued until Jan. 1, 1896, when Mr. Ripley accepted the Presidency of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad, which (1899) he now holds. Mr. Ripley was a prominent factor in securing the location of the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago, and, in April, 1891, was chosen one of the Directors of the Exposition, serving on the Executive Committee and the Committee of Ways and Means and Transportation, being Chairman of the latter.

RIVERSIDE, a suburban town on the Des Plaines River and the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway, 11 miles west of Chicago; has handsome parks, several churches, a bank, two local papers and numerous fine residences. Population (1890), 1,000; (1900), 1,551.

RIVERTON, a village in Clear Creek Township, Sangamon County, at the crossing of the Wabash Railroad over the Sangamon River, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-northeast of Springfield. It has four churches, a nursery, and two coal mines. Population (1880), 705; (1890), 1,137, (1900), 1,511; (1903, est.), about 2,000.

RIVES, John Cook, early banker and journalist, was born in Franklin County, Va., May 24, 1795; in 1806 removed to Kentucky, where he grew up under care of an uncle, Samuel Casey. He received a good education and was a man of high character and attractive manners. In his early manhood he came to Illinois, and was connected, for a time, with the Branch State Bank at Edwardsville, but, about 1824, removed to Shawneetown and held a position in the bank there; also studied law and was admitted to practice. Finally, having accepted a clerkship in the Fourth Auditor's Office in Washington, he removed to that city, and, in 1830, became associated with Francis P. Blair, Sr., in the establishment of "The Congressional Globe" (the predecessor of "The Congressional Record"), of which he finally became sole proprietor, so remaining until 1864. Like his partner, Blair, although a native of Virginia and a life-long Democrat, he was intensely loyal, and contributed liberally of his means for the equipment of soldiers from the District of Columbia, and for the support of their families, during the Civil War. His expenditures for these objects have been estimated at some $80,000. Died, in Prince George's County, Md., April 10, 1864.

ROANOKE, a village of Woodford County, on the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway, 26 miles northeast of Peoria; is in a coal district; has two banks, a coal mine, and one newspaper. Population (1880), 355; (1890), 831; (1900), 966.

ROBB, Thomas Patten, Sanitary Agent, was born in Bath, Maine, in 1819; came to Cook County, Ill., in 1838, and, after arriving at manhood, established the first exclusive wholesale grocery business in Chicago, remaining in the business until 1850. He then went to California, establishing himself in mercantile business at Sacramento, where he remained seven years, meanwhile being elected Mayor of that city. Returning to Chicago on the breaking out of the war, he was appointed on the staff of Governor Yates with the rank of Major, and, while serving in this capacity, was instrumental in giving General Grant the first duty he performed in the office of the Adjutant-General after his arrival from Galena. Later, he was assigned to duty as Inspector-General of Illinois troops with the rank of Colonel, having general charge of sanitary affairs until the close of the war, when he was appointed Cotton Agent for the State of Georgia, and, still later, President of the Board of Tax Commissioners for that State. Other positions held by him were those of Postmaster and Collector of Customs at Savannah, Ga.; he was also one of the publishers of "The New Era," a Republican paper at Atlanta, and a prominent actor in reconstruction affairs. Resigning the Collectorship, he was appointed by the President United States Commissioner to investigate Mexican outrages on the Rio Grande border; was subsequently identified with Texas railroad interests as the President of the Corpus Christi & Rio Grande Railroad, and one of the projectors of the Chicago, Texas & Mexican Central Railway, being thus engaged until 1872. Later he returned to California, dying near Glenwood, in that State, April 10, 1895, aged 75 years and 10 months.

ROBERTS, William Charles, clergyman and educator, was born in a small village of Wales, England., Sept. 23, 1832; received his primary education in that country, but, removing to America during his minority, graduated from Princeton College in 1855, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1858. After filling various pastorates in Delaware, New Jersey and Ohio, in 1881 he was elected Corresponding Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, the next year being offered the Presidency of Rutgers College, which he declined. In 1887 he accepted the presidency of Lake Forest University, which he still retains. From 1859 to 1863 he was a Trustee of Lafayette College, and, in 1866, was elected to a trusteeship of his Alma Mater. He has traveled extensively in the Orient, and was a member of the first and third councils of the Reformed Churches, held at Edinburgh and Belfast. Besides occasional sermons and frequent contributions to English, American, German and Welsh periodicals, Dr. Roberts has published a Welsh translation of the Westminster shorter catechism and a collection of letters on the great preachers of Wales, which appeared in Utica, 1868. He received the degree of D.D., from Union College in 1872, and that of LL.D., from Princeton, in 1887.

ROBINSON, an incorporated city and the county-seat of Crawford County, 25 miles northwest of Vincennes, Ind., and 44 miles south of Paris, Ill.; is on two lines of railroad and in the heart of a fruit and agricultural region. The city has water-works, electric lights, two banks and three weekly newspapers. Population (1890) 1,387; (1900), 1,683; (1904), about 2,000.

ROBINSON, James C., lawyer and former Congressman, was born in Edgar County, Ill., in 1822, read law and was admitted to the bar in 1850. He served as a private during the Mexican War, and, in 1858, was elected to Congress as a Democrat, as he was again in 1860, '62, '70 and '72. In 1864 he was the Democratic nominee for Governor. He was a fluent speaker, and attained considerable distinction as an advocate in criminal practice. Died, at Springfield, Nov. 3, 1886.

ROBINSON, John M., United States Senator, born in Kentucky in 1793, was liberally educated and became a lawyer by profession. In early life he settled at Carmi, Ill., where he married. He was of fine physique, of engaging manners, and personally popular. Through his association with the State militia he earned the title of "General." In 1830 he was elected to the United States Senate, to fill the unexpired term of John McLean. His immediate predecessor was David Jewett Baker, appointed by Governor Edwards, who served one month but failed of election by the Legislature. In 1834 Mr. Robinson was re-elected for a full term, which expired in 1841. In 1843 he was elected to a seat upon the Illinois Supreme bench, but died at Ottawa, April 27, of the same year, within three months after his elevation.

ROCHELLE, a city of Ogle County and an intersecting point of the Chicago & Northwestern and the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railways. It is 75 miles west of Chicago, 27 miles south of Rockford, and 23 miles east by north of Dixon. It is in a rich agricultural and stock-raising region, rendering Rochelle an important shipping point. Among its industrial establishments are water-works, electric lights, a flouring mill and silk-underwear factory. The city has three banks, five churches and three newspapers. Pop. (1890), 1,789; (1900), 2,073; (1903), 2,500.

ROCHESTER, a village and early settlement in Sangamon County, laid out in 1819; in rich agricultural district, on the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railroad, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles southeast of Springfield; has a bank, two churches, one school, and a newspaper. Population (1900), 365.

ROCK FALLS, a city in Whiteside County, on Rock River and the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad; has excellent water-power, a good public school system with a high school, banks and a weekly newspaper. Agricultural implements, barbed wire, furniture, flour and paper are its chief manufactures. Water for the navigable feeder of the Hennepin Canal is taken from Rock River at this point. Pop. (1900), 2,176.

ROCKFORD, a flourishing manufacturing city, the county-seat of Winnebago County; lies on both sides of the Rock River, 92 miles west of Chicago. Four trunk lines of railroad—the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, the Chicago & Northwestern, the Illinois Central and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul—intersect here. Excellent water-power is secured by a dam across the river, and communication between the two divisions of the city is facilitated by three railway and three highway bridges. Water is provided from five artesian wells, a reserve main leading to the river. The city is wealthy, prosperous and progressive. The assessed valuation of property, in 1893, was $6,531,235. Churches are numerous and schools, both public and private, are abundant and well conducted. The census of 1890 showed $7,715,069 capital invested in 246 manufacturing establishments, which employed 5,223 persons and turned out an annual product valued at $8,888,904. The principal industries are the manufacture of agricultural implements and furniture, though watches, silver-plated ware, paper, flour and grape sugar are among the other products. Pop. (1880), 13,129; (1890), 23,584; (1900), 31,051.

ROCKFORD COLLEGE, located at Rockford, Ill., incorporated in 1847; in 1898 had a faculty of 21 instructors with 161 pupils. The branches taught include the classics, music and fine arts. It has a library of 6,150 volumes, funds and endowment aggregating $50,880 and property valued at $240,880, of which $150,000 is real estate.

ROCK ISLAND, the principal city and county-seat of Rock Island County, on the Mississippi River, 182 miles west by south from Chicago; is the converging point of five lines of railroad, and the western terminus of the Hennepin Canal. The name is derived from an island in the Mississippi River, opposite the city, 3 miles long, which belongs to the United States Government and contains an arsenal and armory. The river channel north of the island is navigable, the southern channel having been dammed by the Government, thereby giving great water power to Rock Island and Moline. A combined railway and highway bridge spans the river from Rock Island to Davenport, Iowa, crossing the island, while a railway bridge connects the cities a mile below. The island was the site of Fort Armstrong during the Black Hawk War, and was also a place for the confinement of Confederate prisoners during the Civil War. Rock Island is in a region of much picturesque scenery and has extensive manufactures of lumber, agricultural implements, iron, carriages and wagons and oilcloth; also five banks and three newspapers, two issuing daily editions. Pop. (1890), 13,634; (1900), 19,493.

ROCK ISLAND COUNTY, in the northwestern section of the State bordering upon the Mississippi River (which constitutes its northwestern boundary for more than 60 miles), and having an area of 440 square miles. In 1816 the Government erected a fort on Rock Island (an island in the Mississippi, 3 miles long and one-half to three-quarters of a mile wide), naming it Fort Armstrong. It has always remained a military post, and is now the seat of an extensive arsenal and work-shops. In the spring of 1828, settlements were made near Port Byron by John and Thomas Kinney, Archibald Allen and George Harlan. Other early settlers, near Rock Island and Rapids City, were J. W. Spencer, J. W. Barriels, Benjamin F. Pike and Conrad Leak; and among the pioneers were Wells and Michael Bartlett, Joel Thompson, the Simms brothers and George Davenport. The country was full of Indians, this being the headquarters of Black Hawk and the initial point of the Black Hawk War. (See Black Hawk, and Black Hawk War.) By 1829 settlers were increased in number and county organization was effected in 1835, Rock Island (then called Stephenson) being made the county-seat. Joseph Conway was the first County Clerk, and Joel Wells, Sr., the first Treasurer. The first court was held at the residence of John W. Barriels, in Farnhamsburg. The county is irregular in shape, and the soil and scenery greatly varied. Coal is abundant, the water-power inexhaustible, and the county's mining and manufacturing interests are very extensive. Several lines of railway cross the county, affording admirable transportation facilities to both eastern and western markets. Rock Island and Moline (which see) are the two principal cities in the county, though there are several other important points. Coal Valley is the center of large mining interests, and Milan is also a manufacturing center. Port Byron is one of the oldest towns in the county, and has considerable lime and lumber interests, while Watertown is the seat of the Western Hospital for the Insane. Population of the county (1880), 38,302; (1890), 41,917; (1900), 55,249.

ROCK ISLAND & PEORIA RAILWAY, a standard-gauge road, laid with steel rails, extending from Rock Island to Peoria, 91 miles. It is lessee of the Rock Island & Mercer County Railroad, running from Milan to Cable, Ill., giving it a total length of 118 miles—with Peoria Terminal, 121.10 miles.—(HISTORY.) The company is a reorganization (Oct. 9, 1877) of the Peoria & Rock Island Railroad Company, whose road was sold under foreclosure, April 4, 1877. The latter Road was the result of the consolidation, in 1869, of two corporations—the Rock Island & Peoria and the Peoria & Rock Island Railroad Companies—the new organization taking the latter name. The road was opened through its entire length, Jan. 1, 1872, its sale under foreclosure and reorganization under its present name taking place, as already stated, in 1877. The Cable Branch was organized in 1876, as the Rock Island & Mercer County Railroad, and opened in December of the same year, sold under foreclosure in 1877, and leased to the Rock Island & Peoria Railroad, July 1, 1885, for 999 years, the rental for the entire period being commuted at $450,000.—(FINANCIAL.) The cost of the entire road and equipment was $2,654,487. The capital stock (1898) is $1,500,000; funded debt, $600,000; other forms of indebtedness increasing the total capital invested to $2,181,066.

ROCK RIVER, a stream which rises in Washington County, Wis., and flows generally in a southerly direction, a part of its course being very sinuous. After crossing the northern boundary of Illinois, it runs southwestward, intersecting the counties of Winnebago, Ogle, Lee, Whiteside and Rock Island, and entering the Mississippi three miles below the city of Rock Island. It is about 375 miles long, but its navigation is partly obstructed by rapids, which, however, furnish abundant water-power. The principal towns on its banks are Rockford, Dixon and Sterling. Its valley is wide, and noted for its beauty and fertility.

ROCKTON, a village in Winnebago County, at the junction of two branches of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, on Rock River, 13 miles north of Rockford; has manufactures of paper and agricultural implements, a feed mill, and local paper. Pop. (1890), 892; (1900), 936.

ROE, Edward Reynolds, A.B., M.D., physician, soldier and author, was born at Lebanon, Ohio, June 22, 1813; removed with his father, in 1819, to Cincinnati, and graduated at Louisville Medical Institute in 1842; began practice at Anderson, Ind., but soon removed to Shawneetown, Ill., where he gave much attention to geological research and made some extensive natural history collections. From 1848 to '52 he resided at Jacksonville, lectured extensively on his favorite science, wrote for the press and, for two years (1850-52), edited "The Jacksonville Journal," still later editing the newly established "Constitutionalist" for a few months. During a part of this period he was lecturer on natural science at Shurtleff College; also delivered a lecture before the State Legislature on the geology of Illinois, which was immediately followed by the passage of the act establishing the State Geological Department. A majority of both houses joined in a request for his appointment as State Geologist, but it was rejected on partisan grounds—he, then, being a Whig. Removing to Bloomington in 1852, Dr. Roe became prominent in educational matters, being the first Professor of Natural Science in the State Normal University, and also a Trustee of the Illinois Wesleyan University. Having identified himself with the Democratic party at this time, he became its nominee for State Superintendent of Public Instruction in 1860, but, on the inception of the war in 1861, he promptly espoused the cause of the Union, raised three companies (mostly Normal students) which were attached to the Thirty-third Illinois (Normal) Regiment; was elected Captain and successively promoted to Major and Lieutenant-Colonel. Having been dangerously wounded in the assault at Vicksburg, on May 22, 1863, and compelled to return home, he was elected Circuit Clerk by the combined vote of both parties, was re-elected four years later, became editor of "The Bloomington Pantagraph" and, in 1870, was elected to the Twenty-seventh General Assembly, where he won distinction by a somewhat notable humorous speech in opposition to removing the State Capital to Peoria. In 1871 he was appointed Marshal for the Southern District of Illinois, serving nine years. Dr. Roe was a somewhat prolific author, having produced more than a dozen works which have appeared in book form. One of these, "Virginia Rose; a Tale of Illinois in Early Days," first appeared as a prize serial in "The Alton Courier" in 1852. Others of his more noteworthy productions are: "The Gray and the Blue"; "Brought to Bay"; "From the Beaten Path"; "G. A. R.; or How She Married His Double"; "Dr. Caldwell; or the Trail of the Serpent"; and "Prairie-Land and Other Poems." He died in Chicago, Nov. 6, 1893.

ROGERS, George Clarke, soldier, was born in Grafton County, N. H., Nov. 22, 1838; but was educated in Vermont and Illinois, having removed to the latter State early in life. While teaching he studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1860; was the first, in 1861, to raise a company in Lake County for the war, which was mustered into the Fifteenth Illinois Volunteers; was chosen Second-Lieutenant and later Captain; was wounded four times at Shiloh, but refused to leave the field, and led his regiment in the final charge; was promoted Lieutenant-Colonel and soon after commissioned Colonel for gallantry at Hatchie. At Champion Hills he received three wounds, from one of which he never fully recovered; took a prominent part in the operations at Allatoona and commanded a brigade nearly two years, including the Atlanta campaign, retiring with the rank of brevet Brigadier-General. Since the war has practiced law in Illinois and in Kansas.

ROGERS, Henry Wade, educator, lawyer and author, was born in Central New York in 1853; entered Hamilton College, but the following year became a student in Michigan University, graduating there in 1874, also receiving the degree of A.M., from the same institution, in 1877. In 1883 he was elected to a professorship in the Ann Arbor Law School, and, in 1885, was made Dean of the Faculty, succeeding Judge Cooley, at the age of 32. Five years later he was tendered, and accepted, the Presidency of the Northwestern University, at Evanston, being the first layman chosen to the position, and succeeding a long line of Bishops and divines. The same year (1890), Wesleyan University conferred upon him the honorary degree of LL.D. He is a member of the American Bar Association, has served for a number of years on its Committee on Legal Education and Admission to the Bar, and was the first Chairman of the Section on Legal Education. President Rogers was the General Chairman of the Conference on the Future Foreign Policy of the United States, held at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., in August, 1898. At the Congress held in 1893, as auxiliary to the Columbian Exposition, he was chosen Chairman of the Committee on Law Reform and Jurisprudence, and was for a time associate editor of "The American Law Register," of Philadelphia. He is also the author of a treatise on "Expert Testimony," which has passed through two editions, and has edited a work entitled "Illinois Citations," besides doing much other valuable literary work of a similar character.

ROGERS, John Gorin, jurist, was born at Glasgow, Ky., Dec. 28, 1818, of English and early Virginian ancestry; was educated at Center College, Danville, Ky., and at Transylvania University, graduating from the latter institution in 1841, with the degree of Bachelor of Laws. For sixteen years he practiced in his native town, and, in 1857, removed to Chicago, where he soon attained professional prominence. In 1870 he was elected a Judge of the Cook County Circuit Court, continuing on the bench, through repeated re-elections, until his death, which occurred suddenly, Jan. 10, 1887, four years before the expiration of the term for which he had been elected.

ROGERS PARK, a village and suburb 9 miles north of Chicago, on Lake Michigan and the Chicago & Northwestern and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railways; has a bank and two weekly newspapers; is reached by electric street-car line from Chicago, and is a popular residence suburb. Annexed to City of Chicago, 1898.

ROLL, John E., pioneer, was born in Green Village, N. J., June 4, 1814; came to Illinois in 1830, and settled in Sangamon County. He assisted Abraham Lincoln in the construction of the flat-boat with which the latter descended the Mississippi River to New Orleans, in 1831. Mr. Roll, who was a mechanic and contractor, built a number of houses in Springfield, where he has since continued to reside.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. The earliest Christians to establish places of worship in Illinois were priests of the Catholic faith. Early Catholic missionaries were explorers and historians as well as preachers. (See Allouez; Bergier; Early Missionaries; Gravier; Marquette.) The church went hand in hand with the representatives of the French Government, carrying in one hand the cross and in the other the flag of France, simultaneously disseminating the doctrines of Christianity and inculcating loyalty to the House of Bourbon. For nearly a hundred years, the self-sacrificing and devoted Catholic clergy of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries ministered to the spiritual wants of the early French settlers and the natives. They were not without factional jealousies, however, and a severe blow was dealt to a branch of them in the order for the banishment of the Jesuits and the confiscation of their property. (See Early Missionaries.) The subsequent occupation of the country by the English, with the contemporaneous emigration of a considerable portion of the French west of the Mississippi, dissipated many congregations. Up to 1830 Illinois was included in the diocese of Missouri; but at that time it was constituted a separate diocese, under the episcopal control of Rt. Rev. Joseph Rosatti. At that date there were few, if any, priests in Illinois. But Bishop Rosatti was a man of earnest purpose and rare administrative ability. New parishes were organized as rapidly as circumstances would permit, and the growth of the church has been steady. By 1840 there were thirty-one parishes and twenty priests. In 1896 there are reported 698 parishes, 764 clergymen and a Catholic population exceeding 850,000. (See also Religious Denominations.)

ROODHOUSE, a city in Greene County, 21 miles south of Jacksonville, and at junction of three divisions of the Chicago & Alton Railroad; is in fertile agricultural and coal-mining region; city contains a flouring mill, grain-elevator, stock-yards, railway shops, water-works, electric light plant, two private banks, fine opera house, good school buildings, one daily and two weekly papers. Pop. (1890), 2,360; (1900), 2,351.

ROODHOUSE, John, farmer and founder of the town of Roodhouse, in Greene County, Ill., was born in Yorkshire, England, brought to America in childhood, his father settling in Greene County, Ill., in 1831. In his early manhood he opened a farm in Tazewell County, but finally returned to the paternal home in Greene County, where, on the location of the Jacksonville Division of the Chicago & Alton Railroad, he laid out the town of Roodhouse, at the junction of the Louisiana and Kansas City branch with the main line.

ROOT, George Frederick, musical composer and author, was born at Sheffield, Mass., August 30, 1820. He was a natural musician, and, while employed on his father's farm, learned to play on various instruments. In 1838 he removed to Boston, where he began his life-work. Besides teaching music in the public schools, he was employed to direct the musical service in two churches. From Boston he removed to New York, and, in 1850, went to Paris for purposes of musical study. In 1853 he made his first public essay as a composer in the song, "Hazel Dell," which became popular at once. From this time forward his success as a song-writer was assured. His music, while not of a high artistic character, captivated the popular ear and appealed strongly to the heart. In 1860 he took up his residence in Chicago, where he conducted a musical journal and wrote those "war songs" which created and perpetuated his fame. Among the best known are "Rally Round the Flag"; "Just Before the Battle, Mother"; and "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp." Other popular songs by him are "Rosalie, the Prairie Flower"; "A Hundred Years Ago"; and "The Old Folks are Gone." Besides songs he composed several cantatas and much sacred music, also publishing many books of instruction and numerous collections of vocal and instrumental music. In 1872 the University of Chicago conferred on him the degree of Mus. Doc. Died, near Portland, Maine, August 6, 1895.

ROOTS, Benajah Guernsey, civil engineer, and educator, was born in Onondaga County N. Y., April 20, 1811, and educated in the schools and academies of Central New York; began teaching in 1827, and, after spending a year at sea for the benefit of his health, took a course in law and civil engineering. He was employed as a civil engineer on the Western Railroad of Massachusetts until 1838, when he came to Illinois and obtained employment on the railroad projected from Alton to Shawneetown, under the "internal improvement system" of 1837. When that was suspended in 1839, he settled on a farm near the present site of Tamaroa, Perry County, and soon after opened a boarding school, continuing its management until 1846, when he became Principal of a seminary at Sparta. In 1851 he went into the service of the Illinois Central Railroad, first as resident engineer in charge of surveys and construction, later as land agent and attorney. He was prominent in the introduction of the graded school system in Illinois and in the establishment of the State Normal School at Bloomington and the University of Illinois at Champaign; was a member of the State Board of Education from its organization, and served as delegate to the National Republican Convention of 1868. Died, at his home in Perry County, Ill., May 9, 1888.—Philander Keep (Roots), son of the preceding, born in Tolland County, Conn., June 4, 1838, brought to Illinois the same year and educated in his father's school, and in an academy at Carrollton and the Wesleyan University at Bloomington; at the age of 17 belonged to a corps of engineers employed on a Southern railroad, and, during the war, served as a civil engineer in the construction and repair of military roads. Later, he was Deputy Surveyor-General of Nebraska; in 1871 became Chief Engineer on the Cairo & Fulton (now a part of the Iron Mountain) Railway; then engaged in the banking business in Arkansas, first as cashier of a bank at Fort Smith and afterwards of the Merchants' National Bank at Little Rock, of which his brother, Logan H., was President.—Logan H. (Roots), another son, born near Tamaroa, Perry County, Ill., March 22, 1841, was educated at home and at the State Normal at Bloomington, meanwhile serving as principal of a high school at Duquoin; in 1862 enlisted in the Eighty-first Illinois Volunteers, serving through the war and acting as Chief Commissary for General Sherman on the "March to the Sea," and participating in the great review in Washington, in May, 1865. After the conclusion of the war he was appointed Collector of Internal Revenue for the First Arkansas District, was elected from that State to the Fortieth and Forty-first Congresses (1868 and 1870)—being, at the time, the youngest member in that body—and was appointed United States Marshal by President Grant. He finally became President of the Merchants' National Bank at Little Rock, with which he remained nearly twenty years. Died, suddenly, of congestion of the brain, May 30, 1893, leaving an estate valued at nearly one and a half millions, of which he gave a large share to charitable purposes and to the city of Little Rock, for the benefit of its hospitals and the improvement of its parks.

ROSE, James A., Secretary of State, was born at Golconda, Pope County, Ill., Oct. 13, 1850. The foundation of his education was secured in the public schools of his native place, and, after a term in the Normal University at Normal, Ill., at the age of 18 he took charge of a country school. Soon he was chosen Principal of the Golconda graded schools, was later made County Superintendent of Schools, and re-elected for a second term. During his second term he was admitted to the bar, and, resigning the office of Superintendent, was elected State's Attorney without opposition, being re-elected for another term. In 1889, by appointment of Governor Fifer, he became one of the Trustees of the Pontiac Reformatory, serving until the next year, when he was transferred to the Board of Commissioners of the Southern Illinois Penitentiary at Chester, which position he continued to occupy until 1893. In 1896 he was elected Secretary of State on the Republican ticket, his term extending to January, 1901.

ROSEVILLE, a village in Warren County, on the Rock Island Division of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, 17 miles northwest of Bushnell; has water and electric-light plants, two banks, public library and one newspaper. Region agricultural and coal-mining. Pop. (1900), 1,014.

ROSS, Leonard Fulton, soldier, born in Fulton County, Ill., July 18, 1823; was educated in the common schools and at Illinois College, Jacksonville, studied law and admitted to the bar in 1845; the following year enlisted in the Fourth Illinois Volunteers for the Mexican War, became First Lieutenant and was commended for services at Vera Cruz and Cerro Gordo; also performed important service as bearer of dispatches for General Taylor. After the war he served six years as Probate Judge. In May, 1861, he enlisted in the war for the Union, and was chosen Colonel of the Seventeenth Illinois Volunteers, serving with it in Missouri and Kentucky; was commissioned Brigadier-General a few weeks after the capture of Fort Donelson, and, after the evacuation of Corinth, was assigned to the command of a division with headquarters at Bolivar, Tenn. He resigned in July, 1863, and, in 1867, was appointed by President Johnson Collector of Internal Revenue for the Ninth District; has been three times a delegate to National Republican Conventions and twice defeated as a candidate for Congress in a Democratic District. Since the war he has devoted his attention largely to stock-raising, having a large stock-farm in Iowa. In his later years was President of a bank at Lewistown, Ill. Died Jan. 17, 1901.

ROSS, (Col.) William, pioneer, was born at Monson, Hampden County, Mass., April 24, 1792; removed with his father's family, in 1805, to Pittsfield, Mass., where he remained until his twentieth year, when he was commissioned an Ensign in the Twenty-first Regiment United States Infantry, serving through the War of 1812-14, and participating in the battle of Sackett's Harbor. During the latter part of his service he acted as drill-master at various points. Then, returning to Pittsfield, he carried on the business of blacksmithing as an employer, meanwhile filling some local offices. In 1820, a company consisting of himself and four brothers, with their families and a few others, started for the West, intending to settle in Illinois. Reaching the head-waters of the Allegheny overland, they transferred their wagons, teams and other property to flat-boats, descending that stream and the Ohio to Shawneetown, Ill. Here they disembarked and, crossing the State, reached Upper Alton, where they found only one house, that of Maj. Charles W. Hunter. Leaving their families at Upper Alton, the brothers proceeded north, crossing the Illinois River near its mouth, until they reached a point in the western part of the present county of Pike, where the town of Atlas was afterwards located. Here they erected four rough log-cabins, on a beautiful prairie not far from the Mississippi, removing their families thither a few weeks later. They suffered the usual privations incident to life in a new country, not excepting sickness and death of some of their number. At the next session of the Legislature (1820-21) Pike County was established, embracing all that part of the State west and north of the Illinois, and including the present cities of Galena and Chicago. The Ross settlement became the nucleus of the town of Atlas, laid out by Colonel Ross and his associates in 1823, at an early day the rival of Quincy, and becoming the second county-seat of Pike County, so remaining from 1824 to 1833, when the seat of justice was removed to Pittsfield. During this period Colonel Ross was one of the most prominent citizens of the county, holding, simultaneously or successively, the offices of Probate Judge, Circuit and County Clerk, Justice of the Peace, and others of a subordinate character. As Colonel of Militia, in 1832, he was ordered by Governor Reynolds to raise a company for the Black Hawk War, and, in four days, reported at Beardstown with twice the number of men called for. In 1834 he was elected to the lower branch of the General Assembly, also serving in the Senate during the three following sessions, a part of the time as President pro tem. of the last-named body. While in the General Assembly he was instrumental in securing legislation of great importance relating to Military Tract lands. The year following the establishment of the county-seat at Pittsfield (1834) he became a citizen of that place, which he had the privilege of naming for his early home. He was a member of the Republican State Convention of 1856, and a delegate to the National Republican Convention of 1860, which nominated Mr. Lincoln for President the first time. Beginning life poor he acquired considerable property; was liberal, public-spirited and patriotic, making a handsome donation to the first company organized in Pike County, for the suppression of the Rebellion. Died, at Pittsfield, May 31, 1873.

ROSSVILLE, a village of Vermillion County, on the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad, 19 miles north of Danville; has electric-light plant, water-works, tile and brick-works, two banks and two newspapers. Pop. (1890), 879; (1900), 1,435.

ROUNDS, Sterling Parker, public printer, was born in Berkshire, Vt., June 27, 1828; about 1840 began learning the printer's trade at Kenosha, Wis., and, in 1845, was foreman of the State printing office at Madison, afterward working in offices in Milwaukee, Racine and Buffalo, going to Chicago in 1851. Here he finally established a printer's warehouse, to which he later added an electrotype foundry and the manufacture of presses, also commencing the issue of "Round's Printers' Cabinet," a trade-paper, which was continued during his life. In 1881 he was appointed by President Garfield Public Printer at Washington, serving until 1885, when he removed to Omaha, Neb., and was identified with "The Republican," of that city, until his death, Dec. 17, 1887.

ROUNTREE, Hiram, County Judge, born in Rutherford County, N. C., Dec. 22, 1794; was brought to Kentucky in infancy, where he grew to manhood and served as an Ensign in the War of 1812 under General Shelby. In 1817 he removed to Illinois Territory, first locating in Madison County, where he taught school for two years near Edwardsville, but removed to Fayette County about the time of the removal of the State capital to Vandalia. On the organization of Montgomery County, in 1821, he was appointed to office there and ever afterwards resided at Hillsboro. For a number of years in the early history of the county, he held (at the same time) the offices of Clerk of the County Commissioners Court, Clerk of the Circuit Court, County Recorder, Justice of the Peace, Notary Public, Master in Chancery and Judge of Probate, besides that of Postmaster for the town of Hillsboro. In 1826 he was elected Enrolling and Engrossing Clerk of the Senate and re-elected in 1830; served as Delegate in the Constitutional Convention of 1847, and the next year was elected to the State Senate, serving in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth General Assemblies. On retiring from the Senate (1852), he was elected County Judge without opposition, was re-elected to the same office in 1861, and again, in 1865, as the nominee of the Republicans. Judge Rountree was noted for his sound judgment and sterling integrity. Died, at Hillsboro, March 4, 1873.

ROUTT, John L., soldier and Governor, was born at Eddyville, Ky., April 25, 1826, brought to Illinois in infancy and educated in the common schools. Soon after coming of age he was elected and served one term as Sheriff of McLean County; in 1862 enlisted and became Captain of Company E, Ninety-fourth Illinois Volunteers. After the war he engaged in business in Bloomington, and was appointed by President Grant, successively, United States Marshal for the Southern District of Illinois, Second Assistant Postmaster-General and Territorial Governor of Colorado. On the admission of Colorado as a State, he was elected the first Governor under the State Government, and re-elected in 1890—serving, in all, three years. His home is in Denver. He has been extensively and successfully identified with mining enterprises in Colorado.

ROWELL, Jonathan H., ex-Congressman, was born at Haverhill, N. H., Feb. 10, 1833. He is a graduate of Eureka College and of the Law Department of the Chicago University. During the War of the Rebellion he served three years as company officer in the Seventeenth Illinois Infantry. In 1868 he was elected State's Attorney for the Eighth Judicial Circuit, and, in 1880, was a Presidential Elector on the Republican ticket. In 1882 he was elected to Congress from the Fourteenth Illinois District and three times re-elected, serving until March, 1891. His home is at Bloomington.

ROWETT, Richard, soldier, was born in Cornwall, England, in 1830, came to the United States in 1851, finally settling on a farm near Carlinville, Ill., and becoming a breeder of thorough-bred horses. In 1861 he entered the service as a Captain in the Seventh Illinois Volunteers and was successively promoted Major, Lieutenant-Colonel and Colonel; was wounded in the battles of Shiloh, Corinth and Allatoona, especially distinguishing himself at the latter and being brevetted Brigadier-General for gallantry. After the war he returned to his stock farm, but later held the positions of Canal Commissioner, Penitentiary Commissioner, Representative in the Thirtieth General Assembly and Collector of Internal Revenue for the Fourth (Quincy) District, until its consolidation with the Eighth District by President Cleveland. Died, in Chicago, July 13, 1887.

RUSH MEDICAL COLLEGE, located in Chicago; incorporated by act of March 2, 1837, the charter having been prepared the previous year by Drs. Daniel Brainard and Josiah C. Goodhue. The extreme financial depression of the following year prevented the organization of a faculty until 1843. The institution was named in honor of Dr. Benjamin Rush, the eminent practitioner, medical author and teacher of Philadelphia in the latter half of the eighteenth century. The first faculty consisted of four professors, and the first term opened on Dec. 4, 1843, with a class of twenty-two students. Three years' study was required for graduation, but only two annual terms of sixteen weeks each need be attended at the college itself. Instruction was given in a few rooms temporarily opened for that purpose. The next year a small building, costing between $3,000 and $4,000, was erected. This was re-arranged and enlarged in 1855 at a cost of $15,000. The constant and rapid growth of the college necessitated the erection of a new building in 1867, the cost of which was $70,000. This was destroyed in the fire of 1871, and another, costing $54,000, was erected in 1876 and a free dispensary added. In 1844 the Presbyterian Hospital was located on a portion of the college lot, and the two institutions connected, thus insuring abundant and stable facilities for clinical instruction. Shortly afterwards, Rush College became the medical department of Lake Forest University. The present faculty (1898) consists of 95 professors, adjunct professors, lecturers and instructors of all grades, and over 600 students in attendance. The length of the annual terms is six months, and four years of study are required for graduation, attendance upon at least three college terms being compulsory.

RUSHVILLE, the county-seat of Schuyler County, 50 miles northeast of Quincy and 11 miles northwest of Beardstown; is the southern terminus of the Buda and Rushville branch of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad. The town was selected as the county-seat in 1826, the seat of justice being removed from a place called Beardstown, about five miles eastward (not the present Beardstown in Cass County), where it had been located at the time of the organization of Schuyler County, a year previous. At first the new seat of justice was called Rush-ton, in honor of Dr. Benjamin Rush, but afterwards took its present name. It is a coal-mining, grain and fruit-growing region, and contains several manufactories, including flour-mills, brick and tile works; also has two banks (State and private) and a public library. Four periodicals (one daily) are published here. Population (1880), 1,662; (1890), 2,031; (1900), 2,292.

RUSSELL, John, pioneer teacher and author, was born at Cavendish, Vt., July 31, 1793, and educated in the common schools of his native State and at Middlebury College, where he graduated in 1818—having obtained means to support himself, during his college course, by teaching and by the publication, before he had reached his 20th year, of a volume entitled "The Authentic History of Vermont State Prison." After graduation he taught for a short time in Georgia; but, early in the following year, joined his father on the way to Missouri. The next five years he spent in teaching in the "Bonhomme Bottom" on the Missouri River. During this period he published, anonymously, in "The St. Charles Mis-sourian," a temperance allegory entitled "The Venomous Worm" (or "The Worm of the Still"), which gained a wide popularity and was early recognized by the compilers of school-readers as a sort of classic. Leaving this locality he taught a year in St. Louis, when he removed to Vandalia (then the capital of Illinois), after which he spent two years teaching in the Seminary at Upper Alton, which afterwards became Shurtleff College. In 1828 he removed to Greene County, locating at a point near the Illinois River to which he gave the name of Bluffdale. Here he was licensed as a Baptist preacher, officiating in this capacity only occasionally, while pursuing his calling as a teacher or writer for the press, to which he was an almost constant contributor during the last twenty-five years of his life. About 1837 or 1838 he was editor of a paper called "The Backwoodsman" at Grafton—then a part of Greene County, but now in Jersey County—to which he afterwards continued to be a contributor some time longer, and, in 1841-42, was editor of "The Advertiser," at Louisville, Ky. He was also, for several years, Principal of the Spring Hill Academy in East Feliciana Parish, La., meanwhile serving for a portion of the time as Superintendent of Public Schools. He was the author of a number of stories and sketches, some of which went through several editions, and, at the time of his death, had in preparation a history of "The Black Hawk War," "Evidences of Christianity" and a "History of Illinois." He was an accomplished linguist, being able to read with fluency Greek, Latin, French, Spanish and Italian, besides having considerable familiarity with several other modern languages. In 1862 he received from the University of Chicago the degree of LL.D. Died, Jan. 2, 1863, and was buried on the old homestead at Bluffdale.

RUSSELL, Martin J., politician and journalist, born in Chicago, Dec. 20, 1845. He was a nephew of Col. James A. Mulligan (see Mulligan, James A.) and served with credit as Adjutant-General on the staff of the latter in the Civil War. In 1870 he became a reporter on "The Chicago Evening Post," and was advanced to the position of city editor. Subsequently he was connected with "The Times," and "The Telegram"; was also a member of the Board of Education of Hyde Park before the annexation of that village to Chicago, and has been one of the South Park Commissioners of the city last named. After the purchase of "The Chicago Times" by Carter H. Harrison he remained for a time on the editorial staff. In 1894 President Cleveland appointed him Collector of the Port of Chicago. At the expiration of his term of office he resumed editorial work as editor-in-chief of "The Chronicle," the organ of the Democratic party in Chicago. Died June 25, 1900.

RUTHERFORD, Friend S., lawyer and soldier, was born in Schenectady, N. Y., Sept. 25, 1820; studied law in Troy and removed to Illinois, settling at Edwardsville, and finally at Alton; was a Republican candidate for Presidential Elector in 1856, and, in 1860, a member of the National Republican Convention at Chicago, which nominated Mr. Lincoln for the Presidency. In September, 1862, he was commissioned Colonel of the Ninety-seventh Illinois Volunteers, and participated in the capture of Port Gibson and in the operations about Vicksburg—also leading in the attack on Arkansas Post, and subsequently serving in Louisiana, but died as the result of fatigue and exposure in the service, June 20, 1864, one week before his promotion to the rank of Brigadier-General.—Reuben C. (Rutherford), brother of the preceding, was born at Troy, N. Y., Sept. 29, 1823, but grew up in Vermont and New Hampshire; received a degree in law when quite young, but afterwards fitted himself as a lecturer on physiology and hygiene, upon which he lectured extensively in Michigan, Illinois and other States after coming west in 1849. During 1854-55, in co-operation with Prof. J. B. Turner and others, he canvassed and lectured extensively throughout Illinois in support of the movement which resulted in the donation of public lands, by Congress, for the establishment of "Industrial Colleges" in the several States. The establishment of the University of Illinois, at Champaign, was the outgrowth of this movement. In 1856 he located at Quincy, where he resided some thirty years; in 1861, served for several months as the first Commissary of Subsistence at Cairo; was later associated with the State Quartermaster's Department, finally entering the secret service of the War Department, in which he remained until 1867, retiring with the rank of brevet Brigadier-General. In 1866, General Rutherford removed to New York City, where he died, June 24, 1895.—George V. (Rutherford), another brother, was born at Rutland, Vt., 1830; was first admitted to the bar, but afterwards took charge of the construction of telegraph lines in some of the Southern States; at the beginning of the Civil War became Assistant Quartermaster-General of the State of Illinois, at Springfield, under ex-Gov. John Wood, but subsequently entered the Quartermaster's service of the General Government in Washington, retiring after the war with the rank of Brigadier-General. He then returned to Quincy, Ill., where he resided until 1873, when he engaged in manufacturing business at Northampton, Mass., but finally removed to California for the benefit of his failing health. Died, at St. Helena, Cal., August 28, 1872.

RUTLAND, a village of La Salle County, on the Illinois Central Railroad, 25 miles south of La Salle; has a bank, five churches, school, and a newspaper, with coal mines in the vicinity. Pop. (1890), 509; (1900), 893; (1903), 1,093.

RUTLEDGE, (Rev.) William J., clergyman, Army Chaplain, born in Augusta County, Va., June 24, 1820; was converted at the age of 12 years and, at 21, became a member of the Illinois Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, serving various churches in the central and western parts of the State—also acting, for a time, as Agent of the Illinois Conference Female College at Jacksonville. From 1861 to 1863 he was Chaplain of the Fourteenth Regiment Illinois Volunteers. Returning from the war, he served as pastor of churches at Jacksonville, Bloomington, Quincy, Rushville, Springfield, Griggsville and other points; from 1881 to '84 was Chaplain of the Illinois State Penitentiary at Joliet. Mr. Rutledge was one of the founders of the Grand Army of the Republic, and served for many years as Chaplain of the order for the Department of Illinois. In connection with the ministry, he has occupied a supernumerary relation since 1885. Died in Jacksonville, April 14, 1900.

RUTZ, Edward, State Treasurer, was born in a village in the Duchy of Baden, Germany, May 5, 1829; came to America in 1848, locating on a farm in St. Clair County, Ill.; went to California in 1857, and, early in 1861, enlisted in the Third United States Artillery at San Francisco, serving with the Army of the Potomac until his discharge in 1864, and taking part in every battle in which his command was engaged. After his return in 1865, he located in St. Clair County, and was elected County Surveyor, served three consecutive terms as County Treasurer, and was elected State Treasurer three times—1872, '76 and '80. About 1892 he removed to California, where he now resides.

RYAN, Edward G., early editor and jurist, born at Newcastle House, County Meath, Ireland, Nov. 13, 1810; was educated for the priesthood, but turned his attention to law, and, in 1830, came to New York and engaged in teaching while prosecuting his legal studies; in 1836 removed to Chicago, where he was admitted to the bar and was, for a time, associated in practice with Hugh T. Dickey. In April, 1840, Mr. Ryan assumed the editorship of a weekly paper in Chicago called "The Illinois Tribune," which he conducted for over a year, and which is remembered chiefly on account of its bitter assaults on Judge John Pearson of Danville, who had aroused the hostility of some members of the Chicago bar by his rulings upon the bench. About 1842 Ryan removed to Milwaukee, Wis., where he was, for a time, a partner of Matthew H. Carpenter (afterwards United States Senator), and was connected with a number of celebrated trials before the courts of that State, including the Barstow-Bashford case, which ended with Bashford becoming the first Republican Governor of Wisconsin. In 1874 he was appointed Chief Justice of Wisconsin, serving until his death, which occurred at Madison, Oct. 19, 1880. He was a strong partisan, and, during the Civil War, was an intense opponent of the war policy of the Government. In spite of infirmities of temper, he appears to have been a man of much learning and recognized legal ability.

RYAN, James, Roman Catholic Bishop, born in Ireland in 1848 and emigrated to America in childhood; was educated for the priesthood in Kentucky, and, after ordination, was made a professor in St. Joseph's Seminary, at Bardstown, Ky. In 1878 he removed to Illinois, attaching himself to the diocese of Peoria, and having charge of parishes at Wataga and Danville. In 1881 he became rector of the Ottawa parish, within the episcopal jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Chicago. In 1888 he was made Bishop of the see of Alton, the prior incumbent (Bishop Baltes) having died in 1886.

SACS AND FOXES, two confederated Indian tribes, who were among the most warlike and powerful of the aborigines of the Illinois Country. The Foxes called themselves the Musk-wah-ha-kee, a name compounded of two words, signifying "those of red earth." The French called them Ou-ta-ga-mies, that being their spelling of the name given them by other tribes, the meaning of which was "Foxes," and which was bestowed upon them because their totem (or armorial device, as it may be called) was a fox. They seem to have been driven westward from the northern shore of Lake Ontario, by way of Niagara and Mackinac, to the region around Green Bay, Wis.—Concerning their allied brethren, the Sacs, less is known. The name is variously spelled in the Indian dialects—Ou-sa-kies, Sauks, etc.—and the term Sacs is unquestionably an abbreviated corruption. Black Hawk belonged to this tribe. The Foxes and Sacs formed a confederation according to aboriginal tradition, on what is now known as the Sac River, near Green Bay, but the date of the alliance cannot be determined. The origin of the Sacs is equally uncertain. Black Hawk claimed that his tribe originally dwelt around Quebec, but, as to the authenticity of this claim, historical authorities differ widely. Subsequent to 1670 the history of the allied tribes is tolerably well defined. Their characteristics, location and habits are described at some length by Father Allouez, who visited them in 1666-67. He says that they were numerous and warlike, but depicts them as "penurious, avaricious, thievish and quarrelsome." That they were cordially detested by their neighbors is certain, and Judge James Hall calls them "the Ishmaelites of the lakes." They were unfriendly to the French, who attached to themselves other tribes, and, through the aid of the latter, had well-nigh exterminated them, when the Sacs and Foxes sued for peace, which was granted on terms most humiliating to the vanquished. By 1718, however, they were virtually in possession of the region around Rock River in Illinois, and, four years later, through the aid of the Mascoutins and Kickapoos, they had expelled the Illinois, driving the last of that ill-fated tribe across the Illinois River. They abstained from taking part in the border wars that marked the close of the Revolutionary War, and therefore did not participate in the treaty of Greenville in 1795. At that date, according to Judge Hall, they claimed the country as far west as Council Bluffs, Iowa, and as far north as Prairie du Chien. They offered to co-operate with the United States Government in the War of 1812, but this offer was declined, and a portion of the tribe, under the leadership of Black Hawk, enlisted on the side of the British. The Black Hawk War proved their political ruin. By the treaty of Rock Island they ceded vast tracts of land, including a large part of the eastern half of Iowa and a large body of land east of the Mississippi. (See Black Hawk War; Indian Treaties.) In 1842 the Government divided the nation into two bands, removing both to reservations in the farther West. One was located on the Osage River and the other on the south side of the Nee-ma-ha River, near the northwest corner of Kansas. From these reservations, there is little doubt, many of them have silently emigrated toward the Rocky Mountains, where the hoe might be laid aside for the rifle, the net and the spear of the hunter. A few years ago a part of these confederated tribes were located in the eastern part of Oklahoma.

SAILOR SPRINGS, a village and health resort in Clay County, 5 miles north of Clay City, has an academy and a local paper. Population (1900), 419; (1903, est.), 550.

SALEM, an incorporated city, the county-seat of Marion County, on the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern, the Chicago & Eastern Illinois and the Illinois Southern Railroads, 71 miles east of St. Louis, and 16 miles northeast of Centralia; in agricultural and coal district. A leading industry is the culture, evaporation and shipment of fruit. The city has flour-mills, two banks and three weekly newspapers. Pop. (1890), 1,493; (1900), 1,642.

SALINE COUNTY, a southeastern county, organized in 1847, having an area of 380 square miles. It derives its name from the salt springs which are found in every part of the county. The northern portion is rolling and yields an abundance of coal of a quality suitable for smithing. The bottoms are swamps, but heavily timbered, and saw-mills abound. Oak, hickory, sweet gum, mulberry, locust and sassafras are the prevailing varieties. Fruit and tobacco are extensively cultivated. The climate is mild and humid, and the vegetation varied. The soil of the low lands is rich, and, when drained, makes excellent farming lands. In some localities a good gray sandstone, soft enough to be worked, is quarried, and millstone grit is frequently found. In the southern half of the county are the Eagle Mountains, a line of hills having an altitude of some 450 to 500 feet above the level of the Mississippi at Cairo, and believed by geologists to have been a part of the upheaval that gave birth to the Ozark Mountains in Missouri and Arkansas. The highest land in the county is 864 feet above sea-level. Tradition says that these hills are rich in silver ore, but it has not been found in paying quantities. Springs strongly impregnated with sulphur are found on the slopes. The county-seat was originally located at Raleigh, which was platted in 1848, but it was subsequently removed to Harrisburg, which was laid out in 1859. Population of the county (1880), 15,940; (1890), 19,342; (1900), 21,685.

SALINE RIVER, a stream formed by the confluence of two branches, both of which flow through portions of Saline County, uniting in Gallatin County. The North Fork rises in Hamilton County and runs nearly south, while the South Fork drains part of Williamson County, and runs east through Saline. The river (which is little more than a creek), thus formed, runs southeast, entering the Ohio ten miles below Shawneetown.

SALT MANUFACTURE. There is evidence going to show that the saline springs, in Gallatin County, were utilized by the aboriginal inhabitants in the making of salt, long before the advent of white settlers. There have been discovered, at various points, what appear to be the remains of evaporating kettles, composed of hardened clay and pounded shells, varying in diameter from three to four feet. In 1812, with a view to encouraging the manufacture of salt from these springs, Congress granted to Illinois the use of 36 square miles, the fee still remaining in the United States. These lands were leased by the State to private parties, but the income derived from them was comparatively small and frequently difficult of collection. The workmen were mostly slaves from Kentucky and Tennessee, who are especially referred to in Article VI., Section 2, of the Constitution of 1818. The salt made brought $5 per 100 pounds, and was shipped in keel-boats to various points on the Ohio, Mississippi, Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers, while many purchasers came hundreds of miles on horseback and carried it away on pack animals. In 1827, the State treasury being empty and the General Assembly having decided to erect a penitentiary at Alton, Congress was petitioned to donate these lands to the State in fee, and permission was granted "to sell 30,000 acres of the Ohio Salines in Gallatin County, and apply the proceeds to such purposes as the Legislature might by law direct." The sale was made, one-half of the proceeds set apart for the building of the penitentiary, and one-half to the improvement of roads and rivers in the eastern part of the State. The manufacture of salt was carried on, however—for a time by lessees and subsequently by owners—until 1873, about which time it was abandoned, chiefly because it had ceased to be profitable on account of competition with other districts possessing superior facilities. Some salt was manufactured in Vermilion County about 1824. The manufacture has been successfully carried on in recent years, from the product of artesian wells, at St. John, in Perry County.

SANDOVAL, a village of Marion County, at the crossing of the western branch of the Illinois Central Railroad, and the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern, 6 miles north of Centralia. The town has coal mines and some manufactures, with banks and one newspaper. Population (1880), 564; (1890), 834; (1900), 1,258.

SANDSTONE. The quantity of sandstone quarried in Illinois is comparatively insignificant, its value being less than one-fifth of one per cent of the value of the output of the entire country. In 1890 the State ranked twenty-fifth in the list of States producing this mineral, the total value of the stone quarried being but $17,896, representing 141,605 cubic feet, taken from ten quarries, which employed forty-six hands, and had an aggregate capital invested of $49,400.

SANDWICH, a city in De Kalb County, incorporated in 1873, on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, 58 miles southwest of Chicago. The principal industries are the manufacture of agricultural implements, hay-presses, corn-shell-ers, pumps and wind-mills. Sandwich has two private banks, two weekly and one semi-weekly papers. Pop. (1890), 2,516; (1900), 2,520; (1903), 2,865.

SANGAMON COUNTY, a central county, organized under act of June 30, 1821, from parts of Bond and Madison Counties, and embracing the present counties of Sangamon, Cass, Menard, Mason, Tazewell, Logan, and parts of Morgan, McLean, Woodford, Marshall and Putnam. It was named for the river flowing through it. Though reduced in area somewhat, four years later, it extended to the Illinois River, but was reduced to its present limits by the setting apart of Menard, Logan and Dane (now Christian) Counties, in 1839. Henry Funderburk is believed to have been the first white settler, arriving there in 1817 and locating in what is now Cotton Hill Township, being followed, the next year, by William Drennan, Joseph Dodds, James McCoy, Robert Pulliam and others. John Kelly located on the present site of the city of Springfield in 1818, and was there at the time of the selection of that place as the temporary seat of justice in 1821. Other settlements were made at Auburn, Island Grove, and elsewhere, and population began to flow in rapidly. Remnants of the Pottawatomie and Kickapoo Indians were still there, but soon moved north or west. County organization was effected in 1821, the first Board of County Commissioners being composed of William Drennan, Zachariah Peter and Samuel Lee. John Reynolds (afterwards Governor) held the first term of Circuit Court, with John Taylor, Sheriff; Henry Starr, Prosecuting Attorney, and Charles R. Matheny, Circuit Clerk. A United States Land Office was established at Springfield in 1823, with Pascal P. Enos as Receiver, the first sale of lands taking place the same year. The soil of Sangamon County is exuberantly fertile, with rich underlying deposits of bituminous coal, which is mined in large quantities. The chief towns are Springfield, Auburn, Riverton, Illiopolis and Pleasant Plains. The area of the county is 860 square miles. Population (1880), 52,894; (1890), 61,195; (1900), 71,593.

SANGAMON RIVER, formed by the union of the North and South Forks, of which the former is the longer, or main branch. The North Fork rises in the northern part of Champaign County, whence it runs southwest to the city of Decatur, thence westward through Sangamon County, forming the north boundary of Christian County, and emptying into the Illinois River about 9 miles above Beardstown. The Sangamon is nearly 240 miles long, including the North Fork. The South Fork flows through Christian County, and joins the North Fork about 6 miles east of Springfield. In the early history of the State the Sangamon was regarded as a navigable stream, and its improvement was one of the measures advocated by Abraham Lincoln in 1832, when he was for the first time a candidate (though unsuccessfully) for the Legislature. In the spring of 1832 a small steamer from Cincinnati, called the "Talisman," ascended the river to a point near Springfield. The event was celebrated with great rejoicing by the people, but the vessel encountered so much difficulty in getting out of the river that the experiment was never repeated.

SANGAMON & MORGAN RAILROAD. (See Wabash Railroad.)

SANGER, Lorenzo P., railway and canal contractor, was born at Littleton, N. H., March 2, 1809; brought in childhood to Livingston County, N. Y., where his father became a contractor on the Erie Canal, the son also being employed upon the same work. The latter subsequently became a contractor on the Pennsylvania Canal on his own account, being known as "the boy contractor." Then, after a brief experience in mercantile business, and a year spent in the construction of a canal in Indiana, in 1836 he came to Illinois, and soon after became an extensive contractor on the Illinois & Michigan Canal, having charge of rock excavation at Lockport. He was also connected with the Rock River improvement scheme, and interested in a line of stages between Chicago and Galena, which, having been consolidated with the line managed by the firm of Fink & Walker, finally became the Northwestern Stage Company, extending its operations throughout Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa and Missouri—Mr. Sanger having charge of the Western Division, for a time, with headquarters at St. Louis. In 1851 he became the head of the firm of Sanger, Camp & Co., contractors for the construction of the Western (or Illinois) Division of the Ohio & Mississippi (now the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern) Railway, upon which he was employed for several years. Other works with which he was connected were the North Missouri Railroad and the construction of the State Penitentiary at Joliet, as member of the firm of Sanger & Casey, for a time, also lessees of convict labor. In 1862 Mr. Sanger received from Governor Yates, by request of President Lincoln, a commission as Colonel, and was assigned to staff duty in Kentucky and Tennessee. After the war he became largely interested in stone quarries adjacent to Joliet; also had an extensive contract, from the City of Chicago, for deepening the Illinois & Michigan Canal. Died, at Oakland, Cal., March 23, 1875, whither he had gone for the benefit of his health.—James Young (Sanger), brother of the preceding, was born at Sutton, Vt., March 14, 1814; in boyhood spent some time in a large mercantile establishment at Pittsburg, Pa., later being associated with his father and elder brother in contracts on the Erie Canal and similar works in Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana. At the age of 23 he came with his father's family to St. Joseph, Mich., where they established a large supply store, and engaged in bridge-building and similar enterprises. At a later period, in connection with his father and his brother, L. P. Sanger, he was prominently connected with the construction of the Illinois & Michigan Canal—the aqueduct at Ottawa and the locks at Peru being constructed by them. About 1850 the Construction Company, of which he and his brother, L. P. Sanger, were leading members, undertook the construction of the Ohio & Mississippi (now Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern) Railroad, from St. Louis to Vincennes, Ind., and were prominently identified with other railroad enterprises in Southern Illinois, Missouri and California. Died, July 3, 1867, when consummating arrangements for the performance of a large contract on the Union Pacific Railroad.

SANITARY COMMISSION. (See Illinois Sanitary Commission.)

SANITARY DISTRICT OF CHICAGO. (See Chicago Drainage Canal.)

SAUGANASH, the Indian name of a half-breed known as Capt. Billy Caldwell, the son of a British officer and a Pottawatomie woman, born in Canada about 1780; received an education from the Jesuits at Detroit, and was able to speak and write English and French, besides several Indian dialects; was a friend of Tecumseh's and, during the latter part of his life, a devoted friend of the whites. He took up his residence in Chicago about 1820, and, in 1826, was a Justice of the Peace, while nominally a subject of Great Britain and a Chief of the Ottawa and Pottawatomies. In 1828 the Government, in consideration of his services, built for him the first frame house ever erected in Chicago, which he occupied until his departure with his tribe for Council Bluffs in 1836. By a treaty, made Jan. 2, 1830, reservations were granted by the Government to Sauganash, Shabona and other friendly Indians (see Shabona), and 1,240 acres on the North Branch of Chicago River set apart for Caldwell, which he sold before leaving the country. Died, at Council Bluffs, Iowa, Sept. 28, 1841.

SAVAGE, George S. F., D.D., clergyman, was born at Cromwell, Conn., Jan. 29, 1817; graduated at Yale College in 1844; studied theology at Andover and New Haven, graduating in 1847; was ordained a home missionary the same year and spent twelve years as pastor at St. Charles, Ill., for four years being corresponding editor of "The Prairie Herald" and "The Congregational Herald." For ten years he was in the service of the American Tract Society, and, during the Civil War, was engaged in sanitary and religious work in the army. In 1870 he was appointed Western Secretary of the Congregational Publishing Society, remaining two years, after which he became Financial Secretary of the Chicago Theological Seminary. He has also been a Director of the institution since 1884, a Trustee of Beloit College since 1880, and, for several years, editor and publisher of "The Congregational Review."

SAVANNA, a city in Carroll County, situated on the Mississippi River and the Chicago, Burlington & Northern and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railways; is 10 miles west of Mount Carroll and about 20 miles north of Clinton, Iowa. It is an important shipping-point and contains several manufactories of machinery, lumber, flour, etc. It has two State banks, a public library, churches, two graded schools, township high school, and two daily and weekly newspapers. Pop. (1890), 3,097; (1900), 3,325.

SAYBROOK, a village of McLean County, on the Lake Erie & Western Railroad, 26 miles east of Bloomington; district agricultural; county fairs held here; the town has two banks and two newspapers. Pop. (1890), 851; (1900), 879.

SCATES, Walter Bennett, jurist and soldier, was born at South Boston, Halifax County, Va., Jan. 18, 1808; was taken in infancy to Hopkinsville, Ky., where he resided until 1831, having meanwhile learned the printer's trade at Nashville and studied law at Louisville. In 1831 he removed to Frankfort, Franklin County, Ill., where, for a time, he was County Surveyor. In 1836, having been appointed Attorney-General, he removed to Vandalia, then the seat of government, but resigned at the close of the same year to accept the Judgeship of the Third Judicial Circuit, and took up his residence at Shawneetown. In 1841 he was one of five new Judges added to the Supreme Court bench, the others being Sidney Breesee, Stephen A. Douglas, Thomas Ford and Samuel H. Treat. In that year he removed to Mount Vernon, Jefferson County, and, in January, 1847, resigned his seat upon the bench to resume practice. The same year he was a member of the Constitutional Convention and Chairman of the Committee on Judiciary. In June, 1854, he again took a seat upon the Supreme Court bench, being chosen to succeed Lyman Trumbull, but resigned in May, 1857, and resumed practice in Chicago. In 1862 he volunteered in defense of the Union, received a Major's commission and was assigned to duty on the staff of General McClernand; was made, Assistant Adjutant-General and mustered out in January, 1866. In July, 1866, President Johnson appointed him Collector of Customs at Chicago, which position he filled until July 1, 1869, when he was removed by President Grant, during the same period, being ex-officio custodian of United States funds, the office of Assistant Treasurer not having been then created. Died, at Evanston, Oct. 26, 1886.

SCAMMON, Jonathan Young, lawyer and banker, was born at Whitefield, Maine, July 27, 1812; after graduating at Waterville (now Colby) University in 1831, he studied law and was admitted to the bar at Hallowell, in 1835 removing to Chicago, where he spent the remainder of his life. After a year spent as deputy in the office of the Circuit Clerk of Cook County, during which he prepared a revision of the Illinois statutes, he was appointed attorney for the State Bank of Illinois in 1837, and, in 1839, became reporter of the Supreme Court, which office he held until 1845. In the meantime, he was associated with several prominent lawyers, his first legal firm being that of Scammon, McCagg & Fuller, which was continued up to the fire of 1871. A large operator in real estate and identified with many enterprises of a public or benevolent character, his most important financial venture was in connection with the Chicago Marine & Fire Insurance Company, which conducted an extensive banking business for many years, and of which he was the President and leading spirit. As a citizen he was progressive, public-spirited and liberal. He was one of the main promoters and organizers of the old Galena & Chicago Union Railway, the first railroad to run west from Lake Michigan; was also prominently identified with the founding of the Chicago public school system, a Trustee of the (old) Chicago University, and one of the founders of the Chicago Historical Society, of the Chicago Academy of Sciences and the Chicago Astronomical Society — being the first President of the latter body. He erected, at a cost of $30,000, the Fort Dearborn Observatory, in which he caused to be placed the most powerful telescope which had at that time been brought to the West. He also maintained the observatory at his own expense. He was the pioneer of Swedenborgianism in Chicago, and, in politics, a staunch Whig, and, later, an ardent Republican. In 1844 he was one of the founders of "The Chicago American," a paper designed to advance the candidacy of Henry Clay for the Presidency; and, in 1873, when "The Chicago Tribune" espoused the Liberal Republican cause, he started "The Inter-Ocean" as a Republican organ, being, for some time, its sole proprietor and editor-in-chief. He was one of the first to encourage the adoption of the homeopathic system of medicine in Chicago, and was prominently connected with the founding of the Hahnemann Medical College and the Hahnemann Hospital, being a Trustee in both for many years. As a member of the General Assembly he secured the passage of many important measures, among them being legislation looking toward the bettering of the currency and the banking system. He accumulated a large fortune, but lost most of it by the fire of 1871 and the panic of 1873. Died, in Chicago, March 17, 1890.

SCARRITT, Nathan, pioneer, was born in Connecticut, came to Edwardsville, Ill., in 1820, and, in 1821, located in Scarritt's Prairie, Madison County. His sons afterward became influential in business and Methodist church circles. Died, Dec. 12, 1847.

SCENERY, NATURAL. Notwithstanding the uniformity of surface which characterizes a country containing no mountain ranges, but which is made up largely of natural prairies, there are a number of localities in Illinois where scenery of a picturesque, and even bold and rugged character, may be found. One of the most striking of these features is produced by a spur or low range of hills from the Ozark Mountains of Missouri, projected across the southern part of the State from the vicinity of Grand

Tower in Jackson County, through the northern part of Union, and through portions of Williamson, Johnson, Saline, Pope and Hardin Counties. Grand Tower, the initial point in the western part of the State, is an isolated cliff of limestone, standing out in the channel of the Mississippi, and forming an island nearly 100 feet above low-water level. It has been a conspicuous landmark for navigators ever since the discovery of the Mississippi. "Fountain Bluff," a few miles above Grand Tower, is another conspicuous point immediately on the river bank, formed by some isolated hills about three miles long by a mile and a half wide, which have withstood the forces that excavated the valley now occupied by the Mississippi. About half a mile from the lower end of this hill, with a low valley between them, is a smaller eminence known as the "Devil's Bake Oven." The main chain of bluffs, known as the "Back Bone," is about five miles from the river, and rises to a height of nearly 700 feet above low-tide in the Gulf of Mexico, or more than 400 feet above the level of the river at Cairo. "Bald Knob" is a very prominent inland bluff promontory near Alta Pass on the line of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad, in the northern part of Union County, with an elevation above tide-water of 985 feet. The highest point in this range of hills is reached in the northeastern part of Pope County—the elevation at that point (as ascertained by Prof. Rolfe of the State University at Champaign) being 1,046 feet.—There is some striking scenery in the neighborhood of Grafton between Alton and the mouth of the Illinois, as well as some distance up the latter stream—though the landscape along the middle section of the Illinois is generally monotonous or only gently undulating, except at Peoria and a few other points, where bluffs rise to a considerable height. On the Upper Illinois, beginning at Peru, the scenery again becomes picturesque, including the celebrated "Starved Rock," the site of La Salle's Fort St. Louis (which see). This rock rises to a perpendicular height of about 125 feet from the surface of the river at the ordinary stage. On the opposite side of the river, about four miles below Ottawa, is "Buffalo Rock," an isolated ridge of rock about two miles long by forty to sixty rods wide, evidently once an island at a period when the Illinois River occupied the whole valley. Additional interest is given to both these localities by their association with early history. Deer Park, on the Vermilion River—some two miles from where it empties into the Illinois, just below "Starved

Rock"—is a peculiar grotto-like formation, caused by a ravine which enters the Vermilion at this point. Ascending this ravine from its mouth, for a quarter of a mile, between almost perpendicular walls, the road terminates abruptly at a dome-like overhanging rock which widens at this point to about 150 feet in diameter at the base, with a height of about 75 feet. A clear spring of water gushes from the base of the cliff, and, at certain seasons of the year, a beautiful water-fall pours from the cliffs into a little lake at the bottom of the chasm. There is much other striking scenery higher up, on both the Illinois and Fox Rivers.—A point which arrested the attention of the earliest explorers in this region was Mount Joliet, near the city of that name. It is first mentioned by St. Cosme in 1698, and has been variously known as Monjolly, Mont Jolie, Mount Juliet, and Mount Joliet. It had an elevation, in early times, of about 30 feet with a level top 1,300 by 225 feet. Prof. O. H. Marshall, in "The American Antiquarian," expresses the opinion that, originally, it was an island in the river, which, at a remote period, swept down the valley of the Des Plaines. Mount Joliet was a favorite rallying point of Illinois Indians, who were accustomed to hold their councils at its base.—The scenery along Rock River is not striking from its boldness, but it attracted the attention of early explorers by the picturesque beauty of its groves, undulating plains and sheets of water. The highest and most abrupt elevations are met with in Jo Daviess County, near the Wisconsin State line. Pilot Knob, a natural mound about three miles south of Galena and two miles from the Mississippi, has been a landmark well known to tourists and river men ever since the Upper Mississippi began to be navigated. Towering above the surrounding bluffs, it reaches an altitude of some 430 feet above the ordinary level of Fever River. A chain of some half dozen of these mounds extends some four or five miles in a northeasterly direction from Pilot Knob, Wadell's and Jackson's Mounds being conspicuous among them. There are also some castellated rocks around the city of Galena which are very striking. Charles Mound, belonging to the system already referred to, is believed to be the highest elevation in the State. It stands near the Wisconsin State line, and, according to Prof. Rolfe, has an altitude of 314 feet above the Illinois Central Railroad at Scales' Mound Station, and, 1,257 feet above the Gulf of Mexico.

SCHNEIDER, George, journalist and banker, was born at Pirmasens, Bavaria, Dec. 13, 1823. Being sentenced to death for his participation in the attempted rebellion of 1848, he escaped to America in 1849, going from New York to Cleveland, and afterwards to St. Louis. There, in connection with his brother, he established a German daily—"The New Era"—which was intensely anti-slavery and exerted a decided political influence, especially among persons of German birth. In 1851 he removed to Chicago, where he became editor of "The Staats Zeitung," in which he vigorously opposed the Kansas-Nebraska bill on its introduction by Senator Douglas. His attitude and articles gave such offense to the partisan friends of this measure, that "The Zeitung" was threatened with destruction by a mob in 1855. He early took advanced ground in opposition to slavery, and was a member of the convention of Anti-Nebraska editors, held at Decatur in 1856, and of the first Republican State Convention, held at Bloomington the same year, as well as of the National Republican Conventions of 1856 and 1860, participating in the nomination of both John C. Fremont and Abraham Lincoln for the Presidency. In 1861 he was a member of the Chicago Union Defense Committee, and was appointed, by Mr. Lincoln, Consul-General at Elsinore, Denmark. Returning to America in 1862, he disposed of his interest in "The Staats Zeitung" and was appointed the first Collector of Internal Revenue for the Chicago District. On retiring from this office he engaged in banking, subsequently becoming President of the National Bank of Illinois, with which he was associated for a quarter of a century. In 1877 President Hayes tendered him the ministry to Switzerland, which he declined. In 1880 he was chosen Presidential Elector for the State-at-large, also serving for a number of years as a member of the Republican State Central Committee.

SCHOFIELD, John McAllister, Major-General, was born in Chautauqua County, N. Y., Sept. 29, 1831; brought to Bristol, Kendall County, Ill., in 1843, and, two years later, removed to Freeport; graduated from the United States Military Academy, in 1853, as classmate of Generals McPherson and Sheridan; was assigned to the artillery service and served two years in Florida, after which he spent five years (1855-60) as an instructor at West Point. At the beginning of the Civil War he was on leave of absence, acting as Professor of Physics in Washington University at St. Louis, but, waiving his leave, he at once returned to duty and was appointed mustering officer; then, by permission of the War Department, entered the First Missouri Volunteers as Major, serving as Chief of Staff to General Lyon in the early battles in Missouri, including Wilson's Creek. His subsequent career included the organization of the Missouri State Militia (1862), command of the Army of the Frontier in Southwest Missouri, command of the Department of the Missouri and Ohio, participation in the Atlanta campaign and co-operation with Sherman in the capture of the rebel Gen. Joseph E. Johnston in North Carolina—his army having been transferred for this purpose, from Tennessee by way of Washington. After the close of the war he went on a special mission to Mexico to investigate the French occupation of that country; was commander of the Department of the Potomac, and served as Secretary of War, by appointment of President Johnson, from June, 1868, to March, 1869. On retiring from the Cabinet he was commissioned a full Major-General and held various Division and Department commands until 1886, when, on the death of General Sherman, he succeeded to the command of the Army, with headquarters at Washington. He was retired under the age limit, Sept. 29, 1893. His present home is in Washington.

SCHOLFIELD, John, jurist, was born in Clark County, Ill., in 1834; acquired the rudiments of an education in the common schools during boyhood, meanwhile gaining some knowledge of the higher branches through toilsome application to text-books without a preceptor. At the age of 20 he entered the law school at Louisville, Ky., graduating two years later, and beginning practice at Marshall, Ill. He defrayed his expenses at the law school from the proceeds of the sale of a small piece of land to which he had fallen heir. In 1856 he was elected State's Attorney, and, in 1860, was chosen to represent his county in the Legislature. After serving one term he returned to his professional career and succeeded in building up a profitable practice. In 1869-70 he represented Clark and Cumberland Counties in the Constitutional Convention, and, in 1870, became Solicitor for the Vandalia Railroad. In 1873 he was elected to fill the vacancy on the bench of the Supreme Court of the State for the Middle Grand Division, caused by the resignation of Judge Anthony Thornton, and re-elected without opposition in 1879 and 1888. Died, in office, Feb. 13, 1893. It has been claimed that President Cleveland would have tendered him the Chief Justiceship of the United States Supreme Court, had he not insistently declined to accept the honor.

SCHOOL-HOUSES, EARLY. The primitive school-houses of Illinois were built of logs, and were extremely rude, as regards both structure and furnishing. Indeed, the earliest pioneers rarely erected a special building to be used as a school-house. An old smoke-house, an abandoned dwelling, an old block-house, or the loft or one end of a settler's cabin not unfrequently answered the purpose, and the church and the court-house were often made to accommodate the school. When a school-house, as such, was to be built, the men of the district gathered at the site selected, bringing their axes and a few other tools, with their ox-teams, and devoted four or five days to constructing a house into which, perhaps, not a nail was driven. Trees were cut from the public lands, and, without hewing, fashioned into a cabin. Sixteen feet square was usually considered the proper dimensions. In the walls were cut two holes, one for a door to admit light and air, and the other for the open fireplace, from which rose a chimney, usually built of sticks and mud, on the outside. Danger of fire was averted by thickly lining the inside of the chimney with clay mortar. Sometimes, but only with great labor, stone was substituted for mortar made from the clay soil. The chimneys were always wide, seldom less than six feet, and sometimes extending across one entire end of the building. The fuel used was wood cut directly from the forest, frequently in its green state, dragged to the spot in the form of logs or entire trees to be cut by the older pupils in lengths suited to the width of the chimney. Occasionally there was no chimney, the fire, in some of the most primitive structures, being built on the earth and the smoke escaping through a hole in the roof. In such houses a long board was set up on the windward side, and shifted from side to side as the wind varied. Stones or logs answered for andirons, clapboards served as shovels, and no one complained of the lack of tongs. Roofs were made of roughly split clapboards, held in place by "weight poles" laid on the boards, and by supports starting from "eaves poles." The space between the logs, which constituted the walls of the building, was filled in with blocks of wood or "chinking," and the crevices, both exterior and interior, daubed over with clay mortar, in which straw was sometimes mixed to increase its adhesiveness. On one side of the structure one or two logs were sometimes cut out to allow the admission of light; and, as glass could not always be procured, rain and snow were excluded and light admitted by the use of greased paper. Over this space a board, attached to the outer wall by leather hinges, was sometimes suspended to keep out the storms. The placing of a glass window in a country school-house at Edwardsville, in 1824, was considered an important event. Ordinarily the floor was of the natural earth, although this was sometimes covered with a layer of clay, firmly packed down. Only the more pretentious school-houses had "puncheon floors"; i. e., floors made of split logs roughly hewn. Few had "ceilings" (so-called), the latter being usually made of clapboards, sometimes of bark, on which was spread earth, to keep out the cold. The seats were also of puncheons (without backs) supported on four legs made of pieces of poles inserted through augur holes. No one had a desk, except the advanced pupils who were learning to write. For their convenience a broader and smoother puncheon was fastened into the wall by wooden pins, in such a way that it would slope downward toward the pupil, the front being supported by a brace extending from the wall. When a pupil was writing he faced the wall. When he had finished this task, he "reversed himself" and faced the teacher and his schoolmates. These adjuncts completed the furnishings, with the exception of a split-bottomed chair for the teacher (who seldom had a desk) and a pail, or "piggin," of water, with a gourd for a drinking cup. Rough and uncouth as these structures were, they were evidences of public spirit and of appreciation of the advantages of education. They were built and maintained by mutual aid and sacrifice, and, in them, some of the great men of the State and Nation obtained that primary training which formed the foundation of their subsequent careers. (See Education.)

SCHUYLER COUNTY, located in the western portion of the State, has an area of 430 square miles, and was named for Gen. Philip Schuyler. The first American settlers arrived in 1823, and, among the earliest pioneers, were Calvin Hobart, William H. Taylor and Orris McCartney. The county was organized from a portion of Pike County, in 1825, the first Commissioners being Thomas Blair, Thomas McKee and Samuel Horney. The Commissioners appointed to locate the county-seat, selected a site in the eastern part of the county about one mile west of the present village of Pleasant View, to which the name of Beardstown was given, and where the earliest court was held, Judge John York Sawyer presiding, with Hart Fellows as Clerk, and Orris McCartney, Sheriff. This location, however, proving unsatisfactory, new Commissioners were appointed, who, in the early part of 1826, selected the present site of the city of Rushville, some five miles west of the point originally chosen. The new seat of justice was first called Rushton, in honor of Dr. Benjamin Rush, but the name was afterwards changed to Rushville. Ephraim Eggleston was the pioneer of Rushville. The surface of the county is rolling, and the region contains excellent farming land, which is well watered by the Illinois River and numerous creeks. Population (1890), 16,013; (1900), 16,129.

SCHWATKA, Frederick, Arctic explorer, was born at Galena, Ill., Sept. 29, 1849; graduated from the United States Military Academy in 1871, and was commissioned Second Lieutenant in the Third Cavalry, serving on the frontier until 1877, meantime studying law and medicine, being admitted to the bar in 1875, and graduating in medicine in 1876. Having his interest excited by reports of traces of Sir John Franklin's expedition, found by the Esquimaux, he obtained leave of absence in 1878, and, with Wm. H. Gilder as second in command, sailed from New York in the "Eothen," June 19, for King William's Land. The party returned, Sept. 22, 1880, having found and buried the skeletons of many of Franklin's party, besides discovering relics which tended to clear up the mystery of their fate. During this period he made a sledge journey of 3,251 miles. Again, in 1883, he headed an exploring expedition up the Yukon River. After a brief return to army duty he tendered his resignation in 1885, and the next year led a special expedition to Alaska, under the auspices of "The New York Times," later making a voyage of discovery among the Aleutian Islands. In 1889 he conducted an expedition to Northern Mexico, where he found many interesting relics of Aztec civilization and of the cliff and cave-dwellers. He received the Roquette Arctic Medal from the Geographical Society of Paris, and a medal from the Imperial Geographical Society of Russia; also published several volumes relating to his researches, under the titles, "Along Alaska's Great River"; "The Franklin Search Under Lieutenant Schwatka"; "Nimrod of the North"; and "Children of the Cold." Died, at Portland, Ore., Nov. 2, 1892.

SCOTT, James W., journalist, was born in Walworth County, Wis., June 26, 1849, the son of a printer, editor and publisher. While a boy he accompanied his father to Galena, where the latter established a newspaper, and where he learned the printer's trade. After graduating from the Galena high school, he entered Beloit College, but left at the end of his sophomore year. Going to New York, he became interested in floriculture, at the same time contributing short articles to horticultural periodicals. Later he was a compositor in Washington. His first newspaper venture was the publication of a weekly newspaper in Maryland in 1872. Returning to Illinois, conjointly with his father he started "The Industrial Press" at Galena, but, in 1875, removed to Chicago. There he purchased "The Daily National Hotel Reporter," from which he withdrew a few years later. In May, 1881, in conjunction with others, he organized The Chicago Herald Company, in which he ultimately secured a controlling interest. His journalistic and executive capability soon brought additional responsibilities. He was chosen President of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, of the Chicago Press Club, and of the United Press—the latter being an organization for the collection and dissemination of telegraphic news to journals throughout the United States and Canada. He was also conspicuously connected with the preliminary organization of the World's Columbian Exposition, and Chairman of the Press Committee. In 1893 he started an evening paper at Chicago, which he named "The Post." Early in 1895 he purchased "The Chicago Times," intending to consolidate it with "The Herald," but before the final consummation of his plans, he died suddenly, while on a business visit in New York, April 14, 1895.

SCOTT, John M., lawyer and jurist, was born in St. Clair County, Ill., August 1, 1824; his father being of Scotch-Irish descent and his mother a Virginian. His attendance upon district schools was supplemented by private tuition, and his early education was the best that the comparatively new country afforded. He read law at Belleville, was admitted to the bar in 1848, removed to McLean County, which continued to be his home for nearly fifty years. He served as County School Commissioner from 1849 to 1852, and, in the latter year, was elected County Judge. In 1856 he was an unsuccessful Republican candidate for the State Senate, frequently speaking from the same platform with Abraham Lincoln. In 1862 he was elected Judge of the Circuit Court of the Eighth Judicial Circuit, to succeed David Davis on the elevation of the latter to the bench of the United States Supreme Court, and was re-elected in 1867. In 1870, a new judicial election being rendered necessary by the adoption of the new Constitution, Judge Scott was chosen Justice of the Supreme Court for a term of nine years; was re-elected in 1879, but declined a renomination in 1888. The latter years of his life were devoted to his private affairs. Died, at Bloomington, Jan. 21, 1898. Shortly before his death Judge Scott published a volume containing a History of the Illinois Supreme Court, including brief sketches of the early occupants of the Supreme Court bench and early lawyers of the State.

SCOTT, Matthew Thompson, agriculturist and real-estate operator, was born at Lexington, Ky., Feb. 24, 1828; graduated at Centre College in 1846, then spent several years looking after his father's landed interests in Ohio, when he came to Illinois and invested largely in lands for himself and others. He laid out the town of Chenoa in 1856; lived in Springfield in 1870-72, when he removed to Bloomington, where he organized the McLean County Coal Company, remaining as its head until his death; was also the founder of "The Bloomington Bulletin," in 1878. Died, at Bloomington, May 21, 1891.

SCOTT, Owen, journalist and ex-Congressman, was born in Jackson Township, Effingham County, Ill., July 6, 1848, reared on a farm, and, after receiving a thorough common-school education, became a teacher, and was, for eight years, Superintendent of Schools for his native county. In January, 1874, he was admitted to the bar, but abandoned practice, ten years later, to engage in newspaper work. His first publication was "The Effingham Democrat," which he left to become proprietor and manager of "The Bloomington Bulletin." He was also publisher of "The Illinois Freemason," a monthly periodical. Before removing to Bloomington he filled the offices of City Attorney and Mayor of Effingham, and also served as Deputy Collector of Internal Revenue. In 1890 he was elected as a Democrat from the Fourteenth Illinois District to the Fifty-second Congress. In 1892 he was a candidate for re-election, but was defeated by his Republican opponent, Benjamin F. Funk. During the past few years, Mr. Scott has been editor of "The Bloomington Leader."

SCOTT COUNTY, lies in the western part of the State adjoining the Illinois River, and has an area of 248 square miles. The region was originally owned by the Kickapoo Indians, who ceded it to the Government by the treaty of Edwardsville, July 30, 1819. Six months later (in January, 1820) a party of Kentuckians settled near Lynnville (now in Morgan County), their names being Thomas Stevens, James Scott, Alfred Miller, Thomas Allen, John Scott and Adam Miller. Allen erected the first house in the county, John Scott the second and Adam Miller the third. About the same time came Stephen M. Umstead, whose wife was the first white woman in the county. Other pioneers were Jedediah Webster, Stephen Pierce, Joseph Densmore, Jesse Roberts, and Samuel Bogard. The country was rough and the conveniences of civilization few and remote. Settlers took their corn to Edwardsville to be ground, and went to Alton for their mail. Turbulence early showed itself, and, in 1822, a band of "Regulators" was organized from the best citizens, who meted out a rough and ready sort of justice, until 1830, occasionally shooting a desperado at his cabin door. Scott County was cut off from Morgan and organized in 1839. It contains good farming land, much of it being originally timbered, and it is well watered by the Illinois River and numerous small streams. Winchester is the county-seat. Population of the county (1880), 10,741; (1890), 10,304; (1900), 10,455.

SCRIPPS, John L., journalist, was born near Cape Girardeau, Mo., Feb. 18, 1818; was taken to Rushville, Ill., in childhood, and educated at McKendree College; studied law and came to Chicago in 1847, with the intention of practicing, but, a year or so later, bought a third interest in "The Chicago Tribune," which had been established during the previous year. In 1852 he withdrew from "The Tribune," and, in conjunction with William Bross (afterwards Lieutenant-Governor), established "The Daily Democratic Press," which was consolidated with "The Tribune" in July, 1858, under the name of "The Press and Tribune," Mr. Scripps remaining one of the editors of the new concern. In 1861 he was appointed, by Mr. Lincoln, Postmaster of the city of Chicago, serving until 1865, when, having sold his interest in "The Tribune," he engaged in the banking business as a member of the firm of Scripps, Preston & Kean. His health, however, soon showed signs of failure, and he died, Sept. 21, 1866, at Minneapolis, Minn., whither he had gone in hopes of restoration. Mr. Scripps was a finished and able writer who did much to elevate the standard of Chicago journalism.

SCROGGS, George, journalist, was born at Wilmington, Clinton County, Ohio, Oct. 7, 1842—the son of Dr. John W. Scroggs, who came to Champaign County, Ill., in 1851, and, in 1858, took charge of "The Central Illinois Gazette." In 1866-67 Dr. Scroggs was active in securing the location of the State University at Champaign, afterwards serving as a member of the first Board of Trustees of that institution. The son, at the age of 15, became an apprentice in his father's printing office, continuing until 1862, when he enlisted as a private in the One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, being promoted through the positions of Sergeant-Major and Second Lieutenant, and finally serving on the staffs of Gen. Jeff. C. Davis and Gen. James D. Morgan, but declining a commission as Adjutant of the Sixtieth Illinois. He participated in the battles of Perryville, Chickamauga, Mission Ridge and the march with Sherman to the sea, in the latter being severely wounded at Bentonville, N. C. He remained in the service until July, 1865, when he resigned; then entered the University at Champaign, later studied law, meanwhile writing for "The Champaign Gazette and Union," of which he finally became sole proprietor. In 1877 he was appointed an Aid-de-Camp on the staff of Governor Cullom, and, the following year, was elected to the Thirty-first General Assembly, but, before the close of the session (1879), received the appointment of United States Consul to Hamburg, Germany. He was compelled to surrender this position, a year later, on account of ill-health, and, returning home, died, Oct. 15, 1880.

SEATONVILLE, a village in Hall Township, Bureau County. Population (1900), 909.

SECRETARIES OF STATE. The following is a list of the Secretaries of State of Illinois from its admission into the Union down to the present time (1899), with the date and duration of the term of each incumbent: Elias Kent Kane, 1818-22; Samuel D. Lockwood, 1822-23; David Blackwell, 1823-24; Morris Birkbeck, October, 1824 to January, 1825 (failed of confirmation by the Senate); George Forquer, 1825-28; Alexander Pope Field, 1828-40; Stephen A. Douglas, 1840-41 (served three months—resigned to take a seat on the Supreme bench); Lyman Trumbull, 1841-43; Thompson Campbell, 1843-46; Horace S. Cooley, 1846-50; David L. Gregg, 1850-53; Alexander Starne, 1853-57; Ozias M. Hatch, 1857-65; Sharon Tyndale, 1865-69; Edward Rummel, 1869-73; George H. Harlow, 1873-81; Henry D. Dement, 1881-89; Isaac N. Pearson, 1889-93; William H. Hinrichsen, 1893-97; James A. Rose, 1897—. Nathaniel Pope and Joseph Phillips were the only Secretaries of Illinois during the Territorial period, the former serving from 1809 to 1816, and the latter from 1816 to 1818. Under the first Constitution (1818) the office of the Secretary of State was filled by appointment by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, but without limitation as to term of office. By the Constitution of 1848, and again by that of 1870, that officer was made elective by the people at the same time as the Governor, for a term of four years.

SECRET TREASONABLE SOCIETIES. Early in the War of the Rebellion there sprang up, at various points in the Northwest, organizations of persons disaffected toward the National Government. They were most numerous in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky and Missouri. At first they were known by such titles as "Circles of Honor," "Mutual Protective Associations," etc. But they had kindred aims and their members were soon united in one organization, styled "Knights of the Golden Circle." Its secrets having been partially disclosed, this body ceased to exist—or, it would be more correct to say, changed its name—being soon succeeded (1863) by an organization of similar character, called the "American Knights." These societies, as first formed, were rather political than military. The "American Knights" had more forcible aims, but this, in turn, was also exposed, and the order was re-organized under the name of "Sons of Liberty." The last named order started in Indiana, and, owing to its more perfect organization, rapidly spread over the Northwest, acquiring much more strength and influence than its predecessors had done. The ultimate authority of the organization was vested in a Supreme Council, whose officers were a "supreme commander," "secretary of state," and "treasurer." Each State represented formed a division, under a "deputy grand commander." States were divided into military districts, under "major-generals." County lodges were termed "temples." The order was virtually an officered army, and its aims were aggressive. It had its commander-in-chief, its brigades and its regiments. Three degrees were recognized, and the oaths of secrecy taken at each initiation surpassed, in binding force, either the oath of allegiance or an oath taken in a court of justice. The maintenance of slavery, and forcible opposition to a coercive policy by the Government in dealing with secession, were the pivotal doctrines of the order. Its methods and purposes were to discourage enlistments and resist a draft; to aid and protect deserters; to disseminate treasonable literature; to aid the Confederates in destroying Government property. Clement L. Vallandigham, the expatriated traitor, was at its head, and, in 1864, claimed that it had a numerical strength of 400,000, of whom 65,000 were in Illinois. Many overt acts were committed, but the organization, having been exposed and defeated in its objects, disbanded in 1865. (See Camp Douglas Conspiracy.)

SELBY, Paul, editor, was born in Pickaway County, Ohio, July 20, 1825; removed with his parents, in 1837, to Van Buren County, Iowa, but, at the age of 19, went to Southern Illinois, where he spent four years teaching, chiefly in Madison County. In 1848 he entered the preparatory department of Illinois College at Jacksonville, but left the institution during his junior year to assume the editorship of "The Morgan Journal," at Jacksonville, with which he remained until the fall of 1858, covering the period of the organization of the Republican party, in which "The Journal" took an active part. He was a member of the Anti-Nebraska (afterwards known as Republican) State Convention, which met at Springfield, in October, 1854 (the first ever held in the State), and, on Feb. 22, 1856, attended and presided over a conference of Anti-Nebraska editors of the State at Decatur, called to devise a line of policy for the newly organizing Republican party. (See Anti-Nebraska Editorial Convention.) This body appointed the first Republican State Central Committee and designated the date of the Bloomington Convention of May 29, following, which put in nomination the first Republican State ticket ever named in Illinois, which ticket was elected in the following November. (See Bloomington Convention.) In 1859 he prepared a pamphlet giving a history of the celebrated Canal scrip fraud, which was widely circulated. (See Canal Scrip Fraud.) Going South in the fall of 1859, he was engaged in teaching in the State of Louisiana until the last of June, 1861. Just two weeks before the fall of Fort Sumter he was denounced to his Southern neighbors as an "abolitionist" and falsely charged with having been connected with the "underground railroad," in letters from secession sympathizers in the North, whose personal and political enmity he had incurred while conducting a Republican paper in Illinois, some of whom referred to Jefferson Davis, Senator Slidell, of Louisiana, and other Southern leaders as vouchers for their characters. He at once invited an investigation by the Board of Trustees of the institution, of which he was the Principal, when that body—although composed, for the most part, of Southern men—on the basis of testimonials from prominent citizens of Jacksonville, and other evidence, adopted resolutions declaring the charges prompted by personal hostility, and delivered the letters of his accusers into his hands. Returning North with his family in July, 1861, he spent some nine months in the commissary and transportation branches of the service at Cairo and at Paducah, Ky. In July, 1862, he became associate editor of "The Illinois State Journal" at Springfield, remaining until November, 1865. The next six months were spent as Assistant Deputy Collector in the Custom House at New Orleans, but, returning North in June, 1866, he soon after became identified with the Chicago press, serving, first upon the staff of "The Evening Journal" and, later, on "The Republican." In May, 1868, he assumed the editorship of "The Quincy Whig," ultimately becoming part proprietor of that paper, but, in January, 1874, resumed his old place on "The State Journal," four years later becoming one of its proprietors. In 1880 he was appointed by President Hayes Postmaster of Springfield, was reappointed by Arthur in 1884, but resigned in 1886. Meanwhile he had sold his interest in "The Journal," but the following year organized a new company for its purchase, when he resumed his former position as editor. In 1889 he disposed of his holding in "The Journal," finally removing to Chicago, where he has been employed in literary work. In all he has been engaged in editorial work over thirty-five years, of which eighteen were spent upon "The State Journal." In 1860 Mr. Selby was complimented by his Alma Mater with the honorary degree of A. M. He has been twice married, first to Miss Erra Post, of Springfield, who died in November, 1865, leaving two daughters, and, in 1870, to Mrs. Mary J. Hitchcock, of Quincy, by whom he had two children, both of whom died in infancy.

SEMPLE, James, United States Senator, was born in Green County, Ky., Jan. 5, 1798, of Scotch descent; after learning the tanner's trade, studied law and emigrated to Illinois in 1818, removing to Missouri four years later, where he was admitted to the bar. Returning to Illinois in 1828, he began practice at Edwardsville, but later became a citizen of Alton. During the Black Hawk War he served as Brigadier-General. He was thrice elected to the lower house of the Legislature (1832, '34 and '36), and was Speaker during the last two terms. In 1833 he was elected Attorney-General by the Legislature, but served only until the following year, and, in 1837, was appointed Minister to Granada, South America. In 1843 he was appointed, and afterwards elected, United States Senator to fill the unexpired term of Samuel McRoberts, at the expiration of his term (1847) retiring to private life. He laid out the town of Elsau, in Jersey County, just south of which he owned a large estate on the Mississippi bluffs, where he died. Dec. 20, 1866.

SENECA (formerly Crotty), a village of La Salle County, situated on the Illinois River, the Illinois & Michigan Canal and the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific and the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railways, 13 miles east of Ottawa. It has a graded school, several churches, a bank, some manufactures, grain warehouses, coal mines, telephone system and one newspaper. Pop. (1890), 1,190; (1900), 1,036.

SENN, (Dr.) Nicholas, physician and surgeon, was born in the Canton of St. Gaul, Switzerland, Oct. 31, 1844; was brought to America at 8 years of age, his parents settling at Washington, Wis. He received a grammar school education at Fond du Lac, and, in 1864, began the study of medicine, graduating at the Chicago Medical College in 1868. After some eighteen months spent as resident physician in the Cook County Hospital, he began practice at Ashford, Wis., but removed to Milwaukee in 1874, where he became attending physician of the Milwaukee Hospital. In 1877 he visited Europe, graduated the following year from the University of Munich, and, on his return, became Professor of the Principles of Surgery and Surgical Pathology in Rush Medical College in Chicago—also has held the chair of the Practice of Surgery in the same institution. Dr. Senn has achieved great success and won an international reputation in the treatment of difficult cases of abdominal surgery. He is the author of a number of volumes on different branches of surgery which are recognized as standard authorities. A few years ago he purchased the extensive library of the late Dr. William Baum, Professor of Surgery in the University of Gottingen, which he presented to the Newberry Library of Chicago. In 1893, Dr. Senn was appointed Surgeon-General of the Illinois National Guard, and has also been President of the Association of Military Surgeons of the National Guard of the United States, besides being identified with various other medical bodies. Soon after the beginning of the Spanish-American War, he was appointed, by President McKinley, a Surgeon of Volunteers with the rank of Colonel, and rendered most efficient aid in the military branch of the service at Camp Chickamauga and in the Santiago campaign.

SEXTON, (Col.) James A., Commander-in-Chief of Grand Army of the Republic, was born in the city of Chicago, Jan. 5, 1844; in April, 1861, being then only a little over 17, enlisted as a private soldier under the first call for troops issued by President Lincoln; at the close of his term was appointed a Sergeant, with authority to recruit a company which afterwards was attached to the Fifty-first Volunteer Infantry. Later, he was transferred to the Sixty-seventh with the rank of Lieutenant, and, a few months after, to the Seventy-second with a commission as Captain of Company D, which he had recruited. As commander of his regiment, then constituting a part of the Seventeenth Army Corps, he participated in the battles of Columbia, Duck Creek, Spring Hill, Franklin and Nashville, and in the Nashville campaign. Both at Nashville and Franklin he was wounded, and again, at Spanish Fort, by a piece of shell which broke his leg. His regiment took part in seven battles and eleven skirmishes, and, while it went out 967 strong in officers and men, it returned with only 332, all told, although it had been recruited by 234 men. He was known as "The boy Captain," being only 18 years old when he received his first commission, and 21 when, after participating in the Mobile campaign, he was mustered out with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel. After the close of the war he engaged in planting in the South, purchasing a plantation in Lowndes County, Ala., but, in 1867, returned to Chicago, where he became a member of the firm of Cribben, Sexton & Co., stove manufacturers, from which he retired in 1898. In 1884 he served as Presidential Elector on the Republican ticket for the Fourth District, and, in 1889, was appointed, by President Harrison, Postmaster of the city of Chicago, serving over five years. In 1888 he was chosen Department Commander of the Grand Army of the Republic for the State of Illinois, and, ten years later, to the position of Commander-in-Chief of the order, which he held at the time of his death. He had also been, for a number of years, one of the Trustees of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Home at Quincy, and, during most of the time, President of the Board. Towards the close of the year 1898, he was appointed by President McKinley a member of the Commission to investigate the conduct of the Spanish-American War, but, before the Commission had concluded its labors, was taken with "the grip," which developed into pneumonia, from which he died in Washington, Feb. 5, 1899.

SEYMOUR, George Franklin, Protestant Episcopal Bishop, was born in New York City, Jan. 5, 1829; graduated from Columbia College in 1850, and from the General Theological Seminary (New York) in 1854. He received both minor and major orders at the hands of Bishop Potter, being made deacon in 1854 and ordained priest in 1855. For several years he was engaged in missionary work. During this period he was prominently identified with the founding of St. Stephen's College. After serving as rector in various parishes, in 1865 he was made Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the New York Seminary, and, ten years later, was chosen Dean of the institution, still retaining his professorship. Racine College conferred upon him the degree of S.T.D., in 1867, and Columbia that of LL.D. in 1878. In 1874 he was elected Bishop of Illinois, but failed of confirmation in the House of Deputies. Upon the erection of the new diocese of Springfield (1877) he accepted and was consecrated Bishop at Trinity Church, N. Y., June 11, 1878. He was a prominent member of the Third Pan-Anglican Council (London, 1885), and has done much to foster the growth and extend the influence of his church in his diocese.

SHABBONA, a village of De Kalb County, on the Iowa Division of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, 25 miles west of Aurora. Population (1890), 502; (1900), 587.

SHABONA (or Shabbona), an Ottawa Chief, was born near the Maumee River, in Ohio, about 1775, and served under Tecumseh from 1807 to the battle of the Thames in 1813. In 1810 he accompanied Tecumseh and Capt. Billy Caldwell (see Sauganash) to the homes of the Pottawatomies and other tribes within the present limits of Illinois and Wisconsin, to secure their co-operation in driving the white settlers out of the country. At the battle of the Thames, he was by the side of Tecumseh when he fell, and both he and Caldwell, losing faith in their British allies, soon after submitted to the United States through General Cass at Detroit. Shabona was opposed to Black Hawk in 1832, and did much to thwart the plans of the latter and aid the whites. Having married a daughter of a Pottawatomie chief, who had a village on the Illinois River east of the present city of Ottawa, he lived there for some time, but finally removed 25 miles north to Shabona's Grove in De Kalb County. Here he remained till 1837, when he removed to Western Missouri. Black Hawk's followers having a reservation near by, hostilities began between them, in which a son and nephew of Shabona were killed. He finally returned to his old home in Illinois, but found it occupied by whites, who drove him from the grove that bore his name. Some friends then bought for him twenty acres of land on Mazon Creek, near Morris, where he died, July 27, 1859. He is described as a noble specimen of his race. A life of him has been published by N. Matson (Chicago, 1878).

SHANNON, a village of Carroll County, on the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, 18 miles southwest of Freeport. It is an important trade center, has a bank and one newspaper. Population (1890), 591; (1900), 678.

SHAW, Aaron, former Congressman, born in Orange County, N. Y., in 1811; was educated at the Montgomery Academy, studied law and was admitted to the bar at Goshen in that State. In 1833 he removed to Lawrence County, Ill. He has held various important public offices. He was a member of the first Internal Improvement Convention of the State; was chosen State's Attorney by the Legislature, in which body he served two terms; served four years as Judge of the Twenty-fifth Judicial Circuit; was elected to the Thirty-fifth Congress in 1856, and to the Forty-eighth in 1882, as a Democrat.

SHAW, James, lawyer, jurist, was born in Ireland, May 3, 1832, brought to this country in infancy and grew up on a farm in Cass County, Ill.; graduated from Illinois College in 1857, and, after admission to the bar, began practice at Mount Carroll. In 1870 he was elected to the lower house of the General Assembly, being re-elected in 1872, '76 and '78. He was Speaker of the House during the session of 1877, and one of the Republican leaders on the floor during the succeeding session. In 1872 he was chosen a Presidential Elector, and, in 1891, to a seat on the Circuit bench from the Thirteenth Circuit, and, in 1897 was re-elected for the Fifteenth Circuit.

SHAWNEETOWN, a city and the county-seat of Gallatin County, on the Ohio River 120 miles from its mouth and at the terminus of the Shawneetown Divisions of the Baltimore & Ohio Northwestern and the Louisville & Nashville Railroads; is one of the oldest towns in the State, having been laid out in 1808, and noted for the number of prominent men who resided there at an early day. Coal is extensively mined in that section, and Shawneetown is one of the largest shipping points for lumber, coal and farm products between Cairo and Louisville, navigation being open the year round. Some manufacturing is done here; the city has several mills, a foundry and machine shop, two or three banks, several churches, good schools and two weekly papers. Since the disastrous floods of 1884 and 1898, Shawneetown has reconstructed its levee system on a substantial scale, which is now believed to furnish ample protection against the recurrence of similar disaster. Pop. (1900), 1,698; (1903, est.), 2,200.

SHEAHAN, James W., journalist, was born in Baltimore, Md., spent his early life, after reaching manhood, in Washington City as a Congressional Reporter, and, in 1847, reported the proceedings of the Illinois State Constitutional Convention at Springfield. Through the influence of Senator Douglas he was induced, in 1854, to accept the editorship of "The Young America" newspaper at Chicago, which was soon after changed to "The Chicago Times." Here he remained until the fall of 1860, when, "The Times" having been sold and consolidated with "The Herald," a Buchanan-Breckinridge organ, he established a new paper called "The Morning Post." This he made representative of the views of the "War Democrats" as against "The Times," which was opposed to the war. In May, 1865, he sold the plant of "The Post" and it became "The Chicago Republican" — now "Inter Ocean." A few months later, Mr. Sheahan accepted a position as chief writer on the editorial staff of "The Chicago Tribune," which he retained until his death, June 17, 1883.

SHEPFIELD, a prosperous village of Bureau County, on the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad, 44 miles east of Rock Island; has valuable coal mines, a bank and one newspaper. Population (1890), 993; (1900), 1,265.

SHELBY COUNTY, lies south of the center of the State, and contains an area of 776 square miles. The tide of immigration to this county was at first from Kentucky, Tennessee and North Carolina, although later it began to set in from the Northern States. The first cabin in the county was built by Simeon Wakefield on what is now the site of Williamsburg, first called Cold Spring. Joseph Daniel was the earliest settler in what is now Shelbyville, pre-empting ten acres, which he soon afterward sold to Joseph Oliver, the pioneer merchant of the county, and father of the first white child born within its limits. Other pioneers were Shimei Wakefield, Levi Casey and Samuel Hall. In lieu of hats the early settlers wore caps made of squirrel or coon skin, with the tails dangling at the backs, and he was regarded as well dressed who boasted a fringed buckskin shirt and trousers, with moccasins. The county was formed in 1827, and Shelbyville made the county-seat. Both county and town are named in honor of Governor Shelby, of Kentucky. County Judge Joseph Oliver held the first court in the cabin of Barnett Bone, and Judge Theophilus W. Smith presided over the first Circuit Court in 1828. Coal is abundant, and limestone and sandstone are also found. The surface is somewhat rolling and well wooded. The Little Wabash and Kaskaskia Rivers flow through the central and southeastern portions. The county lies in the very heart of the great corn belt of the State, and has excellent transportation facilities, being penetrated by four lines of railway. Population (1880), 30,270; (1890), 31,191; (1900), 32,126.

SHELBYVILLE, the county-seat and an incorporated city of Shelby County, on the Kaskaskia River and two lines of railway, 32 miles southeast of Decatur. Agriculture is carried on extensively, and there is considerable coal mining in the immediate vicinity. The city has two flouring mills, a handle factory, a creamery, one National and one State bank, one daily and four weekly papers and one monthly periodical, an Orphans' Home, ten churches, two graded schools, and a public library. Population (1890), 3,162; (1900), 3,546.

SHELDON, a village of Iroquois County, at the intersection of the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis and the Toledo, Peoria & Western Railways, 9 miles east of Watseka; has two banks and a newspaper. The region is agricultural. Pop. (1890), 910; (1900), 1,103.

SHELDON, Benjamin R., jurist, was born in Massachusetts in 1813, graduated from Williams College in 1831, studied law at the Yale Law School, and was admitted to practice in 1836. Emigrating to Illinois, he located temporarily at Hennepin, Putnam County, but soon removed to Galena, and finally to Rockford. In 1848 he was elected Circuit Judge of the Sixth Circuit, which afterwards being divided, he was assigned to the Fourteenth Circuit, remaining until 1870, when he was elected a Justice of the Supreme Court, presiding as Chief Justice in 1877. He was re-elected in 1879, but retired in 1888, being succeeded by the late Justice Bailey. Died, April 13, 1897.

SHEPPARD, Nathan, author and lecturer, was born in Baltimore, Md., Nov. 9, 1834; graduated at Rochester Theological Seminary in 1859; during the Civil War was special correspondent of "The New York World" and "The Chicago Journal" and "Tribune," and, during the Franco-German War, of "The Cincinnati Gazette;" also served as special American correspondent of "The London Times," and was a contributor to "Frazer's Magazine" and "Temple Bar." In 1873 he became a lecturer on Modern English Literature and Rhetoric in Chicago University and, four years later, accepted a similar position in Allegheny College; also spent four years in Europe, lecturing in the principal towns of Great Britain and Ireland. In 1884 he founded the "Athenaeum" at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., of which he was President until his death, early in 1888. "The Dickens Reader," "Character Readings from George Eliot" and "Essays of George Eliot" were among the volumes issued by him between 1881 and 1887. Died in New York City, Jan. 24, 1888.

SHERMAN, Alson Smith, early Chicago Mayor, was born at Barre, Vt., April 21, 1811, remaining there until 1836, when he came to Chicago and began business as a contractor and builder. Several years later he opened the first stone quarries at Lemont, Ill. Mr. Sherman spent many years in the service of Chicago as a public official. From 1840 to 1842 he was Captain of a company of militia; for two years served as Chief of the Fire Department, and was elected Alderman in 1842, serving again in 1846. In 1844, he was chosen Mayor, his administration being marked by the first extensive public improvements made in Chicago. After his term as Mayor he did much to secure a better water supply for the city. He was especially interested in promoting common school education, being for several years a member of the City School Board. He was Vice-President of the first Board of Trustees of Northwestern University. Retired from active pursuits, Mr. Sherman is now (1899) spending a serene old age at Waukegan, Ill.—Oren (Sherman) brother of the preceding and early Chicago merchant, was born at Barre, Vt., March 5, 1816. After spending several years in a mercantile house in Montpelier, Vt., at the age of twenty he came west, first to New Buffalo, Mich., and, in 1836, to Chicago, opening a dry-goods store there the next spring. With various partners Mr. Sherman continued in a general mercantile business until 1853, at the same time being extensively engaged in the provision trade, one-half the entire transactions in pork in the city passing through his hands. Next he engaged in developing stone quarries at Lemont, Ill.; also became extensively interested in the marble business, continuing in this until a few years after the panic of 1873, when he retired in consequence of a shock of paralysis. Died, in Chicago, Dec. 15, 1898.

SHERMAN, Elijah B., lawyer, was born at Fairfield, Vt., June 18, 1832—his family being distantly related to Roger Sherman, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, and the late Gen. W. T. Sherman; gained his education in the common schools and at Middlebury College, where he graduated in 1860; began teaching, but soon after enlisted as a private in the war for the Union; received a Lieutenant's commission, and served until captured on the eve of the battle at Antietam, when he was paroled and sent to Camp Douglas, Chicago, awaiting exchange. During this period he commenced reading law and, having resigned his commission, graduated from the law department of Chicago University in 1864. In 1876 he was elected Representative in the General Assembly from Cook County, and re-elected in 1878, and the following year appointed Master in Chancery of the United States District Court, a position which he still occupies. He has repeatedly been called upon to deliver addresses on political, literary and patriotic occasions, one of these being before the alumni of his alma mater, in 1884, when he was complimented with the degree of LL.D.

SHIELDS, James, soldier and United States Senator, was born in Ireland in 1810, emigrated to the United States at the age of sixteen, and began the practice of law at Kaskaskia in 1832. He was elected to the Legislature in 1836, and State Auditor in 1839. In 1843 he became a Judge of the Supreme Court of the State, and, in 1845, was made Commissioner of the General Land Office. In July, 1846, he was commissioned Brigadier-General in the Mexican War gaining the brevet of Major-General at Cerro-Gordo, where he was severely wounded. He was again wounded at Chapultepec, and mustered out in 1848. The same year he was appointed Governor of Oregon Territory. In 1849 the Democrats in the Illinois Legislature elected him Senator, and he resigned his office in Oregon. In 1856 he removed to Minnesota, and, in 1858, was chosen United States Senator from that State, his term expiring in 1859, when he established a residence in California. At the outbreak of the Civil War (1861) he was superintending a mine in Mexico, but at once hastened to Washington to tender his services to the Government. He was commissioned Brigadier-General, and served with distinction until March, 1863, when the effect of numerous wounds caused him to resign. He subsequently removed to Missouri, practicing law at Carrollton and serving in the Legislature of that State in 1874 and 1879. In the latter year he was elected United States Senator to fill out the unexpired term of Senator Boggy, who had died in office—serving only six weeks, but being the only man in the history of the country who filled the office of United States Senator from three different States. Died, at Ottumwa, Iowa, June 1, 1879.

SHIPMAN, a town of Macoupin County, on the Chicago & Alton Railway, 19 miles north-north-east of Alton and 14 miles southwest of Carlinville. Population (1890), 410; (1900), 396.

SHIPMAN, George E., M.D., physician and philanthropist, born in New York City, March 4, 1820; graduated at the University of New York in 1839, and took a course in the College of Physicians and Surgeons; practiced for a time at Peoria, Ill., but, in 1846, located in Chicago, where he assisted in organizing the first Homeopathic Hospital in that city, and, in 1855, was one of the first Trustees of Hahnemann College. In 1871 he established, in Chicago, the Foundlings' Home at his own expense, giving to it the latter years of his life. Died, Jan. 20, 1893.

SHOREY, Daniel Lewis, lawyer and philanthropist, was born at Jonesborough, Washington County, Maine, Jan. 31, 1824; educated at Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass., and at Dartmouth College, graduating from the latter in 1851; taught two years in Washington City, meanwhile reading law, afterwards taking a course at Dane Law School, Cambridge; was admitted to the bar in Boston in 1854, the next year locating at Davenport, Iowa, where he remained ten years. In 1865 he removed to Chicago, where he prosecuted his profession until 1890, when he retired. Mr. Shorey was prominent in the establishment of the Chicago Public Library, and a member of the first Library Board; was also a prominent member of the Chicago Literary Club, and was a Director in the new University of Chicago and deeply interested in its prosperity. Died, in Chicago, March 4, 1899.

SHORT, (Rev.) William F., clergyman and educator, was born in Ohio in 1829, brought to Morgan County, Ill., in childhood, and lived upon a farm until 20 years of age, when he entered McKendree College, spending his senior year, however, at Wesleyan University, Bloomington, where he graduated in 1854. He had meanwhile accepted a call to the Missouri Conference Seminary at Jackson, Mo.; where he remained three years, when he returned to Illinois, serving churches at Jacksonville and elsewhere, for a part of the time being Presiding Elder of the Jacksonville District. In 1875 he was elected President of Illinois Female College at Jacksonville, continuing in that position until 1893, when he was appointed Superintendent of the Illinois State Institution for the Blind at the same place, but resigned early in 1897. Dr. Short received the degree of D.D., conferred upon him by Ohio Wesleyan University.

SHOUP, George L., United States Senator, was born at Kittanning, Pa., June 15, 1836; came to Illinois in 1852, his father locating on a stock-farm near Galesburg; in 1859 removed to Colorado, where he engaged in mining and mercantile business until 1861, when he enlisted in a company of scouts, being advanced from the rank of First Lieutenant to the Colonelcy of the Third Colorado Cavalry, meanwhile serving as Delegate to the State Constitutional Convention of 1864. Retiring to private life, he again engaged in mercantile and mining business, first in Nevada and then in Idaho; served two terms in the Territorial Legislature of the latter, was appointed Territorial Governor in 1889 and, in 1890, was chosen the first Governor of the State, in October of the same year being elected to the United States Senate, and re-elected in 1895 for a second term, which ends in 1901. Senator Shoup is one of the few Western Senators who remained faithful to the regular Republican organization, during the political campaign of 1896.

SHOWALTER, John W., jurist, was born in Mason County, Ky., Feb. 8, 1844; resided some years in Scott County in that State, and was educated in the local schools, at Maysville and Ohio University, finally graduating at Yale College in 1867; came to Chicago in 1869, studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1870. He returned to Kentucky after the fire of 1871, but, in 1872, again came to Chicago and entered the employment of the firm of Moore & Caulfield, with whom he had been before the fire. In 1879 he became a member of the firm of Abbott, Oliver & Showalter (later, Oliver & Showalter), where he remained until his appointment as United States Circuit Judge, in March, 1895. Died, in Chicago, Dec. 12, 1898.

SHUMAN, Andrew, journalist and Lieutenant-Governor, was born at Manor, Lancaster County, Pa., Nov. 8, 1830. His father dying in 1837, he was reared by an uncle. At the age of 15 he became an apprentice in the office of "The Lancaster Union and Sentinel." A year later he accompanied his employer to Auburn, N.Y., working for two years on "The Daily Advertiser" of that city, then known as Governor Seward's "home organ." At the age of 18 he edited, published and distributed—during his leisure hours—a small weekly paper called "The Auburnian." At the conclusion of his apprenticeship he was employed, for a year or two, in editing and publishing "The Cayuga Chief," a temperance journal.

In 1851 he entered Hamilton College, but, before the completion of his junior year, consented, at the solicitation of friends of William H. Seward, to assume editorial control of "The Syracuse Daily Journal." In July, 1856, he came to Chicago, to accept an editorial position on "The Evening Journal" of that city, later becoming editor-in-chief and President of the Journal Company. From 1865 to 1870 (first by executive appointment and afterward by popular election) he was a Commissioner of the Illinois State Penitentiary at Joliet, resigning the office four years before the expiration of his term. In 1876 he was elected Lieutenant-Governor on the Republican ticket. Owing to declining health, he abandoned active journalistic work in 1888, dying in Chicago, May 5, 1890. His home during the latter years of his life was at Evanston. Governor Shuman was author of a romance entitled "Loves of a Lawyer," besides numerous addresses before literary, commercial and scientific associations.

SHUMWAY, Dorice Dwight, merchant, was born at Williamsburg, Worcester County, Mass., Sept. 28, 1813, descended from French Huguenot ancestry; came to Zanesville, Ohio, in 1837, and to Montgomery County, Ill., in 1841; married a daughter of Hiram Rountree, an early resident of Hillsboro, and, in 1843, located in Christian County; was engaged for a time in merchandising at Taylorville, but retired in 1858, thereafter giving his attention to a large landed estate. In 1846 he was chosen Representative in the General Assembly, served in the Constitutional Convention of 1847, and four years as County Judge of Christian County. Died, May 9, 1870.—Hiram P. (Shumway), eldest son of the preceding, was born in Montgomery County, Ill., June, 1842; spent his boyhood on a farm in Christian County and in his father's store at Taylorville; took an academy course and, in 1864, engaged in mercantile business; was Representative in the Twenty-eighth General Assembly and Senator in the Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh, afterwards removing to Springfield, where he engaged in the stone business.

SHURTLEFF COLLEGE, an institution located at Upper Alton, and the third established in Illinois. It was originally incorporated as the "Alton College" in 1831, under a special charter which was not accepted, but re-incorporated in 1835, in an "omnibus bill" with Illinois and McKendree Colleges. (See Early Colleges.) Its primal origin was a school at Rock Spring in St. Clair County, founded about 1824, by Rev. John M. Peck. This became the "Rock Spring Seminary" in 1827, and, about 1831, was united with an academy at Upper Alton. This was the nucleus of "Alton" (afterward "Shurtleff") College. As far as its denominational control is concerned, it has always been dominated by Baptist influence. Dr. Peck's original idea was to found a school for teaching theology and Biblical literature, but this project was at first inhibited by the State. Hubbard Loomis and John Russell were among the first instructors. Later, Dr. Benjamin Shurtleff donated the college $10,000, and the institution was named in his honor. College classes were not organized until 1840, and several years elapsed before a class graduated. Its endowment in 1898 was over $126,000, in addition to $125,000 worth of real and personal property. About 255 students were in attendance. Besides preparatory and collegiate departments, the college also maintains a theological school. It has a faculty of twenty instructors and is co-educational.

SIBLEY, a village of Ford County, on the Chicago Division of the Wabash Railway, 105 miles south-southwest of Chicago; has banks and a weekly newspaper. The district is agricultural. Population (1890), 404; (1900), 444.

SIBLEY, Joseph, lawyer and jurist, was born at Westfield, Mass., in 1818; learned the trade of a whip-maker and afterwards engaged in merchandising. In 1843 he began the study of law at Syracuse, N. Y., and, upon admission to the bar, came west, finally settling at Nauvoo, Hancock County. He maintained a neutral attitude during the Mormon troubles, thus giving offense to a section of the community. In 1847 he was an unsuccessful candidate for the Legislature, but was elected in 1850, and re-elected in 1852. In 1853 he removed to Warsaw, and, in 1855, was elected Judge of the Circuit Court, and re-elected in 1861, '67 and '73, being assigned to the bench of the Appellate Court of the Second District, in 1877. His residence, after 1865, was at Quincy, where he died, June 18, 1897.

SIDELL, a village of Vermillion County, on the Chicago & Eastern Illinois and Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Railroads; has a bank, electric light plant and a newspaper. Pop. (1900), 776.

SIDNEY, a village of Champaign County, on the main line of the Wabash Railway, at the junction of a branch to Champaign, 48 miles east-northeast of Decatur. It is in a farming district; has a bank and a newspaper. Population, (1900), 564.

SIM, (Dr.) William, pioneer physician, was born at Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1795, came to America in early manhood, and was the first physician to settle at Golconda, in Pope County, which he represented in the Fourth and Fifth General Assemblies (1824 and '28). He married a Miss Elizabeth Jack of Philadelphia, making the journey from Golconda to Philadelphia for that purpose on horseback. He had a family of five children, one son, Dr. Francis L. Sim, rising to distinction as a physician, and, for a time, being President of a Medical College at Memphis, Tenn. The elder Dr. Sim died at Golconda, in 1868.

SIMS, James, early legislator and Methodist preacher, was a native of South Carolina, but removed to Kentucky in early manhood, thence to St. Clair County, Ill., and, in 1820, to Sangamon County, where he was elected, in 1822, as the first Representative from that county in the Third General Assembly. At the succeeding session of the Legislature, he was one of those who voted against the Convention resolution designed to prepare the way for making Illinois a slave State. Mr. Sims resided for a time in Menard County, but finally removed to Morgan.

SINGER, Horace M., capitalist, was born in Schnectady, N. Y., Oct. 1, 1823; came to Chicago in 1836 and found employment on the Illinois & Michigan Canal, serving as superintendent of repairs upon the Canal until 1853. While thus employed he became one of the proprietors of the stone-quarries at Lemont, managed by the firm of Singer & Talcott until about 1890, when they became the property of the Western Stone Company. Originally a Democrat, he became a Republican during the Civil War, and served as a member of the Twenty-fifth General Assembly (1867) for Cook County, was elected County Commissioner in 1870, and was Chairman of the Republican County Central Committee in 1890. He was also associated with several financial institutions, being a director of the First National Bank and of the Auditorium Company of Chicago, and a member of the Union League and Calumet Clubs. Died, at Pasadena, Cal., Dec. 28, 1896.

SINGLETON, James W., Congressman, born at Paxton, Va., Nov. 23, 1811; was educated at the Winchester (Va.) Academy, and removed to Illinois in 1833, settling first at Mount Sterling, Brown County, and, some twenty years later, near Quincy. By profession he was a lawyer, and was prominent in political and commercial affairs. In his later years he devoted considerable attention to stock-raising. He was elected Brigadier-General of the Illinois militia in 1844, being identified to some extent with the "Mormon War"; was a member of the Constitutional Conventions of 1847 and 1862, served six terms in the Legislature, and was elected, on the Democratic ticket, to Congress in 1878, and again in 1880. In 1882 he ran as an independent Democrat, but was defeated by the regular nominee of his party, James M. Riggs. During the War of the Rebellion he was one of the most conspicuous leaders of the "peace party." He constructed the Quincy & Toledo (now part of the Wabash) and the Quincy, Alton & St. Louis (now part of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy) Railways, being President of both companies. His death occurred at Baltimore, Md., April 4, 1892.

SINNET, John S., pioneer, was born at Lexington, Ky., March 10, 1796; at three years of age, taken by his parents to Missouri; enlisted in the War of 1812, but, soon after the war, came to Illinois, and, about 1818, settled in what is now Christian County, locating on land constituting a part of the present city of Taylorville. In 1840 he removed to Tazewell County, dying there, Jan. 13, 1872.

SKINNER, Mark, jurist, was born at Manchester, Vt., Sept. 13, 1813; graduated from Middlebury College in 1833, studied law, and, in 1836, came to Chicago; was admitted to the bar in 1839, became City Attorney in 1840, later Master in Chancery for Cook County, and finally United States District Attorney under President Tyler. As member of the House Finance Committee in the Fifteenth General Assembly (1846-48), he aided influentially in securing the adoption of measures for refunding and paying the State debt. In 1851 he was elected Judge of the Court of Common Pleas (now Superior Court) of Cook County, but declined a re-election in 1853. Originally a Democrat, Judge Skinner was an ardent opponent of the Kansas-Nebraska Bill and a liberal supporter of the Government policy during the rebellion. He liberally aided the United States Sanitary Commission and was identified with all the leading charities of the city. Among the great business enterprises with which he was officially associated were the Galena & Chicago Union and the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railways (in each of which he was a Director), the Chicago Marine & Fire Insurance Company, the Gas-Light and Coke Company and others. Died, Sept. 16, 1887. Judge Skinner's only surviving son was killed in the trenches before Petersburg, the last year of the Civil War.

SKINNER, Otis Ainsworth, clergyman and author, was born at Royalton, Vt., July 3, 1807; taught for some time, became a Universalist minister, serving churches in Baltimore, Boston and New York between 1831 and 1857; then came to Elgin, Ill., was elected President of Lombard University at Galesburg, but the following year took charge of a church at Joliet. Died, at Naperville, Sept. 18, 1861. He wrote several volumes on religious topics, and, at different times, edited religious periodicals at Baltimore, Haverhill, Mass., and Boston.

SKINNER, Ozias C., lawyer and jurist, was born at Floyd, Oneida County, N. Y., in 1817; in 1836, removed to Illinois, settling in Peoria County, where he engaged in farming. In 1838 he began the study of law at Greenville, Ohio, and was admitted to the bar of that State in 1840. Eighteen months later he returned to Illinois, and began practice at Carthage, Hancock County, removing to Quincy in 1844. During the "Mormon War" he served as Aid-de-camp to Governor Ford. In 1848 he was elected to the lower house of the Sixteenth General Assembly, and, for a short time, served as Prosecuting Attorney for the district including Adams and Brown Counties. In 1851 he was elected Judge of the (then) Fifteenth Judicial Circuit, and, in 1855, succeeded Judge S. H. Treat on the Supreme bench, resigning this position in April, 1858, two months before the expiration of his term. He was a large land owner and had extensive agricultural interests. He built, and was the first President of the Carthage & Quincy Railroad, now a part of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy system. He was a prominent member of the Constitutional Convention of 1869, serving as Chairman of the Committee on Judiciary. Died in 1877.

SLADE, Charles, early Congressman; his early history, including date and place of birth, are unknown. In 1820 he was elected Representative from Washington County in the Second General Assembly, and, in 1826, was re-elected to the same body for Clinton and Washington. In 1832 he was elected one of the three Congressmen from Illinois, representing the First District. After attending the first session of the Twenty-third Congress, while on his way home, he was attacked with cholera, dying near Vincennes, Ind., July 11, 1834.

SLADE, James P., ex-State Superintendent of Public Instruction, was born at Westerlo, Albany County, N. Y., Feb. 9, 1837, and spent his boyhood with his parents on a farm, except while absent at school; in 1856 removed to Belleville, Ill., where he soon became connected with the public schools, serving for a number of years as Principal of the Belleville High School. While connected with the Belleville schools, he was elected County Superintendent, remaining in office some ten years; later had charge of Almira College at Greenville, Bond County, served six years as Superintendent of Schools at East St. Louis and, in 1878, was elected State Superintendent of Public Instruction as the nominee of the Republican party. On retirement from the office of State Superintendent, he resumed his place at the head of Almira College, but, for the past few years, has been Superintendent of Schools at East St. Louis.

SLAVERY AGITATION OF 1823-24. (See Slavery and Slave Laws.)

SLAVERY AND SLAVE LAWS. African slaves were first brought into the Illinois country by a Frenchman named Pierre F. Renault, about 1722. At that time the present State formed a part of Louisiana, and the traffic in slaves was regulated by French royal edicts. When Great Britain acquired the territory, at the close of the French and Indian War, the former subjects of France were guaranteed security for their persons "and effects," and no interference with slavery was attempted. Upon the conquest of Illinois by Virginia (see Clark, George Rogers), the French very generally professed allegiance to that commonwealth, and, in her deed of cession to the United States, Virginia expressly stipulated for the protection of the "rights and liberties" of the French citizens. This was construed as recognizing the right of property in negro slaves. Even the Ordinance of 1787, while prohibiting slavery in the Northwest Territory, preserved to the settlers (reference being especially made to the French and Canadians) "of the Kaskaskias, St. Vincents and neighboring villages, their laws and customs, now (then) in force, relative to the descent and conveyance of property." A conservative construction of this clause was, that while it prohibited the extension of slavery and the importation of slaves, the status of those who were at that time in involuntary servitude, and of their descendants, was left unchanged. There were those, however, who denied the constitutionality of the Ordinance in toto, on the ground that Congress had exceeded its powers in its passage. There was also a party which claimed that all children of slaves, born after 1787, were free from birth. In 1794 a convention was held at Vincennes, pursuant to a call from Governor Harrison, and a memorial to Congress was adopted, praying for the repeal—or, at least a modification—of the sixth clause of the Ordinance of 1787. The first Congressional Committee, to which this petition was referred, reported adversely upon it; but a second committee recommended the suspension of the operation of the clause in question for ten years. But no action was taken by the National Legislature, and, in 1807, a counter petition, extensively signed, was forwarded to that body, and Congress left the matter in statu quo. It is worthy of note that some of the most earnest opponents of the measure were Representatives from Southern Slave States, John Randolph, of Virginia, being one of them. The pro-slavery party in the State then prepared what is popularly known as the "Indenture Law," which was one of the first acts adopted by Governor Edwards and his Council, and was re-enacted by the first Territorial Legislature in 1812. It was entitled, "An Act relating to the Introduction of Negroes and Mulattoes into this Territory," and gave permission to bring slaves above 15 years of age into the State, when they might be registered and kept in servitude within certain limitations. Slaves under that age might also be brought in, registered, and held in bondage until they reached the age of 35, if males, and 30, if females. The issue of registered slaves were to serve their mother's master until the age of 30 or 28, according to sex. The effect of this legislation was rapidly to increase the number of slaves. The Constitution of 1818 prohibited the introduction of slavery thereafter—that is to say, after its adoption. In 1822 the slave-holding party, with their supporters, began to agitate the question of so amending the organic law as to make Illinois a slave State. To effect such a change the calling of a convention was necessary, and, for eighteen months, the struggle between "conventionists" and their opponents was bitter and fierce. The question was submitted to a popular vote on August 2, 1824, the result of the count showing 4,972 votes for such convention and 6,640 against. This decisive result settled the question of slave-holding in Illinois for all future time, though the existence of slavery in the State continued to be recognized by the National Census until 1840. The number, according to the census of 1810, was 168; in 1820 they had increased to 917. Then the number began to diminish, being reduced in 1830 to 747, and, in 1840 (the last census which shows any portion of the population held in bondage), it was 331.

Hooper Warren—who has been mentioned elsewhere as editor of "The Edwardsville Spectator," and a leading factor in securing the defeat of the scheme to make Illinois a slave State in 1822—in an article in the first number of "The Genius of Liberty" (January, 1841), speaking of that contest, says there were, at its beginning, only three papers in the State—"The Intelligencer" at Vandalia, "The Gazette" at Shawneetown, and "The Spectator" at Edwardsville. The first two of these, at the outset, favored the Convention scheme, while "The Spectator" opposed it. The management of the campaign on the part of the pro-slavery party was assigned to Emanuel J. West, Theophilus W. Smith and Oliver L. Kelly, and a paper was established by the name of "The Illinois Republican," with Smith as editor. Among the active opponents of the measure were George Churchill, Thomas Lippincott, Samuel D. Lockwood, Henry Starr (afterwards of Cincinnati), Rev. John M. Peck and Rev. James Lemen, of St. Clair County. Others who contributed to the cause were Daniel P. Cook, Morris Birkbeck, Dr. Hugh Steel and—Burton of Jackson County, Dr. Henry Perrine of Bond; William Leggett of Edwardsville (afterwards editor of "The New York Evening Post"), Benjamin Lundy (then of Missouri), David Blackwell and Rev. John Dew, of St. Clair County. Still others were Nathaniel Pope (Judge of the United States District Court), William B. Archer, William H. Brown and Benjamin Mills (of Vandalia), John Tillson, Dr. Horatio Newhall, George Forquer, Col. Thomas Mather, Thomas Ford, Judge David J. Baker, Charles W. Hunter and Henry H. Snow (of Alton). This testimony is of interest as coming from one who probably had more to do with defeating the scheme, with the exception of Gov. Edward Coles. Outside of the more elaborate Histories of Illinois, the most accurate and detailed accounts of this particular period are to be found in "Sketch of Edward Coles" by the late E. B. Washburne, and "Early Movement in Illinois for the Legalization of Slavery," an address before the Chicago Historical Society (1864), by Hon. William H. Brown, of Chicago. (See also, Coles, Edward; Warren, Hooper; Brown, William H.; Churchill, George; Lippincott, Thomas; and Newspapers, Early, elsewhere in this volume.)

SLOAN, Wesley, legislator and jurist, was born in Dorchester County, Md., Feb. 20, 1806. At the age of 17, having received a fair academic education, he accompanied his parents to Philadelphia, where, for a year, he was employed in a wholesale grocery. His father dying, he returned to Maryland and engaged in teaching, at the same time studying law, and being admitted to the bar in 1831. He came to Illinois in 1838, going first to Chicago, and afterward to Kaskaskia, finally settling at Golconda in 1839, which continued to be his home the remainder of his life. In 1848 he was elected to the Legislature, and re-elected in 1850, '52, and '56, serving three times as Chairman of the Judiciary Committee. He was one of the members of the first State Board of Education, created by Act of Feb. 18, 1857, and took a prominent part in the founding and organization of the State educational institutions. In 1857 he was elected to the bench of the Nineteenth Judicial Circuit, and re-elected in 1861, but declined a re-election for a third term. Died, Jan. 15, 1887.

SMITH, Abner, jurist, was born at Orange, Franklin County, Mass., August 4, 1843, of an old New England family, whose ancestors came to Massachusetts Colony about 1630; was educated in the public schools and at Middlebury College, Vt., graduating from the latter in 1866. After graduation he spent a year as a teacher in Newton Academy, at Shoreham, Vt., coming to Chicago in 1867, and entering upon the study of law, being admitted to the bar in 1868. The next twenty-five years were spent in the practice of his profession in Chicago, within that time serving as the attorney of several important corporations. In 1893 he was elected a Judge of the Circuit Court of Cook County, and re-elected in 1897, his term of service continuing until 1903.

SMITH, (Dr.) Charles Gilman, physician, was born at Exeter, N. H., Jan. 4, 1828, received his early education at Phillips Academy, in his native place, finally graduating from Harvard University in 1847. He soon after commenced the study of medicine in the Harvard Medical School, but completed his course at the University of Pennsylvania in 1851. After two years spent as attending physician of the Alms House in South Boston, Mass., in 1853 he came to Chicago, where he soon acquired an extensive practice. During the Civil War he was one of six physicians employed by the Government for the treatment of prisoners of war in hospital at Camp Douglas. In 1868 he visited Europe for the purpose of observing the management of hospitals in Germany, France and England, on his return being invited to lecture in the Woman's Medical College in Chicago, and also becoming consulting physician in the Women's and Children's Hospital, as well as in the Presbyterian Hospital—a position which he continued to occupy for the remainder of his life, gaining a wide reputation in the treatment of women's and children's diseases. Died, Jan. 10, 1894.

SMITH, David Allen, lawyer, was born near Richmond, Va., June 18, 1809; removed with his father, at an early day, to Pulaski, Tenn.; at 17 went to Courtland, Lawrence County, Ala., where he studied law with Judge Bramlette and began practice. His father, dying about 1831, left him the owner of a number of slaves whom, in 1837, he brought to Carlinville, Ill., and emancipated, giving bond that they should not become a charge to the State. In 1839 he removed to Jacksonville, where he practiced law until his death. Col. John J. Hardin was his partner at the time of his death on the battle-field of Buena Vista. Mr. Smith was a Trustee and generous patron of Illinois College, for a quarter of a century, but never held any political office. As a lawyer he was conscientious and faithful to the interests of his clients; as a citizen, liberal, public-spirited and patriotic. He contributed liberally to the support of the Government during the war for the Union. Died, at Anoka, Minn., July 13, 1865, where he had gone to accompany an invalid son. — Thomas William (Smith), eldest son of the preceding, born at Courtland, Ala., Sept. 27, 1832; died at Clearwater, Minn., Oct. 29, 1865. He graduated at Illinois College in 1852, studied law and served as Captain in the Tenth Illinois Volunteers, until, broken in health, he returned home to die.

SMITH, Dietrich C., ex-Congressman, was born at Ostfriesland, Hanover, April 4, 1840, in boyhood came to the United States, and, since 1849, has been a resident of Pekin, Tazewell County. In 1861 he enlisted in the Eighth Illinois Volunteers, was promoted to a Lieutenantcy, and, while so serving, was severely wounded at Shiloh. Later, he was attached to the One Hundred and Thirty-ninth Illinois Infantry, and was mustered out of service as Captain of Company C of that regiment. His business is that of banker and manufacturer, besides which he has had considerable experience in the construction and management of railroads. He was a member of the Thirtieth General Assembly, and, in 1880, was elected Representative in Congress from what was then the Thirteenth District, on the Republican ticket, defeating Adlai E. Stevenson, afterwards Vice-President. In 1882, his county (Tazewell) having been attached to the district for many years represented by Wm. M. Springer, he was defeated by the latter as a candidate for reelection.

SMITH, George, one of Chicago's pioneers and early bankers, was born in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, March 8, 1808. It was his early intention to study medicine, and he entered Aberdeen College with this end in view, but was forced to quit the institution at the end of two years, because of impaired vision. In 1833 he came to America, and, in 1834, settled in Chicago, where he resided until 1861, meanwhile spending one year in Scotland. He invested largely in real estate in Chicago and Wisconsin, at one time owning a considerable portion of the present site of Milwaukee. In 1837 he secured the charter for the Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance Company, whose headquarters were at Milwaukee. He was really the owner of the company, although Alexander Mitchell, of Milwaukee, was its Secretary. Under this charter Mr. Smith was able to issue $1,500,000 in certificates, which circulated freely as currency. In 1839 he founded Chicago's first private banking house. About 1843 he was interested in a storage and commission business in Chicago, with a Mr. Webster as partner. He was a Director in the old Galena & Chicago Union Railroad (now a part of the Chicago & Northwestern), and aided it, while in course of construction, by loans of money; was also a charter member of the Chicago Board of Trade, organized in 1848. In 1854, the State of Wisconsin having prohibited the circulation of the Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance certificates above mentioned, Mr. Smith sold out the company to his partner, Mitchell, and bought two Georgia bank charters, which, together, empowered him to issue $3,000,000 in currency. The notes were duly issued in Georgia, and put into circulation in Illinois, over the counter of George Smith & Co.'s Chicago bank. About 1856 Mr. Smith began winding up his affairs in Chicago, meanwhile spending most of his time in Scotland, but, returning in 1860, made extensive investments in railroad and other American securities, which netted him large profits. The amount of capital which he is reputed to have taken with him to his native land has been estimated at $10,000,000, though he retained considerable tracts of valuable lands in Wisconsin and about Chicago. Among those who were associated with him in business, either as employes or otherwise, and who have since been prominently identified with Chicago business affairs, were Hon. Charles B. Farwell, E. I. Tinkham (afterwards a prominent banker of Chicago), E. W. Willard, now of Newport, R. I., and others. Mr. Smith made several visits, during the last forty years, to the United States, but divided his time chiefly between Scotland (where he was the owner of a castle) and London. Died Oct. 7, 1899.

SMITH, George W., soldier, lawyer and State Treasurer, was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., Jan. 8, 1837. It was his intention to acquire a collegiate education, but his father's business embarrassments having compelled the abandonment of his studies, at 17 of years age he went to Arkansas and taught school for two years. In 1856 he returned to Albany and began the study of law, graduating from the law school in 1858. In October of that year he removed to Chicago, where he remained continuously in practice, with the exception of the years 1862-65, when he was serving in the Union army, and 1867-68, when he filled the office of State Treasurer. He was mustered into service, August 27, 1862, as a Captain in the Eighty-eighth Illinois Infantry—the second Board of Trade regiment. At Stone River, he was seriously wounded and captured. After four days' confinement, he was aided by a negro to escape. He made his way to the Union lines, but was granted leave of absence, being incapacitated for service. On his return to duty he joined his regiment in the Chattanooga campaign, and was officially complimented for his bravery at Gordon's Mills. At Mission Ridge he was again severely wounded, and was once more personally complimented in the official report. At Kenesaw Mountain (June 27, 1864), Capt. Smith commanded the regiment after the killing of Lieutenant-Colonel Chandler, and was promoted to a Lieutenant-Colonelcy for bravery on the field. He led the charge at Franklin, and was brevetted Colonel, and thanked by the commander for his gallant service. In the spring of 1865 he was brevetted Brigadier-General, and, in June following, was mustered out. Returning to Chicago, he resumed the practice of his profession, and gained a prominent position at the bar. In 1866 he was elected State Treasurer, and, after the expiration of his term, in January, 1869, held no public office. General Smith was, for many years, a Trustee of the Chicago Historical Society, and Vice-President of the Board. Died, in Chicago, Sept. 16, 1898.

SMITH, George W., lawyer and Congressman, was born in Putnam County, Ohio, August 18, 1846. When he was four years old, his father removed to Wayne County, Ill., settling on a farm. He attended the common schools and graduated from the literary department of McKendree College, at Lebanon, in 1868. In his youth he learned the trade of a blacksmith, but later determined to study law. After reading for a time at Fairfield, Ill., he entered the Law Department of the Bloomington (Ind.) University, graduating there in 1870. The same year he was admitted to the bar in Illinois, and has since practiced at Murphysboro. In 1880 he was a Republican Presidential Elector, and, in 1888, was elected a Republican Representative to Congress from the Twentieth Illinois District, and has been continuously re-elected, now (1899) serving his sixth consecutive term as Representative from the Twenty-second District.

SMITH, Giles Alexander, soldier, and Assistant Postmaster-General, was born in Jefferson County, N. Y., Sept. 29, 1829; engaged in dry-goods business in Cincinnati and Bloomington, Ill., in 1861 being proprietor of a hotel in the latter place; became a Captain in the Eighth Missouri Volunteers, was engaged at Forts Henry and Donelson, Shiloh and Corinth, and promoted Lieutenant-Colonel and Colonel in 1862; led his regiment on the first attack on Vicksburg, and was severely wounded at Arkansas Post; was promoted Brigadier-General in August, 1863, for gallant and meritorious conduct; led a brigade of the Fifteenth Army Corps at Chattanooga and Missionary Ridge, as also in the Atlanta campaign, and a division of the Seventeenth Corps in the "March to the Sea." After the surrender of Lee he was transferred to the Twenty-fifth Army Corps, became Major-General in 1865, and resigned in 1866, having declined a commission as Colonel in the regular army; about 1869 was appointed, by President Grant, Second Assistant Postmaster-General, but resigned on account of failing health in 1872. Died, at Bloomington, Nov. 8, 1876. General Smith was one of the founders of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee.

SMITH, Gustavus Adolphus, soldier, was born in Philadelphia, Dec. 26, 1830; at 16 joined two brothers who had located at Springfield, Ohio, where he learned the trade of a carriage-maker. In December, 1837, he arrived at Decatur, Ill., but soon after located at Springfield, where he resided some six years. Then, returning to Decatur, he devoted his attention to carriage manufacture, doing a large business with the South, but losing heavily as the result of the war. An original Whig, he became a Democrat on the dissolution of the Whig party, but early took ground in favor of the Union after the firing on Fort Sumter; was offered and accepted the colonelcy of the Thirty-fifth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, at the same time assisting Governor

Yates in the selection of Camp Butler as a camp of recruiting and instruction. Having been assigned to duty in Missouri, in the summer of 1861, he proceeded to Jefferson City, joined Fremont at Carthage in that State, and made a forced march to Springfield, afterwards taking part in the campaign in Arkansas and in the battle of Pea Ridge, where he had a horse shot under him and was severely (and, it was supposed, fatally) wounded, not recovering until 1868. Being compelled to return home, he received authority to raise an independent brigade, but was unable to accompany it to the field. In September, 1862, he was commissioned a Brigadier-General by President Lincoln, "for meritorious conduct," but was unable to enter into active service on account of his wound. Later, he was assigned to the command of a convalescent camp at Murfreesboro, Tenn., under Gen. George H. Thomas. In 1864 he took part in securing the second election of President Lincoln, and, in the early part of 1865, was commissioned by Governor Oglesby Colonel of a new regiment (the One Hundred and Fifty-fifth Illinois), but, on account of his wounds, was assigned to court-martial duty, remaining in the service until January, 1866, when he was mustered out with the brevet rank of Brigadier-General. During the second year of his service he was presented with a magnificent sword by the rank and file of his regiment (the Thirty-fifth), for brave and gallant conduct at Pea Ridge. After retiring from the army, he engaged in cotton planting in Alabama, but was not successful; in 1868, canvassed Alabama for General Grant for President, but declined a nomination in his own favor for Congress. In 1870 he was appointed, by General Grant, United States Collection and Disbursing Agent for the District of New Mexico, where he continued to reside.

SMITH, John Corson, soldier, ex-Lieutenant-Governor and ex-State Treasurer, was born in Philadelphia, Feb. 13, 1832. At the age of 16 he was apprenticed to a carpenter and builder. In 1854 he came to Chicago, and worked at his trade, for a time, but soon removed to Galena, where he finally engaged in business as a contractor. In 1862 he enlisted as a private in the Seventy-fourth Illinois Volunteers, but, having received authority from Governor Yates, raised a company, of which he was chosen Captain, and which was incorporated in the Ninety-sixth Illinois Infantry. Of this regiment he was soon elected Major. After a short service about Cincinnati, Ohio, and Covington and Newport, Ky., the Ninety-sixth was sent to the front, and took part (among other battles) in the second engagement at Fort Donelson and in the bloody fight at Franklin, Tenn. Later, Major Smith was assigned to staff duty under Generals Baird and Steedman, serving through the Tullahoma campaign, and participating in the battles of Chickamauga, Lookout Mountain and Missionary Ridge. Being promoted to a Lieutenant-Colonelcy, he rejoined his regiment, and was given command of a brigade. In the Atlanta campaign he served gallantly, taking a conspicuous part in its long series of bloody engagements, and being severely wounded at Kenesaw Mountain. In February, 1865, he was brevetted Colonel, and, in June, 1865, Brigadier-General. Soon after his return to Galena he was appointed Assistant Assessor of Internal Revenue, but was legislated out of office in 1872. In 1873 he removed to Chicago and embarked in business. In 1874-76 he was a member (and Secretary) of the Illinois Board of Commissioners to the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia. In 1875 he was appointed Chief Grain-Inspector at Chicago, and held the office for several years. In 1872 and '76 he was a delegate to the National Republican Conventions of those years, and, in 1878, was elected State Treasurer, as he was again in 1882. In 1884 he was elected Lieutenant-Governor, serving until 1889. He is a prominent Mason, Knight Templar and Odd Fellow, as well as a distinguished member of the Order of Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, and was prominently connected with the erection of the "Masonic Temple Building" in Chicago.

SMITH, John Eugene, soldier, was born in Switzerland, August 3, 1816, the son of an officer who had served under Napoleon, and after the downfall of the latter, emigrated to Philadelphia. The subject of this sketch received an academic education and became a jeweler; in 1861 entered the volunteer service as Colonel of the Forty-fifth Illinois Infantry; took part in the capture of Forts Henry and Donelson, in the battle of Shiloh and siege of Corinth; was promoted a Brigadier-General in November, 1862, and placed in command of a division in the Sixteenth Army Corps; led the Third Division of the Seventeenth Army Corps in the Vicksburg campaign, later being transferred to the Fifteenth, and taking part in the battle of Missionary Ridge and the Atlanta and Carolina campaigns of 1864-65. He received the brevet rank of Major-General of Volunteers in January, 1865, and, on his muster-out from the volunteer service, became Colonel of the Twenty-seventh United States Infantry, being transferred, in 1870, to the Fourteenth. In 1867 his services at Vicksburg and Savannah were further recognized by conferring upon him the brevets of Brigadier and Major-General in the regular army. In May, 1881, he was retired, afterwards residing in Chicago, where he died, Jan. 29, 1897.

SMITH, Joseph, the founder of the Mormon sect, was born at Sharon, Vt., Dec. 23, 1805. In 1815 his parents removed to Palmyra, N. Y., and still later to Manchester. He early showed a dreamy mental cast, and claimed to be able to locate stolen articles by means of a magic stone. In 1820 he claimed to have seen a vision, but his pretensions were ridiculed by his acquaintances. His story of the revelation of the golden plates by the angel Moroni, and of the latter's instructions to him, is well known. With the aid of Martin Harris and Oliver Cowdery he prepared the "Book of Mormon," alleging that he had deciphered it from heaven-sent characters, through the aid of miraculous spectacles. This was published in 1830. In later years Smith claimed to have received supplementary revelations, which so taxed the credulity of his followers that some of them apostatized. He also claimed supernatural power, such as exorcism, etc. He soon gained followers in considerable numbers, whom, in 1832, he led west, a part settling at Kirtland, Ohio, and the remainder in Jackson County, Mo. Driven out of Ohio five years later, the bulk of the sect found the way to their friends in Missouri, whence they were finally expelled after many conflicts with the authorities. Smith, with the other refugees, fled to Hancock County, Ill., founding the city of Nauvoo, which was incorporated in 1840. Here was begun, in the following year, the erection of a great temple, but again he aroused the hostility of the authorities, although soon wielding considerable political power. After various unsuccessful attempts to arrest him in 1844, Smith and a number of his followers were induced to surrender themselves under the promise of protection from violence and a fair trial. Having been taken to Carthage, the county-seat, all were discharged under recognizance to appear at court except Smith and his brother Hyrum, who were held under the new charge of "treason," and were placed in jail. So intense had been the feeling against the Mormons, that Governor Ford called out the militia to preserve the peace; but it is evident that the feeling among the latter was in sympathy with that of the populace. Most of the militia were disbanded after Smith's arrest, one company being left on duty at Carthage.

from whom only eight men were detailed to guard the jail. In this condition of affairs a mob of 150 disguised men, alleged to be from Warsaw, appeared before the jail on the evening of June 27, and, forcing the guards—who made only a feeble resistance,—Joseph Smith and his brother Hyrum were both shot down, while a friend, who had remained with them, was wounded. The fate of Smith undoubtedly went far to win for him the reputation of martyr, and give a new impulse to the Mormon faith. (See Mormons; Nauvoo.)

SMITH, Justin Almerin, D.D., clergyman and editor, was born at Ticonderoga, N. Y., Dec. 29, 1819, educated at New Hampton Literary and Theological Institute and Union College, graduating from the latter in 1843; served a year as Principal of the Union Academy at Bennington, Vt., followed by four years of pastoral work, when he assumed the pastorate of the First Baptist church at Rochester, N. Y., where he remained five years. Then (1853) he removed to Chicago to assume the editorship of "The Christian Times" (now "The Standard"), with which he was associated for the remainder of his life. Meanwhile he assisted in organizing three Baptist churches in Chicago, serving two of them as pastor for a considerable period; made an extended tour of Europe in 1869, attending the Vatican Council at Rome; was a Trustee and one of the founders of the old Chicago University, and Trustee and Lecturer of the Baptist Theological Seminary; was also the author of several religious works. Died, at Morgan Park, near Chicago, Feb. 4, 1896.

SMITH, Perry H., lawyer and politician, was born in Augusta, Oneida County, N. Y., March 18, 1828; entered Hamilton College at the age of 14 and graduated, second in his class, at 18; began reading law and was admitted to the bar on coming of age in 1849. Then, removing to Appleton, Wis., when 23 years of age he was elected a Judge, served later in both branches of the Legislature, and, in 1857, became Vice-President of the Chicago, St. Paul & Fond du Lac Railway, retaining the same position in the reorganized corporation when it became the Chicago & Northwestern. In 1856 Mr. Smith came to Chicago and resided there till his death, on Palm Sunday of 1885. He was prominent in railway circles and in the councils of the Democratic party, being the recognized representative of Mr. Tilden's interests in the Northwest in the campaign of 1876.

SMITH, Robert, Congressman and lawyer, was born at Petersburg, N. H., June 12, 1802; was educated and admitted to the bar in his native town, settled at Alton, Ill., in 1832, and engaged in practice. In 1836 he was elected to the General Assembly from Madison County, and re-elected in 1838. In 1842 he was elected to the Twenty-eighth Congress, and twice re-elected, serving three successive terms. During the Civil War he was commissioned Paymaster, with the rank of Major, and was stationed at St. Louis. He was largely interested in the construction of water power at Minneapolis, Minn., and also in railroad enterprises in Illinois. He was a prominent Mason and a public-spirited citizen. Died, at Alton, Dec. 20, 1867.

SMITH, Samuel Lisle, lawyer, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1817, and, belonging to a wealthy family, enjoyed superior educational advantages, taking a course in the Yale Law School at an age too early to admit of his receiving a degree. In 1836 he came to Illinois, to look after some landed interests of his father's in the vicinity of Peru. Returning east within the next two years, he obtained his diploma, and, again coming west, located in Chicago in 1838, and, for a time, occupied an office with the well-known law firm of Butterfield & Collins. In 1839 he was elected City Attorney and, at the great Whig meeting at Springfield, in June, 1840, was one of the principal speakers, establishing a reputation as one of the most brilliant campaign orators in the West. As an admirer of Henry Clay, he was active in the Presidential campaign of 1844, and was also a prominent speaker at the River and Harbor Convention at Chicago, in 1847. With a keen sense of humor, brilliant, witty and a master of repartee and invective, he achieved popularity, both at the bar and on the lecture platform, and had the promise of future success, which was unfortunately marred by his convivial habits. Died of cholera, in Chicago, July 30, 1854. Mr. Smith married the daughter of Dr. Potts, of Philadelphia, an eminent clergyman of the Episcopal Church.

SMITH, Sidney, jurist, was born in Washington County, N. Y., May 12, 1829; studied law and was admitted to the bar at Albion, in that State, in 1851; came to Chicago in 1856 and entered into partnership with Grant Goodrich and William W. Farwell, both of whom were afterwards elected to places on the bench—the first in the Superior, and the latter in the Circuit Court. In 1879 Judge Smith was elected to the Superior Court of Cook County, serving until 1885, when he became the attorney of the Chicago Board of Trade. He was the Republican candidate for Mayor, in opposition to Carter H. Harrison, in 1885, and is believed by many to have been honestly elected, though defeated on the face of the returns. A recount was ordered by the court, but so much delay was incurred and so many obstacles placed in the way of carrying the order into effect, that Judge Smith abandoned the contest in disgust, although making material gains as far as it had gone. During his professional career he was connected, as counsel, with some of the most important trials before the Chicago courts; was also one of the Directors of the Chicago Public Library, on its organization in 1871. Died suddenly, in Chicago, Oct. 6, 1898.

SMITH, Theophilus Washington, Judge and politician, was born in New York City, Sept. 28, 1784, served for a time in the United States navy, was a law student in the office of Aaron Burr, was admitted to the bar in his native State in 1805, and, in 1816, came west, finally locating at Edwardsville, where he soon became a prominent figure in early State history. In 1820 he was an unsuccessful candidate before the Legislature for the office of Attorney-General, being defeated by Samuel D. Lockwood, but was elected to the State Senate in 1822, serving four years. In 1823 he was one of the leaders of the "Conventionist" party, whose aim was to adopt a new Constitution which would legalize slavery in Illinois, during this period being the editor of the leading organ of the pro-slavery party. In 1825 he was elected one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, but resigned, Dec. 26, 1842. He was impeached in 1832 on charges alleging oppressive conduct, corruption, and other high misdemeanors in office, but secured a negative acquittal, a two-thirds vote being necessary to conviction. The vote in the Senate stood twelve for conviction (on a part of the charges) to ten for acquittal, four being excused from voting. During the Black Hawk War he served as Quartermaster-General on the Governor's staff. As a jurist, he was charged by his political opponents with being unable to divest himself of his partisan bias, and even with privately advising counsel, in political causes, of defects in the record, which they (the counsel) had not discovered. He was also a member of the first Board of Commissioners of the Illinois & Michigan Canal, appointed in 1823. Died, in Chicago, May 6, 1846.

SMITH, William Henry, journalist, Associated Press Manager, was born in Columbia County, N. Y., Dec. 1, 1833; at three years of age was taken by his parents to Ohio, where he enjoyed the best educational advantages that State at the time afforded. After completing his school course he began teaching, and, for a time, served as tutor in a Western college, but soon turned his attention to journalism, at first as assistant editor of a weekly publication at Cincinnati, still later becoming its editor, and, in 1855, city editor of "The Cincinnati Gazette," with which he was connected in a more responsible position at the beginning of the war, incidentally doing work upon "The Literary Review." His connection with a leading paper enabled him to exert a strong influence in support of the Government. This he used most faithfully in assisting to raise troops in the first years of the war, and, in 1863, in bringing forward and securing the election of John Brough as a Union candidate for Governor in opposition to Clement L. Vallandigham, the Democratic candidate. In 1864 he was nominated and elected Secretary of State, being re-elected two years later. After retiring from office he returned to journalism at Cincinnati, as editor of "The Evening Chronicle," from which he retired in 1870 to become Agent of the Western Associated Press, with headquarters, at first at Cleveland, but later at Chicago. His success in this line was demonstrated by the final union of the New York and Western Associated Press organizations under his management, continuing until 1893, when he retired. Mr. Smith was a strong personal friend of President Hayes, by whom he was appointed Collector of the Port of Chicago in 1877. While engaged in official duties he found time to do considerable literary work, having published, several years ago, "The St. Clair Papers," in two volumes, and a life of Charles Hammond, besides contributions to periodicals. After retiring from the management of the Associated Press, he was engaged upon a "History of American Politics" and a "Life of Rutherford B. Hayes," which are said to have been well advanced at the time of his death, which took place at his home, at Lake Forest, Ill., July 27, 1896.

SMITH, William M., merchant, stock-breeder and politician, was born near Frankfort, Ky., May 23, 1827; in 1846 accompanied his father's family to Lexington, McLean County, Ill., where they settled. A few years later he bought forty acres of government land, finally increasing his holdings to 800 acres, and becoming a breeder of fine stock. Still later he added to his agricultural pursuits the business of a merchant. Having early identified himself with the Republican party, he remained a firm adherent of its principles during the Civil War, and, while declining a commission tendered him by Governor Yates, devoted his time and means liberally to the recruiting and organization of regiments for service in the field, and procuring supplies for the sick and wounded. In 1866 he was elected to the lower house of the Legislature, and was re-elected in 1868 and '70, serving, during his last term, as Speaker. In 1877 he was appointed by Governor Cullom a member of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission, of which body he served as President until 1883. He was a man of remarkably genial temperament, liberal impulses, and wide popularity. Died, March 25, 1886.

SMITH, William Sooy, soldier and civil engineer, was born at Tarlton, Pickaway County, Ohio, July 22, 1830; graduated at Ohio University in 1849, and, at the United States Military Academy, in 1853, having among his classmates, at the latter, Generals McPherson, Schofield and Sheridan. Coming to Chicago the following year, he first found employment as an engineer on the Illinois Central Railroad, but later became assistant of Lieutenant-Colonel Graham in engineer service on the lakes; a year later took charge of a select school in Buffalo; in 1857 made the first surveys for the International Bridge at Niagara Falls, then went into the service of extensive locomotive and bridge-works at Trenton, N. J., in their interest making a visit to Cuba, and also superintending the construction of a bridge across the Savannah River. The war intervening, he returned North and was appointed Lieutenant-Colonel and assigned to duty as Assistant Adjutant-General at Camp Denison, Ohio, but, in June, 1862, was commissioned Colonel of the Thirteenth Ohio Volunteers, participating in the West Virginia campaigns, and later, at Shiloh and Perryville. In April, 1862, he was promoted Brigadier-General of volunteers, commanding divisions in the Army of the Ohio until the fall of 1862, when he joined Grant and took part in the Vicksburg campaign, as commander of the First Division of the Sixteenth Army Corps. Subsequently he was made Chief of the Cavalry Department, serving on the staffs of Grant and Sherman, until compelled to resign, in 1864, on account of impaired health. During the war General Smith rendered valuable service to the Union cause in great emergencies, by his knowledge of engineering. On retiring to private life he resumed his profession at Chicago, and since has been employed by the Government on some of its most stupendous works on the lakes, and has also planned several of the most important railroad bridges across the Missouri and other streams. He has been much consulted in reference to municipal engineering, and his name is connected with a number of the gigantic edifices in Chicago.

SMITHBORO, a village and railroad junction in Bond County, 3 miles east of Greenville. Population, 393; (1900), 314.

SNAPP, Henry, Congressman, born in Livingston County, N. Y., June 30, 1822, came to Illinois with his father when 11 years old, and, having read law at Joliet, was admitted to the bar in 1847. He practiced in Will County for twenty years before entering public life. In 1868 he was elected to the State Senate and occupied a seat in that body until his election, in 1871, to the Forty-second Congress, by the Republicans of the (then) Sixth Illinois District, as successor to B. C. Cook, who had resigned. Died, at Joliet, Nov. 23, 1895.

SNOW, Herman W., ex-Congressman, was born in La Porte County, Ind., July 3, 1836, but was reared in Kentucky, working upon a farm for five years, while yet in his minority becoming a resident of Illinois. For several years he was a school teacher, meanwhile studying law and being admitted to the bar. Early in the war he enlisted as a private in the One Hundred and Thirty-ninth Illinois Volunteers, rising to the rank of Captain. His term of service having expired, he re-enlisted in the One Hundred and Fifty-first Illinois, and was mustered out with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel. After the close of the war he resumed teaching at the Chicago High School, and later served in the General Assembly (1873-74) as Representative from Woodford County. In 1890 he was elected, as a Democrat, to represent the Ninth Illinois District in Congress, but was defeated by his Republican opponent in 1892.

SNOWHOOK, William B., first Collector of Customs at Chicago, was born in Ireland in 1804; at the age of eight years was brought to New York, where he learned the printer's trade, and worked for some time in the same office with Horace Greeley. At 16 he went back to Ireland, remaining two years, but, returning to the United States, began the study of law; was also employed on the Passaic Canal; in 1836, came to Chicago, and was soon after associated with William B. Ogden in a contract on the Illinois & Michigan Canal, which lasted until 1841. As early as 1840 he became prominent as a leader in the Democratic party, and, in 1846, received from President Polk an appointment as first Collector of Customs for Chicago (having previously served as Special Surveyor of the Port, while attached to the District of Detroit); in 1853, was re-appointed to the Collectorship by President Pierce, serving two years. During the "Mormon War" (1844) he organized and equipped, at his own expense, the Montgomery Guards, and was commissioned Colonel, but the disturbances were brought to an end before the order to march. From 1856 he devoted his attention chiefly to his practice, but, in 1862, was one of the Democrats of Chicago who took part in a movement to sustain the Government by stimulating enlistments; was also a member of the Convention which nominated Mr. Greeley for President in 1872. Died, in Chicago, May 5, 1882.

SNYDER, Adam Wilson, pioneer lawyer, and early Congressman, was born at Connellsville, Pa., Oct. 6, 1799. In early life he followed the occupation of wool-curling for a livelihood, attending school in the winter. In 1815, he emigrated to Columbus, Ohio, and afterwards settled in Ridge Prairie, St. Clair County, Ill. Being offered a situation in a wool-curling and fulling mill at Cahokia, he removed thither in 1817. He formed the friendship of Judge Jesse B. Thomas, and, through the latter's encouragement and aid, studied law and gained a solid professional, political, social and financial position. In 1830 he was elected State Senator from St. Clair County, and re-elected for two successive terms. He served through the Black Hawk War as private, Adjutant and Captain. In 1833 he removed to Belleville, and, in 1834, was defeated for Congress by Governor Reynolds, whom he, in turn, defeated in 1836. Two years later Reynolds again defeated him for the same position, and, in 1840, he was elected State Senator. In 1841 he was the Democratic nominee for Governor. The election was held in August, 1842, but, in May preceding, he died at his home in Belleville. His place on the ticket was filled by Thomas Ford, who was elected.—William H. (Snyder), son of the preceding, was born in St. Clair County, Ill., July 12, 1825; educated at McKendree College, studied law with Lieutenant-Governor Koerner, and was admitted to practice in 1845; also served for a time as Postmaster of the city of Belleville, and, during the Mexican War, as First-Lieutenant and Adjutant of the Fifth Illinois Volunteers. From 1850 to '54 he represented his county in the Legislature; in 1855 was appointed, by Governor Matteson, State's Attorney, which position he filled for two years. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the office of Secretary of State in 1856, and, in 1857, was elected a Judge of the Twenty-fourth Circuit, was re-elected for the Third Circuit in '73, '79 and '85. He was also a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1869-70. Died, at Belleville, Dec. 24, 1892.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' HOME, a State charitable institution, founded by act of the Legislature in 1885, and located at Quincy, Adams County. The object of its establishment was to provide a comfortable home for such disabled or dependent veterans of the United States land or naval forces as had honorably served during the Civil War. It was opened for the reception of veterans on March 3, 1887, the first cost of site and buildings having been about $350,000. The total number of inmates admitted up to June 30, 1894, was 2,813; the number in attendance during the two previous years 988, and the whole number present on Nov. 10, 1894, 1,088. The value of property at that time was $393,636.08. Considerable appropriations have been made for additions to the buildings at subsequent sessions of the Legislature. The General Government pays to the State $100 per year for each veteran supported at the Home.

SOLDIERS' ORPHANS' HOME, ILLINOIS, an institution, created by act of 1865, for the maintenance and education of children of deceased soldiers of the Civil War. An eighty-acre tract, one mile north of Normal, was selected as the site, and the first principal building was completed and opened for the admission of beneficiaries on June 1, 1869. Its first cost was $135,000, the site having been donated. Repairs and the construction of new buildings, from time to time, have considerably increased this sum. In 1875 the benefits of the institution were extended, by legislative enactment, to the children of soldiers who had died after the close of the war. The aggregate number of inmates, in 1894, was 572, of whom 323 were males and 249 females.

SOLDIERS' WIDOWS' HOME. Provision was made for the establishment of this institution by the Thirty-ninth General Assembly, in an act, approved, June 13, 1895, appropriating $20,000 for the purchase of a site, the erection of buildings and furnishing the same. It is designed for the reception and care of the mothers, wives, widows and daughters of such honorably discharged soldiers or sailors, in the United States service, as may have died, or may be physically or mentally unable to provide for the families naturally dependent on them, provided that such persons have been residents of the State for at least one year previous to admission, and are without means or ability for self-support.

The affairs of the Home are managed by a board of five trustees, of whom two are men and three women, the former to be members of the Grand Army of the Republic and of different political parties, and the latter members of the Women's Relief Corps of this State. The institution was located at Wilmington, occupying a site of seventeen acres, where it was formally opened in a house of eighteen rooms, March 11, 1896, with twenty-six applications for admittance. The plan contemplates an early enlargement by the erection of additional cottages.

SORENTO, a village of Bond County, at the intersection of the Jacksonville & St. Louis and the Toledo, St. Louis & Western Railways, 14 miles southeast of Litchfield; has a bank and a newspaper. Its interests are agricultural and mining. Pop. (1890), 538; (1900), 1,000.

SOULARD, James Gaston, pioneer, born of French ancestry in St. Louis, Mo., July 15, 1798; resided there until 1821, when, having married the daughter of a soldier of the Revolution, he received an appointment at Fort Snelling, near the present city of St. Paul, then under command of Col. Snelling, who was his wife's brother-in-law. The Fort was reached after a tedious journey by flat-boat and overland, late in the fall of 1821, his wife accompanying him. Three years later they returned to St. Louis, where, being an engineer, he was engaged for several years in surveying. In 1827 he removed with his family to Galena, for the next six years had charge of a store of the Gratiot Brothers, early business men of that locality. Towards the close of this period he received the appointment of County Recorder, also holding the position of County Surveyor and Postmaster of Galena at the same time. His later years were devoted to farming and horticulture, his death taking place, Sept. 17, 1878. Mr. Soular was probably the first man to engage in freighting between Galena and Chicago. "The Galena Advertiser" of Sept. 14, 1829, makes mention of a wagon-load of lead sent by him to Chicago, his team taking back a load of salt, the paper remarking: "This is the first wagon that has ever passed from the Mississippi River to Chicago." Great results were predicted from the exchange of commodities between the lake and the lead mine district. — Mrs. Eliza M. Hunt (Soular), wife of the preceding, was born at Detroit, Dec. 18, 1804, her father being Col. Thomas A. Hunt, who had taken part in the Battle of Bunker Hill and remained in the army until his death, at St. Louis, in 1807. His descendants have maintained their connection with the army ever since, a son being a prominent artillery officer at the Battle of Gettysburg. Mrs. Soular was married at St. Louis, in 1820, and survive her husband some sixteen years, dying at Galena August 11, 1894. She had resided in Galena nearly seventy years, and at the date of her death, in the 90th year of her age, she was that city's oldest resident.

SOUTH ELGIN, a village of Kane County, near the city of Elgin. Population (1900), 515.

SOUTHERN COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE, located at Albion, Edwards County, incorporated in 1891; had a faculty of ten teachers with 219 pupils (1897-98)—about equally male and female. Besides classical, scientific, normal, music and fine arts departments, instruction is given in preparatory studies and business education. Its property is valued at $16,500.

SOUTHERN HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE, located at Anna, Union County, founded by act of the Legislature in 1869. The original site comprised 290 acres and cost a little more than $22,000, of which one-fourth was donated by citizens of the county. The construction of buildings was begun in 1869, but it was not until March, 1875, that the north wing (the first completed) was ready for occupancy. Other portions were completed a year later. The Trustees purchased 160 additional acres in 1883. The first cost (up to September, 1876) was nearly $635,000. In 1881 one wing of the main building was destroyed by fire, and was subsequently rebuilt; the patients being, meanwhile, cared for in temporary wooden barracks. The total value of lands and buildings belonging to the State, June 30, 1894, was estimated at $728,580, and, of property of all sorts, at $833,700. The wooden barracks were later converted into a permanent ward, additions made to the main buildings, a detached building for the accommodation of 300 patients erected, numerous outbuildings put up and general improvements made. A second fire on the night of Jan. 3, 1895, destroyed a large part of the main building, inflicting a loss upon the State of $175,000. Provision was made for rebuilding by the Legislature of that year. The institution has capacity for about 750 patients.

SOUTHERN ILLINOIS NORMAL UNIVERSITY, established in 1869, and located, after competitive bidding, at Carbondale, which offered lands and bonds at first estimated to be of the value of $229,000, but which later depreciated, through shrinkage, to $75,000. Construction was commenced in May, 1870, and the first or main building was completed and appropriately dedicated in July, 1874. Its cost was $265,000, but it was destroyed by fire, Nov. 26, 1883. In February, 1887, a new structure was completed at a cost of $150,000. Two normal courses of instruction are given—classical and scientific—each extending over a period of four years. The conditions of admission require that the pupil shall be 16 years of age, and shall possess the qualifications enabling him to pass examination for a second-grade teacher's certificate. Those unable to do so may enter a preparatory department for six months. Pupils who pledge themselves to teach in the public schools, not less than half the time of their attendance at the University, receive free tuition with a small charge for incidentals, while others pay a tuition fee. The number of students in attendance for the year 1897-98 was 730, coming from forty-seven counties, chiefly in the southern half of the State, with representatives from eight other States. The teaching faculty for the same year consisted, besides the President, of sixteen instructors in the various departments, of whom five were ladies and eleven gentlemen.

SOUTHERN PENITENTIARY, THE, located near Chester, on the Mississippi River. Its erection was rendered necessary by the overcrowding of the Northern Penitentiary. (See Northern Penitentiary.) The law providing for its establishment required the Commissioners to select a site convenient of access, adjacent to stone and timber, and having a high elevation, with a never failing supply of water. In 1877, 122 acres were purchased at Chester, and the erection of buildings commenced. The first appropriation was of $200,000, and $300,000 was added in 1879. By March, 1878, 200 convicts were received, and their labor was utilized in the completion of the buildings, which are constructed upon approved modern principles. The prison receives convicts sent from the southern portion of the State, and has accommodation for some 1,200 prisoners. In connection with this penitentiary is an asylum for insane convicts, the erection of which was provided for by the Legislature in 1889.

SOUTH GROVE, a village of De Kalb County. Population (1890), 730.

SPALDING, Jesse, manufacturer. Collector of Customs and Street Railway President, was born at Athens, Bradford County, Pa., April 15, 1833; early commenced lumbering on the Susquehanna, and, at 23, began dealing on his own account. In 1857 he removed to Chicago, and soon after bought the property of the New York Lumber Company at the mouth of the Menominee River in Wisconsin, where, with different partners, and finally practically alone, he has carried on the business of lumber manufacture on a large scale ever since. In 1881 he was appointed, by President Arthur, Collector of the Port of Chicago, and, in 1889, received from President Harrison an appointment as one of the Government Directors of the Union Pacific Railway. Mr. Spalding was a zealous supporter of the Government during the War of the Rebellion and rendered valuable aid in the construction and equipment of Camp Douglas and the barracks at Chicago for the returning soldiers, receiving Auditor's warrants in payment, when no funds in the State treasury were available for the purpose. He was associated with William B. Ogden and others in the project for connecting Green Bay and Sturgeon Bay by a ship canal, which was completed in 1882, and, on the death of Mr. Ogden, succeeded to the Presidency of the Canal Company, serving until 1893, when the canal was turned over to the General Government. He has also been identified with many other public enterprises intimately connected with the development and prosperity of Chicago, and, in July, 1899, became President of the Chicago Union Traction Company, having control of the North and West Chicago Street Railway Systems.

SPALDING, John Lancaster, Catholic Bishop, was born in Lebanon, Ky., June 2, 1840; educated in the United States and in Europe, ordained a priest in the Catholic Church in 1863, and thereupon attached to the cathedral at Louisville, as assistant. In 1869 he organized a congregation of colored people, and built for their use the Church of St. Augustine, having been assigned to that parish as pastor. Soon afterwards he was appointed Secretary to the Bishop and made Chancellor of the Diocese. In 1873 he was transferred from Louisville to New York, where he was attached to the missionary parish of St. Michael's. He had, by this time, achieved no little fame as a pulpit orator and lecturer. When the diocese of Peoria, Ill., was created, in 1877, the choice of the Pope fell upon him for the new see, and he was consecrated Bishop, on May 1 of that year, by Cardinal McCloskey at New York. His administration has been characterized by both energy and success. He has devoted much attention to the subject of emigration, and has brought about the founding of many new settlements in the far West. He was also largely instrumental in bringing about the founding of the Catholic University at Washington. He is a frequent contributor to the reviews, and the author of a number of religious works.

SPANISH INVASION OF ILLINOIS. In the month of June, 1779, soon after the declaration of war between Spain and Great Britain, an expedition was organized in Canada, to attack the Spanish posts along the Mississippi. Simultaneously, a force was to be dispatched from Pensacola against New Orleans, then commanded by a young Spanish Colonel, Don Bernardo de Galvez. Secret instructions had been sent to British Commandants, all through the Western country, to co-operate with both expeditions. De Galvez, having learned of the scheme through intercepted letters, resolved to forestall the attack by becoming the assailant. At the head of a force of 670 men, he set out and captured Baton Rouge, Fort Manchac and Natchez, almost without opposition. The British in Canada, being ignorant of what had been going on in the South, in February following dispatched a force from Mackinac to support the expedition from Pensacola, and, incidentally, to subdue the American rebels while en route. Cahokia and Kaskaskia were contemplated points of attack, as well as the Spanish forts at St. Louis and St. Genevieve. This movement was planned by Capt. Patrick Sinclair, commandant at Mackinac, but Captain Hesse was placed in charge of the expedition, which numbered some 750 men, including a force of Indians led by a chief named Wabasha. The British arrived before St. Louis, early on the morning of May 26, 1780, taking the Spaniards by surprise. Meanwhile Col. George Rogers Clark, having been apprised of the project, arrived at Cahokia from the falls of the Ohio, twenty-four hours in advance of the attack, his presence and readiness to co-operate with the Spanish, no doubt, contributing to the defeat of the expedition. The accounts of what followed are conflicting, the number of killed on the St. Louis shore being variously estimated from seven or eight to sixty-eight—the last being the estimate of Capt. Sinclair in his official report. All agree, however, that the invading party was forced to retreat in great haste. Colonel Montgomery, who had been in command at Cahokia, with a force of 350 and a party of Spanish allies, pursued the retreating invaders as far as the Rock River, destroying many Indian villages on the way. This movement on the part of the British served as a pretext for an attempted reprisal, undertaken by the Spaniards, with the aid of a number of Cahokians, early in 1781. Starting early in January, this latter expedition crossed Illinois, with the design of attacking Fort St. Joseph, at the head of Lake Michigan, which had been captured from the English by Thomas Brady and afterwards retaken. The Spaniards were commanded by Don Eugenio Pourre, and supported by a force of Cahokians and Indians. The fort was easily taken and the British flag replaced by the ensign of Spain. The affair was regarded as of but little moment, at the time, the post being evacuated in a few days, and the Spaniards returning to St. Louis. Yet it led to serious international complications, and the "conquest" was seriously urged by the Spanish ministry as giving that country a right to the territory traversed. This claim was supported by France before the signing of the Treaty of Paris, but was defeated, through the combined efforts of Messrs. Jay, Franklin and Adams, the American Commissioners in charge of the peace negotiations with England.

SPARKS, (Capt.) David R., manufacturer and legislator, was born near Lanesville, Ind., in 1823; in 1836, removed with his parents to Macoupin County, Ill.; in 1847, enlisted for the Mexican War, crossing the plains to Santa Fe, New Mexico. In 1850 he made the overland trip to California, returning the next year by the Isthmus of Panama. In 1855 he engaged in the milling business at Staunton, Macoupin County, but, in 1860, made a third trip across the plains in search of gold, taking a quartz-mill which was erected near where Central City, Colo., now is, and which was the second steam-engine in that region. He returned home in time to vote for Stephen A. Douglas for President, the same year, but became a stalwart Republican, two weeks later, when the advocates of secession began to develop their policy after the election of Lincoln. In 1861 he enlisted, under the call for 500,000 volunteers following the first battle of Bull Run, and was commissioned a Captain in the Third Illinois Cavalry (Col. Eugene A. Carr), serving two and a half years, during which time he took part in several hard-fought battles, and being present at the fall of Vicksburg. At the end of his service he became associated with his former partner in the erection of a large flouring mill at Litchfield, but, in 1869, the firm bought an extensive flouring mill at Alton, of which he became the principal owner in 1881, and which has since been greatly enlarged and improved, until it is now one of the most extensive establishments of its kind in the State. Capt. Sparks was elected to the House of Representatives in 1888, and to the State Senate in 1894, serving in the sessions of 1895 and '97; was also strongly supported as a candidate for the Republican nomination for Congress in 1896.

SPARKS, William A. J., ex-Congressman, was born near New Albany, Ind., Nov. 19, 1828, at 8 years of age was brought by his parents to Illinois, and shortly afterwards left an orphan. Thrown on his own resources, he found work upon a farm, his attendance at the district schools being limited to the winter months. Later, he passed through McKendree College, supporting himself, meanwhile, by teaching, graduating in 1850. He read law with Judge Sidney Brees, and was admitted to the bar in 1851. His first public office was that of Receiver of the Land Office at Edwardsville, to which he was appointed by President Pierce in 1853, remaining until 1856, when he was chosen Presidential Elector on the Democratic ticket. The same year he was elected to the lower house of the General Assembly, and, in 1863-64, served in the State Senate for the unexpired term of James M. Rodgers, deceased. He was a delegate to the National Democratic Convention in 1868, and a Democratic Representative in Congress from 1875 to 1883. In 1885 he was appointed, by President Cleveland, Commissioner of the General Land Office in Washington, retiring, by resignation, in 1887. His home is at Carlyle.

SPEED, Joshua Fry, merchant, and intimate friend of Abraham Lincoln; was educated in the local schools and at St. Joseph's College, Bardstown, Ky., after which he spent some time in a wholesale mercantile establishment in Louisville. About 1835 he came to Springfield, Ill., where he engaged in the mercantile business, later becoming the intimate friend and associate of Abraham Lincoln, to whom he offered the privilege of sharing a room over his store, when Mr. Lincoln removed from New Salem to Springfield, in 1836. Mr. Speed returned to Kentucky in 1842, but the friendship with Mr. Lincoln, which was of a most devoted character, continued until the death of the latter. Having located in Jefferson County, Ky., Mr. Speed was elected to the Legislature in 1848, but was never again willing to accept office, though often solicited to do so. In 1851 he removed to Louisville, where he acquired a handsome fortune in the real-estate business. On the breaking out of the rebellion in 1861, he heartily embraced the cause of the Union, and, during the war, was entrusted with many delicate and important duties in the interest of the Government, by Mr. Lincoln, whom he frequently visited in Washington. His death occurred at Louisville, May 29, 1882.—James (Speed), an older brother of the preceding, was a prominent Unionist of Kentucky, and, after the war, a leading Republican of that State, serving as delegate to the National Republican Conventions of 1872 and 1876. In 1864 he was appointed Attorney-General by Mr. Lincoln and served until 1866, when he resigned on account of disagreement with President Johnson. He died in 1887, at the age of 75 years.

SPOON RIVER, rises in Bureau County, flows southward through Stark County into Peoria, thence southwest through Knox, and to the south and southeast, through Fulton County, entering the Illinois River opposite Havana. It is about 150 miles long.

SPRINGER, (Rev.) Francis, D.D., educator and Army Chaplain, born in Franklin County, Pa., March 19, 1810; was left an orphan at an early age, and educated at Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg; entered the Lutheran ministry in 1836, and, in 1839, removed to Springfield, Ill., where he preached and taught school; in 1847 became President of Hillsboro College, which, in 1852, was removed to Springfield and became Illinois State University, now known as Concordia Seminary. Later, he served for a time as Superintendent of Schools for the city of Springfield, but, in September, 1861, resigned to accept the Chaplaincy of the Tenth Illinois Cavalry; by successive resignations and appointments, held the positions of Chaplain of the First Arkansas Infantry (1863-64) and Post Chaplain at Fort Smith, Ark., serving in the latter position until April, 1867, when he was commissioned Chaplain of the United States Army. This position he resigned while stationed at Fort Harker, Kan., August 23, 1867. During a considerable part of his incumbency as Chaplain at Fort Smith, he acted as Agent of the Bureau of Refugees and Freedmen, performing important service in caring for non-combatants rendered homeless by the vicissitudes of war. After the war he served, for a time, as Superintendent of Schools for Montgomery County, Ill.; was instrumental in the founding of Carthage (Ill.) College, and was a member of its Board of Control at the time of his death. He was elected Chaplain of the Illinois House of Representatives at the session of the Thirty-fifth General Assembly (1887), and Chaplain of the Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons of Illinois for two consecutive terms (1890-'92). He was also member of the Stephenson Post, No. 30, G. A. R., at Springfield, and served as its Chaplain from January, 1884, to his death, which occurred at Springfield, Oct. 21, 1892.

SPRINGER, William McKendree, ex-Congressman, Justice of United States Court, was born in Sullivan County, Ind., May 30, 1836. In 1848 he removed with his parents to Jacksonville, Ill., was fitted for college in the public high school at Jacksonville, under the tuition of the late Dr. Bateman, entered Illinois College, remaining three years, when he removed to the Indiana State University, graduating there in 1858. The following year he was admitted to the bar and commenced practice in Logan County, but soon after removed to Springfield. He entered public life as Secretary of the Constitutional Convention of 1862. In 1871-'72 he represented Sangamon County in the Legislature, and, in 1874, was elected to Congress from the Thirteenth Illinois District as a Democrat. From that time until the close of the Fifty-third Congress (1895), he served in Congress continuously, and was recognized as one of the leaders of his party on the floor, being at the head of many important committees when that party was in the ascendancy, and a candidate for the Democratic caucus nomination for Speaker, in 1893. In 1894 he was the candidate of his party for Congress for the eleventh time, but was defeated by his Republican opponent, James A. Connolly. In 1895 President Cleveland appointed him United States District Judge for Indian Territory.

SPRINGFIELD, the State capital, and the county-seat of Sangamon County, situated five miles south of the Sangamon River and 185 miles southwest of Chicago; is an important railway center. The first settlement on the site of the present city was made by John Kelly in 1819. On April 10, 1821, it was selected, by the first Board of County Commissioners, as the temporary county-seat of Sangamon County, the organization of which had been authorized by act of the Legislature in January previous, and the name Springfield was given to it. In 1823 the selection was made permanent. The latter year the first sale of lands took place, the original site being entered by Pascal P. Enos, Elijah Iles and Thomas Cox. The town was platted about the same time, and the name "Calhoun" was given to a section in the northwest quarter of the present city—this being the "hey-day" of the South Carolina statesman's greatest popularity—but the change was not popularly accepted, and the new name was soon dropped. It was incorporated as a town, April 2, 1832, and as a city, April 6, 1840; and re-incorporated, under the general law in 1882. It was made the State capital by act of the Legislature, passed at the session of 1837, which went into effect, July 4, 1839, and the Legislature first convened there in December of the latter year. The general surface is flat, though there is rolling ground to the west. The city has excellent water-works, a paid fire-department, six banks, electric street railways, gas and electric lighting, commodious hotels, fine churches, numerous handsome residences, beautiful parks, thorough sewerage, and is one of the best paved and handsomest cities in the State. The city proper, in 1890, contained an area of four square miles, but has since been enlarged by the annexation of the following suburbs: North Springfield, April 7, 1891; West Springfield, Jan. 4, 1898; and South Springfield and the village of Laurel, April 5, 1898. These additions give to the present city an area of 5.84 square miles. The population of the original city, according to the census of 1880, was 19,743, and, in 1890, 24,963, while that of the annexed suburbs, at the last census, was 2,109—making a total of 29,072. The latest school census (1898) showed a total population of 33,375—population by census (1900), 34,159. Besides the State House, the city has a handsome United States Government Building for United States Court and post-office purposes, a county courthouse (the former State capitol), a city hall and (State) Executive Mansion. Springfield was the home of Abraham Lincoln. His former residence has been donated to the State, and his tomb and monument are in the beautiful Oak Ridge cemetery, adjoining the city. Springfield is an important coal-mining center, and has many important industries, notably a watch factory, rolling mills, and extensive manufactories of agricultural implements and furniture. It is also the permanent location of the State Fairs, for which extensive buildings have been erected on the Fair Grounds north of the city. There are three daily papers—two morning and one evening—published here, besides various other publications. Pop. (1900), 34,159.

SPRING VALLEY, an incorporated city in Bureau County, at intersection of the Chicago & Northwestern, the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific, the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, and the Toluca, Marquette & Northern Railways, 100 miles southwest of Chicago. It lies in a coal-mining region and has important manufacturing interests as well. It has two banks, electric street and interurban railways, and two newspapers. Population (1890), 3,837; (1900), 6,214.

ST. AGATHA'S SCHOOL, an institution for young ladies, at Springfield, under the patronage of the Bishop of the Episcopal Church, incorporated in 1889. It has a faculty of eight teachers giving instruction in the preparatory and higher branches, including music and fine arts. It reported fifty-five pupils in 1894, and real estate valued at $15,000.

ST. ALBAN'S ACADEMY, a boys' and young men's school at Knoxville, Ill., incorporated in 1896 under the auspices of the Episcopal Church; in 1898 had a faculty of seven teachers, with forty-five pupils, and property valued at $61,100, of which $54,000 was real estate. Instruction is given in the classical and scientific branches, besides music and preparatory studies.

ST. ANNE, a village of Kankakee County, at the crossing of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois and the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railways, 60 miles south of Chicago. The town has two banks, tile and brick factory, and a weekly newspaper. Pop. (1900), 1,000.

ST. CHARLES, a city in Kane County, on both sides of Fox River, at intersection of the Chicago & Northwestern and the Chicago Great Western Railways; 85 miles west of Chicago and 10 miles south of Elgin. The river furnishes excellent water-power, which is being utilized by a number of important manufacturing enterprises. The city is connected with Chicago and many towns in the Fox River valley by interurban electric trolley lines; is also the seat of the State Home for Boys. Pop. (1890), 1,690; (1900), 2,675.

ST. CLAIR, Arthur, first Governor of the Northwest Territory, was born of titled ancestry at Thurso, Scotland, in 1734; came to America in 1757 as an ensign, having purchased his commission, participated in the capture of Louisburg, Canada, in 1758, and fought under Wolfe at Quebec. In 1764 he settled in Pennsylvania, where he amassed a moderate fortune, and became prominent in public affairs. He served with distinction during the Revolutionary War, rising to the rank of Major-General, and succeeding General Gates in command at Ticonderoga, but, later, was censured by Washington for his hasty evacuation of the post, though finally vindicated by a military court. His Revolutionary record, however, was generally good, and even distinguished. He represented Pennsylvania in the Continental Congress, and presided over that body in 1787. He served as Governor of the Northwest Territory (including the present State of Illinois) from 1789 to 1802. As an executive he was not successful, being unpopular because of his arbitrariness. In November, 1791, he suffered a serious defeat by the Indians in the valley between the Miami and the Wabash. In this campaign he was badly crippled by the gout, and had to be carried on a litter; he was again vindicated by a Congressional investigation. His first visit to the Illinois Country was made in 1790, when he organized St. Clair County, which was named in his honor. In 1802 President Jefferson removed him from the governorship of Ohio Territory, of which he had continued to be the Governor after its separation from Indiana and Illinois. The remainder of his life was spent in comparative penury. Shortly before his decease, he was granted an annuity by the Pennsylvania Legislature and by Congress. Died, at Greensburg, Pa., August 31, 1818.

ST. CLAIR COUNTY, the first county organized within the territory comprised in the present State of Illinois—the whole region west of the Ohio River having been first placed under civil jurisdiction, under the name of "Illinois County," by an act of the Virginia House of Delegates, passed in October, 1778, a few months after the capture of Kaskaskia by Col. George Rogers Clark. (See Illinois; also Clark, George Rogers.) St. Clair County was finally set off by an order of Gov. Arthur St. Clair, on occasion of his first visit to the "Illinois Country," in April, 1790—more than two years after his assumption of the duties of Governor of the Northwest Territory, which then comprehended the "Illinois Country" as well as the whole region within the present States of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan and Wisconsin. Governor St. Clair's order, which bears date, April 27, 1790, defines the boundaries of the new county—which took his own name—as follows: "Beginning at the mouth of the Little Michillimackinack River, running thence southerly in a direct line to the mouth of the little river above Fort Massac upon the Ohio River; thence with the said river to its junction with the Mississippi; thence up the Mississippi to the mouth of the Illinois, and so up the Illinois River to the place of beginning, with all the adjacent islands of said rivers, Illinois and Mississippi." The "Little Michillimackanack," the initial point mentioned in this description—also variously spelled "Makina" and "Mackinaw," the latter being the name by which the stream is now known—empties into the Illinois River on the south side a few miles below Pekin, in Tazewell County. The boundaries of St. Clair County, as given by Gov. St. Clair, indicate the imperfect knowledge of the topography of the "Illinois Country" existing in that day, as a line drawn south from the mouth of the Mackinaw River, instead of reaching the Ohio "above Fort Massac," would have followed the longitude of the present city of Springfield, striking the Mississippi about the northwestern corner of Jackson County, twenty-five miles west of the mouth of the Ohio. The object of Governor St. Clair's order was, of course, to include the settled portions of the Illinois Country in the new county; and, if it had had the effect intended, the eastern border of the county would have followed a line some fifty miles farther eastward, along the eastern border of Marion, Jefferson, Franklin, Williamson and Johnson Counties, reaching the Ohio River about the present site of Metropolis City in Massac County, and embracing about one-half of the area of the present State of Illinois. For all practical purposes it embraced all the Illinois Country, as it included that portion in which the white settlements were located. (See St. Clair, Arthur; also Illinois Country.) The early records of St. Clair County are in the French language; its first settlers and its early civilization were French, and the first church to inculcate the doctrine of Christianity was the Roman Catholic. The first proceedings in court under the common law were had in 1796. The first Justices of the Peace were appointed in 1807, and, as there was no penitentiary, the whipping-post and pillory played an important part in the code of penalties, these punishments being impartially meted out as late as the time of Judge (afterwards Governor) Reynolds, to "the lame, the halt and the blind," for such offenses as the larceny of a silk handkerchief. At first three places—Cahokia, Prairie du Rocher and Kaskaskia—were named as county-seats by Governor St. Clair; but Randolph County having been set off in 1895, Cahokia became the county-seat of the older county, so remaining until 1813, when Belleville was selected as the seat of justice. At that time it was a mere cornfield owned by George Blair, although settlements had previously been established in Ridge Prairie and at Badgley. Judge Jesse B. Thomas held his first court in a log-cabin, but a rude court house was erected in 1814, and, the same year, George E. Blair established a hostelery, Joseph Kerr opened a store, and, in 1817, additional improvements were inaugurated by Daniel Murray and others, from Baltimore. John H. Dennis and the Mitchells and Wests (from Virginia) settled soon afterward, becoming farmers and mechanics. Belleville was incorporated in 1819. In 1825 Governor Edwards bought the large landed interests of Etienne Personeau, a large French land-owner, ordered a new survey of the town and infused fresh life into its development. Settlers began to arrive in large numbers, mainly Virginians, who brought with them their slaves, the right to hold which was, for many years, a fruitful and perennial source of strife. Emigrants from Germany began to arrive at an early day, and now a large proportion of the population of Belleville and St. Clair County is made up of that nationality. The county, as at present organized, lies on the western border of the south half of the State, immediately opposite St. Louis, and comprises some 680 square miles. Three-fourths of it are underlaid by a vein of coal, six to eight feet thick, and about one hundred feet below the surface. Considerable wheat is raised. The principal towns are Belleville, East St. Louis, Lebanon and Mascoutah. Population of the county (1880), 61,806; (1890), 66,571; (1900), 86,685.

ST. JOHN, an incorporated village of Perry County, on the Illinois Central Railway, one mile north of Duquoin. Coal is mined and salt manufactured here. Population about 500.

ST. JOSEPH, a village of Champaign County, on the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway, 10 miles east of Champaign; has inter-urban railroad connection. Pop. (1900), 637.

ST. JOSEPH'S HOSPITAL, (Chicago), founded in 1860, by the Sisters of Charity. Having been destroyed in the fire of 1871, it was rebuilt in the following year. In 1892 it was reconstructed, enlarged and made thoroughly modern in its appointments. It can accommodate about 250 patients. The Sisters attend to the nursing, and conduct the domestic and financial affairs. The medical staff comprises ten physicians and surgeons, among whom are some of the most eminent in Chicago.

ST. LOUIS, ALTON & CHICAGO RAILROAD.
(See Chicago & Alton Railroad.)

ST. LOUIS, ALTON & SPRINGFIELD RAILROAD. (See St. Louis, Chicago & St. Paul Railroad.)

ST. LOUIS, ALTON & TERRE HAUTE RAILROAD, a corporation formerly operating an extensive system of railroads in Illinois. The Terre Haute & Alton Railroad Company (the original corporation) was chartered in January, 1851, work begun in 1852, and the main line from Terre Haute to Alton (172.5 miles) completed, March 1, 1856. The Belleville & Illinoistown branch (from Belleville to East St. Louis) was chartered in 1852, and completed between the points named in the title, in the fall of 1854. This corporation secured authority to construct an extension from Illinoistown (now East St. Louis) to Alton, which was completed in October, 1856, giving the first railroad connection between Alton & St. Louis. Simultaneously with this, these two roads (the Terre Haute & Alton and the Belleville & Illinoistown) were consolidated under a single charter by special act of the Legislature in February, 1854, the consolidated line taking the name of the Terre Haute, Alton & St. Louis Railroad. Subsequently the road became financially embarrassed, was sold under foreclosure and reorganized, in 1862, under the name of the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad. June 1, 1867, the main line (from Terre Haute to St. Louis) was leased for ninety-nine years to the Indianapolis & St. Louis Railway Company (an Indiana corporation) guaranteed by certain other lines, but the lease was subsequently broken by the insolvency of the lessee and some of the guarantors. The Indianapolis & St. Louis went into the hands of a receiver in 1882, and was sold under foreclosure, in July of the same year, its interest being absorbed by the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway, by which the main line is now operated. The properties officially reported as remaining in the hands of the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad, June 30, 1895, beside the Belleville Branch (14.40 miles), included the following leased and subsidiary lines: Belleville & Southern Illinois—"Cairo Short Line" (56.40 miles); Belleville & Eldorado, (50.20 miles); Belleville & Carondelet (17.30 miles); St. Louis Southern and branches (47.27 miles), and Chicago, St. Louis & Paducah Railway (53.50 miles). All these have been leased, since the close of the fiscal year 1895, to the Illinois Central. (For sketches of these several roads see headings of each.)

ST. LOUIS, CHICAGO & ST. PAUL RAILROAD, (Bluff Line), a line running from Springfield to Granite City, Ill., (opposite St. Louis), 102.1 miles, with a branch from Lock Haven to Grafton, Ill., 8.4 miles—total length of line in Illinois, 110.5 miles. The track is of standard gauge, laid with 56 to 70-pound steel rails.—(HISTORY.) The road was originally incorporated under the name of the St. Louis, Jerseyville & Springfield Railroad, built from Bates to Grafton in 1882, and absorbed by the Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway Company; was surrendered by the receivers of the latter in 1886, and passed under the control of the bond-holders, by whom it was transferred to a corporation known as the St. Louis & Central Illinois Railroad Company. In June, 1887, the St. Louis, Alton & Springfield Railroad Company was organized, with power to build extensions from Newbern to Alton, and from Bates to Springfield, which was done. In October, 1890, a receiver was appointed, followed by a reorganization under the present name (St. Louis, Chicago & St. Paul). Default was made on the interest and, in June following, it was again placed in the hands of receivers, by whom it was operated until 1898. The total earnings and income for the fiscal year 1897-98 were $318,815, operating expenses, $373,270; total capitalization, $4,853,526, of which, $1,500,000 was in the form of stock and $1,235,000 in income bonds.

ST. LOUIS, INDIANAPOLIS & EASTERN RAILROAD, a railroad line 90 miles in length, extending from Switz City, Ind., to Effingham, Ill.—56 miles being within the State of Illinois. It is of standard gauge and the track laid chiefly with iron rails.—(HISTORY.) The original corporation was chartered in 1869 as the Springfield, Effingham & Quincy Railway Company. It was built as a narrow-gauge line by the Cincinnati, Effingham & Quincy Construction Company, which went into the hands of a receiver in 1878. The road was completed by the receiver in 1880, and, in 1885, restored to the Construction Company by the discharge of the receiver. For a short time it was operated in connection with the Bloomfield Railroad of Indiana, but was reorganized in 1886 as the Indiana & Illinois Southern Railroad, and the gauge changed to standard in 1887. Having made default in the payment of interest, it was sold under foreclosure in 1890 and purchased in the interest of the bond-holders, by whom it was conveyed to the St. Louis, Indianapolis & Eastern Railroad Company, in whose name the line is operated. Its business is limited, and chiefly local. The total earnings in 1898 were $65,583 and the expenditures $69,112. Its capital stock was $740,900; bonded debt, $978,000, other indebtedness increasing the total capital investment to $1,816,736.

ST. LOUIS, PEORIA & NORTHERN RAILWAY, known as "Peoria Short Line," a corporation organized, Feb. 29, 1896, to take over and unite the properties of the St. Louis & Eastern, the St. Louis & Peoria and the North and South Railways, and to extend the same due north from Springfield to Peoria (60 miles), and thence to Fulton or East Clinton, Ill., on the Upper Mississippi. The line extends from Springfield to Glen Carbon (84.46 miles), with trackage facilities over the Chicago, Peoria & St. Louis Railroad and the Merchants' Terminal Bridge (18 miles) to St. Louis.—(HISTORY.) This road has been made up of three sections or divisions. (1) The initial section of the line was constructed under the name of the St. Louis & Chicago Railroad of Illinois, incorporated in 1885, and opened from Mount Olive to Alhambra in 1887. It passed into the hands of a receiver, was sold under foreclosure in 1889, and reorganized, in 1890, as the St. Louis & Peoria Railroad. The St. Louis & Eastern, chartered in 1889, built the line from Glen Carbon to Marine, which was opened in 1893; the following year, bought the St. Louis & Peoria line, and, in 1895, constructed the link (8 miles) between Alhambra and Marine. (3) The North & South Railroad Company of Illinois, organized in 1890, as successor to the St. Louis & Chicago Railway Company, proceeded in the construction of the line (50.46 miles) from Mt. Olive to Springfield, which was subsequently leased to the Chicago, Peoria & St. Louis, then under the management of the Jacksonville, Louisville & St. Louis Railway. The latter corporation having defaulted, the property passed into the hands of a receiver. By expiration of the lease in December, 1896, the property reverted to the proprietary Company, which took possession, Jan. 1, 1896. The St. Louis & Southeastern then bought the line outright, and it was incorporated as a part of the new organization under the name of the St. Louis, Peoria & Northern Railway, the North & South Railroad going out of existence. In May, 1899, the St. Louis, Peoria & Northern was sold to the reorganized Chicago & Alton Railroad Company, to be operated as a short line between Peoria & St. Louis.

ST. LOUIS, ROCK ISLAND & CHICAGO RAILROAD. (See Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad.)

ST. LOUIS SOUTHERN RAILROAD, a line running from Pinckneyville, Ill., via Murphysboro, to Carbondale. The company is also the lessee of the Carbondale & Shawneetown Railroad, extending from Carbondale to Marion, 17.5 miles—total, 50.5 miles. The track is of standard gauge and laid with 56 and 60-pound steel rails. The company was organized in August, 1886, to succeed to the property of the St. Louis Coal Railroad (organized in 1879) and the St. Louis Central Railway; and was leased for 990 years from Dec. 1, 1886, to the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad Company, at an annual rental equal to thirty per cent of the gross earnings, with a minimum guarantee of $32,000, which is sufficient to pay the interest on the first mortgage bonds. During the year 1896 this line passed under lease from the St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad Company, into the hands of the Illinois Central Railroad Company.

ST. LOUIS, SPRINGFIELD, & VINCENNES RAILROAD COMPANY, a corporation organized in July, 1899, to take over the property of the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway in the State of Illinois, known as the Ohio & Mississippi and the Springfield & Illinois Southeastern Railways—the former extending from Vincennes, Ind., to East St. Louis, and the latter from Beardstown to Shawneetown. The property was sold under foreclosure, at Cincinnati, July 10, 1899, and transferred, for purposes of reorganization, into the hands of the new corporation, July 28, 1899. (For history of the several lines see Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway.)

ST. LOUIS, VANDALIA & TERRE HAUTE RAILROAD. This line extends from East St. Louis eastward across the State, to the Indiana State line, a distance of 158.3 miles. The Terre Haute & Indianapolis Railroad Company is the lessee. The track is single, of standard gauge, and laid with steel rails. The outstanding capital stock, in 1898, was $3,924,053, the bonded debt, $4,496,000, and the floating debt, $218,480.—(HISTORY.) The St. Louis, Vandalia & Terre Haute Railroad was chartered in 1865, opened in 1870 and leased to the Terre Haute & Indianapolis Railroad, for itself and the Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad.

ST. LOUIS & CAIRO RAILROAD, extends from East St. Louis to Cairo, Ill., 151.6 miles, with a branch from Millstadt Junction to High Prairie, 9 miles. The track is of standard gauge and laid mainly with steel rails.—(HISTORY.) The original charter was granted to the Cairo & St. Louis Railroad Company, Feb. 16, 1865, and the road opened, March 1, 1875. Subsequently it passed into the hands of a receiver, was sold under foreclosure, July 14, 1881, and was taken charge of by a new company under its present name, Feb. 1, 1882. On Feb. 1, 1886, it was leased to the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company for forty-five years, and now constitutes the Illinois Division of that line, giving it a connection with St. Louis. ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL, located in Chicago. It was chartered in 1865, its incorporators, in their initial statement, substantially declaring their object to be the establishment of a free hospital under the control of the Protestant Episcopal Church, which should be open to the afflicted poor, without distinction of race or creed. The hospital was opened on a small scale, but steadily increased until 1879, when re-incorporation was effected under the general law. In 1885 a new building was erected on land donated for that purpose, at a cost exceeding $150,000, exclusive of $20,000 for furnishing. While its primary object has been to afford accommodation, with medical and surgical care, gratuitously, to the needy poor, the institution also provides a considerable number of comfortable, well-furnished private rooms for patients who are able and willing to pay for the same. It contains an amphitheater for surgical operations and clinics, and has a free dispensary for out-patients. During the past few years important additions have been made, the number of beds increased, and provision made for a training school for nurses. The medical staff (1896) consists of thirteen physicians and surgeons and two pathologists.

ST. MARY'S SCHOOL, a young ladies' seminary, under the patronage of the Episcopal Church, at Knoxville, Knox County, Ill.; was incorporated in 1858, in 1898 had a faculty of fourteen teachers, giving instruction to 113 pupils. The branches taught include the classics, the sciences, fine arts, music and preparatory studies. The institution has a library of 2,200 volumes, and owns property valued at $130,500, of which $100,000 is real estate.

STAGER, Anson, soldier and Telegraph Superintendent, was born in Ontario County, N. Y., April 20, 1825; at 16 years of age entered the service of Henry O'Reilly, a printer who afterwards became a pioneer in building telegraph lines, and with whom he became associated in various enterprises of this character. Having introduced several improvements in the construction of batteries and the arrangement of wires, he was, in 1852, made General Superintendent of the principal lines in the West, and, on the organization of the Western Union Company, was retained in this position. Early in the Civil War he was entrusted with the management of telegraph lines in Southern Ohio and along the Virginia border, and, in October following, was appointed General Superintendent of Government telegraphs, remaining in this position until September, 1868, his services being recognized in his promotion to a brevet Brigadier-Generalship of Volunteers. In 1869 General Stager returned to Chicago and, in addition to his duties as General Superintendent, engaged in the promotion of a number of enterprises connected with the manufacture of electrical appliances and other branches of the business. One of these was the consolidation of the telephone companies, of which he became President, as also of the Western Edison Electric Light Company, besides being a Director in several other corporations. Died, in Chicago, March 26, 1885.

STANDISH, John Van Ness, a lineal descendant of Capt. Miles Standish, the Pilgrim leader, was born at Woodstock, Vt., Feb. 26, 1825. His early years were spent on a farm, but a love of knowledge and books became his ruling passion, and he devoted several years to study, in the "Liberal Institute" at Lebanon, N. H., finally graduating, with the degree of A. B., at Norwich University in the class of 1847. Later, he received the degree of A.M., in due course, from his Alma Mater in 1855; that of Ph.D. from Knox College, in 1883, of LL.D from St. Lawrence University in 1893, and from Norwich, in 1898. Dr. Standish chose the profession of a teacher, and has spent over fifty years in its pursuit in connection with private and public schools and the College, of which more than forty years were as Professor and President of Lombard University at Galesburg. He has also lectured and conducted Teachers' Institutes all over the State, and, in 1859, was elected President of the State Teachers' Association. He made three visits to the Old World—in 1879, '82-83, and '91-92—and, during his second trip, traveled over 40,000 miles, visiting nearly every country of Europe, including the "Land of the Midnight Sun," besides Northern Africa from the Mediterranean to the Desert of Sahara, Egypt, Palestine, Syria and Asia Minor. A lover of art, he has visited nearly all the principal museums and picture galleries of the world. In politics he is a Republican, and, in opposition to many college men, a firm believer in the doctrine of protection. In religion, he is a Universalist.

STAPP, James T. B., State Auditor, was born in Woodford County, Ky., April 13, 1804; at the age of 12 accompanied his widowed mother to Kaskaskia, Ill., where she settled; before he was 20 years old, was employed as a clerk in the office of the State Auditor, and, upon the resignation of that officer, was appointed his successor, being twice thereafter elected by the Legislature, serving nearly five years. He resigned the auditorship to accept the Presidency of the State Bank at Vandalia, which post he filled for thirteen years; acted as Aid-de-camp on Governor Reynolds staff in the Black Hawk War, and served as Adjutant of the Third Illinois Volunteers during the war with Mexico. President Taylor appointed Mr. Stapp Receiver of the United States Land Office at Vandalia, which office he held during the Fillmore administration, resigning in 1855. Two years later he removed to Decatur, where he continued to reside until his death in 1876. A handsome Methodist chapel, erected by him in that city, bears his name.

STARK COUNTY, an interior county in the northern half of the State, lying west of the Illinois River; has an area of 290 square miles. It has a rich, alluvial soil, well watered by numerous small streams. The principal industries are agriculture and stock-raising, and the chief towns are Toulon and Wyoming. The county was erected from Putnam and Knox in 1839, and named in honor of General Stark, of Revolutionary fame. The earliest settler was Isaac B. Essex, who built a cabin on Spoon River, in 1828, and gave his name to a township. Of other pioneer families, the Buswells, Smiths, Spencers and Eastmans came from New England; the Thomases, Moores, Holgates, Fullers and Whittakers from Pennsylvania; the Coxes from Ohio; the Perrys and Parkers from Virginia; the McClanahans from Kentucky; the Hendersons from Tennessee; the Lees and Hazens from New Jersey; the Halls from England, and the Turnbells and Olivers from Scotland. The pioneer church was the Congregational at Toulon. Population (1880), 11,207; (1890), 9,982; (1900), 10,186.

STARVED ROCK, a celebrated rock or cliff on the south side of Illinois River, in La Salle County, upon which the French explorer, La Salle, and his lieutenant, Tonty, erected a fort in 1682, which they named Fort St. Louis. It was one mile north of the supposed location of the Indian village of La Vantum, the metropolis, so to speak, of the Illinois Indians about the time of the arrival of the first French explorers. The population of this village, in 1680, according to Father Membre, was some seven or eight thousand. Both La Vantum and Fort St. Louis were repeatedly attacked by the Iroquois. The Illinois were temporarily driven from La Vantum, but the French, for the time being, successfully defended their fortification. In 1702 the fort was abandoned as a military post, but continued to be used as a French trading-post until 1718, when it was burned by Indians. The Illinois were not again molested until 1723, when the Foxes made an unsuccessful attack upon them. The larger portion of the tribe, however, resolved to cast in their fortunes with other tribes on the Mississippi River. Those who remained fell an easy prey to the foes by whom they were surrounded. In 1769 they were attacked from the north by tribes who desired to avenge the murder of Pontiac. Finding themselves hard pressed, they betook themselves to the bluff where Fort St. Louis had formerly stood. Here they were besieged for twelve days, when, destitute of food or water, they made a gallant but hopeless sortie. According to a tradition handed down among the Indians, all were massacred by the besiegers in an attempt to escape by night, except one half-breed, who succeeded in evading his pursuers. This sanguinary catastrophe has given the rock its popular name. Elmer Baldwin, in his History of La Salle County (1877), says: "The bones of the victims lay scattered about the cliff in profusion after the settlement by the whites, and are still found mingled plentifully with the soil." (See La Salle, Robert Cavelier; Tonty; Fort St. Louis.)

STARNE, Alexander, Secretary of State and State Treasurer, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Nov. 21, 1813; in the spring of 1836 removed to Illinois, settling at Griggsville, Pike County, where he opened a general store. From 1839 to '42 he served as Commissioner of Pike County, and, in the latter year, was elected to the lower house of the General Assembly, and re-elected in 1844. Having, in the meanwhile, disposed of his store at Griggsville and removed to Pittsfield, he was appointed, by Judge Purple, Clerk of the Circuit Court, and elected to the same office for four years, when it was made elective. In 1852 he was elected Secretary of State, when he removed to Springfield, returning to Griggsville at the expiration of his term in 1857, to assume the Presidency of the old Hannibal and Naples Railroad (now a part of the Wabash system). He represented Pike and Brown Counties in the Constitutional Convention of 1862, and the same year was elected State Treasurer. He thereupon again removed to Springfield, where he resided until his death, being, with his sons, extensively engaged in coal mining. In 1870, and again in 1872, he was elected State Senator from Sangamon County. He died at Springfield, March 31, 1886.

STATE BANK OF ILLINOIS. The first legislation, having for its object the establishment of a bank within the territory which now constitutes the State of Illinois, was the passage, by the Territorial Legislature of 1816, of an act incorporating the "Bank of Illinois at Shawneetown, with branches at Edwardsville and Kaskaskia." In the Second General Assembly of the State (1820) an act was passed, over the Governor's veto and in defiance of the adverse judgment of the Council of Revision, establishing a State Bank at Vandalia with branches at Shawneetown, Edwardsville, and Brownsville in Jackson County. This was, in effect, a rechartering of the banks at Shawneetown and Edwardsville. So far as the former is concerned, it seems to have been well managed; but the official conduct of the officers of the latter, on the basis of charges made by Governor Edwards in 1826, was made the subject of a legislative investigation, which (although it resulted in nothing) seems to have had some basis of fact, in view of the losses finally sustained in winding up its affairs—that of the General Government amounting to $54,000. Grave charges were made in this connection against men who were then, or afterwards became, prominent in State affairs, including one Justice of the Supreme Court and one (still later) a United States Senator. The experiment was disastrous, as, ten years later (1831), it was found necessary for the State to incur a debt of $100,000 to redeem the outstanding circulation. Influenced, however, by the popular demand for an increase in the "circulating medium," the State continued its experiment of becoming a stockholder in banks managed by its citizens, and accordingly we find it, in 1835, legislating in the same direction for the establishing of a central "Bank of Illinois" at Springfield, with branches at other points as might be required, not to exceed six in number. One of these branches was established at Vandalia and another at Chicago, furnishing the first banking institution of the latter city. Two years later, when the State was entering upon its scheme of internal improvement, laws were enacted increasing the capital stock of these banks to $4,000,000 in the aggregate. Following the example of similar institutions elsewhere, they suspended specie payments a few months later, but were protected by "stay laws" and other devices until 1842, when the internal improvement scheme having been finally abandoned, they fell in general collapse. The State ceased to be a stockholder in 1843, and the banks were put in course of liquidation, though it required several years to complete the work.

STATE CAPITALS. The first State capital of Illinois was Kaskaskia, where the first Territorial Legislature convened, Nov. 25, 1812. At that time there were but five counties in the State—St. Clair and Randolph being the most important, and Kaskaskia being the county-seat of the latter. Illinois was admitted into the Union as a State in 1818, and the first Constitution provided that the seat of government should remain at Kaskaskia until removed by legislative enactment. That instrument, however, made it obligatory upon the Legislature, at its first session, to petition Congress for a grant of not more than four sections of land, on which should be erected a town, which should remain the seat of government for twenty years. The petition was duly presented and granted; and, in accordance with the power granted by the Constitution, a Board of five Commissioners selected the site of the present city of Vandalia, then a point in the wilderness twenty miles north of any settlement. But so great was the faith of speculators in the future of the proposed city, that town lots were soon selling at $100 to $780 each. The Commissioners, in obedience to law, erected a plain two-story frame building—scarcely more than a commodious shanty—to which the State offices were removed in December, 1820. This building was burned, Dec. 9, 1823, and a brick structure erected in its place. Later, when the question of a second removal of the capital began to be agitated, the citizens of Vandalia assumed the risk of erecting a new, brick State House, costing $16,000. Of this amount $6,000 was reimbursed by the Governor from the contingent fund, and the balance ($10,000) was appropriated in 1837, when the seat of government was removed to Springfield, by vote of the Tenth General Assembly on the fourth ballot. The other places receiving the principal vote at the time of the removal to Springfield, were Jacksonville, Vandalia, Peoria, Alton and Illiopolis—Springfield receiving the largest vote at each ballot. The law removing the capital appropriated $50,000 from the State Treasury, provided that a like amount should be raised by private subscription and guaranteed by bond, and that at least two acres of land should be donated as a site. Two State Houses have been erected at Springfield, the first cost of the present one (including furnishing) having been a little in excess of $4,000,000. Abraham Lincoln, who was a member of the Legislature from Sangamon County at the time, was an influential factor in securing the removal of the capital to Springfield.

STATE DEBT. The State debt, which proved so formidable a burden upon the State of Illinois for a generation, and, for a part of that period, seriously checked its prosperity, was the direct outgrowth of the internal improvement scheme entered upon in 1837. (See Internal Improvement Policy.) At the time this enterprise was undertaken the aggregate debt of the State was less than $400,000—accumulated within the preceding six years. Two years later (1838) it had increased to over $6,500,000, while the total valuation of real and personal property, for the purposes of taxation, was less than $60,000,000, and the aggregate receipts of the State treasury, for the same year, amounted to less than $150,000. At the same time, the disbursements, for the support of the State Government alone, had grown to more than twice the receipts. This disparity continued until the declining credit of the State forced upon the managers of public affairs an involuntary economy, when the means could no longer be secured for more lavish expenditures. The first bonds issued at the inception of the internal improvement scheme sold at a premium of 5 per cent, but rapidly declined until they were hawked in the markets of New York and London at a discount, in some cases falling into the hands of brokers who failed before completing their contracts, thus causing a direct loss to the State. If the internal improvement scheme was ill-advised, the time chosen to carry it into effect was most unfortunate, as it came simultaneously with the panic of 1837, rendering the disaster all the more complete. Of the various works undertaken by the State, only the Illinois & Michigan Canal brought a return, all the others resulting in more or less complete loss. The internal improvement scheme was abandoned in 1839-40, but not until State bonds exceeding $13,000,000 had been issued. For two years longer the State struggled with its embarrassments, increased by the failure of the State Bank in February, 1842, and, by that of the Bank of Illinois at Shawneetown, a few months later, with the proceeds of more than two and a half millions of the State's bonds in their possession. Thus left without credit, or means even of paying the accruing interest, there were those who regarded the State as hopelessly bankrupt, and advocated repudiation as the only means of escape. Better counsels prevailed, however; the Constitution of 1848 put the State on a basis of strict economy in the matter of salaries and general expenditures, with restrictions upon the Legislature in reference to incurring indebtedness, while the beneficent "two-mill tax" gave assurance to its creditors that its debts would be paid. While the growth of the State, in wealth and population, had previously been checked by the fear of excessive taxation, it now entered upon a new career of prosperity, in spite of its burdens—its increase in population, between 1850 and 1860, amounting to over 100 per cent. The movement of the State debt after 1840—when the internal improvement scheme was abandoned—chiefly by accretions of unpaid interest, has been estimated as follows: 1842, $15,637,950; 1844, $14,633,969; 1846, $16,389,817; 1848, $16,661,795. It reached its maximum in 1853—the first year of Governor Matteson's administration—when it was officially reported at $16,724,177. At this time the work of extinguishment began, and was prosecuted under successive administrations, except during the war, when the vast expense incurred in sending troops to the field caused an increase. During Governor Bissell's administration, the reduction amounted to over $3,000,000; during Oglesby's, to over five and a quarter million, besides two and a quarter million paid on interest. In 1880 the debt had been reduced to $281,059.11, and, before the close of 1882, it had been entirely extinguished, except a balance of $18,500 in bonds, which, having been called in years previously and never presented for

STATE GUARDIANS FOR GIRLS, a bureau organized for the care of female juvenile delinquents, by act of June 2, 1893. The Board consists of seven members, nominated by the Executive and confirmed by the Senate, and who constitute a body politic and corporate. Not more than two of the members may reside in the same Congressional District and, of the seven members, four must be women. (See also Home for Female Juvenile Offenders.) The term of office is six years.

STATE HOUSE, located at Springfield. Its construction was begun under an act passed by the Legislature in February, 1867, and completed in 1887. It stands in a park of about eight acres, donated to the State by the citizens of Springfield. A provision of the State Constitution of 1870 prohibited the expenditure of any sum in excess of $3,500,000 in the erection and furnishing of the building, without previous approval of such additional expenditure by the people. This amount proving insufficient, the Legislature, at its session of 1885, passed an act making an additional appropriation of $531,712, which having been approved by popular vote at the general election of 1886, the expenditure was made and the capitol completed during the following year, thus raising the total cost of construction and furnishing to a little in excess of $4,000,000. The building is cruciform as to its ground plan, and classic in its style of architecture; its extreme dimensions (including porticoes), from north to south, being 379 feet, and, from east to west, 286 feet. The walls are of dressed Joliet limestone, while the porticoes, which are spacious and lofty, are of sandstone, supported by polished columns of gray granite. The three stories of the building are surmounted by a Mansard roof, with two turrets and a central dome of stately dimensions. Its extreme height, to the top of the iron flag-staff, which rises from a lantern springing from the dome, is 364 feet.

STATE NORMAL UNIVERSITY, an institution for the education of teachers, organized under an act of the General Assembly, passed Feb. 18, 1857. This act placed the work of organization in the hands of a board of fifteen persons, which was styled "The Board of Education of the State of Illinois," and was constituted as follows: C. B. Denio of Jo Daviess County; Simeon Wright of Lee; Daniel Wilkins of McLean; Charles E. Hovey of Peoria; George P. Rex of Pike; Samuel W. Moulton of Shelby; John Gillespie of Jasper; George Bunsen of St. Clair; Wesley Sloan of Pope; Ninian W. Edwards of Sangamon; John R. Eden of Moultrie; Flavel Moseley and William Wells of Cook; Albert R. Shannon of White; and the Superintendent of Public Instruction, ex-officio. The object of the University, as defined in the organizing law, is to qualify teachers for the public schools of the State, and the course of instruction to be given embraces "the art of teaching, and all branches which pertain to a common-school education; in the elements of the natural sciences, including agricultural chemistry, animal and vegetable physiology; in the fundamental laws of the United States and of the State of Illinois in regard to the rights and duties of citizens, and such other studies as the Board of Education may, from time to time, prescribe." Various cities competed for the location of the institution, Bloomington being finally selected, its bid, including 160 acres of land, being estimated as equivalent to $141,725. The corner-stone was laid on September 29, 1857, and the first building was ready for permanent occupancy in September, 1860. Previously, however, it had been sufficiently advanced to permit of its being used, and the first commencement exercises were held on June 29 of the latter year. Three years earlier, the academic department had been organized under the charge of Charles E. Hovey. The first cost, including furniture, etc., was not far from $200,000. Gratuitous instruction is given to two pupils from each county, and to three from each Senatorial District. The departments are: Grammar school, high school, normal department and model school, all of which are overcrowded. The whole number of students in attendance on the institution during the school year, 1897-98, was 1,197, of whom 891 were in the normal department and 306 in the practice school department, including representatives from 86 counties of the State, with a few pupils from other States on the payment of tuition. The teaching faculty (including the President and Librarian) for the same year, was made up of twenty-six members—twelve ladies and fourteen gentlemen. The expenditures for the year 1897-98 aggregated $47,626.92, against $66,528.69 for 1896-97. Nearly $32,000 of the amount expended during the latter year was on account of the construction of a gymnasium building.

STATE PROPERTY. The United States Census of 1890 gave the value of real and personal property belonging to the State as follows: Public lands, $328,000; buildings, $23,164,000; miscellaneous property, $2,650,000—total, $25,142,000. The land may be subdivided thus: Camp-grounds of the Illinois National Guard near Springfield (donated), $40,000; Illinois and Michigan Canal, $168,000; Illinois University lands, in Illinois (donated by the General Government), $41,000, in Minnesota (similarly donated), $79,000. The buildings comprise those connected with the charitable, penal and educational institutions of the State, besides the State Arsenal, two buildings for the use of the Appellate Courts (at Ottawa and Mount Vernon), the State House, the Executive Mansion, and locks and dams erected at Henry and Copperas Creek. Of the miscellaneous property, $120,000 represents the equipment of the Illinois National Guard; $1,959,000 the value of the movable property of public buildings; $550,000 the endowment fund of the University of Illinois; and $21,000 the movable property of the Illinois & Michigan Canal. The figures given relative to the value of the public buildings include only the first appropriations for their erection. Considerable sums have since been expended upon some of them in repairs, enlargements and improvements.

STATE TREASURERS. The only Treasurer of Illinois during the Territorial period was John Thomas, who served from 1812 to 1818, and became the first incumbent under the State Government. Under the Constitution of 1818 the Treasurer was elected, biennially, by joint vote of the two Houses of the General Assembly; by the Constitution of 1848, this officer was made elective by the people for the same period, without limitations as to number of terms; under the Constitution of 1870, the manner of election and duration of term are unchanged, but the incumbent is ineligible to re-election, for two years from expiration of the term for which he may have been chosen. The following is a list of the State Treasurers, from the date of the admission of the State into the Union down to the present time (1899), with the date and duration of the term of each: John Thomas, 1818-19; Robert K. McLaughlin, 1819-23; Abner Field, 1823-27; James Hall, 1827-31; John Dement, 1831-36; Charles Gregory, 1836-37; John D. Whiteside, 1837-41; Milton Carpenter, 1841-48; John Moore, 1848-57; James Miller, 1857-59; William Butler, 1859-63; Alexander Starne, 1863-65; James H. Beveridge, 1865-67; George W. Smith, 1867-69; Erastus N. Bates, 1869-73; Edward Rutz, 1873-75; Thomas S. Ridgway, 1875-77; Edward Rutz, 1877-79; John C. Smith, 1879-81; Edward Rutz, 1881-83; John C. Smith, 1883-85; Jacob Gross,

STAUNTON, a village in the southeast corner of Macoupin County, on the Chicago, Peoria & St. Louis and the Wabash Railways; is 36 miles northeast of St. Louis, and 14 miles southwest of Litchfield. Agriculture and coal-mining are the industries of the surrounding region. Staunton has two banks, eight churches and a weekly newspaper. Population (1880), 1,358; (1890), 2,209; (1900), 2,786.

STEEL PRODUCTION. In the manufacture of steel, Illinois has long ranked as the second State in the Union in the amount of its output, and, during the period between 1880 and 1890, the increase in production was 241 per cent. In 1880 there were but six steel works in the State; in 1890 these had increased to fourteen; and the production of steel of all kinds (in tons of 2,000 pounds) had risen from 254,569 tons to 868,250. Of the 3,837,039 tons of Bessemer steel ingots, or direct castings, produced in the United States in 1890, 22 per cent were turned out in Illinois, nearly all the steel produced in the State being made by that process. From the tonnage of ingots, as given above, Illinois produced 622,260 pounds of steel rails,—more than 30 per cent of the aggregate for the entire country. This fact is noteworthy, inasmuch as the competition in the manufacture of Bessemer steel rails, since 1880, has been so great that many railmills have converted their steel into forms other than rails, experience having proved their production to any considerable extent, during the past few years, unprofitable except in works favorably located for obtaining cheap raw material, or operated under the latest and most approved methods of manufacture. Open-hearth steel is no longer made in Illinois, but the manufacture of crucible steel is slightly increasing, the output in 1890 being 445 tons, as against 130 in 1880. For purposes requiring special grades of steel the product of the crucible process will be always in demand, but the high cost of manufacture prevents it, in a majority of instances, from successfully competing in price with the other processes mentioned.

STEPHENSON, Benjamin, pioneer and early politician, came to Illinois from Kentucky in 1809, and was appointed the first Sheriff of Randolph County by Governor Edwards under the Territorial Government; afterwards served as a Colonel of Illinois militia during the War of 1812; represented Illinois Territory as Delegate in Congress, 1814-16, and, on his retirement from Congress, became Register of the Land Office at Edwardsville, finally dying at Edwardsville—Col. James W. (Stephenson), a son of the preceding, was a soldier during the Black Hawk War, afterwards became a prominent politician in the northwestern part of the State, served as Register of the Land Office at Galena and, in 1838, received the Democratic nomination for Governor, but withdrew before the election.

STEPHENSON, (Dr.) Benjamin Franklin, physician and soldier, was born in Wayne County, Ill., Oct. 30, 1822, and accompanied his parents, in 1825, to Sangamon County, where the family settled. His early educational advantages were meager, and he did not study his profession (medicine) until after reaching his majority, graduating from Rush Medical College, Chicago, in 1850. He began practice at Petersburg, but, in April, 1862, was mustered into the volunteer army as Surgeon of the Fourteenth Illinois Infantry. After a little over two years service he was mustered out in June, 1864, when he took up his residence in Springfield, and, for a year, was engaged in the drug business there. In 1865 he resumed professional practice. He lacked tenacity of purpose, however, was indifferent to money, and always willing to give his own services and orders for medicine to the poor. Hence, his practice was not lucrative. He was one of the leaders in the organization of the Grand Army of the Republic (which see), in connection with which he is most widely known; but his services in its cause failed to receive, during his lifetime, the recognition which they deserved, nor did the organization promptly flourish, as he had hoped. He finally returned with his family to Petersburg. Died, at Rock Creek, Menard, County, Ill., August 30, 1871.

STEPHENSON COUNTY, a northwestern county, with an area of 560 square miles. The soil is rich, productive and well timbered. Fruit-culture and stock-raising are among the chief industries. Not until 1827 did the aborigines quit the locality, and the county was organized, ten years later, and named for Gen. Benjamin Stephenson. A man named Kirker, who had been in the employment of Colonel Gratiot as a lead-miner, near Galena, is said to have built the first cabin within the present limits of what was called Burr Oak Grove, and set himself up as an Indian-trader in 1826, but only remained a short time. He was followed, the next year, by Oliver

W. Kellogg, who took Kirker's place, built a more pretentious dwelling and became the first permanent settler. Later came William Wadams, the Montagues, Baker, Kilpatrick, Preston, the Goddards, and others whose names are linked with the county's early history. The first house in Freeport was built by William Baker. Organization was effected in 1837, the total poll being eighty-four votes. The earliest teacher was Nelson Martin, who is said to have taught a school of some twelve pupils, in a house which stood on the site of the present city of Freeport. Population (1880), 31,963; (1890), 31,338; (1900), 34,933.

STERLING, a flourishing city on the north bank of Rock River, in Whiteside County, 109 miles west of Chicago, 29 miles east of Clinton, Iowa, and 52 miles east-northeast of Rock Island. It has ample railway facilities, furnished by the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, the Sterling & Peoria, and the Chicago & Northwestern Railroads. It contains fourteen churches, an opera house, high and grade schools, Carnegie library, Government postoffice building, three banks, electric street and interurban car lines, electric and gas lighting, water-works, paved streets and sidewalks, fire department and four newspaper offices, two issuing daily editions. It has fine water-power, and is an important manufacturing center, its works turning out agricultural implements, carriages, paper, barbed-wire, school furniture, burial caskets, pumps, sash, doors, etc. It also has the Sterling Iron Works, besides foundries and machine shops. The river here flows through charming scenery. Pop. (1890), 5,824; (1900), 6,309.

STEVENS, Bradford A., ex-Congressman, was born at Boscawen (afterwards Webster), N. H., Jan. 3, 1813. After attending schools in New Hampshire and at Montreal, he entered Dartmouth College, graduating therefrom in 1835. During the six years following, he devoted himself to teaching, at Hopkinsville, Ky., and New York City. In 1843 he removed to Bureau County, Ill., where he became a merchant and farmer. In 1868 he was chairman of the Board of Supervisors, and, in 1870, was elected to Congress, as an Independent Democrat, for the Fifth District.

STEVENSON, Adlai E., ex-Vice-President of the United States, was born in Christian County, Ky., Oct. 23, 1835. In 1852 he removed with his parents to Bloomington, McLean County, Ill., where the family settled; was educated at the Illinois Wesleyan University and at Centre College, Ky., was admitted to the bar in 1858 and began practice at Metamora, Woodford County, where he was Master in Chancery, 1861-65, and State's Attorney, 1865-69. In 1864 he was candidate for Presidential Elector on the Democratic ticket. In 1869 he returned to Bloomington, where he has since resided. In 1874, and again in 1876, he was an unsuccessful candidate of his party for Congress, but was elected as a Greenback Democrat in 1878, though defeated in 1880 and 1882. In 1877 he was appointed by President Hayes a member of the Board of Visitors to West Point. During the first administration of President Cleveland (1885-89) he was First Assistant Postmaster General; was a member of the National Democratic Conventions of 1884 and 1892, being Chairman of the Illinois delegation the latter year. In 1892 he received his party's nomination for the Vice-Presidency, and was elected to that office, serving until 1897. Since retiring from office he has resumed his residence at Bloomington.

STEWART, Lewis, manufacturer and former Congressman, was born in Wayne County, Pa., Nov. 20, 1824, and received a common school education. At the age of 14 he accompanied his parents to Kendall County, Ill., where he afterwards resided, being engaged in farming and the manufacture of agricultural implements at Plano. He studied law but never practiced. In 1876 he was an unsuccessful candidate for Governor on the Democratic ticket, being defeated by Shelby M. Cullom. In 1890 the Democrats of the Eighth Illinois District elected him to Congress. In 1892 he was again a candidate, but was defeated by his Republican opponent, Robert A. Childs, by the narrow margin of 27 votes, and, in 1894, was again defeated, this time being pitted against Albert J. Hopkins. Mr. Stewart died at his home at Plano, August 26, 1896.

STEWARTSON, a town of Shelby County, at the intersection of the Toledo, St. Louis & Kansas City Railway with the Altamont branch of the Wabash, 12 miles southeast of Shelbyville; is in a grain and lumber region; has a bank and a weekly paper. Population, (1900), 677.

STICKNEY, William H., pioneer lawyer, was born in Baltimore, Md., Nov. 9, 1809, studied law and was admitted to the bar at Cincinnati in 1831, and, in Illinois in 1834, being at that time a resident of Shawneetown; was elected State's Attorney by the Legislature, in 1839, for the circuit embracing some fourteen counties in the southern and southeastern part of the State; for a time also, about 1835-36, officiated as editor of "The Gallatin Democrat," and "The Illinois Advertiser," published at Shawneetown. In 1846

Mr. Stickney was elected to the lower branch of the General Assembly from Gallatin County, and, twenty-eight years later—having come to Chicago in 1848—to the same body from Cook County, serving in the somewhat famous Twenty-ninth Assembly. He also held the office of Police Justice for some thirteen years, from 1860 onward. He lived to an advanced age, dying in Chicago, Feb. 14, 1898, being at the time the oldest surviving member of the Chicago bar.

STILES, Isaac Newton, lawyer and soldier, born at Suffield, Conn., July 16, 1833; was admitted to the bar at Lafayette, Ind., in 1855, became Prosecuting Attorney, a member of the Legislature and an effective speaker in the Fremont campaign of 1856; enlisted as a private soldier at the beginning of the war, went to the field as Adjutant, was captured at Malvern Hill, and, after six weeks' confinement in Libby prison, exchanged and returned to duty; was promoted Major, Lieutenant-Colonel and Colonel, and brevetted Brigadier-General for meritorious service. After the war he practiced his profession in Chicago, though almost totally blind. Died, Jan. 18, 1895.

STILLMAN, Stephen, first State Senator from Sangamon County, Ill., was a native of Massachusetts who came, with his widowed mother, to Sangamon County in 1820, and settled near Williamsville, where he became the first Postmaster in the first postoffice in the State north of the Sangamon River. In 1822, Mr. Stillman was elected as the first State Senator from Sangamon County, serving four years, and, at his first session, being one of the opponents of the pro-slavery Convention resolution. He died, in Peoria, somewhere between 1835 and 1840.

STILLMAN VALLEY, village in Ogle County, on Chicago Great Western and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railways; site of first battle Black Hawk War; has graded schools, four churches, a bank and a newspaper. Pop., 475.

STITES, Samuel, pioneer, was born near Mount Bethel, Somerset County, N. J., Oct. 31, 1776; died, August 16, 1839, on his farm, which subsequently became the site of the city of Trenton, in Clinton County, Ill. He was descended from John Stites, M.D., who was born in England in 1595, emigrated to America, and died at Hempstead, L. I., in 1717, at the age of 123 years. The family removed to New Jersey in the latter part of the seventeenth century. Samuel was a cousin of Benjamin Stites, the first white man to settle within the present limits of Cincinnati, and various members of the family were prominent in the settlement of the upper Ohio Valley as early as 1788. Samuel Stites married, Sept. 14, 1794, Martha Martin, daughter of Ephraim Martin, and grand-daughter of Col. Ephraim Martin, both soldiers of the New Jersey line during the Revolutionary War—with the last named of whom he had (in connection with John Cleves Symmes) been intimately associated in the purchase and settlement of the Miami Valley. In 1800 he removed to Hamilton County, Ohio, in 1803 to Greene County, and, in 1818, in company with his son-in-law, Anthony Wayne Casad, to St. Clair County, Ill., settling near Union Grove. Later, he removed to O'Fallon, and, still later, to Clinton County. He left a large family, several members of which became prominent pioneers in the movements toward Minnesota and Kansas.

STOLBRAND, Carlos John Mueller, soldier, was born in Sweden, May 11, 1821; at the age of 18, enlisted in the Royal Artillery of his native land, serving through the campaign of Schleswig-Holstein (1848); came to the United States soon after, and, in 1861, enlisted in the first battalion of Illinois Light Artillery, finally becoming Chief of Artillery under Gen. John A. Logan. When the latter became commander of the Fifteenth Army Corps, Col. Stolbrand was placed at the head of the artillery brigade; in February, 1865, was made Brigadier-General, and mustered out in January, 1866. After the war he went South, and was Secretary of the South Carolina Constitutional Convention of 1868. The same year he was a delegate to the Republican National Convention at Chicago, and a Presidential Elector. He was an inventor and patented various improvements in steam engines and boilers; was also Superintendent of Public Buildings at Charleston, S. C., under President Harrison. Died, at Charleston, Feb. 3, 1894.

STONE, Daniel, early lawyer and legislator, was a native of Vermont and graduate of Middlebury College; became a member of the Springfield (Ill.) bar in 1833, and, in 1836, was elected to the General Assembly—being one of the celebrated "Long Nine" from Sangamon County, and joining Abraham Lincoln in his protest against a series of pro-slavery resolutions which had been adopted by the House. In 1837 he was a Circuit Court Judge and, being assigned to the north-western part of the State, removed to Galena, but was legislated out of office, when he left the State, dying a few years later, in Essex County, N. J.

STONE, Horatio O., pioneer, was born in Ontario (now Monroe) County, N. Y., Jan. 2, 1811; in boyhood learned the trade of shoemaker, and later acted as overseer of laborers on the Lackawanna Canal. In 1831, having located in Wayne County, Mich., he was drafted for the Black Hawk War, serving twenty-two days under Gen. Jacob Brown. In January, 1835, he came to Chicago and, having made a fortunate speculation in real estate in that early day, a few months later entered upon the grocery and provision trade, which he afterwards extended to grain; finally giving his chief attention to real estate, in which he was remarkably successful, leaving a large fortune at his death, which occurred in Chicago, June 20, 1877.

STONE, (Rev.) Luther, Baptist clergyman, was born in the town of Oxford, Worcester County, Mass., Sept. 26, 1815, and spent his boyhood on a farm. After acquiring a common school education, he prepared for college at Leicester Academy, and, in 1835, entered Brown University, graduating in the class of 1839. He then spent three years at the Theological Institute at Newton, Mass.; was ordained to the ministry at Oxford, in 1843, but, coming west the next year, entered upon evangelical work in Rock Island, Davenport, Burlington and neighboring towns. Later, he was pastor of the First Baptist Church at Rockford, Ill. In 1847 Mr. Stone came to Chicago and established "The Watchman of the Prairies," which survives to-day under the name of "The Standard," and has become the leading Baptist organ in the West. After six years of editorial work, he took up evangelistic work in Chicago, among the poor and criminal classes. During the Civil War he conducted religious services at Camp Douglas, Soldiers' Rest and the Marine Hospital. He was associated in the conduct and promotion of many educational and charitable institutions. He did much for the First Baptist Church of Chicago, and, during the latter years of his life, was attached to the Immanuel Baptist Church, which he labored to establish. Died, in July, 1890.

STONE, Melville E., journalist, banker, Manager of Associated Press, born at Hudson, Ill., August 18, 1848. Coming to Chicago in 1860, he graduated from the local high school in 1867, and, in 1870, acquired the sole proprietorship of a foundry and machine shop. Finding himself without resources after the great fire of 1871, he embarked in journalism, rising, through the successive grades of reporter, city editor, assistant editor and Washington correspondent, to the position of editor-in-chief of his own journal.

He was connected with various Chicago dailies between 1871 and 1875, and, on Christmas Day of the latter year, issued the first number of "The Chicago Daily News." He gradually disposed of his interest in this journal, entirely severing his connection therewith in 1888. Since that date he has been engaged in banking in the city of Chicago, and is also General Manager of the Associated Press.

STONE, Samuel, philanthropist, was born at Chesterfield, Mass., Dec. 6, 1798; left an orphan at seven years of age, after a short term in Leicester Academy, and several years in a wholesale store in Boston, at the age of 19 removed to Rochester, N. Y., to take charge of interests in the "Holland Purchase," belonging to his father's estate; in 1843-49, was a resident of Detroit and interested in some of the early railroad enterprises centering there, but the latter year removed to Milwaukee, being there associated with Ezra Cornell in telegraph construction. In 1859 he became a citizen of Chicago, where he was one of the founders of the Chicago Historical Society, and a liberal patron of many enterprises of a public and benevolent character. Died, May 4, 1876.

STONE FORT, a village in the counties of Saline and Williamson. It is situated on the Cairo Division of the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway, 57 miles northeast of Cairo. Population (1900), 479.

STOREY, Wilbur F., journalist and newspaper publisher, was born at Salisbury, Vt., Dec. 19, 1819. He began to learn the printer's trade at 12, and, before he was 19, was part owner of a Democratic paper called "The Herald," published at La Porte, Ind. Later, he either edited or controlled journals published at Mishawaka, Ind., and Jackson and Detroit, Mich. In January, 1861, he became the principal owner of "The Chicago Times," then the leading Democratic organ of Chicago. His paper soon came to be regarded as the organ of the anti-war party throughout the Northwest, and, in June, 1863, was suppressed by a military order issued by General Burnside, which was subsequently revoked by President Lincoln. The net result was an increase in "The Times'" notoriety and circulation. Other charges, of an equally grave nature, relating to its sources of income, its character as a family newspaper, etc., were repeatedly made, but to all these Mr. Storey turned a deaf ear. He lost heavily in the fire of 1871, but, in 1872, appeared as the editor of "The Times," then destitute of political ties. About 1876 his health began to decline. Medical aid failed to afford relief, and, in August, 1884, he was adjudged to be of unsound mind, and his estate was placed in the hands of a conservator. On the 27th of the following October (1884), he died at his home in Chicago.

STORRS, Emery Alexander, lawyer, was born at Hinsdale, Cattaraugus County, N. Y., August 12, 1835; began the study of law with his father, later pursued a legal course at Buffalo, and, in 1853, was admitted to the bar; spent two years (1857-59) in New York City, the latter year removing to Chicago, where he attained great prominence as an advocate at the bar, as well as an orator on other occasions. Politically a Republican, he took an active part in Presidential campaigns, being a delegate-at-large from Illinois to the National Republican Conventions of 1868, '72, and '80, and serving as one of the Vice-Presidents in 1872. Erratic in habits and a master of epigram and repartee, many of his speeches are quoted with relish and appreciation by those who were his contemporaries at the Chicago bar. Died suddenly, while in attendance on the Supreme Court at Ottawa, Sept. 12, 1885.

STRAWN, Jacob, agriculturist and stock-dealer, born in Somerset County, Pa., May 30, 1800; removed to Licking County, Ohio, in 1817, and to Illinois, in 1831, settling four miles southwest of Jacksonville. He was one of the first to demonstrate the possibilities of Illinois as a live-stock state. Unpretentious and despising mere show, he illustrated the virtues of industry, frugality and honesty. At his death—which occurred August 23, 1865—he left an estate estimated in value at about $1,000,000, acquired by industry and business enterprise. He was a zealous Unionist during the war, at one time contributing $10,000 to the Christian Commission.

STREATOR, a city (laid out in 1868 and incorporated in 1882) in the southern part of La Salle County, 93 miles southwest of Chicago; situated on the Vermilion River and a central point for five railroads. It is surrounded by a rich agricultural country, and is underlaid by coal seams (two of which are worked) and by shale and various clay products of value, adapted to the manufacture of fire and building-brick, drain-pipe, etc. The city is thoroughly modern, having gas, electric lighting, street railways, water-works, a good fire-department, and a large, improved public park. Churches and schools are numerous, as are also fine public and private buildings. One of the chief industries is the manufacture of glass, including rolled-plate, window-glass, flint and Bohemian ware and glass bottles. Other successful industries are foundries and machine shops, flour mills, and clay working establishments. There are several banks, and three daily and weekly papers are published here. The estimated property valuation, in 1884, was $12,000,000. Streator boasts some handsome public buildings, especially the Government post-office and the Carnegie public library building, both of which have been erected within the past few years. Pop. (1890), 11,414; (1900), 14,979.

STREET, Joseph M., pioneer and early politician, settled at Shawneetown about 1812, coming from Kentucky, though believed to have been a native of Eastern Virginia. In 1827 he was a Brigadier-General of militia, and appears to have been prominent in the affairs of that section of the State. His correspondence with Governor Edwards, about this time, shows him to have been a man of far more than ordinary education, with a good opinion of his merits and capabilities. He was a most persistent applicant for office, making urgent appeals to Governor Edwards, Henry Clay and other politicians in Kentucky, Virginia and Washington, on the ground of his poverty and large family. In 1827 he received the offer of the clerkship of the new county of Peoria, but, on visiting that region, was disgusted with the prospect; returning to Shawneetown, bought a farm in Sangamon County, but, before the close of the year, was appointed Indian Agent at Prairie du Chien. This was during the difficulties with the Winnebago Indians, upon which he made voluminous reports to the Secretary of War. Mr. Street was a son-in-law of Gen. Thomas Posey, a Revolutionary soldier, who was prominent in the early history of Indiana and its last Territorial Governor. (See Posey, (Gen.) Thomas.)

STREETER, Alson J., farmer and politician, was born in Rensselaer County, N. Y., in 1823; at the age of two years accompanied his father to Illinois, the family settling at Dixon, Lee County. He attended Knox College for three years, and, in 1849, went to California, where he spent two years in gold mining. Returning to Illinois, he purchased a farm of 240 acres near New Windsor, Mercer County, to which he has since added several thousand acres. In 1872 he was elected to the lower house of the Twenty-eighth General Assembly as a Democrat, but, in 1873, allied himself with the Greenback party, whose candidate for Congress he was in 1878, and for Governor in 1880, when he received nearly 3,000 votes more than his party's Presidential nominee, in Illinois.

In 1884 he was elected State Senator by a coalition of Greenbackers and Democrats in the Twenty-fourth Senatorial District, but acted as an independent throughout his entire term.

STRONG, William Emerson, soldier, was born at Granville, N. Y., in 1840; from 13 years of age, spent his early life in Wisconsin, studied law and was admitted to the bar at Racine in 1861. The same year he enlisted under the first call for troops, took part, as Captain of a Wisconsin Company, in the first battle of Bull Run; was afterwards promoted and assigned to duty as Inspector-General in the West, participated in the Vicksburg and Atlanta campaigns, being finally advanced to the rank of Brigadier-General. After some fifteen months spent in the position of Inspector-General of the Freedmen's Bureau (1865-66), he located in Chicago, and became connected with several important business enterprises, besides assisting, as an officer on the staff of Governor Cullom, in the organization of the Illinois National Guard. He was elected on the first Board of Directors of the World's Columbian Exposition, and, while making a tour of Europe in the interest of that enterprise, died, at Florence, Italy, April 10, 1891.

STUART, John Todd, lawyer and Congressman, born near Lexington, Ky., Nov. 10, 1807—the son of Robert Stuart, a Presbyterian minister and Professor of Languages in Transylvania University, and related, on the maternal side, to the Todd family, of whom Mrs. Abraham Lincoln was a member. He graduated at Centre College, Danville, in 1826, and, after studying law, removed to Springfield, Ill., in 1828, and began practice. In 1832 he was elected Representative in the General Assembly, re-elected in 1834, and, in 1836, defeated, as the Whig candidate for Congress, by Wm. L. May, though elected, two years later, over Stephen A. Douglas, and again in 1840. In 1837, Abraham Lincoln, who had been studying law under Mr. Stuart's advice and instruction, became his partner, the relationship continuing until 1841. He served in the State Senate, 1849-53, was the Bell-Everett candidate for Governor in 1860, and was elected to Congress, as a Democrat, for a third time, in 1862, but, in 1864, was defeated by Shelby M. Cullom, his former pupil. During the latter years of his life, Mr. Stuart was head of the law firm of Stuart, Edwards & Brown. Died, at Springfield, Nov. 28, 1885.

STURGES, Solomon, merchant and banker, was born at Fairfield, Conn., April 21, 1796, early manifested a passion for the sea and, in 1810, made a voyage, on a vessel of which his brother was captain, from New York to Georgetown, D. C., intending to continue it to Lisbon. At Georgetown he was induced to accept a position as clerk with a Mr. Williams, where he was associated with two other youths, as fellow-employés, who became eminent bankers and capitalists—W. W. Corcoran, afterwards the well-known banker of Washington, and George W. Peabody, who had a successful banking career in England, and won a name as one of the most liberal and public-spirited of philanthropists. During the War of 1812 young Sturges joined a volunteer infantry company, where he had, for comrades, George W. Peabody and Francis S. Key, the latter author of the popular national song, "The Star Spangled Banner." In 1814 Mr. Sturges accepted a clerkship in the store of his brother-in-law, Ebenezer Buckingham, at Putnam, Muskingum County, Ohio, two years later becoming a partner in the concern, where he developed that business capacity which laid the foundation for his future wealth. Before steamers navigated the waters of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, he piloted flat-boats, loaded with produce and merchandise, to New Orleans, returning overland. During one of his visits to that city, he witnessed the arrival of the "Washington," the first steamer to descend the Mississippi, as, in 1817, he saw the arrival of the "Walk-in-the-Water" at Detroit, the first steamer to arrive from Buffalo—the occasion of his visit to Detroit being to carry funds to General Cass to pay off the United States troops. About 1849 he was associated with the construction of the Wabash & Erie Canal, from the Ohio River to Terre Haute, Ind., advancing money for the prosecution of the work, for which was reimbursed by the State. In 1854 he came to Chicago, and, in partnership with his brothers-in-law, C. P. and Alvah Buckingham, erected the first large grain-elevator in that city, on land leased from the Illinois Central Railroad Company, following it, two years later, by another of equal capacity. For a time, substantially all the grain coming into Chicago, by railroad, passed into these elevators. In 1857 he established the private banking house of Solomon Sturges & Sons, which, shortly after his death, under the management of his son, George Sturges, became the Northwestern National Bank of Chicago. He was intensely patriotic and, on the breaking out of the War of the Rebellion, used of his means freely in support of the Government, equipping the Sturges Rifles, an independent company, at a cost of $20,000. He was also a subscriber to the first loan made by the Government, during this period, taking $100,000 in Government bonds. While devoted to his business, he was a hater of shams and corruption, and contributed freely to Christian and benevolent enterprises. Died, at the home of a daughter, at Zanesville, Ohio, Oct. 14, 1864, leaving a large fortune acquired by legitimate trade.

STURTEVANT, Julian Munson, D.D., LL.D., clergyman and educator, was born at Warren, Litchfield County, Conn., July 26, 1805; spent his youth in Summit County, Ohio, meanwhile preparing for college; in 1822, entered Yale College as the classmate of the celebrated Elizur Wright, graduating in 1826. After two years as Principal of an academy at Canaan, Conn., he entered Yale Divinity School, graduating there in 1829; then came west, and, after spending a year in superintending the erection of buildings, in December, 1830, as sole tutor, began instruction to a class of nine pupils in what is now Illinois College, at Jacksonville. Having been joined, the following year, by Dr. Edward Beecher as President, Mr. Sturtevant assumed the chair of Mathematics, Natural Philosophy and Astronomy, which he retained until 1844, when, by the retirement of Dr. Beecher, he succeeded to the offices of President and Professor of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy. Here he labored, incessantly and unselfishly, as a teacher during term time, and, as financial agent during vacations, in the interest of the institution of which he had been one of the chief founders, serving until 1876, when he resigned the Presidency, giving his attention, for the next ten years, to the duties of Professor of Mental Science and Science of Government, which he had discharged from 1870. In 1886 he retired from the institution entirely, having given to its service fifty-six years of his life. In 1863, Dr. Sturtevant visited Europe in the interest of the Union cause, delivering effective addresses at a number of points in England. He was a frequent contributor to the weekly religious and periodical press, and was the author of "Economics, or the Science of Wealth" (1876)—a text-book on political economy, and "Keys of Sect, or the Church of the New Testament" (1879), besides frequently occupying the pulpits of local and distant churches—having been early ordained a Congregational minister. He received the degree of D.D. from the University of Missouri and that of LL.D. from Iowa University. Died, in Jacksonville, Feb. 11, 1886.—Julian M. (Sturtevant), Jr., son of the preceding, was born at Jacksonville, Ill., Feb. 2, 1834; fitted for college in the preparatory department of Illinois College and graduated from the college (proper) in 1854. After leaving college he served as teacher in the Jacksonville public schools one year, then spent a year as tutor in Illinois College, when he began the study of theology at Andover Theological Seminary, graduating there in 1859, meanwhile having discharged the duties of Chaplain of the Connecticut State's prison in 1858. He was ordained a minister of the Congregational Church at Hannibal, Mo., in 1860, remaining as pastor in that city nine years. He has since been engaged in pastoral work in New York City (1869-70), Ottawa, Ill., (1870-73); Denver, Colo., (1873-77); Grinnell, Iowa, (1877-84); Cleveland, Ohio, (1884-90); Galesburg, Ill., (1890-93), and Aurora, (1893-97). Since leaving the Congregational church at Aurora, Dr. Sturtevant has been engaged in pastoral work in Chicago. He was also editor of "The Congregationalist" of Iowa (1881-84), and, at different periods, has served as Trustee of Colorado, Marietta and Knox Colleges; being still an honored member of the Knox College Board. He received the degree of D.D. from Illinois College, in 1879.

SUBLETTE, a station and village on the Illinois Central Railroad, in Lee County, 8 miles northwest of Mendota. Population, (1900), 306.

SUFFRAGE, in general, the right or privilege of voting. The qualifications of electors (or voters), in the choice of public officers in Illinois, are fixed by the State Constitution (Art. VII.), except as to school officers, which are prescribed by law. Under the State Constitution the exercise of the right to vote is limited to persons who were electors at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of 1849, or who are native or naturalized male citizens of the United States, of the age of 21 years or over, who have been residents of the State one year, of the county ninety days, and of the district (or precinct) in which they offer to vote, 30 days. Under an act passed in 1891, women, of 21 years of age and upwards, are entitled to vote for school officers, and are also eligible to such offices under the same conditions, as to age and residence, as male citizens. SULLIVAN, a city and county-seat of Moultrie County, 25 miles southeast of Decatur and 14 miles northwest of Mattoon; is on three lines of railway. It is in an agricultural and stock-raising region; contains two State banks and four weekly newspapers. Population (1880), 1,305; (1890), 1,468; (1900), 2,399; (1900, est.), 3,100.

SULLIVAN, William K., journalist, was born at Waterford, Ireland, Nov. 10, 1843; educated at the Waterford Model School and in Dublin, came to the United States in 1863, and, after teaching for a time in Kane County, in 1864 enlisted in the One Hundred and Forty-first Regiment Illinois Volunteers. Then, after a brief season spent in teaching and on a visit to his native land, he began work as a reporter on New York papers, later being employed on "The Chicago Tribune" and "The Evening Journal," on the latter, at different times, holding the position of city editor, managing editor and correspondent. He was also a Representative from Cook County in the Twenty-seventh General Assembly, for three years a member of the Chicago Board of Education, and appointed United States Consul to the Bermudas by President Harrison, resigning in 1892. Died, in Chicago, January 17, 1899.

SULLIVANT, Michael Lucas, agriculturist, was born at Franklinton (a suburb of Columbus, Ohio), August 6, 1807; was educated at Ohio University and Centre College, Ky., and—after being engaged in the improvement of an immense tract of land inherited from his father near his birth-place, devoting much attention, meanwhile, to the raising of improved stock—in 1854 sold his Ohio lands and bought 80,000 acres, chiefly in Champaign and Piatt Counties, Ill., where he began farming on a larger scale than before. The enterprise proved a financial failure, and he was finally compelled to sell a considerable portion of his estate in Champaign County, known as Broad Lands, to John T. Alexander (see Alexander, John T.), retiring to a farm of 40,000 acres at Burr Oaks, Ill. He died, at Henderson, Ky., Jan. 29, 1879.

SUMMERFIELD, a village of St. Clair County, on the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway, 27 miles east of St. Louis; was the home of Gen. Fred. Hecker. Population (1900), 360.

SUMNER, a city of Lawrence County, on the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railroad, 19 miles west of Vincennes, Ind.; has a fine school house, four churches, two banks, two flour mills, telephones, and one weekly newspaper. Pop. (1890), 1,037; (1900), 1,268.

SUPERINTENDENTS OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION. The office of State Superintendent of Public Instruction was created by act of the Legislature, at a special session held in 1854, its duties previous to that time, from 1845, having been discharged by the Secretary of State as Superintendent, ex-officio. The following is a list of the incumbents from the date of the formal creation of the office down to the present time (1899), with the date and duration of the term of each. Ninian W. Edwards (by appointment of the Governor), 1854-57; William H. Powell (by election), 1857-59; Newton Bateman, 1859-63; John P. Brooks, 1863-65; Newton Bateman, 1865-75; Samuel W. Etter, 1875-79; James P. Slade, 1879-83; Henry Raab, 1883-87; Richard Edwards, 1887-91; Henry Raab, 1891-95; Samuel M. Inglis, 1895-98; James H. Freeman, June, 1898, to January, 1899 (by appointment of the Governor, to fill the unexpired term of Prof. Inglis, who died in office, June 1, 1898); Alfred Baylis, 1899—.

Previous to 1870 the tenure of the office was two years, but, by the Constitution adopted that year, it was extended to four years, the elections occurring on the even years between those for Governor and other State officers except State Treasurer.

SUPREME COURT, JUDGES OF THE. The following is a list of Justices of the Supreme Court of Illinois who have held office since the organization of the State Government, with the period of their respective incumbencies: Joseph Phillips, 1818-22 (resigned); Thomas C. Browne, 1818-48 (term expired on adoption of new Constitution); William P. Foster, Oct. 9, 1818, to July 7, 1819 (resigned); John Reynolds, 1818-25; Thomas Reynolds (vice Phillips), 1823-25; William Wilson (vice Foster) 1819-48 (term expired on adoption of new Constitution); Samuel D. Lockwood, 1825-48 (term expired on adoption of new Constitution); Theophilus W. Smith, 1825-42 (resigned); Thomas Ford, Feb. 15, 1841, to August 1, 1842 (resigned); Sidney Breese, Feb. 15, 1841, to Dec. 19, 1842 (resigned)—also (by re-elections), 1857-78 (died in office); Walter B. Scates, 1841-47 (resigned)—also (vice Trumbull), 1854-57 (resigned); Samuel H. Treat, 1841-55 (resigned); Stephen A. Douglas, 1841-42 (resigned); John D. Caton (vice Ford) August, 1842, to March, 1843—also (vice Robinson and by successive re-elections), May, 1843 to January, 1864 (resigned); James Semple (vice Breese), Jan. 14, 1843, to April 16, 1843 (resigned); Richard M. Young (vice Smith), 1843-47 (resigned); John M. Robinson (vice Ford), Jan. 14, 1843, to April 27, 1843 (died in office); Jesse B. Thomas, Jr., (vice Douglas), 1843-45 (resigned)—also (vice Young), 1847-48; James Shields (vice Semple), 1843-45 (resigned); Norman H. Purple (vice Thomas), 1843-48 (retired under Constitution of 1848); Gustavus Koerner (vice Shields), 1845-48 (retired by Constitution); William A. Denning (vice Scates), 1847-48 (retired by Constitution); Lyman Trumbull, 1848-53 (resigned); Ozias S. Skinner (vice Treat), 1855-58 (resigned); Pinkney H. Walker (vice Skinner), 1858-85 (deceased); Corydon Beckwith (by appointment, vice Caton), Jan. 7, 1864, to June 6, 1864; Charles B. Lawrence (one term), 1864-73; Anthony Thornton, 1870-73 (resigned); John M. Scott (two terms), 1870-88; Benjamin R. Sheldon (two terms), 1870-88; William K. McAllister, 1870-75 (resigned); John Scholfield (vice Thornton), 1873-93 (died); T. Lyle Dickey (vice McAllister), 1875-85 (died); David J. Baker (appointed, vice Breese), July 9, 1878, to June 2, 1879—also, 1888-97; John H. Mulkey, 1879-88; Damon G. Tunncliffe (appointed, vice Walker), Feb. 15, 1885, to June 1, 1885; Simeon P. Shope, 1885-94, Joseph M. Bailey, 1888-95 (died in office). The Supreme Court, as at present constituted (1899), is as follows: Carroll C. Boggs, elected, 1897; Jesse J. Phillips (vice Scholfield, deceased) elected, 1893, and re-elected, 1897; Jacob W. Wilkin, elected, 1888, and re-elected, 1897; Joseph N. Carter, elected, 1894; Alfred M. Craig, elected, 1873, and re-elected, 1882 and '91; James H. Cartwright (vice Bailey), elected, 1895, and re-elected, 1897; Benjamin D. Magruder (vice Dickey), elected, 1885, '88 and '97. The terms of Justices Boggs, Phillips, Wilkin, Cartwright and Magruder expire in 1906; that of Justice Carter on 1903; and Justice Craig's, in 1900. Under the Constitution of 1818, the Justices of the Supreme Court were chosen by joint ballot of the Legislature, but, under the Constitutions of 1848 and 1870, by popular vote for terms of nine years each. (See Judicial System; also sketches of individual members of the Supreme Court under their proper names.)

SURVEYS, EARLY GOVERNMENT. The first United States law passed on the subject of Government surveys was dated, May 20, 1785. After reserving certain lands to be allotted by way of pensions and to be donated for school purposes, it provided for the division of the remaining public lands among the original thirteen States. This, however, was, in effect, repealed by the Ordinance of 1788. The latter provided for a rectangular system of surveys which, with but little modification, has remained in force ever since. Briefly outlined, the system is as follows: Townships, six miles square, are laid out from principal bases, each township containing thirty-six sections of one square mile, numbered consecutively, the numeration to commence at the upper right hand corner of the township. The first principal meridian (84° 51' west of Greenwich), coincided with the line dividing Indiana and Ohio. The second (1° 37' farther west) had direct relation to surveys in Eastern Illinois. The third (89° 10' 30" west of Greenwich) and the fourth (90° 29' 56" west) governed the remainder of Illinois surveys. The first Public Surveyor was Thomas Hutchins, who was called "the geographer." (See Hutchins, Thomas.)

SWEET, (Gen.) Benjamin J., soldier, was born at Kirkland, Oneida County, N. Y., April 24, 1832; came with his father, in 1848, to Sheboygan, Wis., studied law, was elected to the State Senate in 1859, and, in 1861, enlisted in the Sixth Wisconsin Volunteers, being commissioned Major in 1862. Later, he resigned and, returning home, assisted in the organization of the Twenty-first and Twenty-second regiments, being elected Colonel of the former; and with it taking part in the campaign in Western Kentucky and Tennessee. In 1863 he was assigned to command at Camp Douglas, and was there on the exposure, in November, 1864, of the conspiracy to release the rebel prisoners. (See Camp Douglas Conspiracy.) The service which he rendered in the defeat of this bold and dangerous conspiracy evinced his courage and sagacity, and was of inestimable value to the country. After the war, General Sweet located at Lombard, near Chicago, was appointed Pension Agent at Chicago, afterwards served as Supervisor of Internal Revenue, and, in 1872, became Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue at Washington. Died, in Washington, Jan. 1, 1874. — Miss Ada C. (Sweet), for eight years (1874-82) the efficient Pension Agent at Chicago, is General Sweet's daughter.

SWEETSER, A. C., soldier and Department Commander G. A. R., was born in Oxford County, Maine, in 1839; came to Bloomington, Ill., in 1857; enlisted at the beginning of the Civil War in the Eighth Illinois Volunteers and, later, in the Thirty-ninth; at the battle of Wierbottom Church, Va., in June, 1864, was shot through both legs, necessitating the amputation of one of them. After the war he held several offices of trust, including those of City Collector of Bloomington and Deputy Collector of Internal Revenue for the Springfield District; in 1887 was elected Department Commander of the Grand Army of the Republic for Illinois. Died, at Bloomington, March 23, 1896.

SWETT, Leonard, lawyer, was born near Turner, Maine, August 11, 1825; was educated at Waterville College (now Colby University), but left before graduation; read law in Portland, and, while seeking a location in the West, enlisted in an Indiana regiment for the Mexican War, being attacked by climatic fever, was discharged before completing his term of enlistment. He soon after came to Bloomington, Ill., where he became the intimate friend of Abraham Lincoln and David Davis, traveling the circuit with them for a number of years. He early became active in State politics, was a member of the Republican State Convention of 1856, was elected to the lower house of the General Assembly in 1858, and, in 1860, was a zealous supporter of Mr. Lincoln as a Presidential Elector for the State-at-large. In 1862 he received the Republican nomination for Congress in his District, but was defeated. Removing to Chicago in 1865, he gained increased distinction as a lawyer, especially in the management of criminal cases. In 1872 he was a supporter of Horace Greeley for President, but later returned to the Republican party, and, in the National Republican Convention of 1888, presented the name of Judge Gresham for nomination for the Presidency. Died, June 8, 1889.

SWIGERT, Charles Phillip, ex-Auditor of Public Accounts, was born in the Province of Baden, Germany, Nov. 27, 1843, brought by his parents to Chicago, Ill., in childhood, and, in his boyhood, attended the Scammon School in that city. In 1854 his family removed to a farm in Kankakee County, where, between the ages of 12 and 18, he assisted his father in "breaking" between 400 and 500 acres of prairie land. On the breaking out of the war, in 1861, although scarcely 19 years of age, he enlisted as a private in the Forty-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and, in April, 1862, was one of twenty heroic volunteers who ran the blockade, on the gunboat Carondelet, at Island No. 10, assisting materially in the reduction of that rebel stronghold, which resulted in the capture of 7,000 prisoners. At the battle of Farmington, Miss., during the siege of Corinth, in May, 1862, he had his right arm torn from its socket by a six-pound cannon-ball, compelling his retirement from the army. Returning home, after many weeks spent in hospital at Jefferson Barracks and Quincy, Ill., he received his final discharge, Dec. 21, 1862, spent a year in school, also took a course in Bryant & Stratton's Commercial College in Chicago, and having learned to write with his left hand, taught for a time in Kankakee County; served as letter-carrier in Chicago, and for a year as Deputy County Clerk of Kankakee County, followed by two terms (1867-69) as a student in the Soldiers' College at Fulton.

III. The latter year he entered upon the duties of Treasurer of Kankakee County, serving, by successive re-elections, until 1880, when he resigned to take the position of State Auditor, to which he was elected a second time in 1884. In all these positions Mr. Swigert has proved himself an upright, capable and high-minded public official. Of late years his residence has been in Chicago.

SWING, (Rev.) David, clergyman and pulpit orator, was born of German ancestry, at Cincinnati, Ohio, August 23, 1836. After 1837 (his father dying about this time), the family resided for a time at Reedsburgh, and, later, on a farm near Williamsburgh, in Clermont County, in the same State. In 1852, having graduated from the Miami (Ohio) University, he commenced the study of theology, but, in 1854, accepted the position of Professor of Languages in his Alma Mater, which he continued to fill for thirteen years. His first pastorate was in connection with the Westminster Presbyterian Church of Chicago, which he assumed in 1866. His church edifice was destroyed in the great Chicago fire, but was later rebuilt. As a preacher he was popular; but, in April, 1874, he was placed on trial, before an ecclesiastical court of his own denomination, on charges of heresy. He was acquitted by the trial court, but, before the appeal taken by the prosecution could be heard, he personally withdrew from affiliation with the denomination. Shortly afterward he became pastor of an independent religious organization known as the "Central Church," preaching, first at McVicker's Theatre and, afterward, at Central Music Hall, Chicago. He was a fluent and, popular speaker on all themes, a frequent and valued contributor to numerous magazines, as well as the author of several volumes. Among his best known books are "Motives of Life," "Truths for To-day," and "Club Essays." Died, in Chicago, Oct. 3, 1894.

SYCAMORE, the county-seat of De Kalb County (founded in 1836), 56 miles west of Chicago, at the intersection of the Chicago & Northwestern and the Chicago Great Western Railroads; lies in a region devoted to agriculture, dairying and stock-raising. The city itself contains several factories, the principal products being agricultural implements, flour, insulated wire, brick, tile, varnish, furniture, soap and carriages and wagons. There are also works for canning vegetables and fruit, besides two creameries. The town is lighted by electricity, and has high-pressure water-works. There are eleven churches, three graded public schools and a young ladies' seminary. Population (1880), 3,028; (1890), 2,987; (1900), 3,653.

TAFT, Lorado, sculptor, was born at Elmwood, Peoria County, Ill., April 29, 1860; at an early age evinced a predilection for sculpture and began modeling; graduated at the University of Illinois in 1880, then went to Paris and studied sculpture in the famous Ecole des Beaux Arts until 1885. The following year he settled in Chicago, finally becoming associated with the Chicago Art Institute. He has been a lecturer on art in the Chicago University. Mr. Taft furnished the decorations of the Horticultural Building on the World's Fair Grounds, in 1893.

TALCOTT, Mancel, business man, was born in Rome, N. Y., Oct. 12, 1817; attended the common schools until 17 years of age, when he set out for the West, traveling on foot from Detroit to Chicago, and thence to Park Ridge, where he worked at farming until 1850. Then, having followed the occupation of a miner for some time, in California, with some success, he united with Horace M. Singer in establishing the firm of Singer & Talcott, stone-dealers, which lasted during most of his life. He served as a member of the Chicago City Council, on the Board of County Commissioners, as a member of the Police Board, and was one of the founders of the First National Bank, and President, for several years, of the Stock Yards National Bank. Liberal and public-spirited, he contributed freely to works of charity. Died, June 5, 1878.

TALCOTT, (Capt.) William, soldier of the War of 1812 and pioneer, was born in Gilead, Conn., March 6, 1774; emigrated to Rome, Oneida County, N. Y., in 1810, and engaged in farming; served as a Lieutenant in the Oneida County militia during the War of 1812-14, being stationed at Sackett's Harbor under the command of Gen. Winfield Scott. In 1835, in company with his eldest son, Thomas B. Talcott, he made an extended tour through the West, finally selecting a location in Illinois at the junction of Rock River and the Pecatonica, where the town of Rockton now stands—there being only two white families, at that time, within the present limits of Winnebago County. Two years later (1837), he brought his family to this point, with his sons took up a considerable body of Government land and erected two mills, to which customers came from a long distance. In 1838 Captain Talcott took part in the organization of the first Congregational Church in that section of the State. A zealous anti-slavery man, he supported James G.

Birney (the Liberty candidate for President) in 1844, continuing to act with that party until the organization of the Republican party in 1856; was deeply interested in the War for the Union, but died before its conclusion, Sept. 2, 1864.—Maj. Thomas B. (Talcott), oldest son of the preceding, was born at Hebron, Conn., April 17, 1806; was taken to Rome, N. Y., by his father in infancy, and, after reaching maturity, engaged in mercantile business with his brother in Chemung County; in 1835 accompanied his father in a tour through the West, finally locating at Rockton, where he engaged in agriculture. On the organization of Winnebago County, in 1836, he was elected one of the first County Commissioners, and, in 1850, to the State Senate, serving four years. He also held various local offices. Died, Sept. 30, 1894.—Hon. Wait (Talcott), second son of Capt. William Talcott, was born at Hebron, Conn., Oct. 17, 1807, and taken to Rome, N. Y., where he remained until his 19th year, when he engaged in business at Booneville and, still later, in Utica; in 1838, removed to Illinois and joined his father at Rockton, finally becoming a citizen of Rockford, where, in his later years, he was extensively engaged in manufacturing, having become, in 1854, with his brother Sylvester, a partner of the firm of J. H. Manny & Co., in the manufacture of the Manny reaper and mower. He was an original anti-slavery man and, at one time, a Free-Soil candidate for Congress, but became a zealous Republican and ardent friend of Abraham Lincoln, whom he employed as an attorney in the famous suit of McCormick vs. the Manny Reaper Company for infringement of patent. In 1854 he was elected to the State Senate, succeeding his brother, Thomas B., and was the first Collector of Internal Revenue in the Second District, appointed by Mr. Lincoln in 1862, and continuing in office some five years. Though too old for active service in the field, during the Civil War, he voluntarily hired a substitute to take his place. Mr. Talcott was one of the original incorporators and Trustees of Beloit College, and a founder of Rockford Female Seminary, remaining a trustee of each for many years. Died, June 7, 1890.—Sylvester (Talcott), third son of William Talcott, born at Rome, N. Y., Oct. 14, 1810; when of age, engaged in mercantile business in Chemung County; in 1837 removed, with other members of the family, to Winnebago County, Ill., where he joined his father in the entry of Government lands and the erection of mills, as already detailed. He became one of the first Justices of the Peace in Winnebago County, also served as Supervisor for a number of years and, although a farmer, became interested, in 1854, with his brother Wait, in the Manny Reaper Company at Rockford. He also followed the example of his brother, just named, in furnishing a substitute for the War of the Rebellion, though too old for service himself. Died, June 19, 1885.—Henry Walter (Talcott), fourth son of William Talcott, was born at Rome, N. Y., Feb. 13, 1814; came with his father to Winnebago County, Ill., in 1835, and was connected with his father and brothers in business. Died, Dec. 9, 1870.—Dwight Lewis (Talcott), oldest son of Henry Walter Talcott, born in Winnebago County; at the age of 17 years enlisted at Belvidere, in January, 1864, as a soldier in the Ninth Illinois Volunteer Infantry; served as provost guard some two months at Fort Pickering, near Memphis, and later took part in many of the important battles of that year in Mississippi and Tennessee. Having been captured at Campbellsville, Tenn., he was taken to Andersonville, Ga., where he suffered all the horrors of that famous prison-pen, until March, 1865, when he was released, arriving at home a helpless skeleton, the day after Abraham Lincoln's assassination. Mr. Talcott subsequently settled in Muscatine County, Iowa.

TALLULA, a prosperous village of Menard County, on the Jacksonville branch of the Chicago & Alton Railway, 24 miles northeast of Jacksonville; is in the midst of a grain, coal-mining, and stock-growing region; has a local bank and newspaper. Pop. (1890), 445; (1900), 639.

TAMAROA, a village in Perry County, situated at the junction of the Illinois Central with the Wabash, Chester & Western Railroad, 8 miles north of Duquoin, and 57 miles east-southeast of Belleville. It has a bank, a newspaper office, a large public school, five churches and two flouring mills. Coal is mined here and exported in large quantities. Pop. (1900), 853.

TAMAROA & MOUNT VERNON RAILROAD. (See Wabash, Chester & Western Railroad.)

TANNER, Edward Allen, clergyman and educator, was born of New England ancestry, at Waverly, Ill., Nov. 29, 1837—being the first child who could claim nativity there; was educated in the local schools and at Illinois College, graduating from the latter in 1857; spent four years teaching in his native place and at Jacksonville; then accepted the Professorship of Latin in Pacific University at Portland, Oregon, remaining four years, when he returned to his Alma Mater (1865), assuming there the chair of Latin and Rhetoric. In 1881 he was appointed financial agent of the latter institution, and, in 1882, its President. While in Oregon he had been ordained a minister of the Congregational Church, and, for a considerable period during his connection with Illinois College, officiated as Chaplain of the Central Hospital for the Insane at Jacksonville, besides supplying local and other pulpits. He labored earnestly for the benefit of the institution under his charge, and, during his incumbency, added materially to its endowment and resources. Died, at Jacksonville, Feb. 8, 1892.

TANNER, John R., Governor, was born in Warrick County, Ind., April 4, 1844, and brought to Southern Illinois in boyhood, where he grew up on a farm in the vicinity of Carbondale, enjoying only such educational advantages as were afforded by the common school; in 1863, at the age of 19, enlisted in the Ninety-eighth Illinois Volunteers, serving until June, 1865, when he was transferred to the Sixty-first, and finally mustered out in September following. All the male members of Governor Tanner's family were soldiers of the late war, his father dying in a rebel prison at Columbus, Miss., one of his brothers suffering the same fate from wounds at Nashville, Tenn., and another brother dying in hospital at Pine Bluff, Ark. Only one of this patriotic family, besides Governor Tanner, still survives—Mr. J. M. Tanner of Clay County, who left the service with the rank of Lieutenant of the Thirtieth Illinois Cavalry. Returning from the war, Mr. Tanner established himself in business as a farmer in Clay County, later engaging successfully in the milling and lumber business as the partner of his brother. The public positions held by him, since the war, include those of Sheriff of Clay County (1870-73), Clerk of the Circuit Court (1872-76), and State Senator (1880-83). During the latter year he received the appointment of United States Marshal for the Southern District of Illinois, serving until after the accession of President Cleveland in 1885. In 1886, he was the Republican nominee for State Treasurer and was elected by an unusually large majority; in 1891 was appointed, by Governor Fifer, a member of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission, but, in 1892, received the appointment of Assistant United States Treasurer at Chicago, continuing in the latter office until December, 1893. For ten years (1874-84) he was a member of the Republican State Central Committee, returning to that body in 1894, when he was chosen Chairman and conducted the campaign which resulted in the unprecedented Republican successes of that year. In 1896 he received the nomination of his party for Governor, and was elected over Gov. John P. Altgeld, his Democratic opponent, by a plurality of over 113,000, and a majority, over all, of nearly 90,000 votes.

TANNER, Tazewell B., jurist, was born in Henry County, Va., and came to Jefferson County, Ill., about 1846 or '47, at first taking a position as teacher and Superintendent of Public Schools. Later, he was connected with "The Jeffersonian," a Democratic paper at Mount Vernon, and, in 1849, went to the gold regions of California, meeting with reasonable success as a miner. Returning in a year or two, he was elected Clerk of the Circuit Court, and, while in the discharge of his duties, prosecuted the study of law, finally, on admission to the bar, entering into partnership with the late Col. Thomas S. Casey. In 1854 he was elected Representative in the Nineteenth General Assembly, and was instrumental in securing the appropriation for the erection of a Supreme Court building at Mount Vernon. In 1862 he served as a Delegate to the State Constitutional Convention of that year; was elected Circuit Judge in 1873, and, in 1877, was assigned to duty on the Appellate bench, but, at the expiration of his term, declined a re-election and resumed the practice of his profession at Mount Vernon. Died, March 25, 1880.

TAXATION, in its legal sense, the mode of raising revenue. In its general sense its purposes are the support of the State and local governments, the promotion of the public good by fostering education and works of public improvement, the protection of society by the preservation of order and the punishment of crime, and the support of the helpless and destitute. In practice, and as prescribed by the Constitution, the raising of revenue is required to be done "by levying a tax by valuation, so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her or its property—such value to be ascertained by some person or persons, to be elected or appointed in such manner as the General Assembly shall direct, and not otherwise." (State Constitution, 1870—Art. Revenue, Sec. 1.) The person selected under the law to make this valuation is the Assessor of the county or the township (in counties under township organization), and he is required to make a return to the County Board at its July meeting each year—the latter having authority to hear complaints of taxpayers and adjust inequalities when found to exist. It is made the duty of the Assessor to include in his return, as real-estate, all lands and the buildings or other improvements erected thereon; and, under the head of personal property, all tangible effects, besides moneys, credits, bonds or stocks, shares of stock of companies or corporations, investments, annuities, franchises, royalties, etc. Property used for school, church or cemetery purposes, as well as public buildings and other property belonging to the State and General Government, municipalities, public charities, public libraries, agricultural and scientific societies, are declared exempt. Nominally, all property subject to taxation is required to be assessed at its cash valuation; but, in reality, the valuation, of late years, has been on a basis of twenty-five to thirty-three per cent of its estimated cash value. In the larger cities, however, the valuation is often much lower than this, while very large amounts escape assessment altogether. The Revenue Act, passed at the special session of the Fortieth General Assembly (1898), requires the Assessor to make a return of all property subject to taxation in his district, at its cash valuation, upon which a Board of Review fixes a tax on the basis of twenty per cent of such cash valuation. An abstract of the property assessment of each county goes before the State Board of Equalization, at its annual meeting in August, for the purpose of comparison and equalizing valuations between counties, but the Board has no power to modify the assessments of individual tax-payers. (See State Board of Equalization.) This Board has exclusive power to fix the valuation for purposes of taxation of the capital stock or franchises of companies (except certain specified manufacturing corporations), incorporated under the State laws, together with the "railroad track" and "rolling stock" of railroads, and the capital stock of railroads and telegraph lines, and to fix the distribution of the latter between counties in which they lie.—The Constitution of 1848 empowered the Legislature to impose a capitation tax, of not less than fifty cents nor more than one dollar, upon each free white male citizen entitled to the right of suffrage, between the ages of 21 and 60 years, but the Constitution of 1870 grants no such power, though it authorizes the extension of the "objects and subjects of taxation" in accordance with the principle contained in the first section of the Revenue Article.—Special assessments in cities, for the construction of sewers, pavements, etc., being local and in the form of benefits, cannot be said to come under the head of general taxation. The same is to be said of revenue derived from fines and penalties, which are forms of punishment for specific offenses, and go to the benefit of certain specified funds.

TAYLOR, Abner, ex-Congressman, is a native of Maine, and a resident of Chicago. He has been in active business all his life as contractor, builder and merchant, and, for some time, a member of the wholesale dry-goods firm of J. V. Farwell & Co., of Chicago. He was a member of the Thirty-fourth General Assembly, a delegate to the National Republican Convention of 1884, and represented the First Illinois District in the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses, 1889 to 1893. Mr. Taylor was one of the contractors for the erection of the new State Capitol of Texas.

TAYLOR, Benjamin Franklin, journalist, poet and lecturer, was born at Lowville, N. Y., July 19, 1819; graduated at Madison University in 1839, the next year becoming literary and dramatic critic of "The Chicago Evening Journal." Here, in a few years, he acquired a wide reputation as a journalist and poet, and was much in demand as a lecturer on literary topics. His letters from the field during the Rebellion, as war correspondent of "The Evening Journal," won for him even a greater popularity, and were complimented by translation into more than one European language. After the war, he gave his attention more unreservedly to literature, his principal works appearing after that date. His publications in book form, including both prose and poetry, comprise the following: "Attractions of Language" (1845); "January and June" (1853); "Pictures in Camp and Field" (1871); "The World on Wheels" (1873); "Old Time Pictures and Sheaves of Rhyme" (1874); "Songs of Yesterday" (1877); "Summer Savory Gleaned from Rural Nooks" (1879); "Between the Gates"—pictures of California life—(1881); "Dulce Domum, the Burden of Song" (1884), and "Theophilus Trent, or Old Times in the Oak Openings," a novel (1887). The last was in the hands of the publishers at his death, Feb. 27, 1887. Among his most popular poems are "The Isle of the Long Ago," "The Old Village Choir," and "Rhymes of the River." "The London Times" complimented Mr. Taylor with the title of "The Oliver Goldsmith of America."

TAYLOR, Edmund Dick, early Indian-trader and legislator, was born at Fairfield C. H., Va., Oct. 18, 1802—the son of a commissary in the army of the Revolution, under General Greene, and a cousin of General (later, President) Zachary Taylor; left his native State in his youth and, at an early day, came to Springfield, Ill., where he opened an Indian-trading post and general store; was elected from Sangamon County to the lower branch of the Seventh General Assembly (1830) and re-elected in 1832—the latter year being a competitor of Abraham Lincoln, whom he defeated. In 1834 he was elected to the State Senate and, at the next session of the Legislature, was one of the celebrated "Long Nine" who secured the removal of the State Capital to Springfield. He resigned before the close of his term to accept, from President Jackson, the appointment of Receiver of Public Moneys at Chicago. Here he became one of the promoters of the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad (1837), serving as one of the Commissioners to secure subscriptions of stock, and was also active in advocating the construction of the Illinois & Michigan Canal. The title of "Colonel," by which he was known during most of his life, was acquired by service, with that rank, on the staff of Gov. John Reynolds, during the Black Hawk War of 1832. After coming to Chicago, Colonel Taylor became one of the Trustees of the Chicago branch of the State Bank, and was later identified with various banking enterprises, as also a somewhat extensive operator in real estate. An active Democrat in the early part of his career in Illinois, Colonel Taylor was one of the members of his party to take ground against the Kansas-Nebraska bill in 1854, and advocated the election of General Bissell to the governorship in 1856. In 1860 he was again in line with his party in support of Senator Douglas for the Presidency, and was an opponent of the war policy of the Government still later, as shown by his participation in the celebrated "Peace Convention" at Springfield, of June 17, 1863. In the latter years of his life he became extensively interested in coal lands in La Salle and adjoining counties, and, for a considerable time, served as President of the Northern Illinois Coal & Mining Company, his home, during a part of this period, being at Mendota. Died, in Chicago, Dec. 4, 1891.

TAYLORVILLE, a city and county-seat of Christian County, on the South Fork of the Sangamon River and on the Wabash Railway at its point of intersection with the Springfield Division of the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern. It is about 27 miles southeast of Springfield, and 28 miles southwest of Decatur. It has several banks, flour mills, paper mill, electric light and gas plants, water-works, two coal mines, carriage and wagon shops, a manufactory of farming implements, two daily and weekly papers, nine churches and five graded and township high schools. Much coal is mined in this vicinity. Pop. (1890), 2,839; (1900), 4,248.

TAZEWELL COUNTY, a central county on the Illinois River; was first settled in 1823 and organized in 1827; has an area of 650 square miles—was named for Governor Tazewell of Virginia. It is drained by the Illinois and Mackinaw Rivers and traversed by several lines of railway. The surface is generally level, the soil alluvial and rich, but, requiring drainage, especially on the river bottoms. Gravel, coal and sandstone are found, but, generally speaking, Tazewell is an agricultural county. The cereals are extensively cultivated; wool is also clipped, and there are dairy interests of some importance. Distilling is extensively conducted at Pekin, the county-seat, which is also the seat of other mechanical industries. (See also Pekin.) Population of the county (1880), 29,666; (1890), 29,556; (1900), 33,221.

TEMPLE, John Taylor, M.D., early Chicago physician, born in Virginia in 1804, graduated in medicine at Middlebury College, Vt., in 1830, and, in 1833, arrived in Chicago. At this time he had a contract for carrying the United States mail from Chicago to Fort Howard, near Green Bay, and the following year undertook a similar contract between Chicago and Ottawa. Having sold these out three years later, he devoted his attention to the practice of his profession, though interested, for a time, in contracts for the construction of the Illinois & Michigan Canal. Dr. Temple was instrumental in erecting the first house (after Rev. Jesse Walker's missionary station at Wolf Point), for public religious worship in Chicago, and, although himself a Baptist, it was used in common by Protestant denominations. He was a member of the first Board of Trustees of Rush Medical College, though he later became a convert to homeopathy, and finally, removing to St. Louis, assisted in founding the St. Louis School of Homeopathy, dying there, Feb. 24, 1877.

TENURE OF OFFICE. (See Elections.)

TERRE HAUTE, ALTON & ST. LOUIS RAILROAD. (See St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad.)

TERRE HAUTE & ALTON RAILROAD (See St. Louis, Alton & Terre Haute Railroad.)

TERRE HAUTE & INDIANAPOLIS RAILROAD, a corporation operating no line of its own within the State, but the lessee and operator of the following lines (which see): St. Louis, Vandalia & Terre Haute, 158.3 miles; Terre Haute & Peoria, 145.12 miles; East St. Louis & Carondelet, 12.74 miles—total length of leased lines in Illinois, 316.16 miles. The Terre Haute & Indianapolis Railroad was incorporated in Indiana in 1847, as the Terre Haute & Richmond, completed a line between the points named in the title, in 1852, and took its present name in 1866. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company purchased a controlling interest in its stock in 1893.

TERRE HAUTE & PEORIA RAILROAD, (Vandalia Line), a line of road extending from Terre Haute, Ind., to Peoria, Ill., 145.12 miles, with 28.78 miles of trackage, making in all 173.9 miles in operation, all being in Illinois—operated by the Terre Haute & Indianapolis Railroad Company. The gauge is standard, and the rails are steel. (HISTORY.) It was organized Feb. 7, 1887, successor to the Illinois Midland Railroad. The latter was made up by the consolidation (Nov. 4, 1874) of three lines: (1) The Peoria, Atlanta & Decatur Railroad, chartered in 1869 and opened in 1874; (2) the Paris & Decatur Railroad, chartered in 1861 and opened in December, 1872; and (3) the Paris & Terre Haute Railroad, chartered in 1873 and opened in 1874—the consolidated lines assuming the name of the Illinois Midland Railroad. In 1886 the Illinois Midland was sold under foreclosure and, in February, 1887, reorganized as the Terre Haute & Peoria Railroad. In 1892 it was leased for ninety-nine years to the Terre Haute & Indianapolis Railroad Company, and is operated as a part of the "Vandalia System." The capital stock (1898) was $3,764,200; funded debt, $2,230,000,—total capital invested, $6,227,481.

TEUTOPOLIS, a village of Effingham County, on the Terre Haute & Indianapolis Railroad, 4 miles east of Effingham; was originally settled by a colony of Germans from Cincinnati. Population (1900), 498.

THOMAS, Horace H., lawyer and legislator, was born in Vermont, Dec. 18, 1831, graduated at Middlebury College, and, after admission to the bar, removed to Chicago, where he commenced practice. At the outbreak of the rebellion he enlisted and was commissioned Assistant Adjutant-General of the Army of the Ohio. At the close of the war he took up his residence in Tennessee, serving as Quartermaster upon the staff of Governor Brownlow. In 1867 he returned to Chicago and resumed practice. He was elected a Representative in the Legislature in 1878 and re-elected in 1880, being chosen Speaker of the House during his latter term. In 1888 he was elected State Senator from the Sixth District, serving during the sessions of the Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh General Assemblies. In 1897, General Thomas was appointed United States Appraiser in connection with the Custom House in Chicago.

THOMAS, Jesse Burgess, jurist and United States Senator, was born at Hagerstown, Md., claiming direct descent from Lord Baltimore. Taken west in childhood, he grew to manhood and settled at Lawrenceburg, Indiana Territory, in 1803; in 1805 was Speaker of the Territorial Legislature and, later, represented the Territory as Delegate in Congress. On the organization of Illinois Territory (which he had favored), he removed to Kaskaskia, was appointed one of the first Judges for the new Territory, and, in 1818, as Delegate from St. Clair County, presided over the first State Constitutional Convention, and, on the admission of the State, became one of the first United States Senators—Governor Edwards being his colleague. Though an avowed advocate of slavery, he gained no little prominence as the author of the celebrated "Missouri Compromise," adopted in 1820. He was re-elected to the Senate in 1823, serving until 1829. He subsequently removed to Mount Vernon, Ohio, where he died by suicide, May 4, 1853.—Jesse Burgess (Thomas), Jr., nephew of the United States Senator of the same name, was born at Lebanon, Ohio, July 31, 1806, was educated at Transylvania University, and, being admitted to the bar, located at Edwardsville, Ill. He first appeared in connection with public affairs as Secretary of the State Senate in 1830, being re-elected in 1832; in 1834 was elected Representative in the General Assembly from Madison County, but, in February following, was appointed Attorney-General, serving only one year. He afterwards held the position of Circuit Judge (1837-39), his home being then in Springfield; in 1843 he became Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, by appointment of the Governor, as successor to Stephen A. Douglas, and was afterwards elected to the same office by the Legislature, remaining until 1848. During a part of his professional career he was the partner of David Prickett and William L. May, at Springfield, and afterwards a member of the Galena bar, finally removing to Chicago, where he died, Feb. 21, 1850.—Jesse B. (Thomas) third, clergyman and son of the last named; born at Edwardsville, Ill., July 29, 1832; educated at Kenyon College, Ohio, and Rochester (N. Y.) Theological Seminary; practiced law for a time in Chicago, but finally entered the Baptist ministry, serving churches at Waukegan, Ill., Brooklyn, N. Y., and San Francisco (1862-69). He then became pastor of the Michigan Avenue Baptist Church, in Chicago, remaining until 1874, when he returned to Brooklyn. In 1887 he became Professor of Biblical History in the Theological Seminary at Newton, Mass., where he has since resided. He is the author of several volumes, and, in 1886, received the degree of D.D. from the old University of Chicago.

THOMAS, John, pioneer and soldier of the Black Hawk War, was born in Wythe County, Va., Jan. 11, 1800. At the age of 18 he accompanied his parents to St. Clair County, Ill., where the family located in what was then called the Alexander settlement, near the present site of Shiloh. When he was 22 he rented a farm (although he had not enough money to buy a horse) and married. Six years later he bought and stocked a farm, and, from that time forward, rapidly accumulated real property, until he became one of the most extensive owners of farming land in St. Clair County. In early life he was fond of military exercise, holding various offices in local organizations and serving as a Colonel in the Black Hawk War. In 1824 he was one of the leaders of the party opposed to the amendment of the State Constitution to sanction slavery, was a zealous opponent of the Kansas-Nebraska bill in 1854, and a firm supporter of the Republican party from the date of its formation. He was elected to the lower house of the General Assembly in 1838, '62, '64, '72 and '74; and to the State Senate in 1878, serving four years in the latter body. Died, at Belleville, Dec. 16, 1894, in the 95th year of his age.

THOMAS, John R., ex-Congressman, was born at Mount Vernon, Ill., Oct. 11, 1846. He served in the Union Army during the War of the Rebellion, rising from the ranks to a captaincy. After his return home he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1869. From 1872 to 1876 he was State's Attorney, and, from 1879 to 1889, represented his District in Congress. In 1897, Mr. Thomas was appointed by President McKinley an additional United States District Judge for Indian Territory. His home is now at Vanita, in that Territory.

THOMAS, William, pioneer lawyer and legislator, was born in what is now Allen County, Ky., Nov. 23, 1802; received a rudimentary education, and served as deputy of his father (who was Sheriff), and afterwards of the County Clerk; studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1823; in 1826 removed to Jacksonville, Ill., where he taught school, served as a private in the Winnebago War (1827), and at the session of 1828-29, reported the proceedings of the General Assembly for "The Vandalia Intelligencer"; was State's Attorney and School Commissioner of Morgan County; served as Quartermaster and Commissary in the Black Hawk War (1831-32), first under Gen. Joseph Duncan and, a year later, under General Whiteside; in 1839 was appointed Circuit Judge, but legislated out of office two years later. It was as a member of the Legislature, however, that he gained the greatest prominence, first as State Senator in 1834-40, and Representative in 1846-48 and 1850-52, when he was especially influential in the legislation which resulted in establishing the institutions for the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind, and the Hospital for the Insane (the first in the State) at Jacksonville—serving, for a time, as a member of the Board of Trustees of the latter. He was also prominent in connection with many enterprises of a local character, including the establishment of the Illinois Female College, to which, although without children of his own, he was a liberal contributor. During the first year of the war he was a member of the Board of Army Auditors by appointment of Governor Yates. Died, at Jacksonville, August 23, 1889.

THORNTON, Anthony, jurist, was born in Bourbon County, Ky., Nov. 9, 1814—being descended from a Virginia family. After the usual primary instruction in the common schools, he spent two years in a high school at Gallatin, Tenn., when he entered Centre College at Danville, Ky., afterwards continuing his studies at Miami University, Ohio, where he graduated in 1834. Having studied law with an uncle at Paris, Ky., he was licensed to practice in 1836, when he left his native State with a view to settling in Missouri, but, visiting his uncle, Gen. William F. Thornton, at Shelbyville, Ill., was induced to establish himself in practice there. He served as a member of the State Constitutional Conventions of 1847 and 1862, and as Representative in the Seventeenth General Assembly (1850-52) for Shelby County. In 1864 he was elected to the Thirty-ninth Congress, and, in 1870, to the Illinois Supreme Court, but served only until 1873, when he resigned. In 1879 Judge Thornton removed to Decatur, Ill., but subsequently returned to Shelbyville, where (1898) he now resides.

THORNTON, William Fitzhugh, Commissioner of the Illinois & Michigan Canal, was born in Hanover County, Va., Oct. 4, 1789; in 1806, went to Alexandria, Va., where he conducted a drug business for a time, also acting as associate editor of "The Alexandria Gazette." Subsequently removing to Washington City, he conducted a paper there in the interest of John Quincy Adams for the Presidency. During the War of 1812-14 he served as a Captain of cavalry, and, for a time, as staff-officer of General Winder. On occasion of the visit of Marquis La Fayette to America (1824-25) he accompanied the distinguished Frenchman from Baltimore to Richmond. In 1829 he removed to Kentucky, and, in 1833, to Shelbyville, Ill., where he soon after engaged in mercantile business, to which he added a banking and brokerage business in 1859, with which he was actively associated until his death. In 1836, he was appointed, by Governor Duncan, one of the Commissioners of the Illinois & Michigan Canal, serving as President of the Board until 1842. In 1840, he made a visit to London, as financial agent of the State, in the interest of the Canal, and succeeded in making a sale of bonds to the amount of $1,000,000 on what were then considered favorable terms. General Thornton was an ardent Whig until the organization of the Republican party, when he became a Democrat. Died, at Shelbyville, Oct. 21, 1873.

TILLSON, John, pioneer, was born at Halifax, Mass., March 13, 1796; came to Illinois in 1819, locating at Hillsboro, Montgomery County, where he became a prominent and enterprising operator in real estate, doing a large business for eastern parties; was one of the founders of Hillsboro Academy and an influential and liberal friend of Illinois College, being a Trustee of the latter from its establishment until his death; was supported in the Legislature of 1837 for State Treasurer, but defeated by James Hall. Died, at Peoria, May 11, 1853.—Christiana Holmes (Tillson), wife of the preceding, was born at Kingston, Mass., Oct. 10, 1798; married to John Tillson in 1822, and immediately came to Illinois to reside; was a woman of rare culture and refinement, and deeply interested in benevolent enterprises. Died, in New York City, May 29, 1872.—Charles Holmes (Tillson), son of John and Christiana Holmes Tillson, was born at Hillsboro, Ill., Sept. 15, 1823; educated at Hillsboro Academy and Illinois College, graduating from the latter in 1844; studied law in St. Louis and at Transylvania University, was admitted to the bar in St. Louis and practiced there some years—also served several terms in the City Council, and was a member of the National Guard of Missouri in the War of the Rebellion. Died, Nov. 25, 1865.—John (Tillson), Jr., another son, was born at Hillsboro, Ill., Oct. 12, 1825; educated at Hillsboro Academy and Illinois College, but did not graduate from the latter; graduated from Transylvania Law School, Ky., in 1847, and was admitted to the bar at Quincy, Ill., the same year; practiced two years at Galena, when he returned to Quincy. In 1861 he enlisted in the Tenth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, became its Lieutenant-Colonel, on the promotion of Col. J. D. Morgan to Brigadier-General, was advanced to the colonelcy, and, in July, 1865, was mustered out with the rank of brevet Brigadier-General; for two years later held a commission as Captain in the regular army. During a portion of 1869-70 he was editor of "The Quincy Whig"; in 1873 was elected Representative in the Twenty-eighth General Assembly to succeed Nehemiah Bushnell, who had died in office, and, during the same year, was appointed Collector of Internal Revenue for the Quincy District, serving until 1881. Died, August 6, 1892.

TILLSON, Robert, pioneer, was born in Halifax County, Mass., August 12, 1800; came to Illinois in 1822, and was employed, for several years, as a clerk in the land agency of his brother, John Tillson, at Hillsboro. In 1826 he engaged in the mercantile business with Charles Holmes, Jr., in St. Louis, but, in 1828, removed to Quincy, Ill., where he opened the first general store in that city; also served as Postmaster for some ten years. During this period he built the first two-story frame building erected in Quincy, up to that date. Retiring from the mercantile business in 1840 he engaged in real estate, ultimately becoming the proprietor of considerable property of this character; was also a contractor for furnishing cavalry accouterments to the Government during the war. Soon after the war he erected one of the handsomest business blocks existing in the city at that time. Died, in Quincy, Dec. 27, 1892.

TINCHER, John L., banker, was born in Kentucky in 1821; brought by his parents to Vermilion County, Ind., in 1829, and left an orphan at 17; attended school in Coles County, Ill., and was employed as clerk in a store at Danville, 1843-53. He then became a member of the firm of Tinchcr & English, merchants, later establishing a bank, which became the First National Bank of Danville. In 1864 Mr. Tinchcr was elected Representative in the Twenty-fourth General Assembly and, two years later, to the Senate, being re-elected in 1870. He was also a member of the State Constitutional Convention of 1869-70. Died, in Springfield, Dec. 17, 1871, while in attendance on the adjourned session of that year.

TIPTON, Thomas F., lawyer and jurist, was born in Franklin County, Ohio, August 29, 1833; has been a resident of McLean County, Ill., from the age of 10 years, his present home being at Bloomington. He was admitted to the bar in 1857, and, from January, 1867, to December, 1868, was State's Attorney for the Eighth Judicial Circuit. In 1870 he was elected Judge of the same circuit, and under the new Constitution, was chosen Judge of the new Fourteenth Circuit. From 1877 to 1879 he represented the (then) Thirteenth Illinois District in Congress, but, in 1878, was defeated by Adlai E. Stevenson, the Democratic nominee. In 1891 he was re-elected to a seat on the Circuit bench for the Bloomington Circuit, but resumed practice at the expiration of his term in 1897.

TISKILWA, a village of Bureau County, on the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway, 7 miles southwest of Princeton; has creameries and cheese factories, churches, school, library, water-works, bank and a newspaper. Pop. (1900), 965.

TODD, (Col.) John, soldier, was born in Montgomery County, Pa., in 1750; took part in the battle of Point Pleasant, Va., in 1774, as Adjutant-General of General Lewis; settled as a lawyer at Fincastle, Va., and, in 1775, removed to Fayette County, Ky., the next year locating near Lexington. He was one of the first two Delegates from Kentucky County to the Virginia House of Burgesses, and, in 1778, accompanied Col. George Rogers Clark on his expedition against Kaskaskia and Vincennes. In December, 1778, he was appointed by Gov. Patrick Henry, Lieutenant-Commandant of Illinois County, embracing the region northwest of the Ohio River, serving two years; in 1780, was again a member of the Virginia Legislature, where he procured grants of land for public schools and introduced a bill for negro-emancipation. He was killed by Indians, at the battle of Blue Licks, Ky., August 19, 1782.

TODD, (Dr.) John, physician, born near Lexington, Ky., April 27, 1787, was one of the earliest graduates of Transylvania University, also graduating at the Medical University of Philadelphia; was appointed Surgeon-General of Kentucky troops in the War of 1812, and captured at the battle of River Raisin. Returning to Lexington after his release, he practiced there and at Bardstown, removed to Edwardsville, Ill., in 1817, and, in 1827, to Springfield, where he had been appointed Register of the Land Office by President John Quincy Adams, but was removed by Jackson in 1829. Dr. Todd continued to reside at Springfield until his death, which occurred, Jan. 9, 1865. He was a grandson of John Todd, who was appointed Commandant of Illinois County by Gov. Patrick Henry in 1778, and an uncle of Mrs. Abraham Lincoln.—John Blair Smith (Todd), son of the preceding, was born at Lexington, Ky., April 4, 1814; came with his father to Illinois in 1817; graduated at the United States Military Academy in 1837, serving afterwards in the Florida and Mexican wars and on the frontier; resigned, and was an Indian-trader in Dakota, 1856-61; the latter year, took his seat as a Delegate in Congress from Dakota, then served as Brigadier-General of Volunteers, 1861-62; was again Delegate in Congress in 1863-65, Speaker of the Dakota Legislature in 1867, and Governor of the Territory, 1869-71. Died, at Yankton City, Jan. 5, 1872.

TOLEDO, a village and the county-seat of Cumberland County, on the Illinois Central Railroad; founded in 1854; has five churches, a graded school, two banks, creamery, flour mill, elevator, and two weekly newspapers. There are no manufacturing, the leading industry in the surrounding country being agriculture. Pop. (1890), 676; (1900), 818.

TOLEDO, CINCINNATI & ST. LOUIS RAILROAD. (See Toledo, St. Louis & Kansas City Railroad.)

TOLEDO, PEORIA & WARSAW RAILROAD. (See Toledo, Peoria & Western Railway.)

TOLEDO, PEORIA & WESTERN RAILROAD. (See Toledo, Peoria & Western Railway.)

TOLEDO, PEORIA & WESTERN RAILWAY, a line of railroad wholly within the State of Illinois, extending from Effner, at the Indiana State line, west to the Mississippi River at Warsaw. The length of the whole line is 230.7 miles, owned entirely by the company. It is made up of a division from Effner to Peoria (110.9 miles)—which is practically an air-line throughout nearly its entire length—and the Peoria and Warsaw Division (108.8 miles) with branches from La Harpe to Iowa Junction (10.4 miles) and 0.6 of a mile connecting with the Keokuk bridge at Hamilton.—(HISTORY.) The original charter for this line was granted, in 1863, under the name of the Toledo, Peoria & Warsaw Railroad; the main line was completed in 1868, and the La Harpe & Iowa Junction branch in 1873. Default was made in 1873, the road sold under foreclosure, in 1880, and reorganized as the Toledo, Peoria & Western Railroad, and the line leased for 49½ years to the Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway Company. The latter defaulted in July, 1884, and, a year later, the Toledo, Peoria & Western was transferred to trustees for the first mortgage bond-holders, was sold under foreclosure in October, 1886, and, in March, 1887, the present company, under the name of the Toledo, Peoria & Western Railway Company, was organized for the purpose of taking over the property. In 1893 the Pennsylvania Railroad Company obtained a controlling interest in the stock, and, in 1894, an agreement, for joint ownership and management, was entered into between that corporation and the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company. The total capitalization, in 1898, was $9,712,433, of which $4,076,900 was in stock and $4,895,000 in bonds.

TOLEDO, ST. LOUIS & KANSAS CITY RAILROAD. This line crosses the State in a northeast direction from East St. Louis to Humrick, near the Indiana State line, with Toledo as its eastern terminus. The length of the entire line is 450.72 miles, of which 179½ miles are operated in Illinois.—(HISTORY.) The Illinois portion of the line grew out of the union of charters granted to the Tuscola, Charleston & Vincennes and the Charleston, Neoga & St. Louis Railroad Companies, which were consolidated in 1881 with certain Indiana lines under the name of the Toledo, Cincinnati & St. Louis Railroad. During 1882 a narrow-gauge road was constructed from Ridge Farm, in Vermilion County, to East St. Louis (173 miles). In 1885 this was sold under foreclosure and, in June, 1886, consolidated with the main line under the name of the Toledo, St. Louis & Kansas City Railroad. The whole line was changed to standard gauge in 1887-89, and otherwise materially improved, but, in 1893, went into the hands of receivers. Plans of reorganization have been under consideration, but the receivers were still in control in 1898.

TOLEDO, WABASH & WESTERN RAILROAD. (See Wabash Railroad.)

TOLONO, a city in Champaign County, situated at the intersection of the Wabash and the Illinois Central Railroads, 9 miles south of Champaign and 37 miles east-northeast of Decatur. It is the business center of a prosperous agricultural region. The town has five churches, a graded school, a bank, a button factory, and a weekly newspaper. Population (1890), 905; (1890), 902; (1900), 845.

TONICA, a village of La Salle County, on the Illinois Central Railway, 9 miles south of La Salle; the district is agricultural, but the place has some manufactures and a newspaper. Population (1890), 473; (1900), 497.

TONTY, Chevalier Henry de, explorer and soldier, born at Gaeta, Italy, about 1650. What is now known as the Tontine system of insurance undoubtedly originated with his father. The younger Tonty was adventurous, and, even as a youth, took part in numerous land and naval encounters. In the course of his experience he lost a hand, which was replaced by an iron or copper substitute. He embarked with La Salle in 1678, and aided in the construction of a fort at Niagara. He advanced into the country of the Illinois and established friendly relations with them, only to witness the defeat of his putative savage allies by the Iroquois. After various encounters (chiefly under the direction of La Salle) with the Indians in Illinois, he returned to Green Bay in 1681. The same year—under La Salle's orders—he began the erection of Fort St. Louis, on what is now called "Starved Rock" in La Salle County. In 1682 he descended the Mississippi to its mouth, with La Salle, but was ordered back to Mackinaw for assistance. In 1684 he returned to Illinois and successfully repulsed the Iroquois from Fort St. Louis. In 1686 he again descended the Mississippi in search of La Salle. Disheartened by the death of his commander and the loss of his early comrades, he took up his residence with the Illinois Indians. Among them he was found by Iberville in 1700, as a hunter and fur-trader. He died, in Mobile, in September, 1704. He was La Salle's most efficient coadjutor, and next to his ill-fated leader, did more than any other of the early French explorers to make Illinois known to the civilized world.

TOPOGRAPHY. Illinois is, generally speaking, an elevated table-land. If low water at Cairo be adopted as the maximum depression, and the summits of the two ridges hereinafter mentioned as the highest points of elevation, the altitude of this table land above the sea-level varies from 300 to 850 feet, the mean elevation being about 600 feet. The State has no mountain chains, and its few hills are probably the result of unequal denudation during the drift epoch. In some localities, particularly in the valley of the upper Mississippi, the streams have cut channels from 200 to 300 feet deep through the nearly horizontal strata, and here are found precipitous scarps, but, for the most part, the fundamental rocks are covered by a thick layer of detrital material. In the northwest there is a broken tract of uneven ground; the central portion of the State is almost wholly flat prairie, and, in the alluvial lands in the State, there are many deep valleys, eroded by the action of streams. The surface generally slopes toward the south and southwest, but the uniformity is broken by two ridges, which cross the State, one in either extremity. The northern ridge crosses the Rock River at Grand Detour and the Illinois at Split Rock, with an extreme altitude of 800 to 850 feet above sea-level, though the altitude of Mount Morris, in Ogle County, exceeds 900 feet. That in the south consists of a range of hills in the latitude of Jonesboro, and extending from Shawneetown to Grand Tower. These hills are also about 800 feet above the level of the ocean. The highest point in the State is in Jo Daviess County, just south of the Wisconsin State line (near Scale's Mound) reaching an elevation of 1,257 feet above sea-level, while the highest in the south is in the northeast corner of Pope County—1,046 feet—a spur of the Ozark mountains. The following statistics regarding elevations are taken from a report of Prof. C. W. Rolfe, of the University of Illinois, based on observations made under the auspices of the Illinois Board of World's Fair Commissioners: The lowest gauge of the Ohio river, at its mouth (above sea-level), is 268.58 feet, and the mean level of Lake Michigan at Chicago 581.28 feet. The altitudes of a few prominent points are as follows: Highest point in Jackson County, 695 feet; "Bald Knob" in Union County, 985; highest point in Cook County (Barrington), 818; in La Salle County (Mendota), 747; in Livingston (Strawn), 770; in Will (Monee), 804; in Pike (Arden), 790; in Lake (Lake Zurich), 880; in Bureau, 910; in Boone, 1,010; in Lee (Carnahan), 1,017; in Stephenson (Waddam's Grove), 1,018; in Kane (Briar Hill), 974; in Winnebago, 985. The elevations of important towns are: Peoria, 465; Jacksonville, 602; Springfield, 596; Galesburg, 755; Joliet, 537; Rockford, 728; Bloomington, 821. Outside of the immediate valleys of the streams, and a few isolated groves or copses, little timber is found in the northern and central portions of the State, and such growth as there is, lacks the thriftiness characteristic of the forests in the Ohio valley. These forests cover a belt extending some sixty miles north of Cairo, and, while they generally include few coniferous trees, they abound in various species of oak, black and white walnut, white and yellow poplar, ash, elm, sugar-maple, linden, honey locust, cottonwood, mulberry, sycamore, pecan, persimmon, and (in the immediate valley of the Ohio)

the cypress. From a commercial point of view, Illinois loses nothing through the lack of timber over three-fourths of the State's area. Chicago is an accessible market for the product of the forests of the upper lakes, so that the supply of lumber is ample, while extensive coal-fields supply abundant fuel. The rich soil of the prairies, with its abundance of organic matter (see Geological Formations), more than compensates for the want of pine forests, whose soil is ill adapted to agriculture. About two-thirds of the entire boundary of the State consists of navigable waters. These, with their tributary streams, ensure sufficient drainage.

TORRENS LAND TITLE SYSTEM. A system for the registration of titles to, and incumbrances upon, land, as well as transfers thereof, intended to remove all unnecessary obstructions to the cheap, simple and safe sale, acquisition and transfer of realty. The system has been in successful operation in Canada, Australia, New Zealand and British Columbia for many years, and it is also in force in some States in the American Union. An act providing for its introduction into Illinois was first passed by the Twentieth General Assembly, and approved, June 13, 1895. The final legislation in reference thereto was enacted by the succeeding Legislature, and was approved, May 1, 1897. It is far more elaborate in its consideration of details, and is believed to be, in many respects, much better adapted to accomplish the ends in view, than was the original act of 1895. The law is applicable only to counties of the first and second class, and can be adopted in no county except by a vote of a majority of the qualified voters of the same—the vote "for" or "against" to be taken at either the November or April elections, or at an election for the choice of Judges. Thus far the only county to adopt the system has been Cook, and there it encountered strong opposition on the part of certain parties of influence and wealth. After its adoption, a test case was brought, raising the question of the constitutionality of the act. The issue was taken to the Supreme Court, which tribunal finally upheld the law.—The Torrens system substitutes a certificate of registration and of transfer for the more elaborate deeds and mortgages in use for centuries. Under it there can be no actual transfer of a title until the same is entered upon the public land register, kept in the office of the Registrar, in which case the deed or mortgage becomes a mere power of attorney to authorize the transfer to be made, upon the principle of an ordinary stock transfer, or of the registration of a United States bond, the actual transfer and public notice thereof being simultaneous. A brief synopsis of the provisions of the Illinois statute is given below: Records of deeds are made Registrars, and required to give bonds of either $50,000 or $200,000, according to the population of the county. Any person or corporation, having an interest in land, may make application to any court having chancery jurisdiction, to have his title thereto registered. Such application must be in writing, signed and verified by oath, and must conform, in matters of specification and detail, with the requirements of the act. The court may refer the application to one of the standing examiners appointed by the Registrar, who are required to be competent attorneys and to give bond to examine into the title, as well as the truth of the applicant's statements. Immediately upon the filing of the application, notice thereof is given by the clerk, through publication and the issuance of a summons to be served, as in other proceedings in chancery, against all persons mentioned in the petition as having or claiming any interest in the property described. Any person interested, whether named as a defendant or not, may enter an appearance within the time allowed. A failure to enter an appearance is regarded as a confession by default. The court, in passing upon the application, is in no case bound by the examiner's report, but may require other and further proof; and, in its final adjudication, passes upon all questions of title and incumbrance, directing the Registrar to register the title in the party in whom it is to be vested, and making provision as to the manner and order in which incumbrances thereon shall appear upon the certificate to be issued. An appeal may be allowed to the Supreme Court, if prayed at the time of entering the decree, upon like terms as in other cases in chancery; and a writ of error may be sued out from that tribunal within two years after the entry of the order or decree. The period last mentioned may be said to be the statutory period of limitation, after which the decree of the court must be regarded as final, although safeguards are provided for those who may have been defrauded, and for a few other classes of persons. Upon the filing of the order or decree of the court, it becomes the duty of the Registrar to issue a certificate of title, the form of which is prescribed by the act, making such notations at the end as shall show and preserve the priorities of all estates, mortgages, incumbrances and changes to which the owner's title is subject. For the purpose of preserving evidence of the owner's handwriting, a receipt for the certificate, duly witnessed or acknowledged, is required of him, which is preserved in the Registrar's office. In case any registered owner should desire to transfer the whole or any part of his estate, or any interest therein, he is required to execute a conveyance to the transferee, which, together with the certificate of title last issued, must be surrendered to the Registrar. That official thereupon issues a new certificate, stamping the word "cancelled" across the surrendered certificate, as well as upon the corresponding entry in his books of record. When land is first brought within the operation of the act, the receiver of the certificate of title is required to pay to the Registrar one-tenth of one per cent of the value of the land, the aggregate so received to be deposited with and invested by the County Treasurer, and reserved as an indemnity fund for the reimbursement of persons sustaining any loss through any omission, mistake or malfeasance of the Registrar or his subordinates. The advantage claimed for the Torrens system is, chiefly, that titles registered thereunder can be dealt with more safely, quickly and inexpensively than under the old system; it being possible to close the entire transaction within an hour or two, without the need of an abstract of title, while (as the law is administered in Cook County) the cost of transfer is only $3. It is asserted that a title, once registered, can be dealt with almost as quickly and cheaply, and quite as safely, as shares of stock or registered bonds.

TOULON, the county-seat of Stark County, on the Peoria & Rock Island Railroad, 37 miles north-northwest of Peoria, and 11 miles southeast of Galva. Besides the county court house, the town has five churches and a high school, an academy, steam granite works, two banks, and two weekly papers. Population (1880), 967; (1890), 945; (1900), 1,057.

TOWER HILL, a village of Shelby County, on the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis and the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railroads, 7 miles east of Pana; has bank, grain elevators, and coal mine. Pop. (1900), 615.

TOWNSHEND, Richard W., lawyer and Congressman, was born in Prince George's County, Md., April 30, 1840. Between the ages of 10 and 18 he attended public and private schools at Washington, D. C. In 1858 he came to Illinois, where he began teaching, at the same time reading law with S. S. Marshall, at McLeansboro, where he was admitted to the bar in 1862, and where he began practice. From 1863 to 1868 he was Circuit Clerk of Hamilton County, and, from 1868 to 1872, Prosecuting Attorney for the Twelfth Judicial Circuit. In 1873 he removed to Shawneetown, where he became an officer of the Gallatin National Bank. From 1864 to 1875 he was a member of the Democratic State Central Committee, and a delegate to the National Democratic Convention at Baltimore, in 1872. For twelve years (1877 to 1889) he represented his District in Congress; was re-elected in 1888, but died, March 9, 1889, a few days after the beginning of his seventh term.

TRACY, John M., artist, was born in Illinois about 1840; served in an Illinois regiment during the Civil War; studied painting in Paris in 1866-76; established himself as a portrait painter in St. Louis and, later, won a high reputation as a painter of animals, being regarded as an authority on the anatomy of the horse and the dog. Died, at Ocean Springs, Miss., March 20, 1893.

TREASURERS. (See State Treasurers.)

TREAT, Samuel Hubbel, lawyer and jurist, was born at Plainfield, Otsego County, N. Y., June 21, 1811, worked on his father's farm and studied law at Richfield, where he was admitted to practice. In 1834 he came to Springfield, Ill., traveling most of the way on foot. Here he formed a partnership with George Forquer, who had held the offices of Secretary of State and Attorney-General. In 1839 he was appointed a Circuit Judge, and, on the reorganization of the Supreme Court in 1841, was elevated to the Supreme bench, being acting Chief Justice at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of 1848. Having been elected to the Supreme bench under the new Constitution, he remained in office until March, 1855, when he resigned to take the position of Judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Illinois, to which he had been appointed by President Pierce. This position he continued to occupy until his death, which occurred at Springfield, March 27, 1887. Judge Treat's judicial career was one of the longest in the history of the State, covering a period of forty-eight years, of which fourteen were spent upon the Supreme bench, and thirty-two in the position of Judge of the United States District Court.

TREATIES. (See Greenville, Treaty of; Indian Treaties.)

TREE, Lambert, jurist, diplomat and ex-Congressman, was born in Washington, D. C., Nov. 29, 1832, of an ancestry distinguished in the War of the Revolution. He received a superior classical and professional education, and was admitted to the bar, at Washington, in October, 1855. Removing to Chicago soon afterward, his professional career has been chiefly connected with that city. In 1864 he was chosen President of the Law Institute, and served as Judge of the Circuit Court of Cook County, from 1870 to 1875, when he resigned. The three following years he spent in foreign travel, returning to Chicago in 1878. In that year, and again in 1880, he was the Democratic candidate for Congress from the Fourth Illinois District, but was defeated by his Republican opponent. In 1885 he was the candidate of his party for United States Senator, but was defeated by John A. Logan, by one vote. In 1884 he was a member of the National Democratic Convention which first nominated Grover Cleveland, and, in July, 1885, President Cleveland appointed him Minister to Belgium, conferring the Russian mission upon him in September, 1888. On March 3, 1889, he resigned this post and returned home. In 1890 he was appointed by President Harrison a Commissioner to the International Monetary Conference at Washington. The year before he had attended (although not as a delegate) the International Conference, at Brussels, looking to the suppression of the slave-trade, where he exerted all his influence on the side of humanity. In 1892 Belgium conferred upon him the distinction of "Councillor of Honor" upon its commission to the World's Columbian Exposition. In 1896 Judge Tree was one of the most earnest opponents of the free-silver policy, and, after the Spanish-American War, a zealous advocate of the policy of retaining the territory acquired from Spain.

TREMONT, a town of Tazewell County, on the Peoria Division of the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway, 9 miles southeast of Pekin; has two banks, two telephone exchanges, and one newspaper. Pop. (1900), 768.

TRENTON, a town of Clinton County, on the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway, 31 miles east of St. Louis; in agricultural district; has creamery, milk condensery, two coal mines, six churches, a public school and one newspaper. Pop. (1890), 1,384; (1900), 1,706; (1904), about 2,000.

TROY, a village of Madison County, on the Terre Haute & Indianapolis railroad, 21 miles northeast of St. Louis; has churches, a bank and a newspaper. Pop. (1900), 1,080.

TRUITT, James Madison, lawyer and soldier, a native of Trimble County, Ky., was born Feb. 12, 1842, but lived in Illinois since 1843, his father having settled near Carrollton that year; was educated at Hillsboro and at McKendree College; enlisted in the One Hundred and Seventeenth Illinois Volunteers in 1862, and was promoted from the ranks to Lieutenant. After the war he studied law with Jesse J. Phillips, now of the Supreme Court, and, in 1872, was elected to the Twenty-eighth General Assembly, and, in 1888, a Presidential Elector on the Republican ticket. Mr. Truitt has been twice a prominent but unsuccessful candidate for the Republican nomination for Attorney-General. His home is at Hillsboro, where he is engaged in the practice of his profession. Died July 26, 1900.

TRUMBULL, Lyman, statesman, was born at Colchester, Conn., Oct. 12, 1813, descended from a historical family, being a grand-nephew of Gov. Jonathan Trumbull, of Connecticut, from whom the name "Brother Jonathan" was derived as an appellation for Americans. Having received an academic education in his native town, at the age of 16 he began teaching a district school near his home, went South four years later, and engaged in teaching at Greenville, Ga. Here he studied law with Judge Hiram Warner, afterwards of the Supreme Court, and was admitted to the bar in 1837. Leaving Georgia the same year, he came to Illinois on horseback, visiting Vandalia, Belleville, Jacksonville, Springfield, Tremont and La Salle, and finally reaching Chicago, then a village of four or five thousand inhabitants. At Jacksonville he obtained a license to practice from Judge Lockwood, and, after visiting Michigan and his native State, he settled at Belleville, which continued to be his home for twenty years. His entrance into public life began with his election as Representative in the General Assembly in 1840. This was followed, in February, 1841, by his appointment by Governor Carlin, Secretary of State, as the successor of Stephen A. Douglas, who, after holding the position only two months, had resigned to accept a seat on the Supreme bench. Here he remained two years, when he was removed by Governor Ford, March 4, 1843, but, five years later (1848), was elected a Justice of the Supreme Court, was re-elected in 1852, but resigned in 1853 on account of impaired health. A year later (1854) he was elected to Congress from the Belleville District as an anti-Nebraska Democrat, but, before taking his seat, was promoted to the United States Senate, as the successor of General Shields in the memorable contest of 1855, which resulted in the defeat of Abraham Lincoln. Senator Trumbull's career of eighteen years in the United States Senate (being re-elected in 1861 and 1867) is one of the most memorable in the history of that body, covering, as it does, the whole history of the war for the Union, and the period of reconstruction which followed it. During this period, as Chairman of the Senate Committee on Judiciary, he had more to do in shaping legislation on war and reconstruction measures than any other single member of that body. While he disagreed with a large majority of his Republican associates on the question of Andrew Johnson's impeachment, he was always found in sympathy with them on the vital questions affecting the war and restoration of the Union. The Civil Rights Bill and Freedmen's Bureau Bills were shaped by his hand. In 1872 he joined in the "Liberal Republican" movement and afterwards co-operated with the Democratic party, being their candidate for Governor in 1880. From 1863 his home was in Chicago, where, after retiring from the Senate, he continued in the practice of his profession until his death, which occurred in that city, June 25, 1896.

TUG MILLS. These were a sort of primitive machine used in grinding corn in Territorial and early State days. The mechanism consisted of an upright shaft, into the upper end of which were fastened bars, resembling those in the capstan of a ship. Into the outer end of each of these bars was driven a pin. A belt, made of a broad strip of ox-hide, twisted into a sort of rope, was stretched around these pins and wrapped twice around a circular piece of wood called a trundle head, through which passed a perpendicular flat bar of iron, which turned the mill-stone, usually about eighteen inches in diameter. From the upright shaft projected a beam, to which were hitched one or two horses, which furnished the motive power. Oxen were sometimes employed as motive power in lieu of horses. These rudimentary contrivances were capable of grinding about twelve bushels of corn, each, per day.

TULEY, Murray Floyd, lawyer and jurist, was born at Louisville, Ky., March 4, 1827, of English extraction and descended from the early settlers of Virginia. His father died in 1832, and, eleven years later, his mother, having married Col. Richard J. Hamilton, for many years a prominent lawyer of Chicago, removed with her family to that city. Young Tuley began reading law with his step-father and completed his studies at the Louisville Law Institute in 1847, the same year being admitted to the bar in Chicago. About the same time he enlisted in the Fifth Illinois Volunteers for service in the Mexican War, and was commissioned First Lieutenant. The war having ended, he settled at Santa Fe, N. M., where he practiced law, also served as Attorney-General and in the Territorial Legislature. Returning to Chicago in 1854, he was associated in practice, successively, with Andrew Harvie, Judge Gary and J. N. Barker, and finally as head of the firm of Tuley, Stiles & Lewis. From 1869 to 1873 he was Corporation Counsel, and during this time framed the General Incorporation Act for Cities, under which the City of Chicago was reincorporated. In 1879 he was elevated to the bench of the Circuit Court of Cook County, and re-elected every six years thereafter, his last election being in 1897. He is now serving his fourth term, some ten years of his incumbency having been spent in the capacity of Chief Justice.

TUNNICLIFFE, Damon G., lawyer and jurist, was born in Herkimer County, N. Y., August 20, 1829; at the age of 20, emigrated to Illinois, settling in Vermont, Fulton County, where, for a time, he was engaged in mercantile pursuits. He subsequently studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1853. In 1854 he established himself at Macomb, McDonough County, where he built up a large and lucrative practice. In 1868 he was chosen Presidential Elector on the Republican ticket, and, from February to June, 1885, by appointment of Governor Oglesby, occupied a seat on the bench of the Supreme Court, vice Pinkney H. Walker, deceased, who had been one of his first professional preceptors.

TURNCHIN, John Basil (Ivan Vasilevitch Turchinoff), soldier, engineer and author, was born in Russia, Jan. 30, 1822. He graduated from the artillery school at St. Petersburg, in 1841, and was commissioned ensign; participated in the Hungarian campaign of 1849, and, in 1852, was assigned to the staff of the Imperial Guards; served through the Crimean War, rising to the rank of Colonel, and being made senior staff officer of the active corps. In 1856 he came to this country, settling in Chicago, and, for five years, was in the service of the Illinois Central Railway Company as topographical engineer. In 1861 he was commissioned Colonel of the Nineteenth Illinois Volunteers, and, after leading his regiment in Missouri, Kentucky and Alabama, was, on July 7, 1862, promoted to a Brigadier-Generalship, being attached to the Army of the Cumberland until 1864, when he resigned. After the war he was, for six years, solicitor of patents at Chicago, but, in 1873, returned to engineering. In 1879 he established a Polish colony at Radom, in Washington County, in this State, and settled as a farmer. He is an occasional contributor to the press, writing usually on military or scientific subjects, and is the author of the "Campaign and Battle of Chickamauga" (Chicago, 1888).

TURNER (now WEST CHICAGO), a town and manufacturing center in Winfield Township, Du Page County, 30 miles west of Chicago, at the junction of two divisions of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, the Elgin, Joliet & Eastern and the Chicago & Northwestern Railroads. The town has a rolling mill, manufactories of wagons and pumps, and railroad repair shops. It also has five churches, a graded school, and two newspapers. Pop. (1900), 1,877; with suburb, 2,270.

TURNER, (Col.) Henry L., soldier and real-estate operator, was born at Oberlin, Ohio, August 26, 1845, and received a part of his education in the college there. During the Civil War he served as First Lieutenant in the One Hundred and Fiftieth Ohio Volunteers, and later, with the same rank in a colored regiment, taking part in the operations about Richmond, the capture of Fort Fisher, of Wilmington and of Gen. Joe Johnston's army. Coming to Chicago after the close of the war, he became connected with the business office of "The Advance," but later was employed in the banking house of Jay Cooke & Co., in Philadelphia. On the failure of that concern, in 1872, he returned to Chicago and bought "The Advance," which he conducted some two years, when he sold out and engaged in the real estate business, with which he has since been identified—being President of the Chicago Real Estate Board in 1888. He has also been President of the Western Publishing Company and a Trustee of Oberlin College. Colonel Turner is an enthusiastic member of the Illinois National Guard and, on the declaration of war between the United States and Spain, in April, 1898, promptly resumed his connection with the First Regiment of the Guard, and finally led it to Santiago de Cuba during the fighting there—his regiment being the only one from Illinois to see actual service in the field during the progress of the war. Colonel Turner won the admiration of his command and the entire nation by the manner in which he discharged his duty. The regiment was mustered out at Chicago, Nov. 17, 1898, when he retired to private life.

TURNER, John Bice, Railway President, was born at Colchester, Delaware County, N. Y., Jan. 14, 1799; after a brief business career in his native State, he became identified with the construction and operation of railroads. Among the works with which he was thus connected, were the Delaware Division of the New York & Erie and the Troy & Schenectady Roads. In 1843 he came to Chicago, having previously purchased a large body of land at Blue Island. In 1847 he joined with W. B. Ogden and others, in resuscitating the Galena & Chicago Union Railway, which had been incorporated in 1836. He became President of the Company in 1850, and assisted in constructing various sections of road in Northern Illinois and Wisconsin, which have since become portions of the Chicago & Northwestern system. He was also one of the original Directors of the North Side Street Railway Company, organized in 1859. Died, Feb. 26, 1871.

TURNER, Jonathan Baldwin, educator and agriculturist, was born in Templeton, Mass., Dec. 7, 1805; grew up on a farm and, before reaching his majority, began teaching in a country school. After spending a short time in an academy at Salem, in 1827 he entered the preparatory department of Yale College, supporting himself, in part, by manual labor and teaching in a gymnasium. In 1829 he matriculated in the classical department at Yale, graduated in 1833, and the same year accepted a position as tutor in Illinois College at Jacksonville, Ill., which had been opened, three years previous, by the late Dr. J. M. Sturtevant. In the next fourteen years he gave instruction in nearly every branch embraced in the college curriculum, though holding, during most of this period, the chair of Rhetoric and English Literature. In 1847 he retired from college duties to give attention to scientific agriculture, in which he had always manifested a deep interest. The cultivation and sale of the Osage orange as a hedge plant now occupied his attention for many years, and its successful introduction in Illinois and other Western States—where the absence of timber rendered some substitute a necessity for fencing purposes—was largely due to his efforts. At the same time he took a deep interest in the cause of practical scientific education for the industrial classes, and, about 1850, began formulating that system of industrial education which, after twelve years of labor and agitation, he had the satisfaction of seeing recognized in the act adopted by Congress, and approved by President Lincoln, in July, 1862, making liberal donations of public lands for the establishment of "Industrial Colleges" in the several States, out of which grew the University of Illinois at Champaign. While Professor Turner had zealous collaborators in this field, in Illinois and elsewhere, to him, more than to any other single man in the Nation, belongs the credit for this magnificent achievement. (See Education, and University of Illinois.) He was also one of the chief factors in founding and building up the Illinois State Teachers' Association, and the State Agricultural and Horticultural Societies. His address on "The Millennium of Labor," delivered at the first State Agricultural Fair at Springfield, in 1853, is still remembered as marking an era in industrial progress in Illinois. A zealous champion of free thought, in both political and religious affairs, he long bore the reproach which attached to the radical Abolitionist, only to enjoy, in later years, the respect universally accorded to those who had the courage and independence to avow their honest convictions. Prof. Turner was twice an unsuccessful candidate for Congress—once as a Republican and once as an "Independent"—and wrote much on political, religious and educational topics. The evening of an honored and useful life was spent among friends in Jacksonville, which was his home for more than sixty years, his death taking place in that city, Jan. 10, 1899, at the advanced age of 93 years.—Mrs. Mary Turner Carriel, at the present time (1899) one of the Trustees of the University of Illinois, is Prof. Turner's only daughter.

TURNER, Thomas J., lawyer and Congressman, born in Trumbull County, Ohio, April 5, 1815. Leaving home at the age of 18, he spent three years in Indiana and in the mining districts about Galena and in Southern Wisconsin, locating in Stephenson County, in 1836, where he was admitted to the bar in 1840, and elected Probate Judge in 1841. Soon afterwards Governor Ford appointed him Prosecuting Attorney, in which capacity he secured the conviction and punishment of the murderers of Colonel Davenport. In 1846 he was elected to Congress as a Democrat, and, the following year, founded "The Prairie Democrat" (afterward "The Freeport Bulletin"), the first newspaper published in the county. Elected to the Legislature in 1854, he was chosen Speaker of the House, the next year becoming the first Mayor of Freeport. He was a member of the Peace Conference of 1861, and, in May of that year, was commissioned, by Governor Yates, Colonel of the Fifteenth Illinois Volunteers, but resigned in 1862. He served as a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1869-70, and, in 1871, was again elected to the Legislature, where he received the Democratic caucus nomination for United States Senator against General Logan. In 1871 he removed to Chicago, and was twice an unsuccessful candidate for the office of State's Attorney. In February, 1874, he went to Hot Springs, Ark., for medical treatment, and died there, April 3 following.

TUSCOLA, a city and the county-seat of Douglas County, located at the intersection of the Illinois Central and two other trunk lines of railway, 22 miles south of Champaign, and 36 miles east of Decatur. Besides a brick court-house it has five churches, a graded school, a national bank, two weekly newspapers and two establishments for the manufacture of carriages and wagons. Population (1880), 1,457; (1890), 1,897; (1900), 2,569.

TUTHILL, Richard Stanley, jurist, was born at Vergennes, Jackson County, Ill., Nov. 10, 1841. After passing through the common schools of his native county, he took a preparatory course in a high school at St. Louis and in Illinois College, Jacksonville, when he entered Middlebury College, Vt., graduating there in 1863. Immediately thereafter he joined the Federal army at Vicksburg, and, after serving for some time in a company of scouts attached to General Logan's command, was commissioned a Lieutenant in the First Michigan Light Artillery, with which he served until the close of the war, meanwhile being twice promoted. During this time he was with General Sherman in the march to Meridian, and in the Atlanta campaign, also took part with General Thomas in the operations against the rebel General Hood in Tennessee, and in the battle of Nashville. Having resigned his commission in May, 1865, he took up the study of law, which he had prosecuted as he had opportunity while in the army, and was admitted to the bar at Nashville in 1866, afterwards serving for a time as Prosecuting Attorney on the Nashville circuit. In 1873 he removed to Chicago, two years later was elected City Attorney and re-elected in 1877; was a delegate to the Republican National Convention of 1880 and, in 1884, was appointed United States District Attorney for the Northern District, serving until 1886. In 1887 he was elected Judge of the Circuit Court of Cook County to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Judge Rogers, was re-elected for a full term in 1891, and again in 1897.

TYNDALE, Sharon, Secretary of State, born in Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 19, 1816; at the age of 17 came to Belleville, Ill., and was engaged for a time in mercantile business, later being employed in a surveyor's corps under the internal improvement system of 1837. Having married in 1839, he returned soon after to Philadelphia, where he engaged in mercantile business with his father;

then came to Illinois, a second time, in 1845, spending a year or two in business at Peoria. About 1847 he returned to Belleville and entered upon a course of mathematical study, with a view to fitting himself more thoroughly for the profession of a civil engineer. In 1851 he graduated in engineering at Cambridge, Mass., after which he was employed for a time on the Sunbury & Erie Railroad, and later on certain Illinois railroads. In 1857 he was elected County Surveyor of St. Clair County, and, in 1861, by appointment of President Lincoln, became Postmaster of the city of Belleville. He held this position until 1864, when he received the Republican nomination for Secretary of State and was elected, remaining in office four years. He was an earnest advocate, and virtually author, of the first act for the registration of voters in Illinois, passed at the session of 1865. After retiring from office in 1869, he continued to reside in Springfield, and was employed for a time in the survey of the Gilman, Clinton & Springfield Railway—now the Springfield Division of the Illinois Central. At an early hour on the morning of April 29, 1871, while going from his home to the railroad station at Springfield, to take the train for St. Louis, he was assassinated upon the street by shooting, as supposed for the purpose of robbery—his dead body being found a few hours later at the scene of the tragedy. Mr. Tyndale was a brother of Gen. Hector Tyndale of Pennsylvania, who won a high reputation by his services during the war. His second wife, who survived him, was a daughter of Shadrach Penn, an editor of considerable reputation who was the contemporary and rival of George D. Prentice at Louisville, for some years.

"UNDERGROUND RAILROAD," THE. A history of Illinois would be incomplete without reference to the unique system which existed there, as in other Northern States, from forty to seventy years ago, known by the somewhat mysterious title of "The Underground Railroad." The origin of the term has been traced (probably in a spirit of facetiousness) to the expression of a Kentucky planter who, having pursued a fugitive slave across the Ohio River, was so surprised by his sudden disappearance, as soon as he had reached the opposite shore, that he was led to remark, "The nigger must have gone off on an underground road." From "underground road" to "underground railroad," the transition would appear to have been easy, especially in view of the increased facility with which the work was performed when railroads came into use. For readers of the present generation, it may be well to explain what "The Underground Railroad" really was. It may be defined as the figurative appellation for a spontaneous movement in the free States—extending, sometimes, into the slave States themselves—to assist slaves in their efforts to escape from bondage to freedom. The movement dates back to a period close to the Revolutionary War, long before it received a definite name. Assistance given to fugitives from one State by citizens of another, became a cause of complaint almost as soon as the Government was organized. In fact, the first President himself lost a slave who took refuge at Portsmouth, N. H., where the public sentiment was so strong against his return, that the patriotic and philosophic "Father of his Country" chose to let him remain unmolested, rather than "excite a mob or riot, or even uneasy sensations, in the minds of well-disposed citizens." That the matter was already one of concern in the minds of slaveholders, is shown by the fact that a provision was inserted in the Constitution for their conciliation, guaranteeing the return of fugitives from labor, as well as from justice, from one State to another.

In 1793 Congress passed the first Fugitive Slave Law, which was signed by President Washington. This law provided that the owner, his agent or attorney, might follow the slave into any State or Territory, and, upon oath or affidavit before a court or magistrate, be entitled to a warrant for his return. Any person who should hinder the arrest of the fugitive, or who should harbor, aid or assist him, knowing him to be such, was subject to a fine of $500 for each offense.—In 1850, fifty-seven years later, the first act having proved inefficacious, or conditions having changed, a second and more stringent law was enacted. This is the one usually referred to in discussions of the subject. It provided for an increased fine, not to exceed $1,000, and imprisonment not exceeding six months, with liability for civil damages to the party injured. No proof of ownership was required beyond the statement of a claimant, and the accused was not permitted to testify for himself. The fee of the United States Commissioner, before whom the case was tried, was ten dollars if he found for the claimant; if not, five dollars. This seemed to many an indirect form of bribery; clearly, it made it to the Judge's pecuniary advantage to decide in favor of the claimant. The law made it possible and easy for a white man to arrest, and carry into slavery, any free negro who could not immediately prove, by other witnesses, that he was born free, or had purchased his freedom.

Instead of discouraging the disposition, on the part of the opponents of slavery, to aid fugitives in their efforts to reach a region where they would be secure in their freedom, the effect of the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850 (as that of 1793 had been in a smaller degree) was the very opposite of that intended by its authors—unless, indeed, they meant to make matters worse. The provisions of the act seemed, to many people, so unfair, so one-sided, that they rebelled in spirit and refused to be made parties to its enforcement. The law aroused the anti-slavery sentiment of the North, and stimulated the active friends of the fugitives to take greater risks in their behalf. New efforts on the part of the slaveholders were met by a determination to evade, hinder and nullify the law.

And here a strange anomaly is presented. The slaveholder, in attempting to recover his slave, was acting within his constitutional and legal rights. The slave was his property in law. He had purchased or inherited his bondman on the same plane with his horse or his land, and, apart from the right to hold a human being in bondage, regarded his legal rights to the one as good as the other. From a legal standpoint his position was impregnable. The slave was his, representing so much of money value, and whoever was instrumental in the loss of that slave was, both theoretically and technically, a partner in robbery. Therefore he looked on "The Underground Railway" as the work of thieves, and entertained bitter hatred toward all concerned in its operation. On the other hand, men who were, in all other respects, good citizens—often religiously devout and pillars of the church—became bold and flagrant violators of the law in relation to this sort of property. They set at naught a plain provision of the Constitution and the act of Congress for its enforcement. Without hope of personal gain or reward, at the risk of fine and imprisonment, with the certainty of social ostracism and bitter opposition, they harbored the fugitive and helped him forward on every occasion. And why? Because they saw in him a man, with the same inherent right to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness" that they themselves possessed. To them this was a higher law than any Legislature, State or National, could enact. They denied that there could be truly such a thing as property in man. Believing that the law violated human rights, they justified themselves in rendering it null and void.

For the most part, the "Underground Railroad" operators and promoters were plain, obscure men, without hope of fame or desire for notoriety. Yet there were some whose names are conspicuous in history, such as Wendell Phillips, Thomas Wentworth Higginson and Theodore Parker of Massachusetts; Gerrit Smith and Thurlow Weed of New York; Joshua R. Giddings of Ohio, and Owen Lovejoy of Illinois. These had their followers and sympathizers in all the Northern States, and even in some portions of the South. It is a curious fact, that some of the most active spirits connected with the "Underground Railroad" were natives of the South, or had resided there long enough to become thoroughly acquainted with the "institution." Levi Coffin, who had the reputation of being the "President of the Underground Railroad"—at least so far as the region west of the Ohio was concerned—was an active operator on the line in North Carolina before his removal from that State to Indiana in 1826. Indeed, as a system, it is claimed to have had its origin at Guilford College, in the "Old North State" in 1819, though the evidence of this may not be conclusive.

Owing to the peculiar nature of their business, no official reports were made, no lists of officers, conductors, station agents or operators preserved, and few records kept which are now accessible. Consequently, we are dependent chiefly upon the personal recollection of individual operators for a history of their transactions. Each station on the road was the house of a "friend" and it is significant, in this connection, that in every settlement of Friends, or Quakers, there was sure to be a house of refuge for the slave. For this reason it was, perhaps, that one of the most frequently traveled lines extended from Virginia and Maryland through Eastern Pennsylvania, and then on towards New York or directly to Canada. From the proximity of Ohio to Virginia and Kentucky, and the fact that it offered the shortest route through free soil to Canada, it was traversed by more lines than any other State, although Indiana was pretty thoroughly "grid-ironed" by roads to freedom. In all, however, the routes were irregular, often zigzag, for purposes of security, and the "conductor" was any one who conveyed fugitives from one station to another. The "train" was sometimes a farm-wagon, loaded with produce for market at some town (or depot) on the line, frequently a closed carriage, and it is related that once, in Ohio, a number of carriages conveying a large party, were made to represent a funeral procession. Occasionally the train ran on foot, for convenience of side-tracking into the woods or a cornfield, in case of pursuit by a wild locomotive.

Then, again, there were not wanting lawyers who, in case the operator, conductor or station agent got into trouble, were ready, without fee or reward, to defend either him or his human freight in the courts. These included such names of national repute as Salmon P. Chase, Thaddeus Stevens, Charles Sumner, William H. Seward, Rutherford B. Hayes, Richard H. Dana, and Isaac N. Arnold, while, taking the whole country over, their "name was legion." And there were a few men of wealth, like Thomas Garrett of Delaware, willing to contribute money by thousands to their assistance. Although technically acting in violation of law—or, as claimed by themselves, in obedience to a "higher law"—the time has already come when there is a disposition to look upon the actors as, in a certain sense, heroes, and their deeds as fitly belonging to the field of romance.

The most comprehensive collection of material relating to the history of this movement has been furnished in a recent volume entitled, "The Underground Railroad from Slavery to Freedom," by Prof. Wilbur H. Siebert, of Ohio State University; and, while it is not wholly free from errors, both as to individual names and facts, it will probably remain as the best compilation of history bearing on this subject—especially as the principal actors are fast passing away. One of the interesting features of Prof. Siebert's book is a map purporting to give the principal routes and stations in the States northwest of the Ohio, yet the accuracy of this, as well as the correctness of personal names given, has been questioned by some best informed on the subject. As might be expected from its geographical position between two slave States—Kentucky and Missouri—on the one hand, and the lakes offering a highway to Canada on the other, it is naturally to be assumed that Illinois would be an attractive field, both for the fugitive and his sympathizer.

The period of greatest activity of the system in this State was between 1840 and 1861—the latter being the year when the pro-slavery party in the South, by their attempt forcibly to dissolve the Union, took the business out of the hands of the secret agents of the "Underground Railroad," and—in a certain sense—placed it in the hands of the Union armies. It was in 1841 that Abraham Lincoln—then a conservative opponent of the extension of slavery—on an appeal from a judgment, rendered by the Circuit Court in Tazewell County, in favor of the holder of a note given for the service of the indentured slave-girl "Nance," obtained a decision from the Supreme Court of Illinois upholding the doctrine that the girl was free under the Ordinance of 1787 and the State Constitution, and that the note, given to the person who claimed to be her owner, was void. And it is a somewhat curious coincidence that the same Abraham Lincoln, as President of the United States, in the second year of the War of the Rebellion, issued the Proclamation of Emancipation which finally resulted in striking the shackles from the limbs of every slave in the Union.

In the practical operation of aiding fugitives in Illinois, it was natural that the towns along the border upon the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, should have served as a sort of entrepôts, or initial stations, for the reception of this class of freight—especially if adjacent to some anti-slavery community. This was the case at Chester, from which access was easy to Sparta, where a colony of Covenanters, or Seceders, was located, and whence a route extended, by way of Oakdale, Nashville and Centralia, in the direction of Chicago. Alton offered convenient access to Bond County, where there was a community of anti-slavery people at an early day, or the fugitives could be forwarded northward by way of Jerseyville, Waverly and Jacksonville, about each of which there was a strong anti-slavery sentiment. Quincy, in spite of an intense hostility among the mass of the community to anything savoring of abolitionism, became the theater of great activity on the part of the opponents of the institution, especially after the advent there of Dr. David Nelson and Dr. Richard Eells, both of whom had rendered themselves obnoxious to the people of Missouri by extending aid to fugitives. The former was a practical abolitionist who, having freed his slaves in his native State of Virginia, removed to Missouri and attempted to establish Marion College, a few miles from Palmyra, but was soon driven to Illinois. Locating near Quincy, he founded the "Mission Institute" there, at which he continued to disseminate his anti-slavery views, while educating young men for missionary work. The "Institute" was finally burned by emissaries from Missouri, while three young men who had been connected with it, having been caught in Missouri, were condemned to twelve years' confinement in the penitentiary of that State—partly on the testimony of a negro, although a negro was not then a legal witness in the courts against a white man. Dr. Eells was prosecuted before Stephen A. Douglas (then a Judge of the Circuit Court), and fined for aiding a fugitive to escape, and the judgment against him was finally confirmed by the Supreme Court after his death, in 1852, ten years after the original indictment.

A map in Professor Siebert's book, showing the routes and principal stations of the "Underground Railroad," makes mention of the following places in Illinois, in addition to those already referred to: Carlinville, in Macoupin County; Payson and Mendon, in Adams; Washington, in Tazewell; Metamora, in Woodford; Magnolia, in Putnam; Galesburg, in Knox; Princeton (the home of Owen Lovejoy and the Bryants), in Bureau; and many more. Ottawa appears to have been the meeting point of a number of lines, as well as the home of a strong colony of practical abolitionists. Cairo also became an important transfer station for fugitives arriving by river, after the completion of the Illinois Central Railroad, especially as it offered the speediest way of reaching Chicago, towards which nearly all the lines converged. It was here that the fugitives could be most safely disposed of by placing them upon vessels, which, without stopping at intermediate ports, could soon land them on Canadian soil.

As to methods, these differed according to circumstances, the emergencies of the occasion, or the taste, convenience or resources of the operator. Deacon Levi Morse, of Woodford County, near Metamora, had a route towards Magnolia, Putnam County; and his favorite "car" was a farm wagon in which there was a double bottom. The passengers were snugly placed below, and grain sacks, filled with bran or other light material, were laid over, so that the whole presented the appearance of an ordinary load of grain on its way to market. The same was true as to stations and routes. One, who was an operator, says: "Wherever an abolitionist happened on a fugitive, or the converse, there was a station, for the time, and the route was to the next anti-slavery man to the east or the north. As a general rule, the agent preferred not to know anything beyond the operation of his own immediate section of the road. If he knew nothing about the operations of another, and the other knew nothing of his, they could not be witnesses in court.

We have it on the authority of Judge Harvey B. Hurd, of Chicago, that runaways were usually forwarded from that city to Canada by way of the Lakes, there being several steamers available for that purpose. On one occasion thirteen were put aboard a vessel under the eyes of a United States Marshal and his deputies. The fugitives, secreted in a woodshed, one by one took the places of colored stevedores carrying wood aboard the ship. Possibly the term, "There's a nigger in the woodpile," may have originated in this incident. Thirteen was an "unlucky number" in this instance—for the masters.

Among the notable trials for assisting runaways in violation of the Fugitive Slave Law, in addition to the case of Dr. Eells, already mentioned, were those of Owen Lovejoy of Princeton, and Deacon Cushing of Will County, both of whom were defended by Judge James Collins of Chicago. John Hossack and Dr. Joseph Stout of Ottawa, with some half-dozen of their neighbors and friends, were tried at Ottawa, in 1859, for assisting a fugitive and acquitted on a technicality. A strong array of attorneys, afterwards widely known through the northern part of the State, appeared for the defense, including Isaac N. Arnold, Joseph Knox, B. C. Cook, J. V. Eustace, Edward S. Leland and E. C. Larned. Joseph T. Morse, of Woodford County, was also arrested, taken to Peoria and committed to jail, but acquitted on trial.

Another noteworthy case was that of Dr. Samuel Willard (now of Chicago) and his father, Julius A. Willard, charged with assisting in the escape of a fugitive at Jacksonville, in 1843, when the Doctor was a student in Illinois College. "The National Corporation Reporter," a few years ago, gave an account of this affair, together with a letter from Dr. Willard, in which he states that, after protracted litigation, during which the case was carried to the Supreme Court, it was ended by his pleading guilty before Judge Samuel D. Lockwood, when he was fined one dollar and costs—the latter amounting to twenty dollars. The Doctor frankly adds: "My father, as well as myself, helped many fugitives afterwards." It did not always happen, however, that offenders escaped so easily.

Judge Harvey B. Hurd, already referred to, and an active anti-slavery man in the days of the Fugitive Slave Law, relates the following: Once, when the trial of a fugitive was going on before Justice Kercheval, in a room on the second floor of a two-story frame building on Clark Street in the city of Chicago, the crowd in attendance filled the room, the stairway and the adjoining sidewalk. In some way the prisoner got mixed in with the audience, and passed down over the heads of those on the stairs, where the officers were unable to follow.

In another case, tried before United States Commissioner Geo. W. Meeker, the result was made to hinge upon a point in the indictment to the effect that the fugitive was "copper-colored." The Commissioner, as the story goes, being inclined to favor public sentiment, called for a large copper cent, that he might make comparison. The decision was, that the prisoner was "off color," so to speak, and he was hustled out of the room before the officers could re-arrest him, as they had been instructed to do.

Dr. Samuel Willard, in a review of Professor Siebert's book, published in "The Dial" of Chicago, makes mention of Henry Irving and William Chauncey Carter as among his active allies at Jacksonville, with Rev. Bilious Pond and Deacon Lyman of Farmington (near the present village of Farmingdale in Sangamon County), Luther Ransom of Springfield, Andrew Borders of Randolph County, Joseph Gerrish of Jersey and William T. Allan of Henry, as their coadjutors in other parts of the State. Other active agents or promoters, in the same field, included such names as Dr. Charles V. Dyer, Philo Carpenter, Calvin De Wolf, L. C. P. Freer, Zebina Eastman, James H. Collins, Harvey B. Hurd, J. Young Scammon, Col. J. F. Farnsworth and others of Chicago, whose names have already been mentioned; Rev. Asa Turner, Deacon Ballard, J. K. Van Dorn and Erastus Benton, of Quincy and Adams County; President Rufus Blanchard of Knox College, Galesburg; John Leeper of Bond; the late Prof. J. B. Turner and Elihu Wolcott of Jacksonville; Capt. Parker Morse and his four sons—Joseph T., Levi P., Parker, Jr., and Mark—of Woodford County; Rev. William Sloane of Randolph; William Strawn of La Salle, besides a host who were willing to aid their fellow men in their aspirations to freedom, without advertising their own exploits.

Among the incidents of "Underground Railroad" in Illinois is one which had some importance politically, having for its climax a dramatic scene in Congress, but of which, so far as known, no full account has ever been written. About 1855, Ephraim Lombard, a Mississippi planter, but a New Englander by birth, purchased a large body of prairie land in the northeastern part of Stark County, and, taking up his residence temporarily in the village of Bradford, began its improvement. He had brought with him from Mississippi a negro, gray-haired and bent with age, a slave of probably no great value. "Old Mose," as he was called, soon came to be well known and a favorite in the neighborhood. Lombard boldly stated that he had brought him there as a slave; that, by virtue of the Dred Scott decision (then of recent date), he had a constitutional right to take his slaves wherever he pleased, and that "Old Mose" was just as much his property in Illinois as in Mississippi. It soon became evident to some, that his bringing of the negro to Illinois was an experiment to test the law and the feelings of the Northern people. This being the case, a shrewd play would have been to let him have his way till other slaves should have been brought to stock the new plantation. But this was too slow a process for the abolitionists, to whom the holding of a slave in the free State of Illinois appeared an unbearable outrage. It was feared that he might take the old negro back to Mississippi and fail to bring any others. It was reported, also, that "Old Mose" was ill-treated; that he was given only the coarsest food in a back shed, as if he were a horse or a dog, instead of being permitted to eat at table with the family. The prairie citizen of that time was very particular upon this point of etiquette. The hired man or woman, debarred from the table of his or her employer, would not have remained a day. A quiet consultation with "Old Mose" revealed the fact that he would hail the gift of freedom joyously. Accordingly, one Peter Risedorf, and another equally daring, met him by the light of the stars and, before morning, he was placed in the care of Owen Lovejoy, at Princeton, twenty miles away. From there he was speedily "franked" by the member of Congress to friends in Canada.

There was a great commotion in Bradford over the "stealing" of "Old Mose." Lombard and his friends denounced the act in terms bitter and profane, and threatened vengeance upon the perpetrators. The conductors were known only to a few, and they kept their secret well. Lovejoy's part in the affair, however, soon leaked out. Lombard returned to Mississippi, where he related his experiences to Mr. Singleton, the Representative in Congress from his district. During the next session of Congress, Singleton took occasion, in a speech, to sneer at Lovejoy as a "nigger-stealer," citing the case of "Old Mose." Mr. Lovejoy replied in his usual fervid and dramatic style, making a speech which ensured his election to Congress for life—"Is it desired to call attention to this fact of my assisting fugitive slaves?" he said. "Owen Lovejoy lives at Princeton, Ill., three-quarters of a mile east of the village, and he aids every slave that comes to his door and asks it. Thou invisible Demon of Slavery, dost thou think to cross my humble threshold and forbid me to give bread to the hungry and shelter to the homeless? I bid you defiance, in the name of my God!"

With another incident of an amusing character this article may be closed: Hon. J. Young Scammon, of Chicago, being accused of conniving at the escape of a slave from officers of the law, was asked by the court what he would do if summoned as one of a posse to pursue and capture a fugitive. "I would certainly obey the summons," he replied, "but—I should probably stub my toe and fall down before I reached him."

NOTE.—Those who wish to pursue the subject of the "Underground Railroad" in Illinois further, are referred to the work of Dr. Siebert, already mentioned, and to the various County Histories which have been issued and may be found in the public libraries; also for interesting incidents, to "Reminiscences of Levi Coffin," Johnson's "From Dixie to Canada," Petit's Sketches, "Still, Underground Railroad," and a pamphlet of the same title by James H. Fairchild, ex-President of Oberlin College.

UNDERWOOD, William H., lawyer, legislator and jurist, was born at Schoharie Court House, N. Y., Feb. 21, 1818, and, after admission to the bar, removed to Belleville, Ill., where he began practice in 1840. The following year he was elected State's Attorney, and re-elected in 1843. In 1846 he was chosen a member of the lower house of the General Assembly, and, in 1848-54, sat as Judge of the Second Circuit. During this period he declined a nomination to Congress, although equivalent to an election. In 1856 he was elected State Senator, and re-elected in 1860. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1869-70, and, in 1870, was again elected to the Senate, retiring to private life in 1872. Died, Sept. 23, 1875.

UNION COUNTY, one of the fifteen counties into which Illinois was divided at the time of its admission as a State—having been organized, under the Territorial Government, in January, 1818. It is situated in the southern division of the State, bounded on the west by the Mississippi River, and has an area of 400 square miles. The eastern and interior portions are drained by the Cache River and Clear Creek. The western part of the county comprises the broad, rich bottom lands lying along the Mississippi, but is subject to frequent overflow, while the eastern portion is hilly, and most of its area originally heavily timbered. The county is especially rich in minerals. Iron-ore, lead, bituminous coal, chalk, alum and potter's clay are found in considerable abundance. Several lines of railway (the most important being the Illinois Central) either cross or tap the county. The chief occupation is agriculture, although manufacturing is carried on to a limited extent. Fruit is extensively cultivated. Jonesboro is the county-seat, and Cobden and Anna important shipping stations. The latter is the location of the Southern Hospital for the Insane. The population of the county, in 1890, was 21,529. Being next to St. Clair, Randolph and Gallatin, one of the earliest settled counties in the State, many prominent men found their first home, on coming into the State, at Jonesboro, and this region, for a time, exerted a strong influence in public affairs. Pop. (1900), 22,610.

UNION LEAGUE OF AMERICA, a secret political and patriotic order which had its origin early in the late Civil War, for the avowed purpose of sustaining the cause of the Union and counteracting the machinations of the secret organizations designed to promote the success of the Rebellion. The first regular Council of the order was organized at Pekin, Tazewell County, June 25, 1862, consisting of eleven members, as follows: John W. Glasgow, Dr. D. A. Cheever, Hart Montgomery, Maj. Richard N. Cullom (father of Senator Cullom), Alexander Small, Rev. J. W. M. Vernon, George H. Harlow (afterward Secretary of State), Charles Turner, Col. Jonathan Merriam, Henry Pratt and L. F. Garrett. One of the number was a Union refugee from Tennessee, who dictated the first oath from memory, as administered to members of a somewhat similar order which had been organized among the Unionists of his own State. It solemnly pledged the taker, (1) to preserve inviolate the secrets and business of the order; (2) to "support, maintain, protect and defend the civil liberties of the Union of these United States against all enemies, either domestic or foreign, at all times and under all circumstances," even "if necessary, to the sacrifice of life"; (3) to aid in electing only true Union men to offices of trust in the town, county, State and General Government; (4) to assist, protect and defend any member of the order who might be in peril from his connection with the order, and (5) to obey all laws, rules or regulations of any Council to which the taker of the oath might be attached. The oath was taken upon the Bible, the Declaration of Independence and Constitution of the United States, the taker pledging his sacred honor to its fulfillment. A special reason for the organization existed in the activity, about this time, of the "Knights of the Golden Circle," a disloyal organization which had been introduced from the South, and which afterwards took the name, in the North, of "American Knights" and "Sons of Liberty." (See Secret Treasonable Societies.) Three months later, the organization had extended to a number of other counties of the State and, on the 25th of September following, the first State Council met at Bloomington—twelve counties being represented—and a State organization was effected. At this meeting the following general officers were chosen: Grand President—Judge Mark Bangs, of Marshall County (now of Chicago); Grand Vice-President—Prof. Daniel Wilkin, of McLean; Grand Secretary—George H. Harlow, of Tazewell; Grand Treasurer—H. S. Austin, of Peoria, Grand Marshal—J. R. Gorin, of Macon; Grand Herald—A. Gould, of Henry; Grand Sentinel—John E. Rosette, of Sangamon. An Executive Committee was also appointed, consisting of Joseph Medill of "The Chicago Tribune"; Dr. A. J. McFarland, of Morgan County; J. K. Warren, of Macon; Rev. J. C. Rybolt, of La Salle; the President, Judge Bangs; Enoch Emery, of Peoria; and John E. Rosette. Under the direction of this Committee, with Mr. Medill as its Chairman, the constitution and by-laws were thoroughly revised and a new ritual adopted, which materially changed the phraseology and removed some of the crudities of the original obligation, as well as increased the beauty and impressiveness of the initiatory ceremonies. New signs, grips and pass-words were also adopted, which were finally accepted by the various organizations of the order throughout the Union, which, by this time, included many soldiers in the army, as well as civilians. The second Grand (or State) Council was held at Springfield, January 14, 1863, with only seven counties represented. The limited representation was discouraging, but the members took heart from the inspiring words of Governor Yates, addressed to a committee of the order who waited upon him. At a special session of the Executive Committee, held at Peoria, six days later, a vigorous campaign was mapped out, under which agents were sent into nearly every county in the State. In October, 1862, the strength of the order in Illinois was estimated at three to five thousand; a few months later, the number of enrolled members had increased to 50,000—so rapid had been the growth of the order. On March 25, 1863, a Grand Council met in Chicago—404 Councils in Illinois being represented, with a number from Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa and Minnesota. At this meeting a Committee was appointed to prepare a plan of organization for a National Grand Council, which was carried out at Cleveland, Ohio, on the 20th of May following—the constitution, ritual and signs of the Illinois organization being adopted with slight modifications. The revised obligation—taken upon the Bible, the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States—bound members of the League to “support, protect and defend the Government of the United States and the flag thereof, against all enemies, foreign and domestic,” and to “bear true faith and allegiance to the same”; to “defend the State against invasion or insurrection”; to support only “true and reliable men” for offices of trust and profit; to protect and defend worthy members, and to preserve inviolate the secrets of the order. The address to new members was a model of impressiveness and a powerful appeal to their patriotism. The organization extended rapidly, not only throughout the Northwest, but in the South also, especially in the army. In 1864 the number of Councils in Illinois was estimated at 1,300, with a membership of 175,000; and it is estimated that the total membership, throughout the Union, was 2,000,000. The influence of the silent, but zealous and effective, operations of the organization, was shown, not only in the stimulus given to enlistments and support of the war policy of the Government, but in the raising of supplies for the sick and wounded soldiers in the field. Within a few weeks before the fall of Vicksburg, over $25,000 in cash, besides large quantities of stores, were sent to Col. John Williams (then in charge of the Sanitary Bureau at Springfield), as the direct result of appeals made through circulars sent out by the officers of the “League.” Large contributions of money and supplies also reached the sick and wounded in hospital through the medium of the Sanitary Commission in Chicago. Zealous efforts were made by the opposition to get at the secrets of the order, and, in one case, a complete copy of the ritual was published by one of their organs; but the effect was so far the reverse of what was anticipated, that this line of attack was not continued. During the stormy session of the Legislature in 1863, the League is said to have rendered effective service in protecting Governor Yates from threatened assassination. It continued its silent but effective operations until the complete overthrow of the rebellion, when it ceased to exist as a political organization.

UNITED STATES SENATORS. The following is a list of United States senators from Illinois, from the date of the admission of the State into the Union until 1899, with the date and duration of the term of each: Ninian Edwards, 1818-24; Jesse B. Thomas, Sr., 1818-29; John McLean, 1824-25 and 1829-30; Elias Kent Kane, 1825-35; David Jewett Baker, Nov. 12 to Dec. 11, 1830; John M. Robinson, 1830-41; William L. D. Ewing, 1835-37; Richard M. Young, 1837-43; Samuel McRoberts, 1841-43; Sidney Breese, 1843-49; James Semple, 1843-47; Stephen A. Douglas, 1847-61; James Shields, 1849-55; Lyman Trumbull, 1855-73; Orville H. Browning, 1861-63; William A. Richardson, 1863-65; Richard Yates, 1865-71; John A. Logan, 1871-77 and 1879-86; Richard J. Oglesby, 1873-79; David Davis, 1877-83; Shelby M. Cullom, first elected in 1883, and re-elected in '89 and '95, his third term expiring in 1901; Charles B. Farwell, 1887-91; John McAuley Palmer, 1891-97; William E. Mason, elected in 1897, for the term expiring, March 4, 1903.

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO (The New). One of the leading educational institutions of the country, located at Chicago. It is the outgrowth of an attempt, put forth by the American Educational Society (organized at Washington in 1888), to supply the place which the original institution of the same name had been designed to fill. (See University of Chicago—The Old.) The following year, Mr. John D. Rockefeller of New York tendered a contribution of $600,000 toward the endowment of the enterprise, conditioned upon securing additional pledges to the amount of $400,000 by June 1, 1890. The offer was accepted, and the sum promptly raised. In addition, a site, covering four blocks of land in the city of Chicago, was secured—two and one-half blocks being acquired by purchase for $282,500, and one and one-half (valued at $125,000) donated by Mr. Marshall Field. A charter was secured and an organization effected, Sept. 10, 1890. The Presidency of the institution was tendered to, and accepted by, Dr. William R. Harper. Since that time the University has been the recipient of other generous benefactions by Mr. Rockefeller and others, until the aggregate donations (1898) exceed $10,000,000. Of this amount over one-half has been contributed by Mr. Rockefeller, while he has pledged himself to make additional contributions of $2,000,000, conditioned upon the raising of a like sum, from other donors, by Jan. 1, 1900. The buildings erected on the campus, prior to 1896, include a chemical laboratory costing $182,000; a lecture hall, $150,000; a physical laboratory $150,000; a museum, $100,000; an academy dormitory, $30,000; three dormitories for women, $150,000; two dormitories for men, $100,000, to which several important additions were made during 1896 and '97. The faculty embraces over 150 instructors, selected with reference to their fitness for their respective departments from among the most eminent scholars in America and Europe. Women are admitted as students and graduated upon an equality with men. The work of practical instruction began in October, 1892, with 589 registered students, coming from nearly every Northern State, and including 250 graduates from other institutions, to which accessions were made, during the year, raising the aggregate to over 900. The second year the number exceeded 1,100; the third, it rose to 1,750, and the fourth (1895-96), to some 2,000, including representatives from every State of the Union, besides many from foreign countries. Special features of the institution include the admission of graduates from other institutions to a post-graduate course, and the University Extension Division, which is conducted largely by means of lecture courses, in other cities, or through lecture centers in the vicinity of the University, non-resident students having the privilege of written examinations. The various libraries embrace over 300,000 volumes, of which nearly 60,000 belong to what are called the "Departmental Libraries," besides a large and valuable collection of maps and pamphlets.

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO (The Old), an educational institution at Chicago, under the care of the Baptist denomination, for some years known as the Douglas University. Senator Stephen A. Douglas offered, in 1854, to donate ten acres of land, in what was then near the southern border of the city of Chicago, as a site for an institution of learning, provided buildings costing $100,000, be erected thereon within a stipulated time. The corner-stone of the main building was laid, July 4, 1857, but the financial panic of that year prevented its completion, and Mr. Douglas extended the time, and finally deeded the land to the trustees without reserve. For eighteen years the institution led a precarious existence, struggling under a heavy debt. By 1885, mortgages to the amount of $330,000 having accumulated, the trustees abandoned further effort, and acquiesced in the sale of the property under foreclosure proceedings. The original plan of the institution contemplated preparatory and collegiate departments, together with a college of law and a theological school.

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS, the leading educational institution under control of the State, located at Urbana and adjoining the city of Champaign. The Legislature at the session of 1863 accepted a grant of 480,000 acres of land under Act of Congress, approved July 2, 1862, making an appropriation of public lands to States—30,000 acres for each Senator and each Representative in Congress—establishing colleges for teaching agriculture and the mechanic arts, though not to the exclusion of classical and scientific studies. Land-scrip under this grant was issued and placed in the hands of Governor Yates, and a Board of Trustees appointed under the State law was organized in March, 1867, the institution being located the same year. Departments and courses of study were established, and Dr. John M. Gregory, of Michigan, was chosen Regent (President).—The land-scrip issued to Illinois was sold at an early day for what it would bring in open market, except 25,000 acres, which was located in Nebraska and Minnesota. This has recently been sold, realizing a larger sum than was received for all the scrip otherwise disposed of. The entire sum thus secured for permanent endowment aggregates $613,026. The University revenues were further increased by donations from Congress to each institution organized under the Act of 1862, of $15,000 per annum for the maintenance of an Agricultural Experiment Station, and, in 1890, of a similar amount for instruction—the latter to be increased $1,000 annually until it should reach $25,000.—A mechanical building was erected in 1871, and this is claimed to have been the first of its kind in America intended for strictly educational purposes. What was called "the main building" was formally opened in December, 1873. Other buildings embrace a "Science Hall," opened in 1892; a new "Engineering Hall," 1894; a fine Library Building, 1897. Eleven other principal structures and a number of smaller ones have been erected as conditions required. The value of property aggregates nearly $2,500,000, and appropriations from the State, for all purposes, previous to 1904, foot up $5,123,517.90.—Since 1871 the institution has been open to women. The courses of study embrace agriculture, chemistry, polytechnics, military tactics, natural and general sciences, languages and literature, economics, household science, trade and commerce. The Graduate School dates from 1891. In 1896 the Chicago College of Pharmacy was connected with the University; a College of Law and a Library School were opened in 1897, and the same year the Chicago College of Physicians and Surgeons was affiliated as the College of Medicine—a School of Dentistry being added to the latter in 1901. In 1885 the State Laboratory of Natural History was transferred from Normal, Ill., and an Agricultural Experiment Station established in 1888, from which bulletins are sent to farmers throughout the State who may desire them.—The first name of the Institution was "Illinois Industrial University," but, in 1885, this was changed to "University of Illinois." In 1887 the Trustees (of whom there are nine) were made elective by popular vote—three being elected every two years, each holding office six years. Dr. Gregory, having resigned the office of Regent in 1880, was succeeded by Dr. Selim H. Peabody, who had been Professor of Mechanical and Civil Engineering. Dr. Peabody resigned in 1891. The duties of Regent were then discharged by Prof. Thomas J. Burrill until August, 1894, when Dr. Andrew Sloan Draper, former State Superintendent of Public Instruction of the State of New York, was installed as President, serving until 1904.—The corps of instruction (1904) includes over 100 Professors, 60 Associate and Assistant Professors and 200 Instructors and Assistants, besides special lecturers, demonstrators and clerks. The number of students has increased rapidly in recent years, as shown by the following totals for successive years from 1890-91 to 1903-04, inclusive: 519; 583; 714; 743; 810; 852; 1,075; 1,582; 1,824; 2,234; 2,505; 2,932; 3,289; 3,589. Of the last number, 2,271 were men and 718 women. During 1903-04 there were in all departments at Urbana, 2,547 students (256 being in the Preparatory Academy); and in the three Professional Departments in Chicago, 1,042, of whom 694 were in the College of Medicine, 185 in the School of Pharmacy, and 163 in the School of Dentistry. The University Library contains 63,700 volumes and 14,500 pamphlets, not including 5,350 volumes and 15,850 pamphlets in the State Laboratory of Natural History.—The University occupies a conspicuous and attractive site, embracing 220 acres adjacent to the line between Urbana and Champaign, and near the residence portion of the two cities. The athletic field of 11 acres, on which stand the gymnasium and armory, is enclosed with an ornamental iron fence. The campus, otherwise, is an open and beautiful park with fine landscape effects.

UNORGANIZED COUNTIES. In addition to the 102 counties into which Illinois is divided, acts were passed by the General Assembly, at different times, providing for the organization of a number of others, a few of which were subsequently organized under different names, but the majority of which were never organized at all—the proposition for such organization being rejected by vote of the people within the proposed boundaries, or allowed to lapse by non-action. These unorganized counties, with the date of the several acts authorizing them, and the territory which they were intended to include, were as follows: Allen County (1841)—comprising portions of Sangamon, Morgan and Macoupin Counties; Audobon (Audubon) County (1843)—from portions of Montgomery, Fayette and Shelby; Benton County (1843)—from Morgan, Greene and Macoupin; Coffee County (1837)—with substantially the same territory now comprised within the boundaries of Stark County, authorized two years later; Dane County (1839)—name changed to Christian in 1840; Harrison County (1855)—from McLean, Champaign and Vermilion, comprising territory since partially incorporated in Ford County; Holmes County (1857)—from Champaign and Vermilion; Marquette County (1843), changed (1847) to Highland—comprising the northern portion of Adams, (this act was accepted, with Columbus as the county-seat, but organization finally vacated); Michigan County (1837)—from a part of Cook; Milton County (1843)—from the south part of Vermilion; Okaw County (1841)—comprising substantially the same territory as Moultrie, organized under act of 1843; Oregon County (1851)—from parts of Sangamon, Morgan and Macoupin Counties, and covering substantially the same territory as proposed to be incorporated in Allen County ten years earlier. The last act of this character was passed in 1867, when an attempt was made to organize Lincoln County out of parts of Champaign and Vermilion, but which failed for want of an affirmative vote.

UPPER ALTON, a city of Madison County, situated on the Chicago & Alton Railroad, about 1½ miles northeast of Alton—laid out in 1816. It has several churches, and is the seat of Shurtleff College and the Western Military Academy, the former founded about 1831, and controlled by the Baptist denomination. Beds of excellent clay are found in the vicinity and utilized in pottery manufacture. Pop. (1890), 1,803; (1900), 2,373.

UPTON, George Putnam, journalist, was born at Roxbury, Mass., Oct. 25, 1834; graduated from Brown University in 1854, removed to Chicago in 1855, and began newspaper work on "The Native American," the following year taking the place of city editor of "The Evening Journal." In 1862, Mr. Upton became musical critic on "The Chicago Tribune," serving for a time also as its war correspondent in the field, later (about 1881) taking a place on the general editorial staff, which he still retains. He is regarded as an authority on musical and dramatic topics. Mr. Upton is also a stockholder in, and, for several years, has been Vice-President of the "Tribune" Company. Besides numerous contributions to magazines, his works include: "Letters of Peregrine Pickle" (1869); "Memories, a Story of German Love," translated from the German of Max Muller (1879); "Woman in Music" (1880); "Lives of German Composers" (3 vols.—1883-84); besides four volumes of standard operas, oratorios, cantatas, and symphonies (1885-88).

URBANA, a flourishing city, the county-seat of Champaign County, on the "Big Four," the Illinois Central and the Wabash Railways: 130 miles south of Chicago and 31 miles west of Danville; in agricultural and coal-mining region. The mechanical industries include extensive railroad shops, manufacture of brick, suspenders and lawn-mowers. The Cunningham Deaconesses' Home and Orphanage is located here. The city has water-works, gas and electric light plants, electric car-lines (local and interurban), superior schools, nine churches, three banks and three newspapers. Urbana is the seat of the University of Illinois. Pop. (1890), 3,511; (1900), 5,728.

USREY, William J., editor and soldier, was born at Washington (near Natchez, Miss., May 16, 1827; was educated at Natchez, and, before reaching manhood, came to Macon County, Ill., where he engaged in teaching until 1846, when he enlisted as a private in Company C, Fourth Illinois Volunteers, for the Mexican War. In 1855, he joined with a Mr. Wingate in the establishment, at Decatur, of "The Illinois State Chronicle," of which he soon after took sole charge, conducting the paper until 1861, when he enlisted in the Thirty-fifth Illinois Volunteers and was appointed Adjutant. Although born and educated in a slave State, Mr. Usrey was an earnest opponent of slavery, as proved by the attitude of his paper in opposition to the Kansas-Nebraska Bill. He was one of the most zealous endorsers of the proposition for a conference of the Anti-Nebraska editors of the State of Illinois, to agree upon a line of policy in opposition to the further extension of slavery, and, when that body met at Decatur, on Feb. 22, 1856, he served as its Secretary, thus taking a prominent part in the initial steps which resulted in the organization of the Republican party in Illinois. (See Anti-Nebraska Editorial Convention.) After returning from the war he resumed his place as editor of "The Chronicle," but finally retired from newspaper work in 1871. He was twice Postmaster of the city of Decatur, first previous to 1850, and again under the administration of President Grant; served also as a member of the City Council and was a member of the local Post of the G. A. R., and Secretary of the Macon County Association of Mexican War Veterans. Died, at Decatur, Jan. 20, 1894.

UTICA, (also called North Utica), a village of La Salle County, on the Illinois & Michigan Canal and the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway, 10 miles west of Ottawa, situated on the Illinois River opposite "Starved Rock," also believed to stand on the site of the Kaskaskia village found by the French Explorer, La Salle, when he first visited Illinois. "Utica cement" is produced here; it also has several factories or mills, besides banks and a weekly paper. Population (1880), 767; (1890), 1,094; (1900), 1,150.

VAN ARNAM, John, lawyer and soldier, was born at Plattsburg, N. Y., March 3, 1820. Having lost his father at five years of age, he went to live with a farmer, but ran away in his boyhood; later, began teaching, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in New York City, beginning practice at Marshall, Mich. In 1858 he removed to Chicago, and, as a member of the firm of Walker, Van Arnam & Dexter, became prominent as a criminal lawyer and railroad attorney, being for a time Solicitor of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad. In 1862 he assisted in organizing the One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Illinois Volunteer Infantry and was commissioned its Colonel, but was compelled to resign on account of illness. After spending some time in California, he resumed practice in Chicago in 1865. His later years were spent in California, dying at San Diego, in that State, April 6, 1890.

VANDALIA, the principal city and county-seat of Fayette County. It is situated on the Kaskaskia River, 30 miles north of Centralia, 62 miles south by west of Decatur, and 68 miles east-northeast of St. Louis. It is an intersecting point for the Illinois Central and the St. Louis, Vandalia and Terre Haute Railroads. It was the capital of the State from 1820 to 1839, the seat of government being removed to Springfield, the latter year, in accordance with act of the General Assembly passed at the session of 1837. It contains a court house (old State Capitol building), six churches, two banks, three weekly papers, a graded school, flour, saw and paper mills, foundry, stave and heading mill, carriage and wagon and brick works. Pop. (1890), 2,144; (1900), 2,665.

VANDEVEER, Horatio M., pioneer lawyer, was born in Washington County, Ind., March 1, 1816; came with his family to Illinois at an early age, settling on Clear Creek, now in Christian County; taught school and studied law, using books borrowed from the late Hon. John T. Stuart of Springfield; was elected first County Recorder of Christian County and, soon after, appointed Circuit Clerk, filling both offices three years. He also held the office of County Judge from 1848 to 1857; was twice chosen Representative in the General Assembly (1842 and 1850) and once to the State Senate (1862); in 1846, enlisted and was chosen Captain of a company for the Mexican War, but, having been rejected on account of the quota being full, was appointed Assistant-Quartermaster, in this capacity serving on the staff of General Taylor at the battle of Buena Vista. Among other offices held by Mr. Vandever, were those of Postmaster of Taylorville, Master in Chancery, Presidential Elector (1848), Delegate to the Constitutional Convention of 1862, and Judge of the Circuit Court (1870-79). In 1868 Judge Vandever established the private banking firm of H. M. Vandever & Co., at Taylorville, which, in conjunction with his sons, he continued successfully during the remainder of his life. Died, March 12, 1894.

VAN HORNE, William C., Railway Manager and President, was born in Will County, Ill., February, 1843; began his career as a telegraph operator on the Illinois Central Railroad in 1856, was attached to the Michigan Central and Chicago & Alton Railroads (1858-72), later being General Manager or General Superintendent of various other lines (1872-79). He next served as General Superintendent of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, but soon after became General Manager of the Canadian Pacific, which he assisted to construct to the Pacific Coast; was elected Vice-President of the line in 1884, and its President in 1888. His services have been recognized by conferring upon him the order of knighthood by the British Government.

VASSEUR, Noel C., pioneer Indian-trader, was born of French parentage in Canada, Dec. 25, 1799; at the age of 17 made a trip with a trading party to the West, crossing Wisconsin by way of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, the route pursued by Joliet and Marquette in 1673; later, was associated with Gurdon S. Hubbard in the service of the American Fur Company, in 1820 visiting the region now embraced in Iroquois County, where he and Hubbard subsequently established a trading post among the Pottawatomie Indians, believed to have been the site of the present town of Iroquois. The way of reaching their station from Chicago was by the Chicago and Des Plaines Rivers to the Kankakee, and ascending the latter and the Iroquois. Here Vasseur remained in trade until the removal of the Indians west of the Mississippi, in which he served as agent of the Government. While in the Iroquois region he married Watseka, a somewhat famous Pottawatomie woman, for whom the town of Watseka was named, and who had previously been the Indian wife of a fellow-trader. His later years were spent at Bourbonnais Grove, in Kankakee County, where he died, Dec. 12, 1879.

VENICE, a city of Madison County, on the Mississippi River opposite St. Louis and 2 miles north of East St. Louis; is touched by six trunk lines of railroad, and at the eastern approach to the new "Merchants' Bridge," with its round-house, has two ferries to St. Louis, street car line, electric lights, water-works, some manufactures and a newspaper. Pop. (1890), 932; (1900), 2,450.

VENICE & CARONDELET RAILROAD. (See Louisville, Evansville & St. Louis (Consolidated) Railroad.)

VERMILION COUNTY, an eastern county, bordering on the Indiana State line, and drained by the Vermilion and Little Vermilion Rivers, from which it takes its name. It was originally organized in 1826, when it extended north to Lake Michigan. Its present area is 926 square miles. The discovery of salt springs, in 1819, aided in attracting immigration to this region, but the manufacture of salt was abandoned many years ago. Early settlers were Seymour Treat, James Butler, Henry Johnston, Harvey Lidington, Gurdon S. Hubbard and Daniel W. Beckwith. James Butler and Achilles Morgan were the first County Commissioners. Many interesting fossil remains have been found, among them the skeleton of a mastodon (1868). Fire clay is found in large quantities, and two coal seams cross the county. The surface is level and the soil fertile. Corn is the chief agricultural product, although oats, wheat, rye, and potatoes are extensively cultivated. Stock-raising and wool-growing are important industries. There are also several manufactories, chiefly at Danville, which is the county-seat. Coal mining is carried on extensively, especially in the vicinity of Danville. Population (1880), 41,588; (1890), 49,905; (1900), 65,635.

VERMILION RIVER, a tributary of the Illinois; rises in Ford and the northern part of McLean County, and, running northwestward through Livingston and the southern part of La Salle Counties, enters the Illinois River nearly opposite the city of La Salle; has a length of about 80 miles.

VERMILION RIVER, an affluent of the Wabash, formed by the union of the North, Middle and South Forks, which rise in Illinois, and come together near Danville in this State. It flows southeastward, and enters the Wabash in Vermilion County, Ind. The main stream is about 28 miles long. The South Fork, however, which rises in Champaign County and runs eastward, has a length of nearly 75 miles. The Little Vermilion River enters the Wabash about 7 or 8 miles below the Vermilion, which is sometimes called the Big Vermilion, by way of distinction.

VERMONT, a village in Fulton County, at junction of Galesburg and St. Louis Division of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, 24 miles north of Beardstown; has a carriage manufactory, flour and saw-mills, brick and tile works, electric light plant, besides two banks, four churches, two graded schools, and one weekly newspaper. An artesian well has been sunk here to the depth of 2,600 feet. Pop. (1900), 1,195.

VERSAILLES, a town of Brown County, on the Wabash Railway, 48 miles east of Quincy; is in a timber and agricultural district; has a bank and weekly newspaper. Population (1900), 524.

VIENNA, the county-seat of Johnson County, situated on the Cairo and Vincennes branch of the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad, 36 miles north-northwest of Cairo. It has a court house, several churches, a graded school, banks and two weekly newspapers. Population (1880), 494; (1890), 828; (1900), 1,217.

VIGO, Francois, pioneer and early Indian-trader, was born at Mondovi, Sardinia (Western Italy), in 1747, served as a private soldier, first at Havana and afterwards at New Orleans. When he left the Spanish army he came to St. Louis, then the military headquarters of Spain for Upper Louisiana, where he became a partner of Commandant de Leba, and was extensively engaged in the fur-trade among the Indians on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. On the occupation of Kaskaskia by Col. George Rogers Clark in 1778, he rendered valuable aid to the Americans, turning out supplies to feed Clark's destitute soldiers, and accepting Virginia Continental money, at par, in payment, incurring liabilities in excess of $20,000. This, followed by the confiscation policy of the British Colonel Hamilton, at Vincennes, where Vigo had considerable property, reduced him to extreme penury. H. W. Beckwith says that, towards the close of his life, he lived on his little homestead near Vincennes, in great poverty but cheerful to the last. He was never recompensed during his life for his sacrifices in behalf of the American cause, though a tardy restitution was attempted, after his death, by the United States Government, for the benefit of his heirs. He died, at a ripe old age, at Vincennes, Ind., March 22, 1835.

VILLA RIDGE, a village of Pulaski County, on the Illinois Central Railway, 10 miles north of Cairo. Population, 500.

VINCENNES, Jean Baptiste Bisso, a Canadian explorer, born at Quebec, January, 1688, of aristocratic and wealthy ancestry. He was closely connected with Louis Joliet — probably his brother-in-law, although some historians say that he was the latter's nephew. He entered the Canadian army as ensign in 1701, and had a long and varied experience as an Indian fighter. About 1725 he took up his residence on what is now the site of the present city of Vincennes, Ind., which is named in his honor. Here he erected an earth fort and established a trading-post. In 1726, under orders, he co-operated with D'Artaguiette (then the French Governor of Illinois) in an expedition against the Chickasaws. The expedition resulted disastrously. Vincennes and D'Artaguiette were captured and burned at the stake, together with Father Senat (a Jesuit priest) and others of the command. (See also D'Artaguiette; French Governors of Illinois.)

VIRDEN, a city of Macoupin County, on the Chicago & Alton and the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroads, 21 miles south by west from Springfield, and 31 miles east-southeast of Jacksonville. It has five churches, two banks, two newspapers, telephone service, electric lights, grain elevators, machine shop, and extensive coal mines. Pop. (1900), 2,280; (school census 1903), 3,651.

VIRGINIA, an incorporated city, the county-seat of Cass County, situated at the intersection of the Chicago, Peoria & St. Louis, with the Springfield Division of the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railroad, 15 miles north of Jacksonville, and 33 miles west-northwest of Springfield. It lies in the heart of a rich agricultural region. There is a flouring mill here, besides manufactories of wagons and cigars. The city has two National and one State bank, five churches, a high school, and two weekly papers. Pop (1890), 1,602; (1900), 1,600.

VOCKE, William, lawyer, was born at Minden, Westphalia (Germany), in 1839, the son of a Government Secretary in the Prussian service. Having lost his father at an early age, he emigrated to America in 1856, and, after a short stay in New York, came to Chicago, where he found employment as a paper-carrier for "The Staats-Zeitung," meanwhile giving his attention to the study of law. Later, he became associated with a real-estate firm; on the commencement of the Civil War, enlisted as a private in a three-months' regiment, and, finally, in the Twenty-fourth Illinois (the first Hecker regiment), in which he rose to the rank of Captain. Returning from the army, he was employed as city editor of "The Staats-Zeitung," but, in 1865, became Clerk of the Chicago Police Court, serving until 1869. Meanwhile he had been admitted to the bar, and, on retirement from office, began practice, but, in 1870, was elected Representative in the Twenty-seventh General Assembly, in which he bore a leading part in framing "the burnt record act" made necessary by the fire of 1871. He has since been engaged in the practice of his profession, having been, for a number of years, attorney for the German Consulate at Chicago, also serving, for several years, on the Chicago Board of Education. Mr. Vocke is a man of high literary tastes, as shown by his publication, in 1869, of a volume of poems translated from the German, which has been highly commended, besides a legal work on "The Administration of Justice in the United States, and a Synopsis of the Mode of Procedure in our Federal and State Courts and All Federal and State Laws relating to Subjects of Interest to Aliens," which has been published in the German Language, and is highly valued by German lawyers and business men. Mr. Vocke was a member of the Republican National Convention of 1872 at Philadelphia, which nominated General Grant for the Presidency a second time.

VOLK, Leonard Wells, a distinguished Illinois sculptor, born at Wellstown (afterwards Wells), N. Y., Nov. 7, 1828. Later, his father, who was a marble cutter, removed to Pittsfield, Mass., and, at the age of 16, Leonard began work in his shop. In 1848 he came west and began modeling in clay and drawing at St. Louis, being only self-taught. He married a cousin of Stephen A. Douglas, and the latter, in 1855, aided him in the prosecution of his art studies in Italy. Two years afterward he settled in Chicago, where he modeled the first portrait bust ever made in the city, having for his subject his first patron—the "Little Giant." The next year (1858) he made a life-size marble statue of Douglas. In 1860 he made a portrait bust of Abraham Lincoln, which passed into the possession of the Chicago Historical Society and was destroyed in the great fire of 1871. In 1868-69, and again in 1871-72, he revisited Italy for purposes of study. In 1867 he was elected academician of the Chicago Academy, and was its President for eight years. He was genial, companionable and charitable, and always ready to assist his younger and less fortunate professional brethren. His best known works are the Douglas Monument, in Chicago, several soldiers' monuments in different parts of the country, the statuary for the Henry Keep mausoleum at Watertown, N. Y., life-size statues of Lincoln and Douglas, in the State House at Springfield, and numerous portrait busts of men eminent in political, ecclesiastical and commercial life. Died, at Osceola, Wis., August 18, 1895.

VOSS, Arno, journalist, lawyer and soldier, born in Prussia, April 16, 1821; emigrated to the United States and was admitted to the bar in Chicago, in 1848, the same year becoming editor of "The Staats-Zeitung"; was elected City Attorney in 1852, and again in 1853; in 1861 became Major of the Sixth Illinois Cavalry, but afterwards assisted in organizing the Twelfth Cavalry, of which he was commissioned Colonel, still later serving with his command in Virginia. He was at Harper's Ferry at the time of the capture of that place in September, 1862, but succeeded in cutting his way, with his command, through the rebel lines, escaping into Pennsylvania. Compelled by ill-health to leave the service in 1863, he retired to a farm in Will County, but, in 1869, returned to Chicago, where he served as Master in Chancery and was elected to the lower branch of the General Assembly in 1876, but declined a re-election in 1878. Died, in Chicago, March 23, 1888.

WABASH, CHESTER & WESTERN RAILROAD, a railway running from Chester to Mount Vernon, Ill., 63.33 miles, with a branch extending from Chester to Menard, 1.5 miles; total mileage, 64.83. It is of standard gauge, and almost entirely laid with 60-pound steel rails.—(HISTORY.) It was organized, Feb. 20, 1878, as successor to the Iron Mountain, Chester & Eastern Railroad. During the fiscal year 1893-94 the Company purchased the Tamaroa & Mount Vernon Railroad, extending from Mount Vernon to Tamara, 22.5 miles. Capital stock (1898), $1,-250,000; bonded indebtedness, $690,000; total capitalization, $2,028,573.

WABASH COUNTY, situated in the southeast corner of the State; area 220 square miles. The county was carved out from Edwards in 1824, and the first court house built at Centerville, in May, 1826. Later, Mount Carmel was made the county-seat. (See Mount Carmel.) The Wabash River drains the county on the east; other streams are the Bon Pas, Coffee and Crawfish Creeks. The surface is undulating with a fair growth of timber. The chief industries are the raising of live-stock and the cultivation of cereals. The wool-crop is likewise valuable. The county is crossed by the Louisville, Evansville & St. Louis and the Cairo and Vincennes Division of the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railroads. Population (1880), 4,945; (1890), 11,866; (1900), 12,583.

WABASH RAILROAD, an extensive railroad system connecting the cities of Detroit and Toledo, on the east, with Kansas City and Council Bluffs, on the west, with branches to Chicago, St. Louis, Quincy and Altamont, Ill., and to Keokuk and Des Moines, Iowa. The total mileage (1898) is 1,874.96 miles, of which 677.4 miles are in Illinois—all of the latter being the property of the company, besides 176.7 miles of yard-tracks, sidings and spurs. The company has trackage privileges over the Toledo, Peoria & Western (6.5 miles) between Elvaston and Keokuk bridge, and over the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy (21.8 miles) between Camp Point and Quincy.—(HISTORY.) A considerable portion of this road in Illinois is constructed on the line upon which the Northern Cross Railroad was projected, in the "internal improvement" scheme adopted in 1837, and embraces the only section of road completed under that scheme—that between the Illinois River and Springfield. (1) The construction of this section was begun by the State, May 11, 1837, the first rail laid, May 9, 1838, the road completed to Jacksonville, Jan. 1, 1840, and to Springfield, May 13, 1842. It was operated for a time by "mule power," but the income was insufficient to keep the line in repair and it was finally abandoned. In 1847 the line was sold for $21,100 to N. H. Ridgely and Thomas Mather of Springfield, and by them transferred to New York capitalists, who organized the Sangamon & Morgan Railroad Company, reconstructed the road from Springfield to Naples and opened it for business in 1849. (2) In 1853 two corporations were organized in Ohio and Indiana, respectively, under the name of the Toledo & Illinois Railroad and the Lake Erie, Wabash & St. Louis Railroad, which were consolidated as the Toledo, Wabash & Western Railroad, June 25, 1856. In 1858 these lines were sold separately under foreclosure, and finally reorganized, under a special charter granted by the Illinois Legislature, under the name of the Great Western Railroad Company. (3) The Quincy & Toledo Railroad, extending from Camp Point to the Illinois River opposite Meredosia, was constructed in 1858-59, and that, with the Illinois & Southern Iowa (from Clayton to Keokuk), was united, July 1, 1865, with the eastern divisions extending to Toledo, the new organization taking the name of the main line, (Toledo, Wabash & Western). (4) The Hannibal & Naples Division (49.6 miles), from Bluffs to Hannibal, Mo., was chartered in 1863, opened for business in 1870 and leased to the Toledo, Wabash & Western. The latter defaulted on its interest in 1875, was placed in the hands of a receiver and, in 1877, was turned over to a new company under the name of the Wabash Railway Company. (5) In 1868 the company, as it then existed, promoted and secured the construction, and afterwards acquired the ownership, of a line extending from Decatur to East St. Louis (110.5 miles) under the name of the Decatur & East St. Louis Railroad. (6) The El River Railroad, from Butler to Logansport, Ind., was acquired in 1877, and afterwards extended to Detroit under the name of the Detroit, Butler & St. Louis Railroad, completing the connection from Logansport to Detroit.—In November, 1879, the Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway Company was organized, took the property and consolidated it with certain lines west of the Mississippi, of which the chief was the St. Louis, Kansas City & Northern. A line had been projected from Decatur to Chicago as early as 1870, but, not having been constructed in 1881, the Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific purchased what was known as the Chicago & Paducah Railroad, uniting with the main line at Bement, and (by way of the Decatur and St. Louis Division) giving a direct line between Chicago and St. Louis. At this time the Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific was operating the following additional leased lines: Pekin, Lincoln & Decatur (67.3 miles); Hannibal & Central Missouri (70.2 miles); Lafayette, Muncie & Bloomington (36.7 miles), and the Lafayette Bloomington & Muncie (80 miles). A connection between Chicago on the west and Toledo and Detroit on the east was established over the Grand Trunk road in 1882, but, in 1890, the company constructed a line from Montpelier, Ohio, to Clark, Ind. (149.7 miles), thence by track lease to Chicago (17.5 miles), giving an independent line between Chicago and Detroit by what is known to investors as the Detroit & Chicago Division.

The total mileage of the Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific system, in 1884, amounted to over 3,600 miles; but, in May of that year, default having been made in the payment of interest, the work of disintegration began. The main line east of the Mississippi and that on the west were separated, the latter taking the name of the "Wabash Western." The Eastern Division was placed in the hands of a receiver, so remaining until May, 1889, when the two divisions, having been bought in by a purchasing committee, were consolidated under the present name. The total earnings and income of the road in Illinois, for the fiscal year 1898, were $4,402,621, and the expenses $4,836,110. The total capital invested (1898) was $139,889,643, including capital stock of $52,000,000 and bonds to the amount of $81,534,000.

WABASH RIVER, rises in northwestern Ohio, passes into Indiana, and runs northwest to Huntington. It then flows nearly due west to Logansport, thence southwest to Covington, finally turning southward to Terre Haute, a few miles below which it strikes the western boundary of Indiana. It forms the boundary between Illinois and Indiana (taking into account its numerous windings) for some 200 miles. Below Vincennes it runs in a south-southwesterly direction, and enters the Ohio at the south-west extremity of Indiana, near latitude 37° 49' north. Its length is estimated at 537 miles.

WAIT, William Smith, pioneer, and original suggestor of the Illinois Central Railroad, was born in Portland, Maine, March 5, 1789, and educated in the public schools of his native place. In his youth he entered a book-publishing house in which his father was a partner, and was for a time associated with the publication of a weekly paper. Later the business was conducted at Boston, and extended over the Eastern, Middle, and Southern States, the subject of this sketch making extensive tours in the interest of the firm. In 1817 he made a tour to the West, reaching St. Louis, and, early in the following year, visited Bond County, Ill., where he made his first entry of land from the Government. Returning to Boston a few months later, he continued in the service of the publishing firm until 1820, when he again came to Illinois, and, in 1821, began farming in Ripley Township, Bond County. Returning East in 1824, he spent the next ten years in the employment of the publishing firm, with occasional visits to Illinois. In 1835 he located permanently near Greenville, Bond County, and engaged extensively in farming and fruit-raising, planting one of the largest apple orchards in the State at that early day. In 1845 he presided as chairman over the National Industrial Convention in New York, and, in 1848, was nominated as the candidate of the National Reform Association for Vice-President on the ticket with Gerrit Smith of New York, but declined. He was also prominent in County and State Agricultural Societies. Mr. Wait has been credited with being one of the first (if not the very first) to suggest the construction of the Illinois Central Railroad, which he did as early as 1835; was also one of the prime movers in the construction of the Mississippi & Atlantic Railroad—now the "Vandalia Line"—giving much time to the latter enterprise from 1846 for many years, and was one of the original incorporators of the St. Louis & Illinois Bridge Company. Died, July 17, 1865.

WALKER, Cyrus, pioneer, lawyer, born in Rockbridge County, Va., May 14, 1791; was taken while an infant to Adair County, Ky., and came to Macomb, Ill., in 1833, being the second lawyer to locate in McDonough County. He had a wide reputation as a successful advocate, especially in criminal cases, and practiced extensively in the courts of Western Illinois and also in Iowa. Died, Dec. 1, 1875. Mr. Walker was uncle of the late Pinkney H. Walker of the Supreme Court, who studied law with him. He was Whig candidate for Presidential Elector for the State-at-large in 1840.

WALKER, James Barr, clergyman, was born in Philadelphia, July 29, 1805; in his youth served as errand-boy in a country store near Pittsburg and spent four years in a printing office; then became clerk in the office of Mordecai M. Noah, in New York, studied law and graduated from Western Reserve College, Ohio; edited various religious papers, including "The Watchman of the Prairies" (now "The Advance") of Chicago, was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Chicago, and for some time was lecturer on "Harmony between Science and Revealed Religion" at Oberlin College and Chicago Theological Seminary. He was author of several volumes, one of which—"The Philosophy of the Plan of Salvation," published anonymously under the editorship of Prof. Calvin E. Stowe (1855)—ran through several editions and was translated into five different languages, including Hindustanee. Died, at Wheaton, Ill., March 6, 1887.

WALKER, James Monroe, corporation lawyer and Railway President, was born at Claremont, N. H., Feb. 14, 1820. At fifteen he removed with his parents to a farm in Michigan; was educated at Oberlin, Ohio, and at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, graduating from the latter in 1849. He then entered a law office as clerk and student, was admitted to the bar the next year, and soon after elected Prosecuting Attorney of Washtenaw County; was also local attorney for the Michigan Central Railway, for which, after his removal to Chicago in 1853, he became General Solicitor. Two years later the firm of Sedgwick & Walker, which had been organized in Michigan, became attorneys for the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, and, until his death, Mr. Walker was associated with this company, either as General Solicitor, General Counsel or President, filling the latter position from 1870 to 1875. Mr. Walker organized both the Chicago and Kansas City stock-yards, and was President of these corporations, as also of the Wilmington Coal Company, down to the time of his death, which occurred on Jan. 22, 1881, as a result of heart disease.

WALKER, (Rev.) Jesse, Methodist Episcopal missionary, was born in Rockingham County, Va., June 9, 1766; in 1800 removed to Tennessee, became a traveling preacher in 1802, and, in 1806, came to Illinois under the presiding-elderhood of Rev. William McKendree (afterwards Bishop), locating first at Turkey Hill, St. Clair County. In 1807 he held a camp meeting near Edwardsville—the first on Illinois soil. Later, he transferred his labors to Northern Illinois; was at Peoria in 1824; at Ottawa in 1825, and devoted much time to missionary work among the Pottawatomies, maintaining a school among them for a time. He visited Chicago in 1826, and there is evidence that he was a prominent resident there for several years, occupying a log house, which he used as a church and living-room, on "Wolf Point" at the junction of the North and South Branches of the Chicago River. While acting as superintendent of the Fox River mission, his residence appears to have been at Plainfield, in the northern part of Will County. Died, Oct. 5, 1835.

WALKER, Pinkney H., lawyer and jurist, was born in Adair County, Ky., June 18, 1815. His boyhood was chiefly passed in farm work and as clerk in a general store; in 1834 he came to Illinois, settling at Rushville, where he worked in a store for four years. In 1838 he removed to Macomb, where he began attendance at an academy and the study of law with his uncle, Cyrus Walker, a leading lawyer of his time. He was admitted to the bar in 1839, practicing at Macomb until 1848, when he returned to Rushville. In 1853 he was elected Judge of the Fifth Judicial Circuit, to fill a vacancy, and re-elected in 1855. This position he resigned in 1858, having been appointed, by Governor Bissell, to fill the vacancy on the bench of the Supreme Court occasioned by the resignation of Judge Skinner. Two months later he was elected to the same position, and re-elected in 1867 and '76. He presided as Chief Justice from January, 1864, to June, '67, and again from June, 1874, to June, '75. Before the expiration of his last term he died, Feb. 7, 1885.

WALL, George Willard, lawyer, politician and Judge, was born at Chaillicoth, Ohio, April 22, 1839; brought to Perry County, Ill., in infancy, and received his preparatory education at McKendree College, finally graduating from the University of Michigan in 1858, and from the Cincinnati Law School in 1859, when he began practice at Duquoin, Ill. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1862, and, from 1864 to '68, served as State's Attorney for the Third Judicial District; was also a Delegate to the State Constitutional Convention of 1869-70. In 1872 he was an unsuccessful Democratic candidate for Congress, although running ahead of his ticket. In 1877 he was elected to the bench of the Third Circuit, and re-elected in '79, '85 and '91, much of the time since 1877 being on duty upon the Appellate bench. His home is at Duquoin.

WALLACE, (Rev.) Peter, D.D., clergyman and soldier; was born in Mason County, Ky., April 11, 1813; taken in infancy to Brown County, Ohio, where he grew up on a farm until 15 years of age, when he was apprenticed to a carpenter; at the age of 20 came to Illinois, where he became a contractor and builder, following this occupation for a number of years. He was converted in 1835 at Springfield, Ill., and, some years later, having decided to enter the ministry, was admitted to the Illinois Conference as a deacon by Bishop E. S. James in 1853, and placed in charge of the Danville Circuit. Two years later he was ordained by Bishop Scott, and, in the next few years, held pastorates at various places in the central and eastern parts of the State. From 1867 to 1874 he was Presiding Elder of the Mattoon and Quincy Districts, and, for six years, held the position of President of the Board of Trustees of Chaddock College at Quincy, from which he received the degree of D.D. in 1881. In the second year of the Civil War he raised a company in Sangamon County, was chosen its Captain and assigned to the Seventy-third Illinois Volunteers, known as the "preachers' regiment"—all of its officers being ministers. In 1864 he was compelled by ill-health to resign his commission. While pastor of the church at Saybrook, Ill., he was offered the position of Postmaster of that place, which he decided to accept, and was allowed to retire from the active ministry. On retirement from office, in 1884, he removed to Chicago. In 1889 he was appointed by Governor Fifer the first Chaplain of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Home at Quincy, but retired some four years afterward, when he returned to Chicago. Dr. Wallace was an eloquent and effective preacher and continued to preach, at intervals, until within a short time of his decease, which occurred in Chicago, Feb. 21, 1897, in his 84th year. A zealous patriot, he frequently spoke very effectively upon the political rostrum. Originally a Whig, he became a Republican on the organization of that party, and took pride in the fact that the first vote he ever cast was for Abraham Lincoln, for Representative in the Legislature, in 1834. He was a Knight Templar, Vice-President of the Tippecanoe Club of Chicago, and, at his death, Chaplain of America Post, No. 708, G. A. R.

WALLACE, William Henry Lamb, lawyer and soldier, was born at Urbana, Ohio, July 8, 1821; brought to Illinois in 1833, his father settling near La Salle and, afterwards, at Mount Morris, Ogle County, where young Wallace attended the Rock River Seminary; was admitted to the bar in 1845; in 1846 enlisted as a private in the First Illinois Volunteers (Col. John J. Hardin's regiment), for the Mexican War, rising to the rank of Adjutant and participating in the battle of Buena Vista (where his commander was killed), and in other engagements. Returning to his profession at Ottawa, he served as District Attorney (1852-56), then became partner of his father-in-law, Col. T. Lyle Dickey, afterwards of the Supreme Court. In April, 1861, he was one of the first to answer the call for troops by enlisting, and became Colonel of the Eleventh Illinois (three-months' men), afterwards re-enlisting for three years. As commander of a brigade he participated in the capture of Forts Henry and Donelson, in February, 1862, receiving promotion as Brigadier-General for gallantry. At Pittsburg Landing (Shiloh), as commander of Gen. C. F. Smith's Division, devolving on him on account of the illness of his superior officer, he showed great courage, but fell mortally wounded, dying at Charleston, Tenn., April 10, 1862. His career promised great brilliancy and his loss was greatly deplored.—Martin R. M. (Wallace), brother of the preceding, was born at Urbana, Ohio, Sept. 29, 1829, came to La Salle County, Ill., with his father's family and was educated in the local schools and at Rock River Seminary; studied law at Ottawa, and was admitted to the bar in 1856, soon after locating in Chicago. In 1861 he assisted in organizing the Fourth Regiment Illinois Cavalry, of which he became Lieutenant-Colonel, and was complimented, in 1865, with the rank of brevet Brigadier-General. After the war he served as Assessor of Internal Revenue (1866-69); County Judge (1869-77); Prosecuting Attorney (1884); and, for many years past, has been one of the Justices of the Peace of the city of Chicago.

WALNUT, a town of Bureau County, on the Mendota and Fulton branch of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, 26 miles west of Mendota; is in a farming and stock-raising district; has two banks and two newspapers. Population (1890), 605; (1900), 791.

WAR OF 1812. Upon the declaration of war by Congress, in June, 1812, the Pottawatomies, and most of the other tribes of Indians in the Territory of Illinois, strongly sympathized with the British. The savages had been hostile and restless for some time previous, and blockhouses and family forts had been erected at a number of points, especially in the settlements most exposed to the incursions of the savages. Governor Edwards, becoming apprehensive of an outbreak, constructed Fort Russell, a few miles from Edwardsville. Taking the field in person, he made this his headquarters, and collected a force of 250 mounted volunteers, who were later reinforced by two companies of rangers, under Col. William Russell, numbering about 100 men. An independent company of twenty-one spies, of which John Reynolds—afterwards Governor—was a member, was also formed and led by Capt. Samuel Judy. The Governor organized his little army into two regiments under Colonels Rector and Stephenson, Colonel Russell serving as second to the commander-in-chief, other members of his staff being Secretary Nathaniel Pope and Robert K. McLaughlin. On Oct. 18, 1812, Governor Edwards, with his men, set out for Peoria, where it was expected that their force would meet that of General Hopkins, who had been sent from Kentucky with a force of 2,000 men. En route, two Kickapoo villages were burned, and a number of Indians unnecessarily slain by Edwards' party. Hopkins had orders to disperse the Indians on the Illinois and Wabash Rivers, and destroy their villages. He determined, however, on reaching the headwaters of the Vermilion to proceed no farther. Governor Edwards reached the head of Peoria Lake, but, failing to meet Hopkins, returned to Fort Russell. About the same time Capt. Thomas E. Craig led a party, in two boats, up the Illinois River to Peoria. His boats, as he alleged, having been fired upon in the night by Indians, who were harbored and protected by the French citizens of Peoria, he burned the greater part of the village, and capturing the population, carried them down the river, putting them on shore, in the early part of the winter, just below Alton. Other desultory expeditions marked the campaigns of 1813 and 1814. The Indians meanwhile gaining courage, remote settlements were continually harassed by marauding bands. Later in 1814, an expedition, led by Major (afterwards President) Zachary Taylor, ascended the Mississippi as far as Rock Island, where he found a large force of Indians, supported by British regulars with artillery. Finding himself unable to cope with so formidable a foe, Major Taylor retreated down the river. On the site of the present town of Warsaw he threw up fortifications, which he named Fort Edwards, from which point he was subsequently compelled to retreat. The same year the British, with their Indian allies, descended from Mackinac, captured Prairie du Chien, and burned Forts Madison and Johnston, after which they retired to Cap au Gris. The treaty of Ghent, signed Dec. 24, 1814, closed the war, although no formal treaties were made with the tribes until the year following.

WAR OF THE REBELLION. At the outbreak of the Civil War, the executive chair, in Illinois, was occupied by Gov. Richard Yates. Immediately upon the issuance of President Lincoln's first call for troops (April 15, 1861), the Governor issued his proclamation summoning the Legislature together in special session and, the same day, issued a call for "six regiments of militia,"

the quota assigned to the State under call of the President. Public excitement was at fever heat, and dormant patriotism in both sexes was aroused as never before. Party lines were broken down and, with comparatively few exceptions, the mass of the people were actuated by a common sentiment of patriotism. On April 19, Governor Yates was instructed, by the Secretary of War, to take possession of Cairo as an important strategic point. At that time, the State militia organizations were few in number and poorly equipped, consisting chiefly of independent companies in the larger cities. The Governor acted with great promptitude, and, on April 21, seven companies, numbering 595 men, commanded by Gen. Richard K. Swift of Chicago, were en route to Cairo. The first volunteer company to tender its services, in response to Governor Yates' proclamation, on April 16, was the Zouave Grays of Springfield. Eleven other companies were tendered the same day, and, by the evening of the 18th, the number had been increased to fifty. Simultaneously with these proceedings, Chicago bankers tendered to the Governor a war loan of $500,000, and those of Springfield, $100,000. The Legislature, at its special session, passed acts increasing the efficiency of the militia law, and provided for the creation of a war fund of $2,000,000. Besides the six regiments already called for, the raising of ten additional volunteer regiments and one battery of light artillery was authorized. The last of the six regiments, apportioned to Illinois under the first presidential call, was dispatched to Cairo early in May. The six regiments were numbered the Seventh to Twelfth, inclusive—the earlier numbers, First to Sixth, being conceded to the six regiments which had served in the war with Mexico. The regiments were commanded, respectively, by Colonels John Cook, Richard J. Oglesby, Eleazer A. Paine, James D. Morgan, William H. L. Wallace, and John McArthur, constituting the "First Brigade of Illinois Volunteers." Benjamin M. Prentiss, having been chosen Brigadier-General on arrival at Cairo, assumed command, relieving General Swift. The quota under the second call, consisting of ten regiments, was mustered into service within sixty days, 200 companies being tendered immediately. Many more volunteered than could be accepted, and large numbers crossed to Missouri and enlisted in regiments forming in that State. During June and July the Secretary of War authorized Governor Yates to recruit twenty-two additional regiments (seventeen infantry and five cavalry), which were promptly raised. On July 22, the day following the defeat of the Union army at Bull Run, President Lincoln called for 500,000 more volunteers. Governor Yates immediately responded with an offer to the War Department of sixteen more regiments (thirteen of infantry and three of cavalry), and a battalion of artillery, adding, that the State claimed it as her right, to do her full share toward the preservation of the Union. Under supplemental authority, received from the Secretary of War in August, 1861, twelve additional regiments of infantry and five of cavalry were raised, and, by December, 1861, the State had 43,000 volunteers in the field and 17,000 in camps of instruction. Other calls were made in July and August, 1862, each for 300,000 men. Illinois' quota, under both calls, was over 52,000 men, no regard being paid to the fact that the State had already furnished 16,000 troops in excess of its quotas under previous calls. Unless this number of volunteers was raised by September 1, a draft would be ordered. The tax was a severe one, inasmuch as it would fall chiefly upon the prosperous citizens, the floating population, the idle and the extremely poor having already followed the army's march, either as soldiers or as camp-followers. But recruiting was actively carried on, and, aided by liberal bounties in many of the counties, in less than a fortnight the 52,000 new troops were secured, the volunteers coming largely from the substantial classes—agricultural, mercantile, artisan and professional. By the end of December, fifty-nine regiments and four batteries had been dispatched to the front, besides a considerable number to fill up regiments already in the field, which had suffered severely from battle, exposure and disease. At this time, Illinois had an aggregate of over 135,000 enlisted men in the field. The issue of President Lincoln's preliminary proclamation of emancipation, in September, 1862, was met by a storm of hostile criticism from his political opponents, who—aided by the absence of so large a proportion of the loyal population of the State in the field—were able to carry the elections of that year. Consequently, when the Twenty-third General Assembly convened in regular session at Springfield, on Jan. 5, 1863, a large majority of that body was not only opposed to both the National and State administrations, but avowedly opposed to the further prosecution of the war under the existing policy. The Legislature reconvened in June, but was prorogued by Governor Yates. Between Oct. 1, 1863, and July 1, 1864, 16,000 veterans re-enlisted and 87,000 new volunteers were enrolled; and, by the date last mentioned, Illinois had furnished to the Union army 244,496 men, being 14,596 in excess of the allotted quotas, constituting fifteen per cent of the entire population. These were comprised in 151 regiments of infantry, 17 of cavalry and two complete regiments of artillery, besides twelve independent batteries. The total losses of Illinois organizations, during the war, has been reported at 34,834, of which 5,874 were killed in battle, 4,020 died from wounds, 22,786 from disease and 2,154 from other causes—being a total of thirteen per cent of the entire force of the State in the service. The part which Illinois played in the contest was conspicuous for patriotism, promptness in response to every call, and the bravery and efficiency of its troops in the field—reflecting honor upon the State and its history. Nor were its loyal citizens—who, while staying at home, furnished moral and material support to the men at the front—less worthy of praise than those who volunteered. By upholding the Government—National and State—and by their zeal and energy in collecting and sending forward immense quantities of supplies—surgical, medical and other—often at no little sacrifice, they contributed much to the success of the Union arms. WAR OF THE REBELLION (HISTORY OF ILLINOIS REGIMENTS). The following is a list of the various military organizations mustered into the service during the Civil War (1861-65), with the terms of service and a summary of the more important events in the history of each, while in the field:

SEVENTH INFANTRY. Illinois having sent six regiments to the Mexican War, by courtesy the numbering of the regiments which took part in the war for the Union began with number Seven. A number of regiments which responded to the first call of the President, claimed the right to be recognized as the first regiment in the field, but the honor was finally accorded to that organized at Springfield by Col. John Cook, and hence his regiment was numbered Seventh. It was mustered into the service, April 25, 1861, and remained at Mound City during the three months' service, the period of its first enlistment. It was subsequently reorganized and mustered for the three years' service, July 25, 1861, and was engaged in the battles of Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Corinth, Cherokee, Allatoona Pass, Salkahatchie Swamp, Bentonville and Columbia. The regiment re-enlisted as veterans at Pulaski, Tenn., Dec. 22, 1863; was mustered out at Louisville, July 9, 1865, and paid off and discharged at Springfield, July 11.

EIGHTH INFANTRY. Organized at Springfield, and mustered in for three months' service, April 26, 1861, Richard J. Oglesby of Decatur, being appointed Colonel. It remained at Cairo during its term of service, when it was mustered out. July 25, 1861, it was reorganized and mustered in for three years' service. It participated in the battles of Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Port Gibson, Thompson Hill, Raymond, Champion Hill, Vicksburg, Brownsville, and Spanish Fort; re-enlisted as veterans, March 24, 1864; was mustered out at Baton Rouge, May 4, 1866, paid off and discharged, May 13, having served five years.

NINTH INFANTRY. Mustered into the service at Springfield, April 26, 1861, for the term of three months, under Col. Eleazer A. Paine. It was reorganized at Cairo, in August, for three years, being composed of companies from St. Clair, Madison, Montgomery, Pulaski, Alexander and Mercer Counties; was engaged at Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Jackson (Tenn.), Mead Creek Swamps, Salem, Wyatt, Florence, Montezuma, Athens and Grenada. The regiment was mounted, March 15, 1863, and so continued during the remainder of its service. Mustered out at Louisville, July 9, 1865.

TENTH INFANTRY. Organized and mustered into the service for three months, on April 29, 1861, at Cairo, and on July 29, 1861, was mustered into the service for three years, with Col. James D. Morgan in command. It was engaged at Sykeston, New Madrid, Corinth, Missionary Ridge, Buzzard's Roost, Resaca, Rome, Kenesaw, Chattahoochie, Savannah and Bentonville. Re-enlisted as veterans, Jan. 1, 1864, and mustered out of service, July 4, 1865, at Louisville, and received final discharge and pay, July 11, 1865, at Chicago.

ELEVENTH INFANTRY. Organized at Springfield and mustered into service, April 30, 1861, for three months. July 30, the regiment was mustered out, and re-enlisted for three years' service. It was engaged at Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Corinth, Tallahatchie, Vicksburg, Liverpool Heights, Yazoo City, Spanish Fort and Fort Blakely. W. H. L. Wallace, afterwards Brigadier-General and killed at Shiloh, was its first Colonel. Mustered out of service, at Baton Rouge, July 14, 1865; paid off and discharged at Springfield.

TWELFTH INFANTRY. Mustered into service for three years, August 1, 1861; was engaged at Columbus, Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Corinth, Lay's Ferry, Rome Cross Roads, Dallas, Kenesaw, Nickajack Creek, Bald Knob, Decatur, Ezra Church, Atlanta, Allatoona and Goldsboro. On Jan. 16, 1864, the regiment re-enlisted as veterans. John McArthur was its first Colonel, succeeded by Augustus L. Chetlain, both being promoted to Brigadier-Generalships. Mustered out of service at Louisville, Ky., July 10, 1865, and received final pay and discharge, at Springfield, July 18.

THIRTEENTH INFANTRY. One of the regiments organized under the act known as the "Ten Regiment Bill"; was mustered into service on May 24, 1861, for three years, at Dixon, with John B. Wyman as Colonel; was engaged at Chickasaw Bayou, Arkansas Post, Vicksburg, Jackson, Missionary Ridge, Rossville and Ringgold Gap. Mustered out at Springfield, June 18, 1864, having served three years and two months.

FOURTEENTH INFANTRY. One of the regiments raised under the "Ten Regiment Bill," which anticipated the requirements of the General Government by organizing, equipping and drilling a regiment in each Congressional District in the State for thirty days, unless sooner required for service by the United States. It was mustered in at Jacksonville for three years, May 25, 1861, under command of John M. Palmer as its first Colonel; was engaged at Shiloh, Corinth, Metamora, Vicksburg, Jackson, Fort Beauregard and Meridian; consolidated with the Fifteenth Infantry, as a veteran battalion (both regiments having enlisted as veterans), on July 1, 1864. In October, 1864, the major part of the battalion was captured by General Hood and sent to Andersonville. The remainder participated in the "March to the Sea," and through the campaign in the Carolinas. In the spring of 1865 the battalion organization was discontinued, both regiments having been filled up by recruits. The regiment was mustered out at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., Sept. 16, 1865; and arrived at Springfield, Ill., Sept. 22, 1865, where it received final payment and discharge. The aggregate number of men who belonged to this organization was 1,980, and the aggregate mustered out at Fort Leavenworth, 490. During its four years and four months of service, the regiment marched 4,490 miles, traveled by rail, 2,330 miles, and, by river, 4,490 miles—making an aggregate of 11,670 miles.

FIFTEENTH INFANTRY. Raised under the "Ten Regiment Act," in the (then) First Congressional District; was organized at Freeport, and mustered into service, May 24, 1861. It was engaged at Sedalia, Shiloh, Corinth, Metamora Hill, Vicksburg, Fort Beauregard, Champion Hill, Allatoona and Bentonville. In March, 1864, the regiment re-enlisted as veterans, and, in July, 1864, was consolidated with the Fourteenth Infantry as a Veteran Battalion. At Big Shanty and Ackworth a large portion of the battalion was captured by General Hood. At Raleigh the Veteran Battalion was discontinued and the Fifteenth reorganized. From July 1, to Sept. 1, 1865, the regiment was stationed at Forts Leavenworth and Kearney. Having been mustered out at Fort Leavenworth, it was sent to Springfield for final payment and discharge—having served four years and four months. Miles marched, 4,299; miles by rail, 2,403, miles by steamer, 4,310; men enlisted from date of organization, 1,963; strength at date of muster-out, 640.

SIXTEENTH INFANTRY. Organized and mustered into service at Quincy under the "Ten-Regiment Act," May 24, 1861. The regiment was engaged at New Madrid, Tiptonville, Corinth, Buzzards' Roost, Resaca, Rome, Kenesaw Mountain, Chattahoochee River, Peach Tree Creek, Atlanta, Savannah, Columbia, Fayetteville, Averysboro and Bentonville. In December, 1864, the regiment re-enlisted as veterans; was mustered out at Louisville, Ky., July 8, 1865, after a term of service of four years and three months, and, a week later, arrived at Springfield, where it received its final pay and discharge papers.

SEVENTEENTH INFANTRY. Mustered into the service at Peoria, Ill., on May 24, 1861; was engaged at Fredericktown (Mo.), Greenfield (Ark.), Shiloh, Corinth, Hatchie and Vicksburg. In May, 1864, the term of enlistment having expired, the regiment was ordered to Springfield for pay and discharge. Those men and officers who re-enlisted, and those whose term had not expired, were consolidated with the Eighth Infantry, which was mustered out in the spring of 1866.

EIGHTEENTH INFANTRY. Organized under the provisions of the "Ten Regiment Bill," at Anna, and mustered into the service on May 28, 1861, the term of enlistment being for three years. The regiment participated in the capture of Fort McHenry, and was actively engaged at Fort Donelson, Shiloh and Corinth. It was mustered out at Little Rock, Dec. 16, 1865, and Dec. 31, thereafter, arrived at Springfield, Ill., for payment and discharge. The aggregate enlistments in the regiment, from its organization to date of discharge (rank and file), numbered 2,043.

NINETEENTH INFANTRY. Mustered into the United States service for three years, June 17, 1861, at Chicago, embracing four companies which had been accepted under the call for three months' men; participated in the battle of Stone River and in the Tullahoma and Chattanooga campaigns; was also engaged at Davis' Cross Roads, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge and Resaca. It was mustered out of service on July 9, 1864, at Chicago. Originally consisting of nearly 1,000 men, besides a large number of recruits received during the war, its strength at the final muster-out was less than 350.

TWENTIETH INFANTRY. Organized, May 14, 1861, at Joliet, and June 13, 1861, and mustered into the service for a term of three years. It participated in the following engagements, battles, sieges, etc.: Fredericktown (Mo.), Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Corinth, Thompson's Plantation, Champion Hills, Big Black River, Vicksburg, Kenesaw Mountain and Atlanta. After marching through the Carolinas, the regiment was finally ordered to Louisville, where it was mustered out, July 16, 1865, receiving its final discharge at Chicago, on July 24.

TWENTY-FIRST INFANTRY. Organized under the "Ten Regiment Bill," from the (then) Seventh Congressional District, at Mattoon, and mustered into service for three years, June 28, 1861. Its first Colonel was U. S. Grant, who was in command until August 7, when he was commissioned Brigadier-General. It was engaged at Fredericktown (Mo.), Corinth, Perryville, Murfreesboro, Liberty Gap, Chickamauga, Jonesboro, Franklin and Nashville. The regiment re-enlisted as veterans, at Chattanooga, in February, 1864. From June, 1864, to December, 1865, it was on duty in Texas. Mustered out at San Antonio, Dec. 16, 1865, and paid off and discharged at Springfield, Jan. 18, 1866.

TWENTY-SECOND INFANTRY. Organized at Belleville, and mustered into service, for three years, at Caseyville, Ill., June 25, 1861; was engaged at Belmont, Charleston (Mo.), Sikestown, Tiptonville, Farmington, Corinth, Stone River, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Resaca, New Hope Church, and all the battles of the Atlanta campaign, except Rocky Face Ridge. It was mustered out at Springfield, July 7, 1864, the veterans and recruits, whose term of service had not expired, being consolidated with the Forty-second Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers.

TWENTY-THIRD INFANTRY. The organization of the Twenty-third Infantry Volunteers commenced, at Chicago, under the popular name of the "Irish Brigade," immediately upon the opening of hostilities at Sumter. The formal muster of the regiment, under the command of Col. James A. Mulligan, was made, June 15, 1861, at Chicago, when it was occupying barracks known as Kane's brewery near the river on West Polk Street. It was early ordered to Northern Missouri, and was doing garrison duty at Lexington, when, in September, 1861, it surrendered with the rest of the garrison, to the forces under the rebel General Price, and was paroled. From Oct. 8, 1861, to June 14, 1862, it was detailed to guard prisoners at Camp Douglas. Thereafter it participated in engagements in the Virginias, as follows: at South Fork, Greenland Gap, Philippi, Hedgeville, Leetown, Maryland Heights, Snicker's Gap, Kernstown, Cedar Creek, Winchester, Charlestown, Berryville, Opequan Creek, Fisher's Hill, Harrisonburg, Hatcher's Run and Petersburg. It also took part in the siege of Richmond and the pursuit of Lee, being present at the surrender at Appomattox. In January and February, 1864, the regiment re-enlisted as veterans, at Greenland Gap, W. Va. In August, 1864, the ten companies of the Regiment, then numbering 440, were consolidated into five companies and designated, "Battalion, Twenty-third Regiment, Illinois Veteran Volunteer Infantry." The regiment was thanked by Congress for its part at Lexington, and was authorized to inscribe Lexington upon its colors. (See also Mulligan, James A.)

TWENTY-FOURTH INFANTRY, (known as the First Hecker Regiment). Organized at Chicago, with two companies—to-wit: the Union Cadets and the Lincoln Rifles—from the three months' service, in June, 1861, and mustered in, July 8, 1861. It participated in the battles of Perryville, Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, Resaca, Kenesaw Mountain and other engagements in the Atlanta campaign. It was mustered out of service at Chicago, August 6, 1864. A fraction of the regiment, which had been recruited in the field, and whose term of service had not expired at the date of muster-out, was organized into one company and attached to the Third Brigade, First Division, Fourteenth Army Corps, and mustered out at Camp Butler, August 1, 1865.

TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY. Organized from the counties of Kankakee, Iroquois, Ford, Vermilion, Douglas, Coles, Champaign and Edgar, and mustered into service at St. Louis, August 4, 1861. It participated in the battles of Pea Ridge, Stone River, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, in the siege of Corinth, the battle of Kenesaw Mountain, the siege of Atlanta, and innumerable skirmishes; was mustered out at Springfield, Sept. 5, 1864. During its three years' service the regiment traveled 4,962 miles, of which 3,252 were on foot, the remainder by steamboat and railroad.

TWENTY-SIXTH INFANTRY. Mustered into service, consisting of seven companies, at Springfield, August 31, 1861. On Jan. 1, 1864, the regiment re-enlisted as veterans. It was authorized by the commanding General to inscribe upon its banners "New Madrid"; "Island No. 10"; "Farmington"; "Siege of Corinth"; "Iuka"; "Corinth—3d and 4th, 1862"; "Resaca"; "Kenesaw"; "Ezra Church"; "Atlanta"; "Jonesboro"; "Griswoldville"; "McAllister"; "Savannah"; "Columbia," and "Bentonville." It was mustered out at Louisville, July 20, 1865, and paid off and discharged, at Springfield, July 28—the regiment having marched, during its four years of service, 6,931 miles, and fought twenty-eight hard battles, besides innumerable skirmishes.

TWENTY-SEVENTH INFANTRY. First organized, with only seven companies, at Springfield, August 10, 1861, and organization completed by the addition of three more companies, at Cairo, on September 1. It took part in the battle of Belmont, the siege of Island No. 10, and the battles of Farmington, Nashville, Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Rocky Face Ridge, Resaca, Calhoun, Adairsville, Dallas, Pine Top Mountain and Kenesaw Mountain, as well as in the investment of Atlanta; was relieved from duty, August 25, 1864, while at the front, and mustered out at Springfield, September 20. Its veterans, with the recruits whose term of service had not expired, were consolidated with the Ninth Infantry.

TWENTY-EIGHTH INFANTRY. Composed of companies from Pike, Fulton, Schuyler, Mason, Scott and Menard Counties; was organized at Springfield, August 15, 1861, and mustered into service for three years. It participated in the battles of Shiloh and Metamora, the siege of Vicksburg and the battles of Jackson, Mississippi, and Fort Beauregard, and in the capture of Spanish Fort, Fort Blakely and Mobile. From June, 1864, to March, 1866, it was stationed in Texas, and was mustered out at Brownsville, in that State, March 15, 1866, having served four years and seven months. It was discharged, at Springfield, May 13, 1866.

TWENTY-NINTH INFANTRY. Mustered into service at Springfield, August 19, 1861, and was engaged at Fort Donelson and Shiloh, and in the sieges of Corinth, Vicksburg and Mobile. Eight companies were detailed for duty at Holly Springs, and were there captured by General Van Dorn, in December, 1862, but were exchanged, six months later. In January, 1864, the regiment re-enlisted as veterans, and, from June, 1864, to November, 1865, was on duty in Texas. It was mustered out of service in that State, Nov. 6, 1865, and received final discharge on November 28.

THIRTIETH INFANTRY. Organized at Springfield, August 28, 1861; was engaged at Belmont, Fort Donelson, the siege of Corinth, Medan Station, Raymond, Champion Hills, the sieges of Vicksburg and Jackson, Big Shanty, Atlanta, Savannah, Pocotaligo, Orangeburg, Columbia, Cheraw, and Fayetteville; mustered out, July 17, 1865, and received final payment and discharge at Springfield, July 27, 1865.

THIRTY-FIRST INFANTRY. Organized at Cairo, and there mustered into service on Sept. 18, 1861; was engaged at Belmont, Fort Donelson, Shiloh, in the two expeditions against Vicksburg, at Thompson's Hill, Ingram Heights, Raymond, Jackson, Champion Hill, Big Shanty, Kenesaw Mountain, Atlanta, Lovejoy Station and Jonesboro; also participated in the "March to the Sea" and took part in the battles and skirmishes at Columbia, Cheraw, Fayetteville and Bentonville. A majority of the regiment re-enlisted as veterans in March, 1864. It was mustered out at Louisville, July 19, 1865, and finally discharged at Springfield, July 23.

THIRTY-SECOND INFANTRY. Organized at Springfield and mustered into service, Dec. 31, 1861. By special authority from the War Department, it originally consisted of ten companies of infantry, one of cavalry, and a battery. It was engaged at Fort Donelson, Shiloh, in the sieges of Corinth and Vicksburg, and in the battles of La Grange, Grand Junction, Metamora, Harrisonburg, Kenesaw Mountain, Nickajack Creek, Allatoona, Savannah, Columbia, Cheraw and Bentonville. In January, 1864, the regiment re-enlisted as veterans, and, in June, 1865, was ordered to Fort Leavenworth. Mustered out there, Sept. 16, 1865, and finally discharged at Springfield.

THIRTY-THIRD INFANTRY. Organized and mustered into service at Springfield in September, 1861; was engaged at Fredericktown (Mo.), Port Gibson, Champion Hills, Black River Bridge, the assault and siege of Vicksburg, siege of Jackson, Fort Esperanza, and in the expedition against Mobile. The regiment veteranized at Vicksburg, Jan. 1, 1864; was mustered out, at the same point, Nov. 24, 1865, and finally discharged at Springfield, Dec. 6 and 7, 1865. The aggregate enrollment of the regiment was between 1,900 and 2,000.

THIRTY-FOURTH INFANTRY. Organized at Springfield, Sept. 7, 1861; was engaged at Shiloh, Corinth, Murfreesboro, Rocky Face Ridge, Resaca, Big Shanty, Kenesaw Mountain, Atlanta, Jonesboro, and, after participating in the "March to the Sea" and through the Carolinas, took part in the battle of Bentonville. After the surrender of Johnston, the regiment went with Sherman's Army to Washington, D. C., and took part in the grand review, May 24, 1865; left Washington, June 12, and arrived at Louisville, Ky., June 18, where it was mustered out, on July 12; was discharged and paid at Chicago, July 17, 1865.

THIRTY-FIFTH INFANTRY. Organized at Decatur on July 3, 1861, and its services tendered to the President, being accepted by the Secretary of War as "Col. G. A. Smith's Independent Regiment of Illinois Volunteers," on July 23, and mustered into service at St. Louis, August 12. It was engaged at Pea Ridge and in the siege of Corinth, also participated in the battles of Perryville, Stone River, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Rocky Face Ridge, Resaca, Dallas and Kenesaw. Its final muster-out took place at Springfield, Sept. 27, 1864, the regiment having marched (exclusive of railroad and steamboat transportation) 3,056 miles.

THIRTY-SIXTH INFANTRY. Organized at Camp Hammond, near Aurora, Ill., and mustered into service, Sept. 23, 1861, for a term of three years. The regiment, at its organization, numbered 965 officers and enlisted men, and had two companies of Cavalry ("A" and "B"), 186 officers and men. It was engaged at Leetown, Pea Ridge, Perryville, Stone River, Chickamauga, the siege of Chattanooga, Missionary Ridge, Rocky Face Ridge, Resaca, Adairsville, New Hope Church, Kenesaw Mountain, Peach Tree Creek, Jonesboro, Franklin and Nashville. Mustered out, Oct. 8, 1865, and disbanded, at Springfield, Oct. 27, having marched and been transported, during its term of service, more than 10,000 miles.

THIRTY-SEVENTH INFANTRY. Familiarly known as "Fremont Rifles"; organized in August, 1861, and mustered into service, Sept. 18. The regiment was presented with battle-flags by the Chicago Board of Trade. It participated in the battles of Pea Ridge, Neosho, Prairie Grove and Chalk Bluffs, the siege of Vicksburg, and in the battles of Yazoo City and Morgan's Bend. In October, 1863, it was ordered to the defense of the frontier along the Rio Grande; re-enlisted as veterans in February, 1864; took part in the siege and storming of Fort Blakely and the capture of Mobile; from July, 1865, to May, 1866, was again on duty in Texas; was mustered out at Houston, May 15, 1866, and finally discharged at Springfield, May 31, having traveled some 17,000 miles, of which nearly 3,800 were by marching.

THIRTY-EIGHTH INFANTRY. Organized at Springfield, in September, 1861. The regiment was engaged in the battles of Fredericktown, Perryville, Knob Gap, Stone River, Liberty Gap, Chickamauga, Pine Top, Kenesaw Mountain, Atlanta, Jonesboro, Franklin and Nashville; re-enlisted as veterans in February, 1864; from June to December, 1865, was on duty in Louisiana and Texas; was mustered out at Victoria, Texas, Dec. 31, 1865, and received final discharge at Springfield.

THIRTY-NINTH INFANTRY. The organization of this Regiment was commenced as soon as the news of the firing on Fort Sumter reached Chicago. General Thomas O. Osborne was one of its contemplated field officers, and labored zealously to get it accepted under the first call for troops, but did not accomplish his object. The regiment had already assumed the name of the "Yates Phalanx" in honor of Governor Yates. It was accepted by the War Department on the day succeeding the first Bull Run disaster (July 22, 1861), and Austin Light, of Chicago, was appointed Colonel. Under his direction the organization was completed, and the regiment left Camp Mather, Chicago, on the morning of Oct. 13, 1861. It participated in the battles of Winchester, Malvern Hill (the second), Morris Island, Fort Wagner, Drury's Bluff, and in numerous engagements before Petersburg and Richmond, including the capture of Fort Gregg, and was present at Lee's surrender at Appomattox. In the meantime the regiment re-enlisted as veterans, at Hilton Head, S. C., in September, 1863. It was mustered out at Norfolk, Dec. 6, 1865, and received final discharge at Chicago, December 16.

FORTIETH INFANTRY. Enlisted from the counties of Franklin, Hamilton, Wayne, White, Wabash, Marion, Clay and Fayette, and mustered into service for three years at Springfield, August 10, 1861. It was engaged at Shiloh, in the siege of Corinth, at Jackson (Miss.), in the siege of Vicksburg, at Missionary Ridge, New Hope Church, Black Jack Knob, Kenesaw Mountain, Atlanta, Jonesboro, Ezra Chapel, Griswoldville, siege of Savannah, Columbia (S. C.), and Bentonville. It re-enlisted, as veterans, at Scottsboro, Ala., Jan. 1, 1864, and was mustered out at Louisville, July 24, 1865, receiving final discharge at Springfield.

FORTY-FIRST INFANTRY. Organized at Decatur during July and August, 1861, and was mustered into service, August 5. It was engaged at Fort Donelson, Shiloh, the siege of Corinth, the second battle of Corinth, the siege of Vicksburg and Jackson, in the Red River campaign, at Guntown, Kenesaw Mountain and Allatoona, and participated in the "March to the Sea." It re-enlisted, as veterans, March 17, 1864, at Vicksburg, and was consolidated with the Fifty-third Infantry, Jan. 4, 1865, forming Companies G and H.

FORTY-SECOND INFANTRY. Organized at Chicago, July 22, 1861; was engaged at Island No. 10, the siege of Corinth, battles of Farmington, Columbia (Tenn.), was besieged at Nashville, engaged at Stone River, in the Tullahoma campaign, at Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Rocky Face Ridge, Resaca, Adairsville, New Hope Church, Pine and Kenesaw Mountains, Peach Tree Creek, Atlanta, Jonesboro, Lovejoy Station, Spring Hill, Franklin and Nashville. It re-enlisted, as veterans, Jan. 1, 1864; was stationed in Texas from July to December, 1865; was mustered out at Indianola, in that State, Dec. 16, 1865, and finally discharged, at Springfield, Jan. 12, 1866.

FORTY-THIRD INFANTRY. Organized at Springfield in September, 1861, and mustered into service on Oct. 12. The regiment took part in the battles of Fort Donelson, Shiloh and in the campaigns in West Tennessee, Mississippi and Arkansas; was mustered out at Little Rock, Nov. 30, 1865, and returned to Springfield for final pay and discharge, Dec. 14, 1865.

FORTY-FOURTH INFANTRY. Organized in August, 1861, at Chicago, and mustered into service, Sept. 13, 1861; was engaged at Pea Ridge, Perryville, Stone River, Hoover's Gap, Shelbyville, Tullahoma, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Buzzard's Roost, Rocky Face Ridge, Adairsville, Dallas, New Hope Church, Kenesaw Mountain, Gulp's Farm, Chattahoochie River, Peach Tree Creek, Atlanta, Jonesboro, Franklin and Nashville. The regiment re-enlisted as veterans in Tennessee, in January, 1864. From June to September, 1865, it was stationed in Louisiana and Texas, was mustered out at Port Lavaca, Sept. 25, 1865, and received final discharge, at Springfield, three weeks later.

FORTY-FIFTH INFANTRY. Originally called the "Washburne Lead Mine Regiment"; was organized at Galena, July 23, 1861, and mustered into service at Chicago, Dec. 25, 1861. It was engaged at Fort Donelson, Shiloh, the siege of Corinth, battle of Median, the campaign against Vicksburg, the Meridian raid, the Atlanta campaign, the "March to the Sea," and the advance through the Carolinas. ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SIXTH INFANTRY. Organized at Alton and mustered in, Sept. 4, 1862, and participated in the siege of Vicksburg. Six companies were engaged in skirmish line, near Humboldt, Tenn., and the regiment took part in the capture of Little Rock and in the fight at Clarendon, Ark. It was mustered out July 12, 1865.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SEVENTH INFANTRY. Mustered into service at Chicago, Sept. 6, 1862; took part in the first campaign against Vicksburg, and in the battle of Arkansas Post, the siege of Vicksburg under Grant, the capture of Jackson (Miss.), the battles of Missionary Ridge and Lookout Mountain, the Meridian raid, and in the fighting at Resaca, Dallas, Kenesaw Mountain, Atlanta and Jonesboro; also accompanied Sherman in his march through Georgia and the Carolinas, taking part in the battle of Bentonville; was mustered out at Chicago, June 17, 1865.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-EIGHTH INFANTRY. Mustered in, Dec. 18, 1862, but remained in service less than five months, when, its number of officers and men having been reduced from 860 to 161 (largely by desertions), a number of officers were dismissed, and the few remaining officers and men were formed into a detachment, and transferred to another Illinois regiment.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-NINTH INFANTRY. Organized at Pontiac, in August, 1862, and mustered into the service Sept. 8. Prior to May, 1864, the regiment was chiefly engaged in garrison duty. It marched with Sherman in the Atlanta campaign and through Georgia and the Carolinas, and took part in the battles of Resaca, Buzzard's Roost, Lost Mountain, Dallas, Peach Tree Creek, Atlanta, Averysboro and Bentonville. It received final pay and discharge at Chicago, June 10, 1865.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTIETH INFANTRY. Organized at Springfield and mustered into service, Oct. 25, 1862; was engaged at Port Gibson, Champion Hills, Black River Bridge, Vicksburg, Jackson (Miss.), and in the Red River expedition. While on this expedition almost the entire regiment was captured at the battle of Mansfield, and not paroled until near the close of the war. The remaining officers and men were consolidated with the Seventy-seventh Infantry in January, 1865, and participated in the capture of Mobile. Six months later its regimental reorganization, as the One Hundred and Thirtieth, was ordered. It was mustered out at New Orleans, August 15, 1865, and discharged at Springfield, August 31.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FIRST INFANTRY. Organized in September, 1862, and mustered into the service, Nov. 13, with 815 men, exclusive of officers. In October, 1863, it was consolidated with the Twenty-ninth Infantry, and ceased to exist as a separate organization. Up to that time the regiment had been in but a few conflicts and in no pitched battle.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SECOND INFANTRY. Organized at Chicago and mustered in for 100 days from June 1, 1864. The regiment remained on duty at Paducah until the expiration of its service, when it moved to Chicago, and was mustered out, Oct. 17, 1864.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FOURTH INFANTRY. Organized at Chicago and mustered in, May 31, 1864, for 100 days; was assigned to garrison duty at Columbus, Ky., and mustered out of service, Oct. 25, 1864, at Chicago.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FIFTH INFANTRY. Mustered in for 100-days' service at Mattoon, June 6, 1864, having a strength of 852 men. It was chiefly engaged, during its term of service, in doing garrison duty and guarding railroads. It was mustered out at Springfield, Sept. 28, 1864.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SIXTH INFANTRY. Enlisted about the first of May, 1864, for 100 days, and went into camp at Centralia, Ill., but was not mustered into service until June 1, following. Its principal service was garrison duty, with occasional scouts and raids amongst guerrillas. At the end of its term of service the regiment re-enlisted for fifteen days; was mustered out at Springfield, Oct. 22, 1864, and discharged eight days later.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SEVENTH INFANTRY. Organized at Quincy, with ex-Gov. John Wood as its Colonel, and mustered in, June 5, 1864, for 100 days. Was on duty at Memphis, Tenn., and mustered out of service at Springfield, Ill., Sept. 4, 1864.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-EIGHTH INFANTRY. Organized at Quincy, and mustered in, June 21, 1864, for 100 days; was assigned to garrison duty at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., and in Western Missouri. It was mustered out of service at Springfield, Ill., Oct. 14, 1864.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-NINTH INFANTRY. Mustered into service as a 100-day's regiment, at Peoria, June 1, 1864; was engaged in garrison duty at Columbus and Cairo, in making reprisals for guerrilla raids, and in the pursuit of the Confederate General Price in Missouri. The latter service was rendered, at the President's request, after the term of enlistment had expired. It was mustered out at Peoria, Oct. 25, 1864, having been in the service nearly five months.

ONE HUNDRED AND FORTIETH INFANTRY. Organized as a 100-days' regiment, at Springfield, June 18, 1864, and mustered into service on that date. The regiment was engaged in guarding railroads between Memphis and Holly Springs, and in garrison duty at Memphis. After the term of enlistment had expired and the regiment had been mustered out, it aided in the pursuit of General Price through Missouri; was finally discharged at Chicago, after serving about five months.

ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-FIRST INFANTRY. Mustered into service as a 100-days' regiment, at Elgin, June 16, 1864—strength, 843 men; departed for the field, June 27, 1864; was mustered out at Chicago, Oct. 10, 1864.

ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SECOND INFANTRY. Organized at Freeport as a battalion of eight companies, and sent to Camp Butler, where two companies were added and the regiment mustered into service for 100 days, June 18, 1864. It was ordered to Memphis, Tenn., five days later, and assigned to duty at White's Station, eleven miles from that city, where it was employed in guarding the Memphis & Charleston railroad. It was mustered out at Chicago, on Oct. 27, 1864, the men having voluntarily served one month beyond their term of enlistment.

ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-THIRD INFANTRY. Organized at Mattoon, and mustered in, June 11, 1864, for 100 days. It was assigned to garrison duty, and mustered out at Mattoon, Sept. 26, 1864.

ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH INFANTRY. Organized at Springfield, Sept. 18, 1864, for one year. Was assigned to the duty of guarding drafted men at Brighton, Quincy, Jacksonville and Springfield, and mustered out at Springfield, July 5, 1865.

ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SEVENTH INFANTRY. Organized at Chicago, and mustered into service for one year, Feb. 18 and 19, 1865; was engaged chiefly on guard or garrison duty, in scouting and in skirmishing with guerrillas. Mustered out at Nashville, Jan. 22, 1866, and received final discharge at Springfield, Feb. 4.

ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-EIGHTH INFANTRY. Organized at Springfield, Feb. 21, 1865, for the term of one year; was assigned to garrison and guard duty and mustered out, Sept. 5, 1865, at Nashville, Tenn.; arrived at Springfield, Sept. 9, 1865, where it was paid off and discharged.

ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-NINTH INFANTRY. Organized at Springfield, Feb. 11, 1865, and mustered in for one year; was engaged in garrison and guard duty; mustered out, Jan. 27, 1866, at Dalton, Ga., and ordered to Springfield, where it received final payment and discharge.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH INFANTRY. Organized at Springfield, and mustered in, Feb. 14, 1865, for one year; was on duty in Tennessee and Georgia, guarding railroads and garrisoning towns. It was mustered out, Jan. 16, 1866, at Atlanta, Ga., and ordered to Springfield, where it received final payment and discharge.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-FIRST INFANTRY. This regiment was organized at Quincy, Ill., and mustered into the United States service, Feb. 23, 1865, and was composed of companies from various parts of the State, recruited, under the call of Dec. 19, 1864. It was engaged in guard duty, with a few guerrilla skirmishes, and was present at the surrender of General Warford's army, at Kingston, Ga.; was mustered out at Columbus, Ga., Jan. 24, 1866, and ordered to Springfield, where it received final payment and discharge, Feb. 8, 1866.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-SECOND INFANTRY. Organized at Springfield and mustered in, Feb. 18, 1865, for one year; was mustered out of service, to date Sept. 11, at Memphis, Tenn., and arrived at Camp Butler, Sept. 9, 1865, where it received final payment and discharge.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-THIRD INFANTRY. Organized at Chicago, and mustered in, Feb. 27, 1865, for one year; was not engaged in any battles. It was mustered out, Sept. 15, 1865, and moved to Springfield, Ill., and, Sept. 24, received final pay and discharge.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-FOURTH INFANTRY. Organized at Springfield, Feb. 21, 1865, for one year. Sept. 18, 1865, the regiment was mustered out at Nashville, Tenn., and ordered to Springfield for final payment and discharge, where it arrived, Sept. 22; was paid off and discharged at Camp Butler, Sept. 29.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-FIFTH INFANTRY. Organized at Springfield and mustered in Feb. 28, 1865, for one year, 904 strong. On Sept. 4, 1865, it was mustered out of service, and moved to Camp Butler, where it received final pay and discharge.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-SIXTH INFANTRY. Organized and mustered in during the months of February and March, 1865, from the northern counties of the State, for the term of one year. The officers of the regiment have left no written record of its history, but its service seems to have been rendered chiefly in Tennessee in the neighborhood of Memphis, Nashville and Chattanooga. Judging by the muster-rolls of the Adjutant-General, the regiment would appear to have been greatly depleted by desertions and otherwise, the remnant being finally mustered out, Sept. 20, 1865.

FIRST CAVALRY. Organized — consisting of seven companies, A, B, C, D, E, F and G—at Alton, in 1861, and mustered into the United States service, July 3. After some service in Missouri, the regiment participated in the battle of Lexington, in that State, and was surrendered, with the remainder of the garrison, Sept. 20, 1861. The officers were paroled, and the men sworn not to take up arms again until discharged. No exchange having been effected in November, the non-commissioned officers and privates were ordered to Springfield and discharged. In June, 1862, the regiment was reorganized at Benton Barracks, Mo., being afterwards employed in guarding supply trains and supply depots at various points. Mustered out, at Benton Barracks, July 14, 1862.

SECOND CAVALRY. Organized at Springfield and mustered into service, August 12, 1861, with Company M (which joined the regiment some months later), numbering 47 commissioned officers and 1,040 enlisted men. This number was increased by recruits and re-enlistments, during its four and a half year's term of service, to 2,236 enlisted men and 145 commissioned officers. It was engaged at Belmont; a portion of the regiment took part in the battles at Fort Henry, Fort Donelson and Shiloh, another portion at Merriweather's Ferry, Bolivar and Holly Springs, and participated in the investment of Vicksburg. In January, 1864, the major part of the regiment re-enlisted as veterans, later, participating in the Red River expedition and the investment of Fort Blakely. It was mustered out at San Antonio, Tex., Nov. 22, 1865, and finally paid and discharged at Springfield, Jan. 3, 1866.

THIRD CAVALRY. Composed of twelve companies, from various localities in the State, the grand total of company officers and enlisted men, under the first organization, being 1,433. It was organized at Springfield, in August, 1861; participated in the battles of Pea Ridge, Haines' Bluff, Arkansas Post, Fort Gibson, Champion Hills, Black River Bridge, and the siege of Vicksburg. In July, 1864, a large portion of the regiment re-enlisted as veterans. The remainder were mustered out, Sept. 5, 1864. The veterans participated in the repulse of Forrest, at Memphis, and in the battles of Lawrenceburg, Spring Hill, Campbellsville and Franklin. From May to October, 1865, engaged in service against the Indians in the Northwest. The regiment was mustered out at Springfield, Oct. 18, 1865.

FOURTH CAVALRY. Mustered into service, Sept. 26, 1861, and participated in the battles of Fort Henry, Fort Donelson, and Shiloh; in the siege of Corinth, and in many engagements of less historic note; was mustered out at Springfield in November, 1864. By order of the War Department, of June 18, 1865, the members of the regiment whose terms had not expired, were consolidated with the Twelfth Illinois Cavalry.

FIFTH CAVALRY. Organized at Camp Butler, in November, 1861; took part in the Meridian raid and the expedition against Jackson, Miss., and in numerous minor expeditions, doing effective work at Canton, Grenada, Woodville, and other points. On Jan. 1, 1864, a large portion of the regiment re-enlisted as veterans. Its final muster-out took place, Oct. 27, 1865, and it received final payment and discharge, October 30.

SIXTH CAVALRY. Organized at Springfield, Nov. 19, 1861; participated in Sherman's advance upon Grenada; in the Grierson raid through Mississippi and Louisiana, the siege of Port Hudson, the battles of Moscow (Tenn), West Point (Miss.), Franklin and Nashville; re-enlisted as veterans, March 30, 1864; was mustered out at Selma, Ala., Nov. 5, 1865, and received discharge, November 20, at Springfield.

SEVENTH CAVALRY. Organized at Springfield, and was mustered into service, Oct. 13, 1861. It participated in the battles of Farmington, Iuka, Corinth (second battle); in Grierson's raid through Mississippi and Louisiana; in the engagement at Plain's Store (La.), and the investment of Port Hudson. In March, 1864, 258 officers and men re-enlisted as veterans. The non-veterans were engaged at Guntown, and the entire regiment took part in the battle of Franklin. After the close of hostilities, it was stationed in Alabama and Mississippi, until the latter part of October, 1865; was mustered out at Nashville, and finally discharged at Springfield, Nov. 17, 1865.

EIGHTH CAVALRY. Organized at St. Charles, Ill., and mustered in, Sept. 18, 1861. The regiment was ordered to Virginia, and participated in the general advance on Manassas in March, 1862; was engaged at Mechanicsville, Gaines' Hill, Malvern Hill, Sugar Loaf Mountain, Middletown, South Mountain, Antietam, Fredericksburg, Sulphur Springs, Warrenton, Rapidan Station, Northern Neck, Gettysburg, Williamsburg, Funkstown, Falling Water, Chester Gap, Sandy Hook, Culpepper, Brandy Station, and in many raids and skirmishes. It was mustered out of service at Benton Barracks, Mo., July 17, 1865, and ordered to Chicago, where it received final payment and discharge.

NINTH CAVALRY. Organized at Chicago, in the autumn of 1861, and mustered in, November 30; was engaged at Coldwater, Grenada, Wyatt, Saulsbury, Moscow, Guntown, Pontotoc, Tupelo, Old Town Creek, Hurricane Creek, Lawrenceburg, Campbellsville, Franklin and Nashville. The regiment re-enlisted as veterans, March 16, 1864; was mustered out of service at Selma, Ala., Oct. 31, 1865, and ordered to Springfield, where the men received final payment and discharge.

TENTH CAVALRY. Organized at Springfield in the latter part of September, 1861, and mustered into service, Nov. 25, 1861; was engaged at Prairie Grove, Cotton Plant, Arkansas Post, in the Yazoo Pass expedition, at Richmond (La.), Brownsville, Bayou Metoe, Bayou La Fourche and Little Rock. In February, 1864, a large portion of the regiment re-enlisted as veterans, the non-veterans accompanying General Banks in his Red River expedition. On Jan. 27, 1865, the veterans, and recruits were consolidated with the Fifteenth Cavalry, and all reorganized under the name of the Tenth Illinois Veteran Volunteer Cavalry. Mustered out of service at San Antonio, Texas, Nov. 22, 1865, and received final discharge at Springfield, Jan. 6, 1866.

ELEVENTH CAVALRY. Robert G. Ingersoll of Peoria, and Basil D. Meeks, of Woodford County, obtained permission to raise a regiment of cavalry, and recruiting commenced in October, 1861. The regiment was recruited from the counties of Peoria, Fulton, Tazewell, Woodford, Marshall, Stark, Knox, Henderson and Warren; was mustered into the service at Peoria, Dec. 20, 1861, and was first under fire at Shiloh. It also took part in the raid in the rear of Corinth, and in the battles of Bolivar, Corinth (second battle), Iuka, Lexington and Jackson (Tenn.); in McPherson's expedition to Canton and Sherman's Meridian raid, in the relief of Yazoo City, and in numerous less important raids and skirmishes. Most of the regiment re-enlisted as veterans in December, 1863; the non-veterans being mustered out at Memphis, in the autumn of 1864. The veterans were mustered out at the same place, Sept. 30, 1865, and discharged at Springfield, October 20.

TWELFTH CAVALRY. Organized at Springfield, in February, 1862, and remained there guarding rebel prisoners until June 25, when it was mounted and sent to Martinsburg, Va. It was engaged at Fredericksburg, Williamsport, Falling Waters, the Rapidan and Stevensburg. On Nov. 26, 1863, the regiment was relieved from service and ordered home to reorganize as veterans. Subsequently it joined Banks in the Red River expedition and in Davidson's expedition against Mobile. While at Memphis the Twelfth Cavalry was consolidated into an eight-company organization, and the Fourth Cavalry, having previously been consolidated into a battalion of five companies, was consolidated with the Twelfth. The consolidated regiment was mustered out at Houston, Texas, May 29, 1866, and, on June 18, received final pay and discharge at Springfield.

THIRTEENTH CAVALRY. Organized at Chicago, in December, 1861; moved to the front from Benton Barracks, Mo., in February, 1862, and was engaged in the following battles and skirmishes (all in Missouri and Arkansas): Putnam's Ferry, Cotton Plant, Union City (twice), Camp Pillow, Bloomfield (first and second battles), Van Buren, Allen, Eleven Point River, Jackson, White River, Chalk Bluff, Bushy Creek, near Helena, Grand Prairie, White River, Deadman's Lake, Brownsville, Bayou Metoe, Austin, Little Rock, Benton, Batesville, Pine Bluff, Arkadelphia, Okolona, Little Missouri River, Prairie du Anne, Camden, Jenkins' Ferry, Cross Roads, Mount Elba, Douglas Landing and Monticello. The regiment was mustered out, August 31, 1865, and received final pay and discharge at Springfield, Sept. 13, 1865.

FOURTEENTH CAVALRY. Mustered into service at Peoria, in January and February, 1863; participated in the battle of Cumberland Gap, in the defense of Knoxville and the pursuit of Longstreet, in the engagements at Bean Station and Dandridge, in the Macon raid, and in the cavalry battle at Sunshine Church. In the latter General Stoneman surrendered, but the Fourteenth cut its way out. On their retreat the men were betrayed by a guide and the regiment badly cut up and scattered, those escaping being hunted by soldiers with bloodhounds. Later, it was engaged at Waynesboro and in the battles of Franklin and Nashville, and was mustered out at Nashville, July 31, 1865, having marched over 10,000 miles, exclusive of duty done by detachments.

FIFTEENTH CAVALRY. Composed of companies originally independent, attached to infantry regiments and acting as such; participated in the battles of Fort Donelson and Shiloh, and in the siege and capture of Corinth. Regimental organization was effected in the spring of 1863, and thereafter it was engaged chiefly in scouting and post duty. It was mustered out at Springfield, August 25, 1864, the recruits (whose term of service had not expired) being consolidated with the Tenth Cavalry.

SIXTEENTH CAVALRY. Composed principally of Chicago men—Thieleman's and Schambeck's Cavalry Companies, raised at the outset of the war, forming the nucleus of the regiment. The former served as General Sherman's body-guard for some time. Captain Thieleman was made a Major and authorized to raise a battalion, the two companies named thenceforth being known as Thieleman's Battalion. In September, 1862, the War Department authorized the extension of the battalion to a regiment, and, on the 11th of June, 1863, the regimental organization was completed. It took part in the East Tennessee campaign, a portion of the regiment aiding in the defense of Knoxville, a part garrisoning Cumberland Gap, and one battalion being captured by Longstreet. The regiment also participated in the battles of Rocky Face Ridge, Buzzard's Roost, Resaca, Kingston, Cassville, Cartersville, Allatoona, Kenesaw, Lost Mountain, Mines Ridge, Powder Springs, Chattahoochee, Atlanta, Jonesboro, Franklin and Nashville. It arrived in Chicago, August 23, 1865, for final payment and discharge, having marched about 5,000 miles and engaged in thirty-one battles, besides numerous skirmishes.

SEVENTEENTH CAVALRY. Mustered into service in January and February, 1864; aided in the repulse of Price at Jefferson City, Mo., and was engaged at Booneville, Independence, Mine Creek, and Fort Scott, besides doing garrison duty, scouting and raiding. It was mustered out in November and December, 1865, at Leavenworth, Kan. Gov. John L. Beveridge, who had previously been a Captain and Major of the Eighth Cavalry, was the Colonel of this regiment.

FIRST LIGHT ARTILLERY. Consisted of ten batteries. Battery A was organized under the first call for State troops, April 21, 1861, but not mustered into the three years' service until July 16; was engaged at Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Chickasaw Bayou, Arkansas Post, the sieges of Vicksburg and Jackson, and in the Atlanta campaign; was in reserve at Champion Hills and Nashville, and mustered out July 3, 1865, at Chicago.

Battery B was organized in April, 1861, engaged at Belmont, Fort Donelson, Shiloh, in the siege of Corinth and at La Grange, Holly Springs, Memphis, Chickasaw Bayou, Arkansas Post, the siege of Vicksburg, Mechanicsburg, Richmond (La.), the Atlanta campaign and the battle of Nashville. The Battery was reorganized by consolidation with Battery A, and mustered out at Chicago, July 2, 1865.

Battery D was organized at Cairo, Sept. 2, 1861; was engaged at Fort Donelson and at Shiloh, and mustered out, July 28, 1865, at Chicago.

Battery E was organized at Camp Douglas and mustered into service, Dec. 19, 1861; was engaged at Shiloh, Corinth, Jackson, Vicksburg, Gun-town, Pontotoc, Tupelo and Nashville, and mustered out at Louisville, Dec. 24, 1864.

Battery F was recruited at Dixon and mustered in at Springfield, Feb. 25, 1862. It took part in the siege of Corinth and the Yocona expedition, and was consolidated with the other batteries in the regiment, March 7, 1865.

Battery G was organized at Cairo and mustered in Sept. 28, 1861; was engaged in the siege and the second battle of Corinth, and mustered out at Springfield, July 24, 1865.

Battery H was recruited in and about Chicago, during January and February, 1862; participated in the battle of Shiloh, siege of Vicksburg, and in the Atlanta campaign, the "March to the Sea," and through the Carolinas with Sherman.

Battery I was organized at Camp Douglas and mustered in, Feb. 10, 1862; was engaged at Shiloh, in the Tallahatchie raid, the sieges of Vicksburg and Jackson, and in the battles of Chattanooga and Vicksburg. It was veteranized, March 17, 1864, and was mustered out, July 26, 1865.

Battery K was organized at Shawneetown and mustered in, Jan. 9, 1862, participated in Burnside's campaign in Tennessee, and in the capture of Knoxville. Part of the men were mustered out at Springfield in June, 1865, and the remainder at Chicago in July.

Battery M was organized at Camp Douglas and mustered into the service, August 12, 1862, for three years. It served through the Chickamauga campaign, being engaged at Chickamauga; also was engaged at Missionary Ridge, was besieged at Chattanooga, and took part in all the important battles of the Atlanta campaign. It was mustered out at Chicago, July 24, 1864, having traveled 3,102 miles and been under fire 178 days.

SECOND LIGHT ARTILLERY. Consisted of nine batteries. Battery A was organized at Peoria, and mustered into service, May 23, 1861; served in Missouri and Arkansas, doing brilliant work at Pea Ridge. It was mustered out of service at Springfield, July 27, 1865.

Battery D was organized at Cairo, and mustered into service in December, 1861; was engaged at Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Vicksburg, Jackson, Meridian and Decatur, and mustered out at Louisville, Nov. 21, 1864.

Battery E was organized at St. Louis, Mo., in August, 1861, and mustered into service, August 20, at that point. It was engaged at Fort Donelson and Shiloh, and in the siege of Corinth and the Yocona expedition—was consolidated with Battery A.

Battery F was organized at Cape Girardeau, Mo., and mustered in, Dec. 11, 1861; was engaged at Shiloh, in the siege and second battle of Corinth, and the Meridian campaign; also at Kenesaw, Atlanta and Jonesboro. It was mustered out, July 27, 1865, at Springfield.

Battery H was organized at Springfield, December, 1861, and mustered in, Dec. 31, 1861; was engaged at Fort Donelson and in the siege of Fort Pillow; veteranized, Jan. 1, 1864, was mounted as cavalry the following summer, and mustered out at Springfield, July 29, 1865.

Battery I was recruited in Will County, and mustered into service at Camp Butler, Dec. 31, 1861. It participated in the siege of Island No. 10, in the advance upon Corinth, and in the battles of Perryville, Chickamauga, Lookout Mountain, Missionary Ridge and Chattanooga. It was veteranized, Jan. 1, 1864, marched with Sherman to Atlanta, and thence to Savannah and through the Carolinas, and was mustered out at Springfield.

Battery K was organized at Springfield and mustered in Dec. 31, 1863; was engaged at Fort Pillow, the capture of Clarkston, Mo., and the siege of Vicksburg. It was mustered out, July 14, 1865, at Chicago.

Battery L was organized at Chicago and mustered in, Feb. 28, 1862; participated in the advance on Corinth, the battle of Hatchie and the advance on the Tallahatchie, and was mustered out at Chicago, August 9, 1865.

Battery M was organized at Chicago, and mustered in at Springfield, June, 1862; was engaged at Jonesboro, Blue Spring, Blountsville and Rogersville, being finally consolidated with other batteries of the regiment.

CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE BATTERY. Organized through the efforts of the Chicago Board of Trade, which raised $15,000 for its equipment, within forty-eight hours. It was mustered into service, August 1, 1862, was engaged at Lawrenceburg, Murfreesboro, Stone River, Chickamauga, Farmington, Decatur (Ga.), Atlanta, Lovejoy Station, Nashville, Selma and Columbus (Ga.) It was mustered out at Chicago, June 30, 1865, and paid in full, July 3, having marched 5,268 miles and traveled by rail 1,231 miles. The battery was in eleven of the hardest battles fought in the West, and in twenty-six minor battles, being in action forty-two times while on scouts, reconnoissances or outpost duty.

CHICAGO MERCANTILE BATTERY. Recruited and organized under the auspices of the Mercantile Association, an association of prominent and patriotic merchants of the City of Chicago. It was mustered into service, August 29, 1862, at Camp Douglas, participated in the Tallahatchie and Yazoo expeditions, the first attack upon Vicksburg, the battle of Arkansas Post, the siege of Vicksburg, the battles of Magnolia Hills, Champion Hills, Black River Bridge and Jackson (Miss.); also took part in Banks' Red River expedition; was mustered out at Chicago, and received final payment, July 10, 1865, having traveled, by river, sea and land, over 11,000 miles.

SPRINGFIELD LIGHT ARTILLERY. Recruited principally from the cities of Springfield, Belleville and Wenona, and mustered into service at Springfield, for the term of three years, August 21, 1862, numbering 199 men and officers. It participated in the capture of Little Rock and in the Red River expedition, and was mustered out at Springfield, 114 strong, June 30, 1865.

COGSWELL'S BATTERY, LIGHT ARTILLERY. Organized at Ottawa, Ill., and mustered in, Nov. 11, 1861, as Company A (Artillery) Fifty-third Illinois Volunteers, Colonel Cushman commanding the regiment. It participated in the advance on Corinth, the siege of Vicksburg, the battle of Missionary Ridge, and the capture of Spanish Fort and Fort Blakely, near Mobile. The regiment was mustered out at Springfield, August 14, 1865, having served three years and nine months, marched over 7,500 miles, and participated in seven sieges and battles.

STURGES RIFLES. An independent company, organized at Chicago, armed, equipped and subsisted for nearly two months, by the patriotic generosity of Mr. Solomon Sturges; was mustered into service, May 6, 1861; in June following, was ordered to West Virginia, serving as body-guard of General McClellan; was engaged at Rich Mountain, in the siege of Yorktown, and in the seven days' battle of the Chickahominy. A portion of the company was at Antietam, the remainder having been detached as foragers, scouts, etc. It was mustered out at Washington, Nov. 25, 1862.

WAR, THE SPANISH-AMERICAN. The oppressions and misrule which had characterized the administration of affairs by the Spanish Government and its agents for generations, in the Island of Cuba, culminated, in April, 1898, in mutual declarations of war between Spain and the United States. The causes leading up to this result were the injurious effects upon American commerce and the interests of American citizens owning property in Cuba, as well as the constant expense imposed upon the Government of the United States in the maintenance of a large navy along the South Atlantic coast to suppress filibustering, superadded to the friction and unrest produced among the people of this country by the long continuance of disorders and abuses so near to our own shores, which aroused the sympathy and indignation of the entire civilized world. For three years a large proportion of the Cuban population had been in open rebellion against the Spanish Government, and, while the latter had imported a large army to the island and subjected the insurgents and their families and sympathizers to the grossest cruelties, not even excepting torture and starvation itself, their policy had failed to bring the insurgents into subjection or to restore order. In this condition of affairs the United States Government had endeavored, through negotiation, to secure a mitigation of the evils complained of, by a modification of the Spanish policy of government in the island; but all suggestions in this direction had either been resented by Spain as unwarrantable interference in her affairs, or promises of reform, when made, had been as invariably broken.

In the meantime an increasing sentiment had been growing up in the United States in favor of conceding belligerent rights to the Cuban insurgents, or the recognition of their independence, which found expression in measures proposed in Congress—all offers of friendly intervention by the United States having been rejected by Spain with evidences of indignation. Compelled, at last, to recognize its inability to subdue the insurrection, the Spanish Government, in November, 1897, made a pretense of tendering autonomy to the Cuban people, with the privilege of amnesty to the insurgents on laying down their arms. The long duration of the war and the outrages perpetrated upon the helpless "reconcentrados," coupled with the increased confidence of the insurgents in the final triumph of their cause, rendered this movement—even if intended to be carried out to the letter—of no avail. The proffer came too late, and was promptly rejected.

In this condition of affairs and with a view to greater security for American interests, the American battleship Maine was ordered to Havana, on Jan. 24, 1898. It arrived in Havana Harbor the following day, and was anchored at a point designated by the Spanish commander. On the night of February 15, following, it was blown up and destroyed by some force, as shown by after investigation, applied from without. Of a crew of 354 men belonging to the vessel at the time, 266 were either killed outright by the explosion, or died from their wounds. Not only the American people, but the entire civilized world, was shocked by the catastrophe. An act of horrible treachery had been perpetrated against an American vessel and its crew on a peaceful mission in the harbor of a professedly friendly nation.

The successive steps leading to actual hostilities were rapid and eventful. One of the earliest and most significant of these was the passage, by a unanimous vote of both houses of Congress, on March 9, of an appropriation placing $50,000,000 in the hands of the President as an emergency fund for purposes of national defense. This was followed, two days later, by an order for the mobilization of the army. The more important events following this step were: An order, under date of April 5, withdrawing American consuls from Spanish stations; the departure, on April 9, of Consul-General Fitzhugh Lee from Havana; April 19, the adoption by Congress of concurrent resolutions declaring Cuba independent and directing the President to use the land and naval forces of the United States to put an end to Spanish authority in the island; April 20, the sending to the Spanish Government, by the President, of an ultimatum in accordance with this act; April 21, the delivery to Minister Woodford, at Madrid, of his passports without waiting for the presentation of the ultimatum, with the departure of the Spanish Minister from Washington; April 23, the issue of a call by the President for 125,000 volunteers; April 24, the final declaration of war by Spain; April 25, the adoption by Congress of a resolution declaring that war had existed from April 21; on the same date an order to Admiral Dewey, in command of the Asiatic Squadron at Hongkong, to sail for Manila with a view to investing that city and blockading Philippine ports.

The chief events subsequent to the declaration of war embraced the following: May 1, the destruction by Admiral Dewey's squadron of the Spanish fleet in the harbor of Manila; May 19, the arrival of the Spanish Admiral Cervera's fleet at Santiago de Cuba; May 25, a second call by the President for 75,000 volunteers; July 3, the attempt of Cervera's fleet to escape, and its destruction off Santiago; July 17, the surrender of Santiago to the forces under General Shafter; July 30, the statement by the President, through the French Ambassador at Washington, of the terms on which the United States would consent to make peace; August 9, acceptance of the peace terms by Spain, followed, three days later, by the signing of the peace protocol; September 9, the appointment by the President of Peace Commissioners on the part of the United States; Sept. 18, the announcement of the Peace Commissioners selected by Spain; October 1, the beginning of the Peace Conference by the representatives of the two powers, at Paris, and the formal signing, on December 10, of the peace treaty, including the recognition by Spain of the freedom of Cuba, with the transfer to the United States of Porto Rico and her other West India islands, together with the surrender of the Philippines for a consideration of $20,000,000.

Seldom, if ever, in the history of nations have such vast and far-reaching results been accomplished within so short a period. The war, which practically began with the destruction of the Spanish fleet in Manila Harbor—an event which aroused the enthusiasm of the whole American people, and won the respect and admiration of other nations—was practically ended by the surrender of Santiago and the declaration by the President of the conditions of peace just three months later. Succeeding events, up to the formal signing of the peace treaty, were merely the recognition of results previously determined.

HISTORY OF ILLINOIS REGIMENTS.—The part played by Illinois in connection with these events may be briefly summarized in the history of Illinois regiments and other organizations. Under the first call of the President for 125,000 volunteers, eight regiments—seven of infantry and one of cavalry—were assigned to Illinois, to which was subsequently added, on application through Governor Tanner, one battery of light artillery. The infantry regiments were made up of the Illinois National Guard, numbered consecutively from one to seven, and were practically mobilized at their home stations within forty-eight hours from the receipt of the call, and began to arrive at Camp Tanner, near Springfield, the place of rendezvous, on April 26, the day after the issue of the Governor's call. The record of Illinois troops is conspicuous for the promptness of their response and the completeness of their organization—in this respect being unsurpassed by those of any other State. Under the call of May 25 for an additional force of 75,000 men, the quota assigned to Illinois was two regiments, which were promptly furnished, taking the names of the Eighth and Ninth. The first of these belonged to the Illinois National Guard, as the regiments mustered in under the first call had done, while the Ninth was one of a number of "Provisional Regiments" which had tendered their services to the Government. Some twenty-five other regiments of this class, more or less complete, stood ready to perfect their organizations should there be occasion for their services. The aggregate strength of Illinois organizations at date of muster out from the United States service was 12,280—11,789 men and 491 officers.

FIRST REGIMENT ILLINOIS VOLUNTEERS (originally Illinois National Guard) was organized at Chicago, and mustered into the United States service at Camp Tanner (Springfield), under the command of Col. Henry L. Turner, May 13, 1898; left Springfield for Camp Thomas (Chickamauga) May 17; assigned to First Brigade, Third Division, of the First Army Corps; started for Tampa, Fla., June 2, but soon after arrival there was transferred to Picnic Island, and assigned to provost duty in place of the First United States Infantry. On June 30 the bulk of the regiment embarked for Cuba, but was detained in the harbor at Key West until July 5, when the vessel sailed for Santiago, arriving in Guantanamo Bay on the evening of the 8th. Disembarking on the 10th, the whole regiment arrived on the firing line on the 11th, spent several days and nights in the trenches before Santiago, and were present at the surrender of that city on the 17th. Two companies had previously been detached for the scarcely less perilous duty of service in the fever hospitals and in caring for their wounded comrades. The next month was spent on guard duty in the captured city, until August 25, when, depleted in numbers and weakened by fever, the bulk of the regiment was transferred by hospital boats to Camp Wikoff, on Montauk Point, L. I. The members of the regiment able to travel left Camp Wikoff, September 8, for Chicago, arriving two days later, where they met an enthusiastic reception and were mustered out, November 17, 1,235 strong (rank and file)—a considerable number of recruits having joined the regiment just before leaving Tampa. The record of the First was conspicuous by the fact that it was the only Illinois regiment to see service in Cuba during the progress of actual hostilities. Before leaving Tampa some eighty members of the regiment were detailed for engineering duty in Porto Rico, sailed for that island on July 12, and were among the first to perform service there. The First suffered severely from yellow fever while in Cuba, but, as a regiment, while in the service, made a brilliant record, which was highly complimented in the official reports of its commanding officers.

SECOND REGIMENT ILLINOIS VOLUNTEER INFANTRY (originally Second I. N. G.). This regiment, also from Chicago, began to arrive at Springfield, April 27, 1898—at that time numbering 1,202 men and 47 officers, under command of Col. George M. Moulton; was mustered in between May 4 and May 15; on May 17 started for Tampa, Fla., but en route its destination was changed to Jacksonville, where, as a part of the Seventh Army Corps, under command of Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, it assisted in the dedication of Camp Cuba Libre. October 25 it was transferred to Savannah, Ga., remaining at "Camp Lee" until December 8, when two battalions embarked for Havana, landing on the 15th, being followed, a few days later, by the Third Battalion, and stationed at Camp Columbia. From Dec. 17 to Jan. 11, 1899, Colonel Moulton served as Chief of Police for the city of Havana. On March 28 to 30 the regiment left Camp Columbia in detachments for Augusta, Ga., where it arrived April 5, and was mustered out, April 26, 1,051 strong (rank and file), and returned to Chicago. During its stay in Cuba the regiment did not lose a man. A history of this regiment has been written by Rev. H. W. Bolton, its late Chaplain.

THIRD REGIMENT ILLINOIS VOLUNTEER INFANTRY, composed of companies of the Illinois National Guard from the counties of La Salle, Livingston, Kane, Kankakee, McHenry, Ogle, Will, and Winnebago, under command of Col. Fred Bennett, reported at Springfield, with 1,170 men and 50 officers, on April 27; was mustered in May 7, 1898; transferred from Springfield to Camp Thomas (Chickamauga), May 14; on July 22 left Chickamauga for Porto Rico; on the 28th sailed from Newport News, on the liner St. Louis, arriving at Ponce, Porto Rico, on July 31; soon after disembarking captured Arroyo, and assisted in the capture of Guayama, which was the beginning of General Brooke's advance across the island to San Juan, when intelligence was received of the signing of the peace protocol by Spain. From August 13 to October 1 the Third continued in the performance of guard duty in Porto Rico; on October 23, 986 men and 39 officers took transport for home by way of New York, arriving in Chicago, November 11, the several companies being mustered out at their respective home stations. Its strength at final muster-out was 1,273 men and officers. This regiment had the distinction of being one of the first to see service in Porto Rico, but suffered severely from fever and other diseases during the three months of its stay in the island.

FOURTH ILLINOIS VOLUNTEER INFANTRY, composed of companies from Champaign, Coles, Douglas, Edgar, Effingham, Fayette, Jackson, Jefferson, Montgomery, Richland, and St. Clair counties; mustered into the service at Springfield, May 20, under command of Col. Casimer Andel; started immediately for Tampa, Fla., but en route its destination was changed to Jacksonville, where it was stationed at Camp Cuba Libre as a part of the Seventh Corps under command of Gen. Fitzhugh Lee; in October was transferred to Savannah, Ga., remaining at Camp Onward until about the first of January, when the regiment took ship for Havana. Here the regiment was stationed at Camp Columbia until April 4, 1899, when it returned to Augusta, Ga., and was mustered out at Camp Mackenzie (Augusta), May 2, the companies returning to their respective home stations. During a part of its stay at Jacksonville, and again at Savannah, the regiment was employed on guard duty. While at Jacksonville Colonel Andel was suspended by court-martial, and finally tendered his resignation, his place being supplied by Lieut.-Col. Eben Swift, of the Ninth.

FIFTH REGIMENT ILLINOIS VOLUNTEER INFANTRY was the first regiment to report, and was mustered in at Springfield, May 7, 1898, under command of Col. James S. Culver, being finally composed of twelve companies from Pike, Christian, Sangamon, McLean, Montgomery, Adams, Tazewell, Macon, Morgan, Peoria, and Fulton counties; on May 14 left Springfield for Camp Thomas (Chickamauga, Ga.), being assigned to the command of General Brooke; August 3 left Chickamauga for Newport News, Va., with the expectation of embarking for Porto Rico—a previous order of July 26 to the same purport having been countermanded; at Newport News embarked on the transport Odbam, but again the order was rescinded, and, after remaining on board thirty-six hours, the regiment was disembarked. The next move was made to Lexington, Ky., where the regiment—having lost hope of reaching "the front"—remained until Sept 5, when it returned to Springfield for final muster-out. This regiment was composed of some of the best material in the State, and anxious for active service, but after a succession of disappointments, was compelled to return to its home station without meeting the enemy. After its arrival at Springfield the regiment was furloughed for thirty days and finally mustered out, October 16, numbering 1,213 men and 47 officers.

SIXTH REGIMENT ILLINOIS VOLUNTEER INFANTRY, consisting of twelve companies from the counties of Rock Island, Knox, Whiteside, Lee, Carroll, Stephenson, Henry, Warren, Bureau, and Jo Daviess, was mustered in May 11, 1898, under command of Col. D. Jack Foster; on May 17 left Springfield for Camp Alger, Va.; July 5 the regiment moved to Charleston, S. C., where a part embarked for Siboney, Cuba, but the whole regiment was soon after united in General Miles' expedition for the invasion of Porto Rico, landing at Guanico on July 25, and advancing into the interior as far as Adjunta and Utuado. After several weeks' service in the interior, the regiment returned to Ponce, and on September 7 took transport for the return home, arrived at Springfield a week later, and was mustered out November 25, the regiment at that time consisting of 1,239 men and 49 officers.

SEVENTH ILLINOIS VOLUNTEER INFANTRY (known as the "Hibernian Rifles"). Two battalions of this regiment reported at Springfield, April 27, with 33 officers and 765 enlisted men, being afterwards increased to the maximum; was mustered into the United States service, under command of Col. Marcus Kavanagh, May 18, 1898; on May 28 started for Camp Alger, Va.; was afterwards encamped at Thorofare Gap and Camp Meade; on September 9 returned to Springfield, was furloughed for thirty days, and mustered out, October 20, numbering 1,260 men and 49 officers. Like the Fifth, the Seventh saw no actual service in the field.

EIGHTH ILLINOIS VOLUNTEER INFANTRY (colored regiment), mustered into the service at Springfield under the second call of the President, July 23, 1898, being composed wholly of Afro-Americans under officers of their own race, with Col. John R. Marshall in command, the muster-roll showing 1,195 men and 76 officers. The six companies, from A to F, were from Chicago, the other five being, respectively, from Bloomington, Springfield, Quincy, Litchfield, Mound City and Metropolis, and Cairo. The regiment having tendered their services to relieve the First Illinois on duty at Santiago de Cuba, it started for Cuba, August 8, by way of New York; immediately on arrival at Santiago, a week later, was assigned to duty, but subsequently transferred to San Luis, where Colone, Marshall was made military governor. The major part of the regiment remained here until ordered home early in March, 1899, arrived at Chicago, March 15, and was mustered out, April 3, 1,226 strong, rank and file, having been in service nine months and six days.

NINTH ILLINOIS VOLUNTEER INFANTRY was organized from the counties of Southern Illinois, and mustered in at Springfield under the second call of the President, July 4-11, 1898, under command of Col. James R. Campbell; arrived at Camp Cuba Libre (Jacksonville, Fla.), August 9; two months later was transferred to Savannah, Ga.; was moved to Havana in December, where it remained until May, 1899, when it returned to Augusta, Ga., and was mustered out there, May 20, 1899, at that time consisting of 1,095 men and 46 officers. From Augusta the several companies returned to their respective home stations. The Ninth was the only "Provisional Regiment" from Illinois mustered into the service during the war, the other regiments all belonging to the National Guard.

FIRST ILLINOIS CAVALRY was organized at Chicago immediately after the President's first call, seven companies being recruited from Chicago, two from Bloomington, and one each from Springfield, Elkhart, and Lacon; was mustered in at Springfield, May 21, 1898, under command of

Col. Edward C. Young; left Springfield for Camp Thomas, Ga., May 30, remaining there until August 24, when it returned to Fort Sheridan, near Chicago, where it was stationed until October 11, when it was mustered out, at that time consisting of 1,158 men and 50 officers. Although the regiment saw no active service in the field, it established an excellent record for itself in respect to discipline.

FIRST ENGINEERING CORPS, consisting of 80 men detailed from the First Illinois Volunteers, were among the first Illinois soldiers to see service in Porto Rico, accompanying General Miles' expedition in the latter part of July, and being engaged for a time in the construction of bridges in aid of the intended advance across the island. On September 8 they embarked for the return home, arrived at Chicago, September 17, and were mustered out November 20.

BATTERY A (I. N. G.), from Danville, Ill., was mustered in under a special order of the War Department, May 12, 1898, under command of Capt. Oscar P. Yaeger, consisting of 118 men; left Springfield for Camp Thomas, Ga., May 19, and, two months later, joined in General Miles' Porto Rico expedition, landing at Guanico on August 3, and taking part in the affair at Guayama on the 12th. News of peace having been received, the Battery returned to Ponce, where it remained until September 7, when it started on the return home by way of New York, arrived at Danville, September 17, was furloughed for sixty days, and mustered out November 25. The Battery was equipped with modern breech-loading rapid-firing guns, operated by practical artillerymen and prepared for effective service.

NAVAL RESERVES.—One of the earliest steps taken by the Government after it became apparent that hostilities could not be averted, was to begin preparation for strengthening the naval arm of the service. The existence of the "Naval Militia," first organized in 1893, placed Illinois in an exceptionally favorable position for making a prompt response to the call of the Government, as well as furnishing a superior class of men for service—a fact evidenced during the operations in the West Indies. Gen. John McNulta, as head of the local committee, was active in calling the attention of the Navy Department to the value of the service to be rendered by this organization, which resulted in its being enlisted practically as a body, taking the name of "Naval Reserves"—all but eighty-eight of the number passing the physical examination, the places of these being promptly filled by new recruits. The first detachment of over 200 left Chicago May 2, under the command of Lieut.-Com. John M. Hawley, followed soon after by the remainder of the First Battalion, making the whole number from Chicago 400, with 267, constituting the Second Battalion, from other towns of the State. The latter was made up of 147 men from Moline, 58 from Quincy, and 62 from Alton—making a total from the State of 667. This does not include others, not belonging to this organization, who enlisted for service in the navy during the war, which raised the whole number for the State over 1,000. The Reserves enlisted from Illinois occupied a different relation to the Government from that of the "naval militia" of other States, which retained their State organizations, while those from Illinois were regularly mustered into the United States service. The recruits from Illinois were embarked at Key West, Norfolk and New York, and distributed among fifty-two different vessels, including nearly every vessel belonging to the North Atlantic Squadron. They saw service in nearly every department from the position of stokers in the hold to that of gunners in the turrets of the big battleships, the largest number (60) being assigned to the famous battleship Oregon, while the cruiser Yale followed with 47; the Harvard with 35; Cincinnati, 27; Yankton, 19; Franklin, 18; Montgomery and Indiana, each, 17; Hector, 14; Marietta, 11; Wilmington and Lancaster, 10 each, and others down to one each. Illinois sailors thus had the privilege of participating in the brilliant affair of July 3, which resulted in the destruction of Cervera's fleet off Santiago, as also in nearly every other event in the West Indies of less importance, without the loss of a man while in the service, although among the most exposed. They were mustered out at different times, as they could be spared from the service, or the vessels to which they were attached went out of commission, a portion serving out their full term of one year. The Reserves from Chicago retain their organization under the name of "Naval Reserve Veterans," with headquarters in the Masonic Temple Building, Chicago.

WARD, James H., ex-Congressman, was born in Chicago, Nov. 30, 1853, and educated in the Chicago public schools and at the University of Notre Dame, graduating from the latter in 1873. Three years later he graduated from the Union College of Law, Chicago, and was admitted to the bar. Since then he has continued to practice his profession in his native city. In 1879 he was elected Supervisor of the town of West Chicago, and, in 1884, was a candidate for Presidential Elector on the Democratic ticket, and the same year, was the successful candidate of his party for Congress in the Third Illinois District, serving one term.

WINNEBAGO INDIANS, a tribe of the Dakota, or Sioux, stock, which at one time occupied a part of Northern Illinois. The word Winnebago is a corruption of the French Ouinebegoutz, Ouimbegouc, etc., the diphthong "ou" taking the place of the consonant "w," which is wanting in the French alphabet. These were, in turn, French misspellings of an Algonquin term meaning "fetid," which the latter tribe applied to the Winnebagoes because they had come from the western ocean—the salt (or "fetid") water. In their advance towards the East the Winnebagoes early invaded the country of the Illinois, but were finally driven northward by the latter, who surpassed them in numbers rather than in bravery. The invaders settled in Wisconsin, near the Fox River, and here they were first visited by the Jesuit Fathers in the seventeenth century. (See Jesuit Relations.) The Winnebagoes are commonly regarded as a Wisconsin tribe; yet, that they claimed territorial rights in Illinois is shown by the fact that the treaty of Prairie du Chien (August 1, 1829), alludes to a Winnebago village located in what is now Jo Daviess County, near the mouth of the Pecatonica River. While, as a rule, the tribe, if left to itself, was disposed to live in amity with the whites, it was carried away by the eloquence and diplomacy of Tecumseh and the cajoleries of "The Prophet." General Harrison especially alludes to the bravery of the Winnebago warriors at Tippecanoe, which he attributes in part, however, to a superstitious faith in "The Prophet." In June or July, 1827, an unprovoked and brutal outrage by the whites upon an unoffending and practically defenseless party of Winnebagoes, near Prairie du Chien brought on what is known as the "Winnebago War." (See Winnebago War.) The tribe took no part in the Black Hawk War, largely because of the great influence and shrewd tactic of their chief, Naw-caw. By treaties executed in 1832 and 1837 the Winnebagoes ceded to the United States all their lands lying east of the Mississippi. They were finally removed west of that river, and, after many shiftings of location, were placed upon the Omaha Reservation in Eastern Nebraska, where their industry, thrift and peaceable disposition elicited high praise from Government officials.

WARNER, Vespasian, lawyer and Member of Congress, was born in De Witt County, Ill., April 23, 1842, and has lived all his life in his native county—his present residence being Clinton. After a short course in Lombard University, while studying law in the office of Hon. Lawrence Weldon, at Clinton, he enlisted as a private soldier of the Twentieth Illinois Volunteers, in June, 1861, serving until July, 1866, when he was mustered out with the rank of Captain and brevet Major. He received a gunshot wound at Shiloh, but continued to serve in the Army of the Tennessee until the evacuation of Atlanta, when he was ordered North on account of disability. His last service was in fighting Indians on the plains. After the war he completed his law studies at Harvard University, graduating in 1868, when he entered into a law partnership with Clifton H. Moore of Clinton. He served as Judge-Advocate General of the Illinois National Guard for several years, with the rank of Colonel, under the administrations of Governors Hamilton, Oglesby and Fifer, and, in 1894, was nominated and elected, as a Republican, to the Fifty-fourth Congress for the Thirteenth District, being re-elected in 1896, and again in 1898. In the Fifty-fifth Congress, Mr. Warner was a member of the Committees on Agriculture and Invalid Pensions, and Chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws.

WARREN, a village in Jo Daviess County, at intersection of the Illinois Central and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railways, 26 miles west-northwest of Freeport and 27 miles east by north of Galena. The surrounding region is agricultural and stock-raising; there are also lead mines in the vicinity. Tobacco is grown to some extent. Warren has a flouring mill, tin factory, creamery and stone quarries, a State bank, water supply from artesian wells, fire department, gas plant, two weekly newspapers, five churches, a high school, an academy and a public library. Pop. (1890), 1,172; (1900), 1,327.

WARREN, Calvin A., lawyer, was born in Essex County, N. Y., June 3, 1807; in his youth, worked for a time, as a typographer, in the office of "The Northern Spectator," at Poultney, Vt., side by side with Horace Greeley, afterwards the founder of "The New York Tribune." Later, he became one of the publishers of "The Palladium" at Ballston, N. Y., but, in 1832, removed to Hamilton County, Ohio, where he began the study of law, completing his course at Transylvania University, Ky., in 1834, and beginning practice at Batavia, Ohio, as the partner of Thomas Morris, then a United States Senator from Ohio, whose daughter he married, thereby becoming the brother-in-law of the late Isaac N. Morris, of Quincy, Ill. In 1836, Mr. Warren came to Quincy, Adams County, Ill., but soon after removed to Warsaw in Hancock County, where he resided until 1839, when he returned to Quincy. Here he continued in practice, either alone or as a partner, at different times, of several of the leading attorneys of that city. Although he held no office except that of Master in Chancery, which he occupied for some sixteen years, the possession of an inexhaustible fund of humor, with strong practical sense and decided ability as a speaker, gave him great popularity at the bar and upon the stump, and made him a recognized leader in the ranks of the Democratic party, of which he was a life-long member. He served as Presidential Elector on the Pierce ticket in 1852, and was the nominee of his party for the same position on one or two other occasions. Died, at Quincy, Feb. 22, 1881.

WARREN, Hooper, pioneer journalist, was born at Walpole, N. H., in 1790; learned the printer's trade on the Rutland (Vt.) "Herald"; in 1814 went to Delaware, whence, three years later, he emigrated to Kentucky, working for a time on a paper at Frankfort. In 1818 he came to St. Louis and worked in the office of the old "Missouri Gazette" (the predecessor of "The Republican"), and also acted as the agent of a lumber company at Cairo, Ill., when the whole population of that place consisted of one family domiciled on a grounded flat-boat. In March, 1819, he established, at Edwardsville, the third paper in Illinois, its predecessors being "The Illinois Intelligencer," at Kaskaskia, and "The Illinois Emigrant," at Shawneetown. The name given to the new paper was "The Spectator," and the contest over the effort to introduce a pro-slavery clause in the State Constitution soon brought it into prominence. Backed by Governor Coles, Congressman Daniel P. Cook, Judge S. D. Lockwood, Rev. Thomas Lippincott, Judge Wm. H. Brown (afterwards of Chicago), George Churchill and other opponents of slavery, "The Spectator" made a sturdy fight in opposition to the scheme, which ended in defeat of the measure by the rejection at the polls, in 1824, of the proposition for a Constitutional Convention. Warren left the Edwardsville paper in 1825, and was, for a time, associated with "The National Crisis," an anti-slavery paper at Cincinnati, but soon returned to Illinois and established "The Sangamon Spectator"—the first paper ever published at the present State capital. This he sold out in 1829, and, for the next three years, was connected with "The Advertiser and Upper Mississippi Herald," at Galena. Abandoning this field in 1832, he removed to Hennepin, where, within the next five years, he held the offices of Clerk of the Circuit and County Commissioners' Courts and ex-officio Recorder of Deeds. In 1836 he began the publication of the third paper in Chicago—"The Commercial Advertiser" (a weekly)—which was continued a little more than a year, when it was abandoned, and he settled on a farm at Henry, Marshall County. His further newspaper ventures were, as the associate of Zebina Eastman, in the publication of "The Genius of Liberty," at Lowell, La Salle County, and "The Western Citizen"—afterwards "The Free West"—in Chicago. (See Eastman, Zebina, and Lundy, Benjamin.) On the discontinuance of "The Free West" in 1856, he again retired to his farm at Henry, where he spent the remainder of his days. While returning home from a visit to Chicago, in August, 1864, he was taken ill at Mendota, dying there on the 23d of the month.

WARREN, John Esaias, diplomatist and real-estate operator, was born in Troy, N. Y., in 1826, graduated at Union College and was connected with the American Legation to Spain during the administration of President Pierce; in 1859-60 was a member of the Minnesota Legislature and, in 1861-62, Mayor of St. Paul; in 1867, came to Chicago, where, while engaged in real-estate business, he became known to the press as the author of a series of articles entitled "Topics of the Time." In 1886 he took up his residence in Brussels, Belgium, where he died, July 6, 1896. Mr. Warren was author of several volumes of travel, of which "An Attache in Spain" and "Para" are most important.

WARREN COUNTY. A western county, created by act of the Legislature, in 1825, but not fully organized until 1830, having at that time about 350 inhabitants; has an area of 540 square miles, and was named for Gen. Joseph Warren. It is drained by the Henderson River and its affluents, and is traversed by the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy (two divisions), the Iowa Central and the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroads. Bituminous coal is mined and limestone is quarried in large quantities. The county's early development was retarded in consequence of having become the "seat of war," during the Black Hawk War. The principal products are grain and live-stock, although manufacturing is carried on to some extent. The county-seat and chief city is Monmouth (which see). Roseville is a shipping point. Population (1880), 22,933. (1890), 21,281; (1900), 23,163.

WARRENSBURG, a town of Macon County, on Peoria Division Ill. Cent. Railway, 9 miles northwest of Decatur; has elevators, canning factory, a bank and newspaper. Pop. (1900), 503.

WARSAW, the largest town in Hancock County, and admirably situated for trade. It stands on a bluff on the Mississippi River, some three miles below Keokuk, and about 40 miles above Quincy. It is the western terminus of the Toledo, Peoria & Western Railway, and lies 116 miles west-southwest of Peoria. Old Fort Edwards, established by Gen. Zachary Taylor, during the War of 1812, was located within the limits of the present city of Warsaw, opposite the mouth of the Des Moines River. An iron foundry, a large woolen mill, a plow factory and cooperage works are its principal manufacturing establishments. The channel of the Mississippi admits of the passage of the largest steamers up to this point. Warsaw has eight churches, a system of common schools comprising one high and three grammar schools, a National bank and two weekly newspapers. Population (1880), 3,105; (1890), 2,721; (1900), 2,335.

WASHBURN, a village of Woodford County, on a branch of the Chicago & Alton Railway 25 miles northeast of Peoria; has banks and a weekly paper; the district is agricultural. Population (1890), 598; (1900), 703.

WASHBURNE, Elihu Benjamin, Congressman and diplomatist, was born at Livermore, Maine, Sept. 23, 1816; in early life learned the trade of a printer, but graduated from Harvard Law School and was admitted to the bar in 1840. Coming west, he settled at Galena, forming a partnership with Charles S. Hempstead, for the practice of law, in 1841. He was a stalwart Whig, and, as such, was elected to Congress in 1852. He continued to represent his District until 1869, taking a prominent position, as a Republican, on the organization of that party. On account of his long service he was known as the "Father of the House," administering the Speaker's oath three times to Schuyler Colfax and once to James G. Blaine. He was appointed Secretary of State by General Grant in 1869, but surrendered his portfolio to become Envoy to France, in which capacity he achieved great distinction. He was the only official representative of a foreign government who remained in Paris, during the siege of that city by the Germans (1870-71) and the reign of the "Commune." For his conduct he was honored by the Governments of France and Germany alike. On his return to the United States, he made his home in Chicago, where he devoted his latter years chiefly to literary labor, and where he died, Oct. 23, 1887. He was strongly favored as a candidate for the Presidency in 1880.

WASHINGTON, a city in Tazewell County, situated at the intersection of the Chicago & Alton, the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe, and the Toledo, Peoria & Western Railroads. It is 21 miles west of El Paso, and 13 miles east of Peoria. Carriages, plows and farming implements constitute the manufactured output. It is also an important shipping-point for farm products. It has electric light and water-works plants, eight churches, a graded school, two banks and two newspapers. Pop. (1890), 1,301; (1900), 1,451.

WASHINGTON COUNTY, an interior county of Southern Illinois, east of St. Louis; is drained by the Kaskaskia River and the Elkhorn, Beaucoup and Muddy Creeks; was organized in 1818, and has an area of 540 square miles. The surface is diversified, well watered and timbered. The soil is of variable fertility. Corn, wheat and oats are the chief agricultural products. Manufacturing is carried on to some extent, among the products being agricultural implements, flour, carriages and wagons. The most important town is Nashville, which is also the county-seat. Population (1890), 19,262; (1900), 19,526. Washington was one of the fifteen counties into which Illinois was divided at the organization of the State Government, being one of the last three created during the Territorial period—the other two being Franklin and Union.

WASHINGTON HEIGHTS, a village of Cook County, on the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific and the Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railways, 12 miles southwest of Chicago; has a graded school, female seminary, military school, a car factory, several churches and a newspaper. Annexed to City of Chicago, 1890.

WATAGA, a village of Knox County, on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, 8 miles northeast of Galesburg. Population (1900), 545.

WATERLOO, the county-seat and chief town of Monroe County, on the Illinois Division of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad, 24 miles east of south from St. Louis. The region is chiefly agricultural, but underlaid with coal. Its industries embrace two flour mills, a plow factory, distillery, creamery, two ice plants, and some minor concerns. The city has municipal water and electric light plants, four churches, a graded school and two newspapers. Pop. (1890), 1,860; (1900), 2,114.

WATERMAN, Arba Nelson, lawyer and jurist, was born at Greensboro, Orleans County, Vt., Feb. 3, 1836. After receiving an academic education and teaching for a time, he read law at Montpelier and, later, passed through the Albany Law School. In 1861 he was admitted to the bar, removed to Joliet, Ill., and opened an office. In 1862 he enlisted as a private in the One Hundredth Illinois Volunteers, serving with the Army of the Cumberland for two years, and being mustered out in August, 1864, with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel. On leaving the army, Colonel Waterman commenced practice in Chicago. In 1873-74 he represented the Eleventh Ward in the City Council. In 1887 he was elected to the bench of the Cook County Circuit Court, and was re-elected in 1891 and, again, in 1897. In 1890 he was assigned as one of the Judges of the Appellate Court.

WATSEKA, the county-seat of Iroquois County, situated on the Iroquois River, at the mouth of Sugar Creek, and at the intersection of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois and the Toledo, Peoria & Western Railroads, 77 miles south of Chicago, 46 miles north of Danville and 14 miles east of Gilman. It has flour-mills, brick and tile works and foundries, besides several churches, banks, a graded school and three weekly newspapers. Artesian well water is obtained by boring to the depth of 100 to 160 feet, and some forty flowing streams from these shafts are in the place. Population (1890), 2,017; (1900), 2,505.

WATTS, Amos, jurist, was born in St. Clair County, Ill., Oct. 25, 1821, but removed to Washington County in boyhood, and was elected County Clerk in 1847, '49 and '53, and State's Attorney for the Second Judicial District in 1856 and '60; then became editor and proprietor of a newspaper, later resuming the practice of law, and, in 1873, was elected Circuit Judge, remaining in office until his death, at Nashville, Ill. Dec. 6, 1888.

WAUKEGAN, the county-seat and principal city of Lake County, situated on the shore of Lake Michigan and on the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad, about 36 miles north by west from Chicago, and 50 miles south of Milwaukee; is also the northern terminus of the Elgin, Joliet & Eastern Railroad and connected by electric lines with Chicago and Fox Lake. Lake Michigan is about 80 miles wide opposite this point. Waukegan was first known as "Little Fort," from the remains of an old fort that stood on its site. The principal part of the city is built on a bluff, which rises abruptly to the height of about fifty feet. Between the bluff and the shore is a flat tract about 400 yards wide which is occupied by gardens, dwellings, warehouses and manufacturing. The manufactures include steel-wire, refined sugar, scales, agricultural implements, brass and iron products, sash, doors and blinds, leather, beer, etc.; the city has paved streets, gas and electric light plants, three banks, eight or ten churches, graded and high schools and two newspapers. A large trade in grain, lumber, coal and dairy products is carried on. Pop. (1890), 4,915; (1900), 9,426.

WAUKEGAN & SOUTHWESTERN RAILWAY. (See Elgin, Joliet & Eastern Railway.)

WAVERLY, a city in Morgan County, 18 miles southeast of Jacksonville, on the Jacksonville & St. Louis and the Chicago, Peoria & St. Louis Railroads. It was originally settled by enterprising emigrants from New England, whose descendants constitute a large proportion of the population. It is the center of a rich agricultural region, has a fine graded school, six or seven churches, two banks, two newspapers and tile works. Population (1880), 1,124; (1890), 1,337; (1900), 1,573.

WAYNE, (Gen.) Anthony, soldier, was born in Chester County, Pa., Jan. 1, 1745, of Anglo-Irish descent, graduated as a Surveyor, and first practiced his profession in Nova Scotia. During the years immediately antecedent to the Revolution he was prominent in the colonial councils of his native State, to which he had returned in 1767, where he became a member of the "Committee of Safety." On June 3, 1776, he was commissioned Colonel of the Fourth Regiment of Pennsylvania troops in the Continental army, and, during the War of the Revolution, was conspicuous for his courage and ability as a leader. One of his most daring and successful achievements was the capture of Stony Point, in 1779, when—the works having been carried and Wayne having received, what was supposed to be, his death-wound—he entered the fort, supported by his aids. For this service he was awarded a gold medal by Congress. He also took a conspicuous part in the investiture and capture of Yorktown. In October, 1783, he was brevetted Major-General. In 1784 he was elected to the Pennsylvania Legislature. A few years later he settled in Georgia, which State he represented in Congress for seven months, when his seat was declared vacant after contest. In April, 1792, he was confirmed as General-in-Chief of the United States Army, on nomination of President Washington. His connection with Illinois history began shortly after

St. Clair's defeat, when he led a force into Ohio (1783) and erected a stockade at Greenville, which he named Fort Recovery; his object being to subdue the hostile savage tribes. In this he was eminently successful and, on August 3, 1793, after a victorious campaign, negotiated the Treaty of Greenville, as broad in its provisions as it was far-reaching in its influence. He was a daring fighter, and although Washington called him "prudent," his dauntlessness earned for him the sobriquet of "Mad Anthony." In matters of dress he was punctilious, and, on this account, he was sometimes dubbed "Dandy Wayne." He was one of the few white officers whom all the Western Indian tribes at once feared and respected. They named him "Black Snake" and "Tornado." He died at Presque Isle near Erie, Dec. 15, 1796. Thirteen years afterward his remains were removed by one of his sons, and interred in Badnor churchyard, in his native county. The Pennsylvania Historical Society erected a marble monument over his grave, and appropriately dedicated it on July 4 of the same year.

WAYNE COUNTY, in the southeast quarter of the State; has an area of 720 square miles; was organized in 1819, and named for Gen. Anthony Wayne. The county is watered and drained by the Little Wabash and its branches, notably the Skillet Fork. At the first election held in the county, only fifteen votes were cast. Early life was exceedingly primitive, the first settlers pounding corn into meal with a wooden pestle, a hollowed stump being used as a mortar. The first mill erected (of the antique South Carolina pattern) charged 25 cents per bushel for grinding. Prairie and woodland make up the surface, and the soil is fertile. Railroad facilities are furnished by the Louisville, Evansville & St. Louis and the Baltimore & Ohio (Southwestern) Railroads. Corn, oats, tobacco, wheat, hay and wool are the chief agricultural products. Saw mills are numerous and there are also carriage and wagon factories. Fairfield is the county-seat. Population (1880), 21,291; (1890), 23,806; (1900), 27,626.

WEAS, THE, a branch of the Miami tribe of Indians. They called themselves "We-wee-hahs," and were spoken of by the French as "Oui-at-a-nons" and "Oui-as." Other corruptions of the name were common among the British and American colonists. In 1718 they had a village at Chicago, but abandoned it through fear of their hostile neighbors, the Chippewas and Pottawatomies. The Weas were, at one time, brave and warlike; but their numbers were reduced by constant warfare and disease, and, in the end, debauchery enervated and demoralized them. They were removed west of the Mississippi and given a reservation in Miami County, Kan. This they ultimately sold, and, under the leadership of Baptiste Peoria, united with their few remaining brethren of the Miamis and with the remnant of the Ill-i-ni under the title of the "confederated tribes," and settled in Indian Territory. (See also Miamis; Piankeshaws.)

WEBB, Edwin B., early lawyer and politician, was born about 1802, came to the vicinity of Carmi, White County, Ill., about 1828 to 1830, and, still later, studied law at Transylvania University. He held the office of Prosecuting Attorney of White County, and, in 1834, was elected to the lower branch of the General Assembly, serving, by successive re-elections, until 1842, and, in the Senate, from 1842 to '46. During his service in the House he was a colleague and political and personal friend of Abraham Lincoln. He opposed the internal improvement scheme of 1837, predicting many of the disasters which were actually realized a few years later. He was a candidate for Presidential Elector on the Whig ticket, in 1844 and '48, and, in 1852, received the nomination for Governor as the opponent of Joel A. Matteson, two years later, being an unsuccessful candidate for Justice of the Supreme Court in opposition to Judge W. B. Scates. While practicing law at Carmi, he was also a partner of his brother in the mercantile business. Died, Oct. 14, 1858, in the 56th year of his age.

WEBB, Henry Livingston, soldier and pioneer (an elder brother of James Watson Webb, a noted New York journalist), was born at Claverack, N. Y., Feb. 6, 1795; served as a soldier in the War of 1812, came to Southern Illinois in 1817, and became one of the founders of the town of America near the mouth of the Ohio; was Representative in the Fourth and Eleventh General Assemblies, a Major in the Black Hawk War and Captain of volunteers and, afterwards, Colonel of regulars, in the Mexican War. In 1860 he went to Texas and served, for a time, in a semi-military capacity under the Confederate Government; returned to Illinois in 1869, and died, at Makanda, Oct. 5, 1876.

WEBSTER, Fletcher, lawyer and soldier, was born at Portsmouth, N. H., July 23, 1813; graduated at Harvard in 1833, and studied law with his father (Daniel Webster); in 1837, located at Peru, Ill., where he practiced three years. His father having been appointed Secretary of State in 1841, the son became his private secretary, was also Secretary of Legation to Caleb Cushing (Minister to China) in 1843, a member of the Massachusetts Legislature in 1847, and Surveyor of the Port of Boston, 1850-61; the latter year became Colonel of the Twelfth Massachusetts Volunteers, and was killed in the second battle of Bull Run, August 30, 1862.

WEBSTER, Joseph Dana, civil engineer and soldier, was born at Old Hampton, N. H., August 25, 1811. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1832, and afterwards read law at Newburyport, Mass. His natural inclination was for engineering, and, after serving for a time in the Engineer and War offices, at Washington, was made a United States civil engineer (1835) and, on July 7, 1838, entered the army as Second Lieutenant of Topographical Engineers. He served through the Mexican War, was made First Lieutenant in 1849, and promoted to a captaincy, in March, 1853. Thirteen months later he resigned, removing to Chicago, where he made his permanent home, and soon after was identified, for a time, with the proprietorship of "The Chicago Tribune." He was President of the commission that perfected the Chicago sewerage system, and designed and executed the raising of the grade of a large portion of the city from two to eight feet, whole blocks of buildings being raised by jack screws, while new foundations were inserted. At the outbreak of the Civil War he tendered his services to the Government and superintended the erection of the fortifications at Cairo, Ill., and Paducah, Ky. On April 7, 1861, he was commissioned Paymaster of Volunteers, with the rank of Major, and, in February, 1862, Colonel of the First Illinois Artillery. For several months he was chief of General Grant's staff, participating in the capture of Forts Donelson and Henry, and in the battle of Shiloh, in the latter as Chief of Artillery. In October, 1862, the War Department detailed him to make a survey of the Illinois & Michigan Canal, and, the following month, he was commissioned Brigadier-General of Volunteers, serving as Military Governor of Memphis and Superintendent of military railroads. He was again chief of staff to General Grant during the Vicksburg campaign, and, from 1864 until the close of the war, occupied the same relation to General Sherman. He was brevetted Major-General of Volunteers, March 13, 1865, but, resigning Nov. 6, following, returned to Chicago, where he spent the remainder of his life. From 1869 to 1872 he was Assessor of Internal Revenue there, and, later, Assistant United States Treasurer, and, in July, 1872, was appointed Collector of Internal Revenue. Died, at Chicago, March 12, 1876.

WELCH, William R., lawyer and jurist, was born in Jessamine County, Ky., Jan. 22, 1828, educated at Transylvania University, Lexington, graduating from the academic department in 1847, and, from the law school, in 1851. In 1864 he removed to Carlinville, Macoupin County, Ill., which place he made his permanent home. In 1877 he was elected to the bench of the Fifth Circuit, and re-elected in 1879 and '85. In 1884 he was assigned to the bench of the Appellate Court for the Second District. Died, Sept. 1, 1888.

WELDON, Lawrence, one of the Judges of the United States Court of Claims, Washington, D. C., was born in Muskingum County, Ohio, in 1829; while a child, removed with his parents to Madison County, and was educated in the common schools, the local academy and at Wittenberg College, Springfield, in the same State; read law with Hon. R. A. Harrison, a prominent member of the Ohio bar, and was admitted to practice in 1854, meanwhile, in 1852-53, having served as a clerk in the office of the Secretary of State at Columbus. In 1854 he removed to Illinois, locating at Clinton, DeWitt County, where he engaged in practice; in 1860 was elected a Representative in the Twenty-second General Assembly, was also chosen a Presidential Elector the same year, and assisted in the first election of Abraham Lincoln to the Presidency. Early in 1861 he resigned his seat in the Legislature to accept the position of United States District Attorney for the Southern District of Illinois, tendered him by President Lincoln, but resigned the latter office in 1866 and, the following year, removed to Bloomington, where he continued the practice of his profession until 1883, when he was appointed, by President Arthur, an Associate Justice of the United States Court of Claims at Washington—a position which he still (1899) continues to fill. Judge Weldon is among the remaining few who rode the circuit and practiced law with Mr. Lincoln. From the time of coming to the State in 1854 to 1860, he was one of Mr. Lincoln's most intimate traveling companions in the old Eighth Circuit, which extended from Sangamon County on the west to Vermilion on the east, and of which Judge David Davis, afterwards of the Supreme Court of the United States and United States Senator, was the presiding Justice. The Judge holds in his memory many pleasant reminiscences of that day, especially of the eastern portion of the District, where he was accustomed to meet the late Senator Voorhees, Senator McDonald and other leading lawyers of Indiana, as well as the historic men whom he met at the State capital.

WELLS, Albert W., lawyer and legislator, was born at Woodstock, Conn., May 9, 1839, and enjoyed only such educational and other advantages as belonged to the average New England boy of that period. During his boyhood his family removed to New Jersey, where he attended an academy, later, graduating from Columbia College and Law School in New York City, and began practice with State Senator Robert Allen at Red Bank, N. J. During the Civil War he enlisted in a New Jersey regiment and took part in the battle of Gettysburg, resuming his profession at the close of the war. Coming west in 1870, he settled in Quincy, Ill., where he continued practice. In 1886 he was elected to the House of Representatives from Adams County, as a Democrat, and re-elected two years later. In 1890 he was advanced to the Senate, where, by re-election in 1894, he served continuously until his death in office, March 5, 1897. His abilities and long service—covering the sessions of the Thirty-fifth to the Fortieth General Assemblies—placed him at the head of the Democratic side of the Senate during the latter part of his legislative career.

WELLS, William, soldier and victim of the Fort Dearborn massacre, was born in Kentucky, about 1770. When a boy of 12, he was captured by the Miami Indians, whose chief, Little Turtle, adopted him, giving him his daughter in marriage when he grew to manhood. He was highly esteemed by the tribe as a warrior, and, in 1790, was present at the battle where Gen. Arthur St. Clair was defeated. He then realized that he was fighting against his own race, and informed his father-in-law that he intended to ally himself with the whites. Leaving the Miamis, he made his way to General Wayne, who made him Captain of a company of scouts. After the treaty of Greenville (1795) he settled on a farm near Fort Wayne, where he was joined by his Indian wife. Here he acted as Indian Agent and Justice of the Peace. In 1812 he learned of the contemplated evacuation of Fort Dearborn, and, at the head of thirty Miamis, he set out for the post, his intention being to furnish a body-guard to the non-combatants on their proposed march to Fort Wayne. On August 13, he marched out of the fort with fifteen of his dusky warriors behind him, the remainder bringing up the rear. Before a mile and a half had been traveled, the party fell into an Indian ambuscade, and an indiscriminate massacre followed. (See Fort Dearborn.) The Miamis fled, and Captain Wells' body was riddled with bullets, his head cut off and his heart taken out. He was an uncle of Mrs. Heald, wife of the commander of Fort Dearborn.

WELLS, William Harvey, educator, was born in Tolland, Conn., Feb. 27, 1812; lived on a farm until 17 years old, attending school irregularly, but made such progress that he became successively a teacher in the Teachers' Seminary at Andover and Newburyport, and, finally, Principal of the State Normal School at Westfield, Mass. In 1856 he accepted the position of Superintendent of Public Schools for the city of Chicago, serving till 1864, when he resigned. He was an organizer of the Massachusetts State Teachers' Association, one of the first editors of "The Massachusetts Teacher" and prominently connected with various benevolent, educational and learned societies; was also author of several textbooks, and assisted in the revision of "Webster's Unabridged Dictionary." Died, Jan. 21, 1885.

WENONA, city on the eastern border of Marshall County, 20 miles south of La Salle, has zinc works, public and parochial schools, a weekly paper, two banks, and five churches. A good quality of soft coal is mined here. Population (1880), 911; (1890), 1,053; (1900), 1,486.

WENTWORTH, John, early journalist and Congressman, was born at Sandwich, N. H., March 5, 1815, graduated from Dartmouth College in 1836, and came to Chicago the same year, where he became editor of "The Chicago Democrat," which had been established by John Calhoun three years previous. He soon after became proprietor of "The Democrat," of which he continued to be the publisher until it was merged into "The Chicago Tribune," July 24, 1864. He also studied law, and was admitted to the Illinois bar in 1841. He served in Congress as a Democrat from 1843 to 1851, and again from 1853 to 1855, but left the Democratic party on the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. He was elected Mayor of Chicago in 1857, and again in 1860, during his incumbency introducing a number of important municipal reforms; was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1862, and twice served on the Board of Education. He again represented Illinois in Congress as a Republican from 1865 to 1867—making fourteen years of service in that body. In 1873 he joined in the Greeley movement, but later renewed his allegiance to the Republican party. In 1874 Mr. Wentworth published an elaborate genealogical work in three volumes, entitled "History of the Wentworth Family." A volume of "Congressional Reminiscences" and two by him on "Early Chicago," published in connection with the Fergus Historical Series, contain some valuable information on early local and national history. On account of his extraordinary height he received the sobriquet of "Long John," by which he was familiarly known throughout the State. Died, in Chicago, Oct. 16, 1888.

WEST, Edward M., merchant and banker, was born in Virginia, May 2, 1814; came with his father to Illinois in 1818; in 1829 became a clerk in the Recorder's office at Edwardsville, also served as deputy postmaster, and, in 1833, took a position in the United States Land Office there. Two years later he engaged in mercantile business, which he prosecuted over thirty years—meanwhile filling the office of County Treasurer, ex-officio Superintendent of Schools, and Delegate to the Constitutional Convention of 1847. In 1867, in conjunction with W. R. Prickett, he established a bank at Edwardsville, with which he was connected until his death, Oct. 31, 1887. Mr. West officiated frequently as a "local preacher" of the Methodist Church, in which capacity he showed much ability as a public speaker.

WEST, Mary Allen, educator and philanthropist, was born at Galesburg, Ill., July 31, 1837; graduated at Knox Seminary in 1854 and taught until 1873, when she was elected County Superintendent of Schools, serving nine years. She took an active and influential interest in educational and reformatory movements, was for two years editor of "Our Home Monthly," in Philadelphia, and also a contributor to other journals, besides being editor-in-chief of "The Union Signal," Chicago, the organ of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union—in which she held the position of President; was also President, in the latter days of her life, of the Illinois Woman's Press Association of Chicago, that city having become her home in 1885. In 1892, Miss West started on a tour of the world for the benefit of her health, but died at Tokio, Japan, Dec. 1, 1892.

WESTERN HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE, an institution for the treatment of the insane, located at Watertown, Rock Island County, in accordance with an act of the General Assembly, approved, May 22, 1895. The Thirty-ninth General Assembly made an appropriation of $100,000 for the erection of fire-proof buildings, while Rock Island County donated a tract of 400 acres of land valued at $40,000. The site selected by the Commissioners, is a commanding one overlooking the Mississippi River, eight miles above Rock Island, and five and a half miles from Moline, and the buildings are of the most modern style of construction. Watertown is reached by two lines of railroad—the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul and the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy—besides the Mississippi River. The erection of buildings was begun in 1896, and they were opened for the reception of patients in 1898. They have a capacity for 800 patients.

WESTERN MILITARY ACADEMY, an institution located at Upper Alton, Madison County, incorporated in 1892; has a faculty of eight members and reports eighty pupils for 1897-98, with property valued at $70,000. The institution gives instruction in literary and scientific branches, besides preparatory and business courses.

WESTERN NORMAL COLLEGE, located at Bushnell, McDonough County; incorporated in 1888. It is co-educational, has a corps of twelve instructors and reported 500 pupils for 1897-98, 300 males and 200 females.

WESTERN SPRINGS, a village of Cook County, and residence suburb of the city of Chicago, on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, 15 miles west of the initial station. Population (1890), 451; (1900), 662.

WESTERN THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, located in Chicago and controlled by the Protestant Episcopal Church. It was founded in 1883 through the munificence of Dr. Tolman Wheeler, and was opened for students two years later. It has two buildings, of a superior order of architecture—one including the school and lecture rooms and the other a dormitory. A hospital and gymnasium are attached to the latter, and a school for boys is conducted on the first floor of the main building, which is known as Wheeler Hall. The institution is under the general supervision of Rt. Rev. William E. McLaren, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the Diocese of Illinois.

WESTFIELD, village of Clark County, on Cin., Ham. & Dayton R. R., 10 m. s.-e. of Charleston; seat of Westfield College; has a bank, five churches and two newspapers. Pop. (1900), 820.

WEST SALEM, a town of Edwards County, on the Peoria-Evansville Div. Ill. Cent. R. R., 12 miles northeast of Albion; has a bank and a weekly paper. Pop. (1890), 476; (1900), 700.

WETHERELL, Emma Abbott, vocalist, was born in Chicago, Dec. 9, 1849; in her childhood attracted attention while singing with her father (a poor musician) in hotels and on the streets in Chicago, Peoria and elsewhere; at 18 years of age, went to New York to study, earning her way by giving concerts en route, and receiving aid and encouragement from Clara Louisa Kellogg; in New York was patronized by Henry Ward Beecher and others, and aided in securing the training of European masters. Compelled to surmount many obstacles from poverty and other causes, her after success in her profession was phenomenal. Died, during a professional tour, at Salt Lake City, Jan. 5, 1891. Miss Abbott married her manager, Eugene Wetherell, who died before her.

WHEATON, a city and the county-seat of Du Page County, situated on the Chicago & Northwestern Railway, 25 miles west of Chicago. Agriculture and stock-raising are the chief industries in the surrounding region. The city owns a new water-works plant (costing $60,000) and has a public library valued at $75,000, the gift of a resident, Mr. John Quincy Adams; has a court house, electric light plant, sewerage and drainage system, seven churches, three graded schools, four weekly newspapers and a State bank. Wheaton is the seat of Wheaton College (which see). Population (1880), 1,160; (1890), 1,622; (1900), 2,345.

WHEATON COLLEGE, an educational institution located at Wheaton, Du Page County, and under Congregational control. It was founded in 1853, as the Illinois Institute, and was chartered under its present name in 1860. Its early existence was one of struggle, but of late years it has been established on a better foundation, in 1898 having $54,000 invested in productive funds, and property aggregating $136,000. The faculty comprises fifteen professors, and, in 1898, there were 321 students in attendance. It is co-educational and instruction is given in business and preparatory studies, as well as the fine arts, music and classical literature.

WHEELER, David Hilton, D.D., LL.D., clergyman, was born at Ithaca, N. Y., Nov. 19, 1829; graduated at Rock River Seminary, Mount Morris, in 1851; edited "The Carroll County Republican" and held a professorship in Cornell College, Iowa, (1857-61); was United States Consul at Geneva, Switzerland, (1861-66); Professor of English Literature in Northwestern University (1867-75); edited "The Methodist" in New York, seven years, and was President of Allegheny College (1883-87); received the degree of D.D. from Cornell College in 1867, and that of LL.D. from the Northwestern University in 1881. He is the author of "Brigandage in South Italy"

(two volumes, 1864) and "By-Ways of Literature" (1883), besides some translations.

WHEELER, Hamilton K., ex-Congressman, was born at Ballston, N. Y., August 5, 1848, but emigrated with his parents to Illinois in 1852; remained on a farm until 19 years of age, his educational advantages being limited to three months' attendance upon a district school each year. In 1871, he was admitted to the bar at Kankakee, where he has since continued to practice. In 1884 he was elected to represent the Sixteenth District in the State Senate, where he served on many important committees, being Chairman of that on the Judicial Department. In 1892 he was elected Representative in Congress from the Ninth Illinois District, on the Republican ticket.

WHEELING, a town on the northern border of Cook County, on the Wisconsin Central Railway. Population (1890), 811; (1900), 331.

WHISTLER, (Maj.) John, soldier and builder of the first Fort Dearborn, was born in Ulster, Ireland, about 1756; served under Burgoyne in the Revolution, and was with the force surrendered by that officer at Saratoga, in 1777. After the peace he returned to the United States, settled at Hagerstown, Md., and entered the United States Army, serving at first in the ranks and being severely wounded in the disastrous Indian campaigns of 1791. Later, he was promoted to a captaincy and, in the summer of 1803, sent with his company, to the head of Lake Michigan, where he constructed the first Fort Dearborn within the limits of the present city of Chicago, remaining in command until 1811, when he was succeeded by Captain Heald. He received the brevet rank of Major, in 1815 was appointed military store-keeper at Newport, Ky., and afterwards at Jefferson Barracks, near St. Louis, where he died, Sept. 3, 1829. Lieut. William Whistler, his son, who was with his father, for a time, in old Fort Dearborn—but transferred, in 1809, to Fort Wayne—was of the force included in Hull's surrender at Detroit in 1812. After his exchange he was promoted to a captaincy, to the rank of Major in 1826 and to a Lieutenant-Colonelcy in 1845, dying at Newport, Ky., in 1863. James Abbott McNeil Whistler, the celebrated, but eccentric artist of that name, is a grandson of the first Major Whistler.

WHITE, George E., ex-Congressman, was born in Massachusetts in 1848; after graduating, at the age of 16, he enlisted as a private in the Fifty-seventh Massachusetts Veteran Volunteers, serving under General Grant in the campaign against Richmond from the battle of the Wilderness until the surrender of Lee. Having taken a course in a commercial college at Worcester, Mass., in 1867 he came to Chicago, securing employment in a lumber yard, but a year later began business on his own account, which he has successfully conducted. In 1878 he was elected to the State Senate, as a Republican, from one of the Chicago Districts, and re-elected four years later, serving in that body eight years. He declined a nomination for Congress in 1884, but accepted in 1894, and was elected for the Fifth District, as he was again in 1896, but was defeated, in 1898, by Edward T. Noonan, Democrat.

WHITE, Horace, journalist, was born at Colebrook, N. H., August 10, 1834; in 1853 graduated at Beloit College, Wis., whither his father had removed in 1837; engaged in journalism as city editor of "The Chicago Evening Journal," later becoming agent of the Associated Press, and, in 1857, an editorial writer on "The Chicago Tribune," during a part of the war acting as its Washington correspondent. He also served, in 1856, as Assistant Secretary of the Kansas National Committee, and, later, as Secretary of the Republican State Central Committee. In 1864 he purchased an interest in "The Tribune," a year or so later becoming editor-in-chief, but retired in October, 1874. After a protracted European tour, he united with Carl Schurz and E. L. Godkin of "The Nation," in the purchase and reorganization of "The New York Evening Post," of which he is now editor-in-chief.

WHITE, Julius, soldier, was born in Cazenovia, N. Y., Sept. 29, 1816; removed to Illinois in 1836, residing there and in Wisconsin, where he was a member of the Legislature of 1849; in 1861 was made Collector of Customs at Chicago, but resigned to assume the colonelcy of the Thirty-seventh Illinois Volunteers, which he commanded on the Fremont expedition to Southwest Missouri. He afterwards served with General Curtiss in Arkansas, participated in the battle of Pea Ridge and was promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General. He was subsequently assigned to the Department of the Shenandoah, but finding his position at Martinsburg, W. Va., untenable, retired to Harper's Ferry, voluntarily serving under Colonel Miles, his inferior in command. When this post was surrendered (Sept. 15, 1862), he was made a prisoner, but released under parole; was tried by a court of inquiry at his own request, and acquitted, the court finding that he had acted with courage and capability.

He resigned in 1864, and, in March, 1865, was brevetted Major-General of Volunteers. Died, at Evanston, May 12, 1890.

WHITE COUNTY, situated in the southeastern quarter of the State, and bounded on the east by the Wabash River; was organized in 1816, being the tenth county organized during the Territorial period: area, 500 square miles. The county is crossed by three railroads and drained by the Wabash and Little Wabash Rivers. The surface consists of prairie and woodland, and the soil is, for the most part, highly productive. The principal agricultural products are corn, wheat, oats, potatoes, tobacco, fruit, butter, sorghum and wool. The principal industrial establishments are carriage factories, saw mills and flour mills. Carmi is the county-seat. Other towns are Enfield, Grayville and Norris City. Population (1880), 23,087; (1890), 25,005; (1900), 25,386.

WHITEHALL, a city in Greene County, at the intersection of the Chicago & Alton and the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroads, 65 miles north of St. Louis and 24 miles south-southwest of Jacksonville; in rich farming region; has stoneware and sewer-pipe factories, foundry and machine shop, flour mill, elevators, wagon shops, creamery, water system, sanitarium, heating, electric light and power system, nurseries and fruit-supply houses, and two poultry packing houses; also has five churches, a graded school, two banks and three newspapers—one daily. Population (1890), 1,961; (1900), 2,030.

WHITEHOUSE, Henry John, Protestant Episcopal Bishop, was born in New York City, August 19, 1803; graduated from Columbia College in 1821, and from the (New York) General Theological Seminary in 1824. After ordination he was rector of various parishes in Pennsylvania and New York until 1851, when he was chosen Assistant Bishop of Illinois, succeeding Bishop Chase in 1852. In 1867, by invitation of the Archbishop of Canterbury, he delivered the opening sermon before the Pan-Anglican Conference held in England. During this visit he received the degree of D.D. from Oxford University, and that of LL.D. from Cambridge. His rigid views as a churchman and a disciplinarian, were illustrated in his prosecution of Rev. Charles Edward Cheney, which resulted in the formation of the Reformed Episcopal Church. He was a brilliant orator and a trenchant and unyielding controversialist. Died, in Chicago, August 10, 1874.

WHITESIDE COUNTY, in the northwestern portion of the State bordering on the Mississippi River; created by act of the Legislature passed in 1836, and named for Capt. Samuel Whiteside, a noted Indian fighter; area, 700 square miles. The surface is level, diversified by prairies and woodland, and the soil is extremely fertile. The county-seat was first fixed at Lyndon, then at Sterling, and finally at Morrison, its present location. The Rock River crosses the county and furnishes abundant water power for numerous factories, turning out agricultural implements, carriages and wagons, furniture, woolen goods, flour and wrapping paper. There are also distilling and brewing interests, besides saw and planing mills. Corn is the staple agricultural product, although all the leading cereals are extensively grown. The principal towns are Morrison, Sterling, Fulton and Rock Falls. Population (1880), 30,885; (1890), 30,854; (1900), 34,710.

WHITESIDE, William, pioneer and soldier of the Revolution, emigrated from the frontier of North Carolina to Kentucky, and thence, in 1793, to the present limits of Monroe County, Ill., erecting a fort between Cahokia and Kaskaskia, which became widely known as "Whiteside Station." He served as a Justice of the Peace, and was active in organizing the militia during the War of 1812-14, dying at the old Station in 1815.—John (Whiteside), a brother of the preceding, and also a Revolutionary soldier, came to Illinois at the same time, as also did William B. and Samuel, sons of the two brothers, respectively. All of them became famous as Indian fighters. The two latter served as Captains of companies of "Rangers" in the War of 1812, Samuel taking part in the battle of Rock Island in 1814, and contributing greatly to the success of the day. During the Black Hawk War (1832) he attained the rank of Brigadier-General. Whiteside County was named in his honor. He made one of the earliest improvements in Ridge Prairie, a rich section of Madison County, and represented that county in the First General Assembly. William B. served as Sheriff of Madison County for a number of years.—John D. (Whiteside), another member of this historic family, became very prominent, serving in the lower House of the Seventh, Eighth, Ninth and Fourteenth General Assemblies, and in the Senate of the Tenth, from Monroe County; was a Presidential Elector in 1836, State Treasurer (1837-41) and a member of the State Constitutional Convention of 1847. General Whiteside, as he was known, was the second of James Shields in the famous Shields and Lincoln duel (so-called) in 1842, and, as such, carried the challenge of the former to Mr. Lincoln. (See Duels.)

WHITING, Lorenzo D., legislator, was born in Wayne County, N. Y., Nov. 17, 1819; came to Illinois in 1838, but did not settle there permanently until 1849, when he located in Bureau County. He was a Representative from that county in the Twenty-sixth General Assembly (1869), and a member of the Senate continuously from 1871 to 1887, serving in the latter through eight General Assemblies. Died at his home near Tiskilwa, Bureau County, Ill., Oct. 10, 1889.

WHITING, Richard H., Congressman, was born at West Hartford, Conn., June 17, 1826, and received a common school education. In 1862 he was commissioned Paymaster in the Volunteer Army of the Union, and resigned in 1866. Having removed to Illinois, he was appointed Assistant Assessor of Internal Revenue for the Fifth Illinois District, in February, 1870, and so continued until the abolition of the office in 1873. On retiring from the Assessorship he was appointed Collector of Internal Revenue, and served until March 4, 1875, when he resigned to take his seat as Republican Representative in Congress from the Peoria District, to which he had been elected in November, 1874. After the expiration of his term he held no public office, but was a member of the Republican National Convention of 1884. Died, at the Continental Hotel, in New York City, May 24, 1888.

WHITNEY, James W., pioneer lawyer and early teacher, known by the nickname of "Lord Coke"; came to Illinois in Territorial days (believed to have been about 1800); resided for some time at or near Edwardsville, then became a teacher at Atlas, Pike County, and, still later, the first Circuit and County Clerk of that county. Though nominally a lawyer, he had little if any practice. He acquired the title, by which he was popularly known for a quarter of a century, by his custom of visiting the State Capital, during the sessions of the General Assembly, when he would organize the lobbyists and visitors about the capital—of which there were an unusual number in those days—into what was called the "Third House." Having been regularly chosen to preside under the name of "Speaker of the Lobby," he would deliver a message full of practical hits and jokes, aimed at members of the two houses and others, which would be received with cheers and laughter. The meetings of the "Third House," being held in the evening, were attended by many members and visitors in lieu of other forms of entertainment. Mr. Whitney's home, in his latter years, was at Pittsfield. He resided for a time at Quincy. Died, Dec. 13, 1860, aged over 80 years.

WHITEMORE, Floyd K., State Treasurer, is a native of New York, came at an early age, with his parents, to Sycamore, Ill., where he was educated in the high school there. He purposed becoming a lawyer, but, on the election of the late James H. Beveridge State Treasurer, in 1864, accepted the position of clerk in the office. Later, he was employed as a clerk in the banking house of Jacob Bunn in Springfield, and, on the organization of the State National Bank, was chosen cashier of that Institution, retaining the position some twenty years. After the appointment of Hon. John R. Tanner to the position of Assistant Treasurer of the United States, at Chicago, in 1892, Mr. Whitmore became cashier in that office, and, in 1865, Assistant State Treasurer under the administration of State Treasurer Henry Wulff. In 1898 he was elected State Treasurer, receiving a plurality of 43,450 over his Democratic opponent.

WICKERSHAM, (Col.) Dudley, soldier and merchant, was born in Woodford County, Ky., Nov. 22, 1819; came to Springfield, Ill., in 1843, and served as a member of the Fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteers (Col. E. D. Baker's) through the Mexican War. On the return of peace he engaged in the dry-goods trade in Springfield, until 1861, when he enlisted in the Tenth Regiment Illinois Cavalry, serving, first as Lieutenant-Colonel and then as Colonel, until May, 1864, when, his regiment having been consolidated with the Fifteenth Cavalry, he resigned. After the war, he held the office of Assessor of Internal Revenue for several years, after which he engaged in the grocery trade. Died, in Springfield, August 8, 1898.

WIDEN, Raphael, pioneer and early legislator, was a native of Sweden, who, having been taken to France at eight years of age, was educated for a Catholic priest. Coming to the United States in 1815, he was at Cahokia, Ill., in 1818, where, during the same year, he married into a French family of that place. He served in the House of Representatives from Randolph County, in the Second and Third General Assemblies (1820-24), and as Senator in the Fourth and Fifth (1824-28). During his last term in the House, he was one of those who voted against the pro-slavery Convention resolution. He died of cholera, at Kaskaskia, in 1833.

WIKE, Scott, lawyer and ex-Congressman, was born at Meadville, Pa., April 6, 1834; at 4 years of age removed with his parents to Quincy, Ill., and, in 1844, to Pike County. Having graduated from Lombard University, Galesburg, in 1857, he began reading law with Judge O. C. Skinner of Quincy. He was admitted to the bar in 1858, but, before commencing practice, spent a year at Harvard Law School, graduating there in 1859. Immediately thereafter he opened an office at Pittsfield, Ill., and has resided there ever since. In politics he has always been a strong Democrat. He served two terms in the Legislature (1863-67) and, in 1874, was chosen Representative from his District in Congress, being re-elected in 1888 and, again, in 1890. In 1893 he was appointed by President Cleveland Third Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, which position he continued to fill until March, 1897, when he resumed the practice of law at Pittsfield. Died Jan. 15, 1901.

WILEY, (Col.) Benjamin Ladd, soldier, was born in Smithfield, Jefferson County, Ohio, March 25, 1821, came to Illinois in 1845 and began life at Vienna, Johnson County, as a teacher. In 1846 he enlisted for the Mexican War, as a member of the Fifth (Colonel Newby's) Regiment Illinois Volunteers, serving chiefly in New Mexico until mustered out in 1848. A year later he removed to Jonesboro, where he spent some time at the carpenter's trade, after which he became clerk in a store, meanwhile assisting to edit "The Jonesboro Gazette" until 1853; then became traveling salesman for a St. Louis firm, but later engaged in the hardware trade at Jonesboro, in which he continued for several years. In 1856 he was the Republican candidate for Congress for the Ninth District, receiving 4,000 votes, while Fremont, the Republican candidate for President, received only 825 in the same district. In 1857 he opened a real estate office in Jonesboro in conjunction with David L. Phillips and Col. J. W. Ashley, with which he was connected until 1860, when he removed to Makanda, Jackson County. In September, 1861, he was mustered in as Lieutenant-Colonel of the Fifth Illinois Cavalry, later serving in Missouri and Arkansas under Generals Steele and Curtis, being, a part of the time, in command of the First Brigade of Cavalry, and, in the advance on Vicksburg, having command of the right wing of General Grant's cavalry. Being disabled by rheumatism at the end of the siege, he tendered his resignation, and was immediately appointed Enrolling Officer at Cairo, serving in this capacity until May, 1865, when he was mustered out. In 1869 he was appointed by Governor Palmer one of the Commissioners to locate the Southern Illinois Hospital for the Insane, and served as Secretary of the Board until the institution was opened at Anna, in May, 1871. In 1869 he was defeated as a candidate for County Judge of Jackson County, and, in 1872, for the State Senate, by a small majority in a strongly Democratic District; in 1876 was the Republican candidate for Congress, in the Eighteenth District, against William Hartzell, but was defeated by only twenty votes, while carrying six out of the ten counties comprising the District. In the latter years of his life, Colonel Wiley was engaged quite extensively in fruit-growing at Makanda, Jackson County, where he died, March 22, 1890.

WILKIE, Franc Bangs, journalist, was born in Saratoga County, N. Y., July 2, 1830; took a partial course at Union College, after which he edited papers at Schenectady, N. Y., Elgin, Ill., and Davenport and Dubuque, Iowa; also serving, during a part of the Civil War, as the western war correspondent of "The New York Times." In 1863 he became an editorial writer on "The Chicago Times," remaining with that paper, with the exception of a brief interval, until 1888—a part of the time as its European correspondent. He was the author of a series of sketches over the nom de plume of "Poliuto," and of a volume of reminiscences under the title, "Thirty-five Years of Journalism," published shortly before his death, which took place, April 12, 1892.

WILKIN, Jacob W., Justice of the Supreme Court, was born in Licking County, Ohio, June 7, 1837; removed with his parents to Illinois, at 12 years of age, and was educated at McKendree College; served three years in the War for the Union; studied law with Judge Scholfield and was admitted to the bar in 1866. In 1872, he was chosen Presidential Elector on the Republican ticket, and, in 1879, elected Judge of the Circuit Court and re-elected in 1885—the latter year being assigned to the Appellate bench for the Fourth District, where he remained until his election to the Supreme bench in 1888, being re-elected to the latter office in 1897. His home is at Danville.

WILKINSON, Ira O., lawyer and Judge, was born in Virginia in 1822, and accompanied his father to Jacksonville (1835), where he was educated. During a short service as Deputy Clerk of Morgan County, he conceived a fondness for the profession of the law, and, after a course of study under Judge William Thomas, was admitted to practice in 1847. Richard Yates (afterwards Governor and Senator) was his first partner. In 1845 he removed to Rock Island, and, six years later, was elected a Circuit Judge, being again chosen to the same position in 1861. At the expiration of his second term he removed to Chicago. Died, at Jacksonville, August 24, 1894.

WILKINSON, John P., early merchant, was born, Dec. 14, 1790, in New Kent County, Va., emigrated first to Kentucky, and, in 1828, settled in Jacksonville, Ill., where he engaged in mercantile business. Mr. Wilkinson was a liberal friend of Illinois College and Jacksonville Female Academy, of each of which he was a Trustee from their origin until his death, which occurred, during a business visit to St. Louis, in December, 1841.

WILL, Conrad, pioneer physician and early legislator, was born in Philadelphia, June 4, 1778; about 1804 removed to Somerset County Pa., and, in 1813, to Kaskaskia, Ill. He was a physician by profession, but having leased the saline lands on the Big Muddy, in the vicinity of what afterwards became the town of Brownsville, he engaged in the manufacture of salt, removing thither in 1815, and becoming one of the founders of Brownsville, afterwards the first county-seat of Jackson County. On the organization of Jackson County, in 1816, he became a member of the first Board of County Commissioners, and, in 1818, served as Delegate from that county in the Convention which framed the first State Constitution. Thereafter he served continuously as a member of the Legislature from 1818 to '34—first as Senator in the First General Assembly, then as Representative in the Second, Third, Fourth and Fifth, and again as Senator in the Sixth, Seventh, Eighth and Ninth—his career being conspicuous for long service. He died in office, June 11, 1834. Dr. Will was short of stature, fleshy, of jovial disposition and fond of playing practical jokes upon his associates, but very popular, as shown by his successive elections to the Legislature. He has been called "The Father of Jackson County." Will County, organized by act of the Legislature two years after his death, was named in his honor.

WILL COUNTY, a northeastern county, embracing 850 square miles, named in honor of Dr. Conrad Will, an early politician and legislator. Early explorations of the territory were made in 1829, when white settlers were few. The bluff west of Joliet is said to have been first occupied by David and Benjamin Maggard. Joseph Smith, the Mormon "apostle," expounded his peculiar doctrines at "the Point" in 1831. Several of the early settlers fled from the country during (or after) a raid by the Sac Indians.

There is a legend, seemingly well supported, to the effect that the first lumber, sawed to build the first frame house in Chicago (that of P. F. W. Peck), was sawed at Plainfield. Will County, originally a part of Cook, was separately erected in 1836, Joliet being made the county-seat. Agriculture, quarrying and manufacturing are the chief industries. Joliet, Lockport and Wilmington are the principal towns. Population (1880), 53,422; (1890), 62,007; (1900), 74,764.

WILLARD, Frances Elizabeth, teacher and reformer, was born at Churchville, N. Y., Sept. 28, 1839, graduated from the Northwestern Female College at Evanston, Ill., in 1859, and, in 1862, accepted the Professorship of Natural Sciences in that institution. During 1866-67 she was the Principal of the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary. The next two years she devoted to travel and study abroad, meanwhile contributing to various periodicals. From 1871 to 1874 she was Professor of Æsthetics in the Northwestern University and dean of the Woman's College. She was always an enthusiastic champion of temperance, and, in 1874, abandoned her profession to identify herself with the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. For five years she was Corresponding Secretary of the national body, and, from 1879, its President. While Secretary she organized the Home Protective Association, and prepared a petition to the Illinois Legislature, to which nearly 200,000 names were attached, asking for the granting to women of the right to vote on the license question. In 1878 she succeeded her brother, Oliver A. Willard (who had died), as editor of "The Chicago Evening Post," but, a few months later, withdrew, and, in 1882, was elected as a member of the executive committee of the National Prohibition party. In 1886 she became leader of the White Cross Movement for the protection of women, and succeeded in securing favorable legislation, in this direction, in twelve States. In 1883 she founded the World's Christian Temperance Union, and, in 1888, was chosen its President, as also President of the International Council of Women. The latter years of her life were spent chiefly abroad, much of the time as the guest and co-worker of Lady Henry Somerset, of England, during which she devoted much attention to investigating the condition of women in the Orient. Miss Willard was a prolific and highly valued contributor to the magazines, and (besides numerous pamphlets) published several volumes, including "Nineteen Beautiful Years" (a tribute to her sister); "Woman in Temperance"; "How to Win," and

"Woman in the Pulpit." Died, in New York, Feb. 18, 1898.

WILLARD, Samuel, A.M., M.D., LL.D., physician and educator, was born in Lunenburg, Vt., Dec. 30, 1821—the lineal descendant of Maj. Simon Willard, one of the founders of Concord, Mass., and prominent in "King Philip's War," and of his son, Rev. Dr. Samuel Willard, of the Old South Church, Boston, and seventh President of Harvard College. The subject of this sketch was taken in his infancy to Boston, and, in 1831, to Carrollton, Ill., where his father pursued the avocation of a druggist. After a preparatory course at Shurtleff College, Upper Alton, in 1836 he entered the freshman class in Illinois College at Jacksonville, but withdrew the following year, re-entering college in 1840 and graduating in the class of 1843, as a classmate of Dr. Newton Bateman, afterwards State Superintendent of Public Instruction and President of Knox College, and Rev. Thomas K. Beecher, now of Elmira, N. Y. The next year he spent as Tutor in Illinois College, when he began the study of medicine at Quincy, graduating from the Medical Department of Illinois College in 1848. During a part of the latter year he edited a Free-Soil campaign paper ("The Tribune") at Quincy, and, later, "The Western Temperance Magazine" at the same place. In 1849 he began the practice of his profession at St. Louis, but the next year removed to Collinsville, Ill., remaining until 1857, when he took charge of the Department of Languages in the newly organized State Normal University at Normal. The second year of the Civil War (1862) he enlisted as a private in the Ninety-seventh Illinois Volunteer Infantry, but was soon after commissioned as Surgeon with the rank of Major, participating in the campaigns in Tennessee and in the first attack upon Vicksburg. Being disabled by an attack of paralysis, in February, 1863, he was compelled to resign, when he had sufficiently recovered accepting a position in the office of Provost Marshal General Oakes, at Springfield, where he remained until the close of the war. He then became Grand Secretary of the Independent Order of Odd-Fellows for the State of Illinois—a position which he had held from 1856 to 1862—remaining under his second appointment from 1865 to '69. The next year he served as Superintendent of Schools at Springfield, meanwhile assisting in founding the Springfield public library, and serving as its first librarian. In 1870 he accepted the professorship of History in the West Side High School of Chicago, which, with the exception of two years (1884-86), he continued to occupy for more than twenty-five years, retiring in 1898. In the meantime, Dr. Willard has been a laborious literary worker, having been, for a considerable period, editor, or assistant-editor, of "The Illinois Teacher," a contributor to "The Century Magazine" and "The Dial" of Chicago, besides having published a "Digest of the Laws of Odd Fellowship" in sixteen volumes, begun while he was Grand Secretary of the Order in 1864, and continued in 1872 and '82; a "Synopsis of History and Historical Chart," covering the period from B. C. 800 to A. D. 1876—of which he has had a second edition in course of preparation. Of late years he has been engaged upon a "Historical Dictionary of Names and Places," which will include some 12,000 topics, and which promises to be the most important work of his life. Previous to the war he was an avowed Abolitionist and operator on the "Underground Railroad," who made no concealment of his opinions, and, on one or two occasions, was called to answer for them in prosecutions under the "Fugitive Slave Act." (See "Underground Railroad.") His friend and classmate, the late Dr. Bateman, says of him: "Dr. Willard is a sound thinker; a clear and forcible writer; of broad and accurate scholarship; conscientious, genial and kindly, and a most estimable gentleman."

WILLIAMS, Archibald, lawyer and jurist, was born in Montgomery County, Ky., June 10, 1801; with moderate advantages but natural fondness for study, he chose the profession of law, and was admitted to the bar in Tennessee in 1828, coming to Quincy, Ill., the following year. He was elected to the General Assembly three times—serving in the Senate in 1832-36, and in the House, 1836-40; was United States District Attorney for the Southern District of Illinois, by appointment of President Taylor, 1849-53; was twice the candidate of his party (the Whig) for United States Senator, and appointed by President Lincoln, in 1861, United States District Judge for the State of Kansas. His abilities and high character were widely recognized. Died, in Quincy, Sept. 21, 1863—His son, John H., an attorney at Quincy, served as Judge of the Circuit Court 1879-85.—Another son, Abraham Lincoln, was twice elected Attorney-General of Kansas.

WILLIAMS, Erastus Smith, lawyer and jurist, was born at Salem, N. Y., May 22, 1821. In 1842 he removed to Chicago, where, after reading law, he was admitted to the bar in 1844. In 1854 he was appointed Master in Chancery, which office he filled until 1863, when he was elected a Judge of the Circuit Court of Cook County. After re-election in 1870 he became Chief Justice, and, at the same time, heard most of the cases on the equity side of the court. In 1879 he was a candidate for re-election as a Republican, but was defeated with the party ticket. After his retirement from the bench he resumed private practice. Died, Feb. 24, 1884.

WILLIAMS, James R., Congressman, was born in White County, Ill., Dec. 27, 1850, at the age of 25 graduated from the Indiana State University, at Bloomington, and, in 1876, from the Union College of Law, Chicago, since then being an active and successful practitioner at Carmi. In 1880 he was appointed Master in Chancery and served two years. From 1882 to 1886 he was County Judge. In 1892 he was a nominee on the Democratic ticket for Presidential Elector. He was elected to represent the Nineteenth Illinois District in the Fifty-first Congress at a special election held to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of R. W. Townsend, was re-elected in 1890 and 1892, but defeated by Orlando Burrell (Republican) for re-election in the newly organized Twentieth District in 1894. In 1898 he was again a candidate and elected to the Fifty-sixth Congress.

WILLIAMS, John, pioneer merchant, was born in Bath County, Ky., Sept. 11, 1808; between 14 and 16 years of age was clerk in a store in his native State; then, joining his parents, who had settled on a tract of land in a part of Sangamon (now Menard) County, Ill., he found employment as clerk in the store of Major Elijah Iles, at Springfield, whom he succeeded in business at the age of 22, continuing it without interruption until 1880. In 1856 Mr. Williams was the Republican candidate for Congress in the Springfield District, and, in 1861, was appointed Commissary-General for the State, rendering valuable service in furnishing supplies for State troops, in camps of instruction and while proceeding to the field, in the first years of the war; was also chief officer of the Illinois Sanitary Commission for two years, and, as one of the intimate personal friends of Mr. Lincoln, was chosen to accompany the remains of the martyred President, from Washington to Springfield, for burial. Liberal, enterprising and public-spirited, his name was associated with nearly every public enterprise of importance in Springfield during his business career—being one of the founders, and, for eleven years President, of the First National Bank; a chief promoter in the construction of what is now the Springfield Division of the Illinois Central Railroad, and the Springfield and Peoria line; a Director of the Springfield Iron Company; one of the Commissioners who constructed the Springfield water-works, and an officer of the Lincoln Monument Association, from 1865 to his death, May 29, 1890.

WILLIAMS, Norman, lawyer, was born at Woodstock, Vt., Feb. 1, 1833, being related, on both the paternal and maternal sides, to some of the most prominent families of New England. He fitted for college at Union Academy, Meriden, and graduated from the University of Vermont in the class of 1855. After taking a course in the Albany Law School and with a law firm in his native town, he was admitted to practice in both New York and Vermont, removed to Chicago in 1858, and, in 1860, became a member of the firm of King, Kales & Williams, still later forming a partnership with Gen. John L. Thompson, which ended with the death of the latter in 1888. In a professional capacity he assisted in the organization of the Pullman Palace Car Company, and was a member of its Board of Directors; also assisted in organizing the Western Electric Company, and was prominently identified with the Chicago Telephone Company and the Western Union Telegraph Company. In 1881 he served as the United States Commissioner to the Electrical Exposition at Paris. In conjunction with his brother (Edward H. Williams) he assisted in founding the public library at Woodstock, Vt., which, in honor of his father, received the name of "The Norman Williams Public Library." With Col. Huntington W. Jackson and J. McGregor Adams, Mr. Williams was named, in the will of the late John Crerar, as an executor of the Crerar estate and one of the Trustees of the Crerar Public Library, and became its first President; was also a Director of the Chicago Public Library, and trustee of a number of large estates. Mr. Williams was a son-in-law of the late Judge John D. Caton, and his oldest daughter became the wife of Major-General Wesley Merritt, a few months before his death, which occurred at Hampton Beach, N. H., June 19, 1899—his remains being interred in his native town of Woodstock, Vt.

WILLIAMS, Robert Ebenezer, lawyer, born Dec. 3, 1825, at Clarksville, Pa., his grandfathers on both sides being soldiers of the Revolutionary War. In 1830 his parents removed to Washington in the same State, where in boyhood he worked as a mechanic in his father's shop, attending a common school in the winter until he reached the age of 17 years, when he entered Washington College, remaining for more than a year. He then began teaching, and, in 1845 went to Kentucky, where he pursued the business of a teacher for four years. Then he entered Bethany College in West Virginia, at the same time prosecuting his law studies, but left at the close of his junior year, when, having been licensed to practice, he removed to Clinton, Texas. Here he accepted, from a retired lawyer, the loan of a law library, which he afterwards purchased; served for two years as State's Attorney, and, in 1856, came to Bloomington, Ill., where he spent the remainder of his life in the practice of his profession. Much of his time was devoted to practice as a railroad attorney, especially in connection with the Chicago & Alton and the Illinois Central Railroads, in which he acquired prominence and wealth. He was a lifelong Democrat and, in 1868, was the unsuccessful candidate of his party for Attorney-General of the State. The last three years of his life he had been in bad health, dying at Bloomington, Feb. 15, 1899.

WILLIAMS, Samuel, Bank President, was born in Adams County, Ohio, July 11, 1820; came to Winnebago County, Ill., in 1835, and, in 1842, removed to Iroquois County, where he held various local offices, including that of County Judge, to which he was elected in 1861. During his later years he had been President of the Watseka Citizens' Bank. Died, June 16, 1896.

WILLIAMSON, Rollin Samuel, legislator and jurist, was born at Cornwall, Vt., May 23, 1839. At the age of 14 he went to Boston, where he began life as a telegraph messenger boy. In two years he had become a skillful operator, and, as such, was employed in various offices in New England and New York. In 1857 he came to Chicago seeking employment and, through the fortunate correction of an error on the part of the receiver of a message, secured the position of operator and station agent at Palatine, Cook County. Here he read law during his leisure time without a preceptor, and, in 1870, was admitted to the bar. The same year he was elected to the lower House of the General Assembly and, in 1872, to the Senate. In 1880 he was elected to the bench of the Superior Court of Cook County, and, in 1887, was chosen a Judge of the Cook County Circuit Court. Died, August 10, 1889.

WILLIAMSON COUNTY, in the southern part of the State, originally set off from Franklin and organized in 1839. The county is well watered, the principal streams being the Big Muddy and the South Fork of the Saline. The surface is undulating and the soil fertile. The region was originally well covered with forests. All the cereals (as well as potatoes) are cultivated, and rich meadows encourage stock-raising. Coal and sandstone underlie the entire county. Area, 440 square miles; population (1880), 19,324; (1890) 22,226; (1900), 27,796.

WILLIAMSVILLE, village of Sangamon County, on Chicago & Alton Railroad, 12 miles north of Springfield; has a bank, elevator, 3 churches, a newspaper and coal-mines. Pop. (1900), 573.

WILLIS, Jonathan Clay, soldier and former Railroad and Warehouse Commissioner, was born in Sumner County, Tenn., June 27, 1826; brought to Gallatin County, Ill., in 1834, and settled at Golconda in 1843; was elected Sheriff of Pope County in 1856, removed to Metropolis in 1859, and engaged in the wharf-boat and commission business. He entered the service as Quartermaster of the Forty-eighth Illinois Volunteers in 1861, but was compelled to resign on account of injuries, in 1863; was elected Representative in the Twenty-sixth General Assembly (1868), appointed Collector of Internal Revenue in 1869, and Railway and Warehouse Commissioner in 1892, as the successor of John R. Tanner, serving until 1893.

WILMETTE, a village in Cook County, 14 miles north of Chicago, on the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad, a handsome suburb of Chicago on the shore of Lake Michigan; principal streets paved and shaded with fine forest trees; has public library and good schools. Pop. (1900), 2,300.

WILMINGTON, a city of Will County, on the Kankakee River and the Chicago & Alton Railroad, 53 miles from Chicago and 15 south-south-west of Joliet; has considerable manufactures, two National banks, a graded school, churches and one newspaper. Wilmington is the location of the Illinois Soldiers' Widows' Home. Population (1890), 1,576; (1900), 1,420.

WILSON, Charles Lush, journalist, was born in Fairfield County, Conn., Oct. 10, 1818, educated in the common schools and at an academy in his native State, and, in 1835, removed to Chicago, entering the employment of his older brothers, who were connected with the construction of the Illinois & Michigan Canal at Joliet. His brother, Richard L., having assumed charge of "The Chicago Daily Journal" (the successor of "The Chicago American"), in 1844, Charles L. took a position in the office, ultimately securing a partnership, which continued until the death of his brother in 1856, when he succeeded to the ownership of the paper. Mr. Wilson was an ardent friend and supporter of Abraham Lincoln for the United States Senate in 1858, but, in 1860, favored the nomination of Mr. Seward for the Presidency, though earnestly supporting Mr. Lincoln after his nomination. In 1861 he was appointed Secretary of the American Legation at London, serving with the late Minister Charles Francis Adams, until 1864, when he resigned and resumed his connection with "The Journal." In 1875 his health began to fail, and three years later, having gone to San Antonio, Tex., in the hope of receiving benefit from a change of climate, he died in that city, March 9, 1878.—Richard Lush (Wilson), an older brother of the preceding, the first editor and publisher of "The Chicago Evening Journal," the oldest paper of consecutive publication in Chicago, was a native of New York. Coming to Chicago with his brother John L., in 1834, they soon after established themselves in business on the Illinois & Michigan Canal, then in course of construction. In 1844 he took charge of "The Chicago Daily Journal" for a publishing committee which had purchased the material of "The Chicago American," but soon after became principal proprietor. In April, 1847, while firing a salute in honor of the victory of Buena Vista, he lost an arm and was otherwise injured by the explosion of the cannon. Early in 1849, he was appointed, by President Taylor, Postmaster of the city of Chicago, but, having failed of confirmation, was compelled to retire in favor of a successor appointed by Millard Fillmore, eleven months later. Mr. Wilson published a little volume in 1842 entitled "A Trip to Santa Fe," and, a few years later, a story of travel under the title, "Short Ravelings from a Long Yarn." Died, December, 1856.—John Lush (Wilson), another brother, also a native of New York, came to Illinois in 1834, was afterwards associated with his brothers in business, being for a time business manager of "The Chicago Journal," also served one term as Sheriff of Cook County. Died, in Chicago, April 13, 1888.

WILSON, Isaac Grant, jurist, was born at Middlebury, N. Y., April 26, 1817, graduated from Brown University in 1838, and the same year came to Chicago, whither his father's family had preceded him in 1835. After reading law for two years, he entered the senior class at Cambridge (Mass.) Law School, graduating in 1841. In August of that year he opened an office at Elgin, and, for ten years "rode the circuit." In 1851 he was elected to the bench of the Thirteenth Judicial Circuit to fill a vacancy, and re-elected for a full term in 1855, and again in '61. In November of the latter year he was commissioned the first Colonel of the Fifty-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry, but resigned, a few weeks later, and resumed his place upon the bench. From 1867 to 1879 he devoted himself to private practice, which was largely in the Federal Courts. In 1879 he resumed his seat upon the bench (this time for the Twelfth Circuit), and was at once designated as one of the Judges of the Appellate Court at Chicago, of which tribunal he became Chief Justice in 1881. In 1885 he was re-elected Circuit Judge, but died, about the close of his term, at Geneva, June 8, 1891.

WILSON, James Grant, soldier and author, was born at Edinburgh, Scotland, April 28, 1832, and, when only a year old, was brought by his father, William Wilson, to America. The family settled at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., where James Grant was educated at College Hill and under private teachers. After finishing his studies he became his father's partner in business, but, in 1855, went abroad, and, shortly after his return, removed to Chicago, where he founded the first literary paper established in the Northwest. At the outbreak of the Civil War, he disposed of his journal to enlist in the Fifteenth Illinois Cavalry, of which he was commissioned Major and afterwards promoted to the colonelcy. In August, 1863, while at New Orleans, by advice of General Grant, he accepted a commission as Colonel of the Fourth Regiment United States Colored Cavalry, and was assigned, as Aid-de-camp, to the staff of the Commander of the Department of the Gulf, filling this post until April, 1865. When General Banks was relieved, Colonel Wilson was brevetted Brigadier-General and placed in command at Port Hudson, resigning in July, 1865, since which time his home has been in New York. He is best known as an author, having published numerous addresses, and being a frequent contributor to American and European magazines. Among larger works which he has written or edited are "Biographical Sketches of Illinois Officers"; "Love in Letters"; "Life of General U. S. Grant"; "Life and Letters of Fitz Greene Halleck"; "Poets and Poetry of Scotland"; "Bryant and His Friends"; and "Appleton's Cyclopaedia of American Biography."

WILSON, James Harrison, soldier and military engineer, was born near Shawneetown, Ill., Sept. 2, 1837. His grandfather, Alexander Wilson, was one of the pioneers of Illinois, and his father (Harrison Wilson) was an ensign during the War of 1812 and a Captain in the Black Hawk War. His brother (Bluford Wilson) served as Assistant Adjutant-General of Volunteers during the Civil War, and as Solicitor of the United States Treasury during the "whisky ring" prosecutions. James H. was educated in the common schools, at McKendree College, and the United States Military Academy at West Point, graduating from the latter in 1860, and being assigned to the Topographical Engineer Corps. In September, 1861, he was promoted to a First Lieutenancy, then served as Chief Topographical Engineer of the Port Royal expedition until March, 1862; was afterwards attached to the Department of the South, being present at the bombardment of Fort Pulaski; was Aid-de-camp to McClellan, and participated in the battles of South Mountain and Antietam; was made Lieutenant-Colonel of Volunteers in November, 1862; was Chief Topographical Engineer and Inspector-General of the Army of the Tennessee until October, 1863, being actively engaged in the operations around Vicksburg; was made Captain of Engineers in May, 1863, and Brigadier-General of Volunteers, Oct. 31, following. He also conducted operations preliminary to the battle of Chattanooga and Missionary Ridge, and for the relief of Knoxville. Later, he was placed in command of the Third Division of the cavalry corps of the Army of the Potomac, serving from May to August, 1864, under General Sheridan. Subsequently he was transferred to the Department of the Mississippi, where he so distinguished himself that, on April 20, 1865, he was made Major-General of Volunteers. In twenty-eight days he captured five fortified cities, twenty-three stands of colors, 288 guns and 6,820 prisoners—among the latter being Jefferson Davis. He was mustered out of the volunteer service in January, 1866, and, on July 28, following, was commissioned Lieutenant-Colonel of the Thirty-fifth United States Infantry, being also brevetted Major-General in the regular army. On Dec. 31, 1870, he returned to civil life, and was afterwards largely engaged in railroad and engineering operations, especially in West Virginia. Promptly after the declaration of war with Spain (1898) General Wilson was appointed, by the President, Major-General of Volunteers, serving until its close. He is the author of "China: Travels and Investigations in the Middle Kingdom"; "Life of Andrew J. Alexander"; and the "Life of Gen. U. S. Grant," in conjunction with Charles A.

Dana. His home, in recent years, has been in New York.

WILSON, John M., lawyer and jurist, was born in New Hampshire in 1802, graduated at Bowdoin College in 1824—the classmate of Franklin Pierce and Nathaniel Hawthorne; studied law in New Hampshire and came to Illinois in 1835, locating at Joliet; removed to Chicago in 1841, where he was the partner of Norman B. Judd, serving, at different periods, as attorney of the Chicago & Rock Island, the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern and the Chicago & Northwestern Railways; was Judge of the Court of Common Pleas of Cook County, 1853-59, when he became Presiding Judge of the Superior Court of Chicago, serving until 1868. Died, Dec. 7, 1883.

WILSON, John P., lawyer, was born in Whiteside County, Ill., July 3, 1844; educated in the common schools and at Knox College, Galesburg, graduating from the latter in 1865; two years later was admitted to the bar in Chicago, and speedily attained prominence in his profession. During the World's Fair period he was retained as counsel by the Committee on Grounds and Buildings, and was prominently connected, as counsel for the city, with the Lake Front litigation.

WILSON, Robert L., early legislator, was born in Washington County, Pa., Sept. 11, 1805, taken to Zanesville, Ohio, in 1810, graduated at Franklin College in 1831, studied law and, in 1833, removed to Athens (now in Menard County), Ill.; was elected Representative in 1836, and was one of the members from Sangamon County, known as the "Long Nine," who assisted in securing the removal of the State Capital to Springfield. Mr. Wilson removed to Sterling, Whiteside County, in 1840, was elected five times Circuit Clerk and served eight years as Probate Judge. Immediately after the fall of Fort Sumter, he enlisted as private in a battalion in Washington City under command of Cassius M. Clay, for guard duty until the arrival of the Seventh New York Regiment. He subsequently assisted in raising troops in Illinois, was appointed Paymaster by Lincoln, serving at Washington, St. Louis, and, after the fall of Vicksburg, at Springfield—being mustered out in November, 1865. Died, in Whiteside County, 1880.

WILSON, Robert S., lawyer and jurist, was born at Montrose, Susquehanna County, Pa., Nov. 6, 1812; learned the printer's art, then studied law and was admitted to the bar in Allegany County, about 1833; in 1836 removed to Ann Arbor, Mich., where he served as Probate Judge and State Senator; in 1850 came to Chicago, was elected Judge of the Recorder's Court in 1853, and re-elected in 1858, serving ten years, and proving "a terror to evil-doers." Died, at Lawrence, Mich., Dec. 23, 1882.

WILSON, William, early jurist, was born in Loudoun County, Va., April 27, 1794; studied law with Hon. John Cook, a distinguished lawyer, and minister to France in the early part of the century; in 1817 removed to Kentucky, soon after came to Illinois, two years later locating in White County, near Carmi, which continued to be his home during the remainder of his life. In 1819 he was appointed Associate Justice of the Supreme Court as successor to William P. Foster, who is described by Governor Ford as "a great rascal and no lawyer," and who held office only about nine months. Judge Wilson was re-elected to the Supreme bench, as Chief-Justice, in 1825, being then only a little over 30 years old, and held office until the reorganization of the Supreme Court under the Constitution of 1843—a period of over twenty-nine years, and, with the exception of Judge Browne's, the longest term of service in the history of the court. He died at his home in White County, April 29, 1857. A Whig in early life, he allied himself with the Democratic party on the dissolution of the former. Hon. James C. Conkling, of Springfield, says of him, "as a writer, his style was clear and distinct; as a lawyer, his judgment was sound and discriminating."

WINCHESTER, a city and county-seat of Scott County, founded in 1839, situated on Big Sandy Creek and on the line of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, 29 miles south of Beardstown and 84 miles north by west of St. Louis. While the surrounding region is agricultural and largely devoted to wheat growing, there is some coal mining. Winchester is an important shipping-point, having three grain elevators, two flouring mills, and a coal mine employing fifty miners. There are four Protestant and one Catholic church, a court house, a high school, a graded school building, two banks and two weekly newspapers. Population (1880), 1,636; (1890), 1,542; (1900), 1,711.

WINDSOR, a city of Shelby County at the crossing of the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis and the Wabash Railways, 11 miles northeast of Shelbyville. Population (1880), 768; (1890), 888; (1900), 866.

WINES, Frederick Howard, clergyman and sociologist, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., April 9, 1838, graduated at Washington (Pa.) College in 1857, and, after serving as tutor there for a short time, entered Princeton Theological Seminary, but was compelled temporarily to discontinue his studies on account of a weakness of the eyes. The Presbytery of St. Louis licensed him to preach in 1860, and, in 1862, he was commissioned Hospital Chaplain in the Union army. During 1862-64 he was stationed at Springfield, Mo., participating in the battle of Springfield on Jan. 8, 1863, and being personally mentioned for bravery on the field in the official report. Re-entering the seminary at Princeton in 1864, he graduated in 1865, and at once accepted a call to the pulpit of the First Presbyterian Church of Springfield, Ill., which he filled for four years. In 1869 he was appointed Secretary of the newly created Board of Commissioners of Public Charities of Illinois, in which capacity he continued until 1893, when he resigned. For the next four years he was chiefly engaged in literary work, in lecturing before universities on topics connected with social science, in aiding in the organization of charitable work, and in the conduct of a thorough investigation into the relations between liquor legislation and crime. At an early period he took a prominent part in organizing the various Boards of Public Charities of the United States into an organization known as the National Conference of Charities and Corrections, and, at the Louisville meeting (1883), was elected its President. At the International Penitentiary Congress at Stockholm (1878) he was the official delegate from Illinois. On his return, as a result of his observations while abroad, he submitted to the Legislature a report strongly advocating the construction of the Kankakee Hospital for the Insane, then about to be built, upon the "detached ward" or "village" plan, a departure from then existing methods, which marks an era in the treatment of insane in the United States. Mr. Wines conducted the investigation into the condition and number of the defective, dependent and delinquent classes throughout the country, his report constituting a separate volume under the "Tenth Census," and rendered a similar service in connection with the eleventh census (1890). In 1887 he was elected Secretary of the National Prison Association, succeeding to the post formerly held by his father, Enoch Cobb Wines, D.D., LL.D. After the inauguration of Governor Tanner in 1897, he resumed his former position of Secretary of the Board of Public Charities, remaining until 1899, when he again tendered his resignation, having received the appointment to the position of Assistant Director of the Twelfth Census, which he now holds. He is the author of "Crime and Reformation" (1895); of a voluminous series of reports; also of numerous pamphlets and brochures, among which may be mentioned "The County Jail System; An Argument for its Abolition" (1878); "The Kankakee Hospital" (1882); "Provision for the Insane in the United States" (1885); "Conditional Liberation, or the Paroling of Prisoners" (1886), and "American Prisons in the Tenth Census" (1888).

WINES, Walter B., lawyer (brother of Frederick H. Wines), was born in Boston, Mass., Oct. 10, 1848, received his primary education at Williston Academy, East Hampton, Mass., after which he entered Middlebury College, Vt., taking a classical course and graduating there. He afterwards became a student in the law department of Columbia College, N. Y., graduating in 1871, being admitted to the bar the same year and commencing practice in New York City. In 1879 he came to Springfield, Ill., and was, for a time, identified with the bar of that city. Later, he removed to Chicago, where he has been engaged in literary and journalistic work.

WINNEBAGO COUNTY, situated in the "northern tier," bordering on the Wisconsin State line; was organized, under an act passed in 1836, from La Salle and Jo Daviess Counties, and has an area of 552 square miles. The county is drained by the Rock and Pecatonica Rivers. The surface is rolling prairie and the soil fertile. The geology is simple, the quaternary deposits being underlaid by the Galena blue and buff limestone, adapted for building purposes. All the cereals are raised in abundance, the chief product being corn. The Winnebago Indians (who gave name to the county) formerly lived on the west side of the Rock River, and the Pottawatomies on the east, but both tribes removed westward in 1835. (As to manufacturing interests, see Rockford.) Population (1880), 30,505; (1890), 39,938; (1900), 47,845.

WINNEBAGO WAR. The name given to an Indian disturbance which had its origin in 1827, during the administration of Gov. Ninian Edwards. The Indians had been quiet since the conclusion of the War of 1812, but a few isolated outrages were sufficient to start terrified "runners" in all directions. In the northern portion of the State, from Galena to Chicago (then Fort Dearborn) the alarm was intense. The meagre militia force of the State was summoned and volunteers were called for. Meanwhile, 600 United States Regular Infantry, under command of Gen. Henry Atkinson, put in an appearance. Besides the infantry, Atkinson had at his disposal some 130 mounted sharpshooters. The origin of the disturbance was as follows: The Winnebagoes attacked a band of Chippewas, who were (by treaty) under Government protection, several of the latter being killed. For participation in this offense, four Winnebago Indians were summarily apprehended, surrendered to the Chippewas and shot. Meanwhile, some dispute had arisen as to the title of the lands, claimed by the Winnebagoes in the vicinity of Galea, which had been occupied by white miners. Repeated acts of hostility and of reprisal, along the Upper Mississippi, intensified mutual distrust. A gathering of the Indians around two keel-boats, laden with supplies for Fort Snelling, which had anchored near Prairie du Chien and opposite a Winnebago camp, was regarded by the whites as a hostile act. Liquor was freely distributed, and there is historical evidence that a half-dozen drunken squaws were carried off and shamefully maltreated. Several hundred warriors assembled to avenge the deception which had been practiced upon them. They laid in ambush for the boats on their return trip. The first passed too rapidly to be successfully assailed, but the second grounded and was savagely, yet unsuccessfully, attacked. The presence of General Atkinson's forces prevented an actual outbreak, and, on his demand, the great Winnebago Chief, Red Bird, with six other leading men of the tribe, surrendered themselves as hostages to save their nation from extermination. A majority of these were, after trial, acquitted. Red Bird, however, unable to endure confinement, literally pined to death in prison, dying on Feb. 16, 1828. He is described as having been a savage of superior intelligence and noble character. A treaty of peace was concluded with the Winnebagoes in a council held at Prairie du Chien, a few months later, but the affair seems to have produced as much alarm among the Indians as it did among the whites. (For Winnebago Indians see page 576.)

WINNETKA, a village of Cook County, on the Chicago & Northwestern Railway, 16½ miles north of Chicago. It stands eighty feet above the level of Lake Michigan, has good schools (being the seat of the Winnetka Institute), several churches, and is a popular residence town. Population (1880), 584; (1890), 1,079; (1900), 1,833.

WINSTON, Frederick Hampton, lawyer, was born in Liberty County, Ga., Nov. 20, 1830, was brought to Woodford County, Ky., in 1835, left an orphan at 12, and attended the common schools until 18, when, returning to Georgia, he engaged in cotton manufacture. He finally began the study of law with United States Senator W. C. Dawson, and graduated from Harvard Law School in 1852; spent some time in the office of W. M. Everts in New York, was admitted to the bar and came to Chicago in 1853, where he formed a partnership with Norman B. Judd, afterwards being associated with Judge Henry W. Blodgett; served as general solicitor of the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific and the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railways—remaining with the latter twenty years. In 1855 he was appointed, by President Cleveland, Minister to Persia, but resigned the following year, and traveled extensively in Russia, Scandinavia and other foreign countries. Mr. Winston was a delegate to the Democratic National Conventions of 1868, '76 and '84; first President of the Stock Yards at Jersey City, for twelve years President of the Lincoln Park Commission, and a Director of the Lincoln National Bank.

WISCONSIN CENTRAL LINES. The Wisconsin Central Company was organized, June 17, 1887, and subsequently acquired the Minnesota, St. Croix & Wisconsin, the Wisconsin & Minnesota, the Chippewa Falls & Western, the St. Paul & St. Croix Falls, the Wisconsin Central, the Penokee, and the Packwaukee & Montebello Railroads, and assumed the leases of the Milwaukee & Lake Winnebago and the Wisconsin & Minnesota Roads. On July 1, 1888, the company began to operate the entire Wisconsin Central system, with the exception of the Wisconsin Central Railroad and the leased Milwaukee & Lake Winnebago, which remained in charge of the Wisconsin Central Railroad mortgage trustees until Nov. 1, 1889, when these, too, passed under the control of the Wisconsin Central Company. The Wisconsin Central Railroad Company is a reorganization (Oct. 1, 1879) of a company formed Jan. 1, 1871. The Wisconsin Central and the Wisconsin Central Railroad Companies, though differing in name, are a financial unit; the former holding most of the first mortgage bonds of the latter, and substantially all its notes, stocks and income bonds, but, for legal reasons (such as the protection of land titles), it is necessary that separate corporations be maintained. On April 1, 1890, the Wisconsin Central Company executed a lease to the Northern Pacific Railroad, but this was set aside by the courts, on Sept. 27, 1893, for non-payment of rent, and was finally canceled. On the same day receivers were appointed to insure the protection of all interests. The total mileage is 415.46 miles, of which the Company owns 258.90—only .10 of a mile in Illinois. A line, 58.10 miles in length, with 8.44 miles of side-track (total, 66.54 miles), lying wholly within the State of Illinois, is operated by the Chicago & Wisconsin and furnishes the allied line an entrance into Chicago.

WITHROW, Thomas F., lawyer, was born in Virginia in March, 1833, removed with his parents to Ohio in childhood, attended the Western Reserve College, and, after the death of his father, taught school and worked as a printer, later, editing a paper at Mount Vernon. In 1855 he removed to Janesville, Wis., where he again engaged in journalistic work, studied law, was admitted to the bar in Iowa in 1857, settled at Des Moines and served as private secretary of Governors Lowe and Kirkwood. In 1860 he became Supreme Court Reporter; served as Chairman of the Republican State Central Committee in 1863 and, in 1866, became associated with the Rock Island Railroad in the capacity of local attorney, was made chief law officer of the Company in 1873, and removed to Chicago, and, in 1890, was promoted to the position of General Counsel. Died, in Chicago, Feb. 3, 1893.

WOLCOTT, (Dr.) Alexander, early Indian Agent, was born at East Windsor, Conn., Feb. 14, 1790; graduated from Yale College in 1809, and, after a course in medicine, was commissioned, in 1812, Surgeon's Mate in the United States Army. In 1820 he was appointed Indian Agent at Fort Dearborn (now Chicago), as successor to Charles Jouett—the first Agent—who had been appointed a United States Judge in Arkansas. The same year he accompanied General Lewis Cass and Henry Schoolcraft on their tour among the Indians of the Northwest; was married in 1823 to Ellen Marion Kinzie, a daughter of Col. John Kinzie, the first permanent settler of Chicago; in 1825 was appointed a Justice of the Peace for Peoria County, which then included Cook County; was a Judge of Election in 1830, and one of the purchasers of a block of ground in the heart of the present city of Chicago, at the first sale of lots, held Sept. 27, 1830, but died before the close of the year. Dr. Wolcott appears to have been a high-minded and honorable man, as well as far in advance of the mass of pioneers in point of education and intelligence.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE. (See Suffrage.)

WOOD, Benson, lawyer and Congressman, was born in Susquehanna County, Pa., in 1839; received a common school and academic education; at the age of 20 came to Illinois, and, for two years, taught school in Lee County. He then enlisted as a soldier in an Illinois regiment, attaining the rank of Captain of Infantry; after the war, graduated from the Law Department of the old Chicago University, and has since been engaged in the practice of his profession. He was elected a member of the Twenty-eighth General Assembly (1872) and was a delegate to the Republican National Conventions of 1876 and 1888; also served as Mayor of the city of Effingham, where he now resides. In 1894 he was elected to the Fifty-fourth Congress by the Republicans of the Nineteenth District, which has uniformly returned a Democrat, and, in office, proved himself a most industrious and efficient member. Mr. Wood was defeated as a candidate for re-election in 1896.

WOOD, John, pioneer, Lieutenant-Governor and Governor, was born at Moravia, N. Y., Dec. 20, 1798—his father being a Revolutionary soldier who had served as Surgeon and Captain in the army. At the age of 21 years young Wood removed to Illinois, settling in what is now Adams County, and building the first log-cabin on the site of the present city of Quincy. He was a member of the upper house of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth General Assemblies, and was elected Lieutenant-Governor in 1859 on the same ticket with Governor Bissell, and served out the unexpired term of the latter, who died in office. (See Bissell, William H.) He was succeeded by Richard Yates in 1861. In February of that year he was appointed one of the five Commissioners from Illinois to the "Peace Conference" at Washington, to consider methods for averting civil war. The following May he was appointed Quartermaster-General for the State by Governor Yates, and assisted most efficiently in fitting out the troops for the field. In June, 1864, he was commissioned Colonel of the One Hundred and Thirty-seventh Illinois Volunteers (100-days' men) and mustered out of service the following September. Died, at Quincy, June 11, 1880. He was liberal, patriotic and public-spirited. His fellow-citizens of Quincy erected a monument to his memory, which was appropriately dedicated, July 4, 1883.

WOODFORD COUNTY, situated a little north of the center of the State, bounded on the west by the Illinois River; organized in 1841; area, 540 square miles. The surface is generally level, except along the Illinois River, the soil fertile and well watered. The county lies in the northern section of the great coal field of the State. Eureka is the county-seat. Other thriving cities and towns are Metamora, Minonk, El Paso and Roanoke. Corn, oats, wheat, potatoes and barley are the principal crops. The chief mechanical industries are flour manufacture, carriage and wagon-making, and saddlery and harness work. Population (1890), 21,429; (1900), 21,822.

WOODHULL, a village of Henry County, on Keithsburg branch Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, 15 miles west of Galva; has a bank, electric lights, water works, brick and tile works, six churches and weekly paper. Pop. (1900), 774.

WOODMAN, Charles W., lawyer and Congressman, was born in Aalborg, Denmark, March 11, 1844; received his early education in the schools of his native country, but took to the sea in 1860, following the life of a sailor until 1863, when, coming to Philadelphia, he enlisted in the Gulf Squadron of the United States. After the war, he came to Chicago, and, after reading law for some time in the office of James L. High, graduated from the Law Department of the Chicago University in 1871. Some years later he was appointed Prosecuting Attorney for some of the lower courts, and, in 1881, was nominated by the Judges of Cook County as one of the Justices of the Peace for the city of Chicago. In 1894 he became the Republican candidate for Congress from the Fourth District and was elected, but failed to secure a renomination in 1896. Died, in Elgin Asylum for the Insane, March 18, 1898.

WOODS, Robert Mann, was born at Greenville, Pa., April 17, 1840; came with his parents to Illinois in 1842, the family settling at Barry, Pike County, but subsequently residing at Pittsfield, Canton and Galesburg. He was educated at Knox College in the latter place, which was his home from 1849 to '58; later, taught school in Iowa and Missouri until 1861, when he went to Springfield and began the study of law with Milton Hay and Shelby M. Cullom. His law studies having been interrupted by the Civil War, after spending some time in the mustering and disbursing office, he was promoted by Governor Yates to a place in the executive office, from which he went to the field as Adjutant of the Sixty-fourth Illinois Infantry, known as the "Yates Sharp-Shooters." After participating, with the Army of the Tennessee, in the Atlanta campaign, he took part in the "March to the Sea," and the campaign in the Carolinas, including the siege of Savannah and the forcing of the Salkahatchie, where he distinguished himself, as also in the taking of Columbia, Fayetteville, Cheraw, Raleigh and Bentonville. At the latter place he had a horse shot under him and won the brevet rank of Major for gallantry in the field, having previously been commissioned Captain of Company A of his regiment. He also served on the staffs of Gens. Giles A. Smith, Benjamin F. Potts, and William W. Belknap, and was the last mustering officer in General Sherman's army. In 1867 Major Woods removed to Chicago, where he was in business for a number of years, serving as chief clerk of Custom House construction from 1872 to 1877. In 1879 he purchased "The Daily Republican" at Joliet, which he conducted successfully for fifteen years. While connected with "The Republican," he served as Secretary of the Illinois Republican Press Association and in various other positions.

Major Woods was one of the founders of the Grand Army of the Republic, whose birth-place was in Illinois. (See Grand Army of the Republic; also Stephenson, Dr. B. F.) When Dr. Stephenson (who had been Surgeon of the Fourteenth Illinois Infantry), conceived the idea of founding such an order, he called to his assistance Major Woods, who was then engaged in writing the histories of Illinois regiments for the Adjutant-General's Report. The Major wrote the Constitution and By-laws of the Order, the charter blanks for all the reports, etc. The first official order bears his name as the first Adjutant-General of the Order, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF ILLINOIS
GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., APRIL 1, 1866.

GENERAL ORDERS:

No. 1. (The following named officers are hereby appointed and assigned to duty at these headquarters. They will be obeyed and respected accordingly:

Colonel Jules C. Webber, A. D. C. and Chief of Staff.

Colonel John M. Snyder, Quartermaster-General.

Major Robert M. Woods, Adjutant-General.

Captain John A. Lightfoot, Assistant Adjutant-General.

Captain John S. Phelps, Aid-de-Camp.

By order of B. F. Stephenson, Department Commander.

ROBERT M. WOODS,
Adjutant-General.

Major Woods afterwards organized the various Departments in the West, and it has been conceded that he furnished the money necessary to carry on the work during the first six months of the existence of the Order. He has never accepted a nomination or run for any political office; but is now engaged in financial business in Joliet and Chicago, with his residence in the former place.

WOODSON, David Meade, lawyer and jurist, was born in Jessamine County, Ky., May 18, 1806; was educated in private schools and at Transylvania University, and read law with his father. He served a term in the Kentucky Legislature in 1832, and, in 1834, removed to Illinois, settling at Carrollton, Greene County. In 1839 he was elected State's Attorney and, in 1840, a member of the lower house of the Legislature, being elected a second time in 1868. In 1843 he was the Whig candidate for Congress in the Fifth District, but was defeated by Stephen A. Douglas. He was a member of the Constitutional Conventions of 1847 and 1869-70. In 1848 he was elected a Judge of the First Judicial Circuit, remaining in office until 1867. Died, in 1877.

WOODSTOCK, the county-seat of McHenry County, situated on the Chicago & Northwestern Railway, about 51 miles northwest of Chicago and 32 miles east of Rockford. It contains a court house, eight churches, four banks, three newspaper offices, foundry and machine shops, planing mills, canning works, pickle, cheese and butter factories. The Oliver Typewriter Factory is located here; the town is also the seat of the Todd Seminary for boys. Population (1890), 1,683; (1900), 2,502.

WORCESTER, Linus E., State Senator, was born in Windsor, Vt., Dec. 5, 1811, was educated in the common schools of his native State and at Chester Academy, came to Illinois in 1836, and, after teaching three years, entered a dry-goods store at Whitehall as clerk, later becoming a partner. He was also engaged in various other branches of business at different times, including the drug, hardware, grocery, agricultural implement and lumber business. In 1843 he was appointed Postmaster at Whitehall, serving twelve years; was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1847, served as County Judge for six years from 1853, and as Trustee of the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, at Jacksonville, from 1859, by successive reappointments, for twelve years. In 1856 he was elected, as a Democrat, to the State Senate, to succeed John M. Palmer, resigned; was re-elected in 1860, and, at the session of 1865, was one of the five Democratic members of that body who voted for the ratification of the Emancipation Amendment of the National Constitution. He was elected County Judge a second time, in 1863, and re-elected in 1867, served as delegate to the Democratic National Convention of 1876, and, for more than thirty years, was one of the Directors of the Jacksonville branch of the Chicago & Alton Railroad, serving from the organization of the corporation until his death, which occurred Oct. 19, 1891.

WORDEN, a village of Madison County, on the Wabash and the Jacksonville, Louisville & St. Louis Railways, 32 miles northeast of St. Louis. Population (1890), 522; (1900), 544

WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION. An exhibition of the scientific, liberal and mechanical arts of all nations, held at Chicago, between May 1 and Oct. 31, 1893. The project had its inception in November, 1885, in a resolution adopted by the directorate of the Chicago Interstate Exposition Company. On July 6, 1888, the first well defined action was taken, the Iroquois Club, of Chicago, inviting the co-operation of six other leading clubs of that city in "securing the location of an international celebration at Chicago of the 400th anniversary of the discovery of America by Columbus." In July, 1889, a decisive step was taken in the appointment by Mayor Cregier, under resolution of the City Council, of a committee of 100 (afterwards increased to 256) citizens, who were charged with the duty of promoting the selection of Chicago as the site for the Exposition. New York, Washington and St. Louis were competing points, but the choice of Congress fell upon Chicago, and the act establishing the World's Fair at that city was signed by President Harrison on April 25, 1890. Under the requirements of the law, the President appointed eight Commissioners-at-large, with two Commissioners and two alternates from each State and Territory and the District of Columbia. Col. George R. Davis, of Chicago, was elected Director-General by the body thus constituted. Ex-Senator Thomas M. Palmer, of Michigan, was chosen President of the Commission and John T. Dickinson, of Texas, Secretary. This Commission delegated much of its power to a Board of Reference and Control, who were instructed to act with a similar number appointed by the World's Columbian Exposition. The latter organization was an incorporation, with a directorate of forty-five members, elected annually by the stockholders. Lyman J. Gage, of Chicago, was the first President of the corporation, and was succeeded by W. T. Baker and Harlow N. Higinbotham.

In addition to these bodies, certain powers were vested in a Board of Lady Managers, composed of two members, with alternates, from each State and Territory, besides nine from the city of Chicago. Mrs. Potter Palmer was chosen President of the latter. This Board was particularly charged with supervision of women's participation in the Exposition, and of the exhibits of women's work.

The supreme executive power was vested in the Joint Board of Control. The site selected was Jackson Park, in the South Division of Chicago, with a strip connecting Jackson and Washington Parks, known as the "Midway Plaisance," which was surrendered to "concessionaires" who purchased the privilege of giving exhibitions, or conducting restaurants or selling-booths thereon. The total area of the site was 633 acres, and that of the buildings—not reckoning those erected by States other than Illinois, and by foreign governments—was about 200 acres. When to this is added the acreage of the foreign and State buildings, the total space under roof approximated 250 acres. These figures do not include the buildings erected by private exhibitors, caterers and vendors, which would add a small percentage to the grand total. Forty-seven foreign Governments made appropriations for the erection of their own buildings and other expenses connected with official representation, and there were exhibitors from eighty-six nations. The United States Government erected its own building, and appropriated $500,000 to defray the expenses of a national exhibit, besides $2,500,000 toward the general cost of the Exposition. The appropriations by foreign Governments aggregated about $6,500,000, and those by the States and Territories, $6,120,000—that of Illinois being $800,000. The entire outlay of the World's Columbian Exposition Company, up to March 31, 1894, including the cost of preliminary organization, construction, operating and post-Exposition expenses, was $37,151,800. This is, of course, exclusive of foreign and State expenditures, which would swell the aggregate cost to nearly $45,000,000. Citizens of Chicago subscribed $5,608,206 toward the capital stock of the Exposition Company, and the municipality, $5,000,000, which was raised by the sale of bonds. (See Thirty-sixth General Assembly.)

The site, while admirably adapted to the purpose, was, when chosen, a marshy flat, crossed by low sand ridges, upon which stood occasional clumps of stunted scrub oaks. Before the gates of the great fair were opened to the public, the entire area had been transformed into a dream of beauty. Marshes had been drained, filled in and sodded; driveways and broad walks constructed; artificial ponds and lagoons dug and embanked, and all the highest skill of the landscape gardener's art had been called into play to produce varied and striking effects. But the task had been a Herculean one. There were seventeen principal (or, as they may be called, departmental) buildings, all of beautiful and ornate design, and all of vast size. They were known as the Manufacturers' and Liberal Arts, the Machinery, Electrical, Transportation, Woman's, Horticultural, Mines and Mining, Anthropological, Administration, Art Galleries, Agricultural, Art Institute, Fisheries, Live Stock, Dairy and Forestry buildings, and the Music Hall and Casino. Several of these had large annexes. The Manufacturers' Building was the largest. It was rectangular (1687 x 787 feet), having a ground area of 31 acres and a floor and gallery area of 44 acres. Its central chamber was 1280 x 380 feet, with a nave 107 feet wide, both hall and nave being surrounded by a gallery 50 feet wide. It was four times as large as the Roman Coliseum and three times as large as St. Peter's at Rome; 17,000,000 feet of lumber, 13,000,000 pounds of steel, and 2,000,000 pounds of iron had been used in its construction, involving a cost of $1,500,000.

It was originally intended to open the Exposition, formally, on Oct. 21, 1892, the quadri-centennial of Columbus' discovery of land on the Western Hemisphere, but the magnitude of the undertaking rendered this impracticable. Consequently, while dedicatory ceremonies were held on that day, preceded by a monster procession and followed by elaborate pyrotechnic displays at night, May 1, 1893, was fixed as the opening day—the machinery and fountains being put in operation, at the touch of an electric button by President Cleveland, at the close of a short address. The total number of admissions from that date to Oct. 31, was 27,530,460—the largest for any single day being on Oct. 9 (Chicago Day) amounting to 761,944. The total receipts from all sources (including National and State appropriations, subscriptions, etc.), amounted to $28,151,168.75, of which $10,626,330.76 was from the sale of tickets, and $8,699,581.43 from concessions. The aggregate attendance fell short of that at the Paris Exposition of 1889 by about 500,000, while the receipts from the sale of tickets and concessions exceeded the latter by nearly $5,800,000. Subscribers to the Exposition stock received a return of ten per cent on the same.

The Illinois building was the first of the State buildings to be completed. It was also the largest and most costly, but was severely criticised from an architectural standpoint. The exhibits showed the internal resources of the State, as well as the development of its governmental system, and its progress in civilization from the days of the first pioneers. The entire Illinois exhibit in the State building was under charge of the State Board of Agriculture, who devoted one-tenth of the appropriation, and a like proportion of floor space, to the exhibition of the work of Illinois women as scientists, authors, artists, decorators, etc. Among special features of the Illinois exhibit were: State trophies and relics, kept in a fire-proof memorial hall; the display of grains and minerals, and an immense topographical map (prepared at a cost of $15,000), drafted on a scale of two miles to the inch, showing the character and resources of the State, and correcting many serious cartographical errors previously undiscovered.

WORTHEN, Amos Henry, scientist and State Geologist, was born at Bradford, Vt., Oct. 31, 1813, emigrated to Kentucky in 1834, and, in 1836, removed to Illinois, locating at Warsaw. Teaching, surveying and mercantile business were his pursuits until 1842, when he returned to the East, spending two years in Boston, but returning to Warsaw in 1844. His natural predilections were toward the natural sciences, and, after coming west, he devoted most of his leisure time to the collection and study of specimens of mineralogy, geology and conchology. On the organization of the geological survey of Illinois in 1851, he was appointed assistant to Dr. J. G. Norwood, then State Geologist, and, in 1858, succeeded to the office, having meanwhile spent three years as Assistant Geologist in the first Iowa survey. As State Geologist he published seven volumes of reports, and was engaged upon the eighth when overtaken by death, May 6, 1888. These reports, which are as comprehensive as they are voluminous, have been reviewed and warmly commended by the leading scientific periodicals of this country and Europe. In 1877 field work was discontinued, and the State Historical Library and Natural History Museum were established, Professor Worthen being placed in charge as curator. He was the author of various valuable scientific papers and member of numerous scientific societies in this country and in Europe.

WORTHINGTON, Nicholas Ellsworth, ex-Congressman, was born in Brooke County, W. Va., March 30, 1836, and completed his education at Allegheny College, Pa., studied Law at Morgantown, Va., and was admitted to the bar in 1860. He is a resident of Peoria, and, by profession, a lawyer; was County Superintendent of Schools of Peoria County from 1868 to 1872, and a member of the State Board of Education from 1869 to 1872. In 1882 he was elected to Congress, as a Democrat, from the Tenth Congressional District, and re-elected in 1884. In 1886 he was again a candidate, but was defeated by his Republican opponent, Philip Sidney Post. He was elected Circuit Judge of the Tenth Judicial District in 1891, and re-elected in 1897. In 1894 he served upon a commission appointed by President Cleveland, to investigate the labor strikes of that year at Chicago.

WRIGHT, John Stephen, manufacturer, was born at Sheffield, Mass., July 16, 1815; came to Chicago in 1832, with his father, who opened a store in that city; in 1837, at his own expense, built the first school building in Chicago; in 1840 established "The Prairie Farmer," which he conducted for many years in the interest of popular education and progressive agriculture. In 1852 he engaged in the manufacture of Atkins' self-raking reaper and mower, was one of the promoters of the Galena & Chicago Union and the Illinois Central Railways, and wrote a volume entitled, "Chicago: Past, Present and Future," published in 1870. Died, in Chicago, Sept. 26, 1874.

WULFF, Henry, ex-State Treasurer, was born in Meldorf, Germany, August 24, 1854; came to Chicago in 1863, and began his political career as a Trustee of the town of Jefferson. In 1866 he was elected County Clerk of Cook County, and re-elected in 1890; in 1894 became the Republican nominee for State Treasurer, receiving, at the November election of that year, the unprecedented plurality of 133,427 votes over his Democratic opponent.

WYANET, a town of Bureau County, at the intersection of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy and the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railways, 7 miles southwest of Princeton. Population (1890), 670; (1900), 902.

WYLIE, (Rev.) Samuel, domestic missionary, born in Ireland and came to America in boyhood; was educated at the University of Pennsylvania and the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, and ordained in 1818. Soon after this he came west as a domestic missionary and, in 1820, became pastor of a church at Sparta, Ill., where he remained until his death, March 20, 1872, after a pastorate of 52 years. During his pastorate the church sent out a dozen colonies to form new church organizations elsewhere. He is described as able, eloquent and scholarly.

WYMAN, (Col.) John B., soldier, was born in Massachusetts, July 12, 1817, and educated in the schools of that State until 14 years of age, when he became a clerk in a clothing store in his native town of Shrewsbury, later being associated with mercantile establishments in Cincinnati, and again in his native State. From 1846 to 1850 he was employed successively as a clerk in the car and machine shops at Springfield, Mass., then as Superintendent of Construction, and, later, as conductor on the New York & New Haven Railroad, finally, in 1850, becoming Superintendent of the Connecticut River Railroad. In 1852 he entered the service of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, assisting in the survey and construction of the line under Col. R. B. Mason, the Chief Engineer, and finally becoming Assistant Superintendent of the Northern Division. He was one of the original proprietors of the town of Amboy, in Lee County, and its first Mayor, also serving a second term. Having a fondness for military affairs, he was usually connected with some military organization—while in Cincinnati being attached to a company, of which Prof. O. M. Mitchell, the celebrated astronomer (afterwards Major-General Mitchell), was Captain. After coming to Illinois he became Captain of the Chicago Light Guards. Having left the employ of the Railroad in 1858, he was in private business at Amboy at the beginning of the Civil War in 1861. As Assistant-Adjutant General, by appointment of Governor Yates, he rendered valuable service in the early weeks of the war in securing arms from Jefferson Barracks and in the organization of the three-months' regiments. Then, having organized the Thirteenth Illinois Volunteer Infantry—the first organized in the State for the three years' service—he was commissioned its Colonel, and, in July following, entered upon the duty of guarding the railroad lines in Southwest Missouri and Arkansas. The following year his regiment was attached to General Sherman's command in the first campaign against Vicksburg. On the second day of the Battle of Chickasaw Bayou, he fell mortally wounded, dying on the field, Dec. 28, 1862. Colonel Wyman was one of the most accomplished and promising of the volunteer soldiers sent to the field from Illinois, of whom so many were former employes of the Illinois Central Railroad.

WYOMING, a town of Stark County, 31 miles north-northwest from Peoria, at the junction of the Peoria branch Rock Island & Pacific and the Rushville branch of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway; has two high schools, churches, two banks, flour mills, water-works, machine shop, and two weekly newspapers. Coal is mined here. Pop. (1890), 1,116; (1900), 1,277.

XENIA, a village of Clay County, on the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railroad, 87 miles east of St. Louis. Population (1900), 800.

YATES CITY, a village of Knox County, at the junction of the Peoria Division of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, with the Rushville branch, 23 miles southeast of Galesburg. The town has banks, a coal mine, telephone exchange, school, churches and a newspaper. Pop. (1890), 687; (1900), 650.

YATES, Henry, pioneer, was born in Caroline County, Va., Oct. 29, 1786—being a grand-nephew of Chief Justice John Marshall; removed to Fayette County, Ky., where he located and laid out the town of Warsaw, which afterwards became the county-seat of Gallatin County. In 1831 he removed to Sangamon County, Ill., and, in 1832, settled at the site of the present town of Berlin, which he laid out the following year, also laying out the town of New Berlin, a few years later, on the line of the Wabash Railway. He was father of Gov. Richard Yates. Died, Sept. 13, 1865.—Henry (Yates), Jr., son of the preceding, was born at Berlin, Ill., March 7, 1835; engaged in merchandising at New Berlin; in 1862, raised a company of volunteers for the One Hundred and Sixth Regiment Illinois Infantry, was appointed Lieutenant-Colonel and brevetted Colonel and Brigadier-General. He was accidentally shot in 1863, and suffered sun-stroke at Little Rock, from which he never fully recovered. Died, August 3, 1871.

YATES, Richard, former Governor and United States Senator, was born at Warsaw, Ky., Jan. 18, 1815, of English descent. In 1831 he accompanied his father to Illinois, the family settling first at Springfield and later at Berlin, Sangamon County. He soon after entered Illinois College, from which he graduated in 1835, and subsequently read law with Col. John J. Hardin, at Jacksonville, which thereafter became his home. In 1842 he was elected Representative in the General Assembly from Morgan County, and was re-elected in 1844, and again in 1848. In 1850 he was a candidate for Congress from the Seventh District and elected over Maj. Thomas L. Harris, the previous incumbent, being the only Whig Representative in the Thirty-second Congress from Illinois. Two years later he was re-elected over John Calhoun, but was defeated, in 1854, by his old opponent, Harris. He was one of the most vigorous opponents of the Kansas-Nebraska Bill in the Thirty-third Congress, and an early participant in the movement for the organization of the Republican party to resist the further extension of slavery, being a prominent speaker, on the same platform with Lincoln, before the first Republican State Convention held at Bloomington, in May, 1856, and serving as one of the Vice-Presidents of that body. In 1860 he was elected to the executive chair on the ticket headed by Abraham Lincoln for the Presidency, and, by his energetic support of the National administration in its measures for the suppression of the Rebellion, won the sobriquet of "the Illinois War-Governor." In 1865 he was elected United States Senator, serving until 1871. He died suddenly, at St. Louis, Nov. 27, 1873, while returning from Arkansas, whither he had gone, as a United States Commissioner, by appointment of President Grant, to inspect a land-subsidy railroad. He was a man of rare ability, earnestness of purpose and extraordinary personal magnetism, as well as of a lofty order of patriotism. His faults were those of a nature generous, impulsive and warm-hearted.

YORKVILLE, the county-seat of Kendall County, on Fox River and Streator Division of Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, 13 miles southwest of Aurora; on interurban electric line; has water-power, electric lights, a bank, churches and weekly newspaper. Pop. (1890) 375; (1900) 413.

YOUNG, Brigham, Mormon leader, was born at Whittingham, Vt., June 1, 1801, joined the Mormons in 1831 and, the next year, became associated with Joseph Smith, at Kirtland, Ohio, and, in 1835, an "apostle." He accompanied a considerable body of that sect to Independence, Mo., but was driven out with them in 1837, settling for a short time at Quincy, Ill., but later removing to Nauvoo, of which he was one of the founders. On the assassination of Smith, in 1844, he became the successor of the latter, as head of the Mormon Church, and, the following year, headed the exodus from Illinois, which finally resulted in the Mormon settlement in Utah. His subsequent career there, where he was appointed Governor by President Fillmore, and, for a time, successfully defied national authority, is a matter of national rather than State history. He remained at the head of the Mormon Church until his death at Salt Lake City, August 29, 1877.

YOUNG, Richard Montgomery, United States Senator, was born in Kentucky in 1796, studied law and removed to Jonesboro, Ill., where he was admitted to the bar in 1817; served in the Second

General Assembly (1820-22) as Representative from Union County; was a Circuit Judge, 1825-27; Presidential Elector in 1828; Circuit Judge again, 1829-37; elected United States Senator in 1837 as successor to W. L. D. Ewing, serving until 1843, when he was commissioned Justice of the Supreme Court, but resigned in 1847 to become Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington. During the session of 1850-51, he served as Clerk of the National House of Representatives. Died, in an insane asylum, in Washington, in 1853.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION, first permanently organized at Chicago, in 1858, although desultory movements of a kindred character had previously been started at Peoria, Quincy, Chicago and Springfield, some as early as 1854. From 1858 to 1872, various associations were formed at different points throughout the State, which were entirely independent of each other. The first effort looking to union and mutual aid, was made in 1872, when Robert Weidensall, on behalf of the International Committee, called a convention, to meet at Bloomington, November 6-9. State conventions have been held annually since 1872. In that of 1875, steps were taken looking to the appointment of a State Secretary, and, in 1876, Charles M. Morton assumed the office. Much evangelistic work was done, and new associations formed, the total number reported at the Champaign Convention, in 1877, being sixty-two. After one year's work Mr. Morton resigned the secretaryship, the office remaining vacant for three years. The question of the appointment of a successor was discussed at the Decatur Convention in 1879, and, in April, 1880, I. B. Brown was made State Secretary, and has occupied the position to the present time (1899). At the date of his appointment the official figures showed sixteen associations in Illinois, with a total membership of 2,443, and property valued at $126,500, including building funds, the associations at Chicago and Aurora owning buildings. Thirteen officers were employed, none of them being in Chicago. Since 1880 the work has steadily grown, so that five Assistant State Secretaries are now employed. In 1886, a plan for arranging the State work under departmental administration was devised, but not put in operation until 1890. The present six departments of supervision are: General Supervision, in charge of the State Secretary and his Assistants; railroad and city work; counties and towns; work among students; corresponding membership department, and office work. The two last named are under one executive head, but each of the others in charge of an Assistant Secretary, who is responsible for its development. The entire work is under the supervision of a State Executive Committee of twenty-seven members, one-third of whom are elected annually. Willis H. Herrick of Chicago has been its chairman for several years. This body is appointed by a State convention composed of delegates from the local Associations. Of these there were, in October, 1898, 116, with a membership of 15,888. The value of the property owned was $2,500,000. Twenty-two occupy their own buildings, of which five are for railroad men and one for students. Weekly gatherings for young men numbered 248, and there are now representatives or correspondents in 665 communities where no organization has been effected. Scientific physical culture is made a feature by 40 associations, and educational work has been largely developed. The enrollment in evening classes, during 1898-99, was 978. The building of the Chicago branch (erected in 1893) is the finest of its class in the world. Recently a successful association has been formed among coal miners, and another among the first grade boys of the Illinois State Reformatory, while an extensive work has been conducted at the camps of the Illinois National Guard.

ZANE, Charles S., lawyer and jurist, was born in Cumberland County, N. J., March 2, 1831, of English and New England stock. At the age of 19 he emigrated to Sangamon County, Ill., for a time working on a farm and at brick-making. From 1852 to '55 he attended McKendree College, but did not graduate, and, on leaving college, engaged in teaching, at the same time reading law. In 1857 he was admitted to the bar and commenced practice at Springfield. The following year he was elected City Attorney. He had for partners, at different times, William H. Herndon (once a partner of Abraham Lincoln) and Senator Shelby M. Cullom. In 1873 he was elected a Judge of the Circuit Court for the Fifth Judicial Circuit, and was re-elected in 1879. In 1883 President Arthur appointed him Chief Justice of Utah, where he has since resided, though superseded by the appointment of a successor by President Cleveland. At the first State election in Utah, held in November, 1895, he was chosen one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the new Commonwealth, but was defeated for re-election, by his Democratic opponent, in 1898.

SUPPLEMENT.

The following matter, received too late for insertion in the body of this work, is added in the form of a supplement.

COGHLAN, (Capt.) Joseph Bullock, naval officer, was born in Kentucky, and, at the age of 15 years, came to Illinois, living on a farm for a time near Carlyle, in Clinton County. In 1860 he was appointed by his uncle, Hon. Philip B. Fouke—then a Representative in Congress from the Belleville District—to the Naval Academy at Annapolis, graduating in 1863, and being promoted through the successive grades of Ensign, Master, Lieutenant, Lieutenant-Commander, and Commander, and serving upon various vessels until Nov. 18, 1896, when he was commissioned Captain and, in 1897, assigned to the command of the battleship Raleigh, on the Asiatic Station. He was thus connected with Admiral Dewey's squadron at the beginning of the Spanish-American War, and took a conspicuous and brilliant part in the affair in Manila Bay, on May 1, 1898, which resulted in the destruction of the Spanish fleet. Captain Coghlan's connection with subsequent events in the Philippines was in the highest degree creditable to himself and the country. His vessel (the Raleigh) was the first of Admiral Dewey's squadron to return home, coming by way of the Suez Canal, in the summer of 1899, he and his crew receiving an immense ovation on their arrival in New York harbor.

CRANE, (Rev.) James Lyons, clergyman, army chaplain, was born at Mt. Eaton, Wayne County, Ohio, August 30, 1823, united with the Methodist Episcopal Church at Cincinnati in 1841, and, coming to Edgar County, Illinois, in 1842, attended a seminary at Paris some three years. He joined the Illinois Conference in 1846, and was assigned to the Danville circuit, afterwards presiding over charges at Grandview, Hillsboro, Alton, Jacksonville, and Springfield—at the last two points being stationed two or more times, besides serving as Presiding Elder of the Paris, Danville, and Springfield Districts. The importance of the stations which he filled during his itinerant career served as evidence of his recognized ability and popularity as a preacher.

In July, 1861, he was appointed Chaplain of the Twenty-first Regiment Illinois Volunteers, at that time commanded by Ulysses S. Grant as Colonel, and, although he remained with the regiment only a few months, the friendship then established between him and the future commander of the armies of the Union lasted through their lives. This was shown by his appointment by President Grant, in 1869, to the position of Postmaster of the city of Springfield, which came to him as a personal compliment, being re-appointed four years afterwards and continuing in office eight years. After retiring from the Springfield postoffice, he occupied charges at Island Grove and Shelbyville, his death occurring at the latter place, July 29, 1879, as the result of an attack of paralysis some two weeks previous. Mr. Crane was married in 1847 to Miss Elizabeth Mayo, daughter of Col. J. Mayo—a prominent citizen of Edgar County, at an early day—his wife surviving him some twenty years. Rev. Charles A. Crane and Rev. Frank Crane, pastors of prominent Methodist churches in Boston and Chicago, are sons of the subject of this sketch.

DAWES, Charles Gates, Comptroller of the Treasury, was born at Marietta, Ohio, August 27, 1865; graduated from Marietta College in 1884, and from the Cincinnati Law School in 1886; worked at civil engineering during his vacations, finally becoming Chief Engineer of the Toledo & Ohio Railroad. Between 1887 and 1894 he was engaged in the practice of law at Lincoln, Neb., but afterwards became interested in the gas business in various cities, including Evanston, Ill., which became his home. In 1896 he took a leading part in securing instructions by the Republican State Convention at Springfield in favor of the nomination of Mr. McKinley for the Presidency, and during the succeeding campaign served as a member of the National Republican Committee for the State of Illinois. Soon after the accession of President McKinley, he was appointed Comptroller of the Treasury, a position which he now holds. Mr. Dawes is the son of R. B. Dawes, a former Congressman from Ohio, and the great-grandson of Manasseh Cutler, who was an influential factor in the early history of the Northwest Territory, and has been credited with exerting a strong influence in shaping and securing the adoption of the Ordinance of 1787.

DISTIN, (Col.) William L., former Department Commander of Grand Army of the Republic for the State of Illinois, was born at Cincinnati, Ohio, Feb. 9, 1843, his father being of English descent, while his maternal grandfather was a Colonel of the Polish Lancers in the army of the first Napoleon, who, after the exile of his leader, came to America, settling in Indiana. The father of the subject of this sketch settled at Keokuk, Iowa, where the son grew to manhood and in February, 1863, enlisted as a private in the Seventeenth Iowa Infantry, having been twice rejected previously on account of physical ailment. Soon after enlistment he was detailed for provost-marshal duty, but later took part with his regiment in the campaign in Alabama. He served for a time in the Fifteenth Army Corps, under Gen. John A. Logan, was subsequently detailed for duty on the Staff of General Raum, and participated in the battles of Resaca and Tilton, Ga. Having been captured in the latter, he was imprisoned successively at Jacksonville (Ga.), Montgomery, Savannah, and finally at Andersonville. From the latter he succeeded in effecting his escape, but was recaptured and returned to that famous prison-pen. Having escaped a second time by assuming the name of a dead man and bribing the guard, he was again captured and imprisoned at various points in Mississippi until exchanged about the time of the assassination of President Lincoln. He was then so weakened by his long confinement and scanty fare that he had to be carried on board the steamer on a stretcher. At this time he narrowly escaped being on board the steamer Sultana, which was blown up below Cairo, with 2,100 soldiers on board, a large proportion of whom lost their lives. After being mustered out at Davenport, Iowa, June 28, 1865, he was employed for a time on the Des Moines Valley Railroad, and as a messenger and route agent of the United States Express Company. In 1873 he established himself in business in Quincy, Ill., in which he proved very successful. Here he became prominent in local Grand Army circles, and, in 1890, was unanimously elected Commander of the Department of Illinois. Previous to this he had been an officer of the Illinois National Guard, and served as Aid-de-Camp, with the rank of Colonel, on the staff of Governors Hamilton, Oglesby and Fifer. In 1897 Colonel Distin was appointed by President McKinley Surveyor-General for the Territory of Alaska, a position which (1899) he still holds.

DUMMER, Henry E., lawyer, was born at Hallowell, Maine, April 9, 1808, was educated in Bowdoin College, graduating there in the class of 1827, after which he took a course in law at Cambridge Law School, and was soon after admitted to the bar. Then, having spent some two years in his native State, in 1832 he removed to Illinois, settling first in Springfield, where he remained six years, being for a part of the time a partner of John T. Stuart, who afterwards became the first partner in law of Abraham Lincoln. Mr. Dummer had a brother, Richard William Dummer, who had preceded him to Illinois, living for a time in Jacksonville. In 1838 he removed to Beardstown, Cass County, which continued to be his home for more than a quarter of a century. During his residence there he served as Alderman, City Attorney and Judge of Probate for Cass County; also represented Cass County in the Constitutional Convention of 1847, and, in 1860, was elected State Senator in the Twenty-second General Assembly, serving four years. Mr. Dummer was an earnest Republican, and served that party as a delegate for the State-at-large to the Convention of 1864, at Baltimore, which nominated Abraham Lincoln for the Presidency a second time. In 1864 he removed to Jacksonville, and for the next year was the law partner of David A. Smith, until the death of the latter in 1865. In the summer of 1878 Mr. Dummer went to Mackinac, Mich., in search of health, but died there August 12 of that year.

ECKELS, James H., ex-Comptroller of the Currency, was born of Scotch-Irish parentage at Princeton, Ill., Nov. 22, 1858, was educated in the common schools and the high school of his native town, graduated from the Law School at Albany, N. Y., in 1881, and the following year began practice at Ottawa, Ill. Here he continued in active practice until 1893, when he was appointed by President Cleveland Comptroller of the Currency, serving until May 1, 1898, when he resigned to accept the presidency of the Commercial National Bank of Chicago. Mr. Eckels manifested such distinguished ability in the discharge of his duties as Comptroller that he received the notable compliment of being retained in office by a Republican administration more than a year after the retirement of President Cleveland, while his selection for a place at the head of one of the leading banking institutions of Chicago was a no less marked recognition of his abilities as a financier. He was a Delegate from the Eleventh District to the National Democratic Convention at Chicago in 1892, and represented the same district in the Gold Democratic Convention at Indianapolis in 1896, and assisted in framing the platform there adopted—which indicated his views on the financial questions involved in the campaign of that year.

FIELD, Daniel, early merchant, was born in Jefferson County, Kentucky, Nov. 30, 1790, and settled at Golconda, Ill., in 1818, dying there in 1855. He was a man of great enterprise, engaged in merchandising, and became a large landholder, farmer and stock-grower, and an extensive shipper of stock and produce to lower Mississippi markets. He married Elizabeth Dailey of Charleston, Ind., and raised a large family of children, one of whom, Philip D., became Sheriff, while another, John, was County Judge of Pope County. His daughter, Maria, married Gen. Green B. Raum, who became prominent as a soldier during the Civil War and, later, as a member of Congress and Commissioner of Internal Revenue and Pension Commissioner in Washington.

FIELD, Green B., member of a pioneer family, was born within the present limits of the State of Indiana in 1787, served as a Lieutenant in the War of 1812, was married in Bourbon County, Kentucky, to Miss Mary E. Cogswell, the daughter of Dr. Joseph Cogswell, a soldier of the Revolutionary War, and, in 1817, removed to Pope County, Illinois, where he laid off the town of Golconda, which became the county-seat. He served as a Representative from Pope County in the First General Assembly (1818-20), and was the father of Juliet C. Field, who became the wife of John Raum; of Edna Field, the wife of Dr. Turlton Dunn, and of Green B. Field, who was a Lieutenant in Third Regiment Illinois Volunteers during the Mexican War. Mr. Field was the grandfather of Gen. Green B. Raum, mentioned in the preceding paragraph. He died of yellow fever in Louisiana in 1823.

GALE, Stephen Francis, first Chicago book-seller and a railway promoter, was born at Exeter, N. H., March 8, 1812; at 15 years of age became clerk in a leading book-store in Boston; came to Chicago in 1835, and soon afterwards opened the first book and stationery establishment in that city, which, in after years, gained an extensive trade. In 1842 the firm of S. F.

Gale & Co. was organized, but Mr. Gale, having become head of the Chicago Fire Department, retired from business in 1845. As early as 1846 he was associated with Wm. B. Ogden and John B. Turner in the steps then being taken to revive the Galena & Chicago Union Railroad (now a part of the Chicago & Northwestern), and, in conjunction with these gentlemen, became responsible for the means to purchase the charter and assets of the road from the Eastern bondholders. Later, he engaged in the construction of the branch road from Turner Junction to Aurora, became President of the line and extended it to Mendota to connect with the Illinois Central at that Point. These roads afterwards became a part of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy line. A number of years ago Mr. Gale returned to his old home in New Hampshire, where he has since resided.

HAY, John, early settler, came to the region of Kaskaskia between 1790 and 1800, and became a prominent citizen of St. Clair County. He was selected as a member of the First Legislative Council of Indiana Territory for St. Clair County in 1805. In 1809 he was appointed Clerk of the Common Pleas Court of St. Clair County, and was continued in office after the organization of the State Government, serving until his death at Belleville in 1845.

HAYS, John, pioneer settler of Northwest Territory, was a native of New York, who came to Cahokia, in the "Illinois Country," in 1793, and lived there the remainder of his life. His early life had been spent in the fur-trade about Mackinac, in the Lake of the Woods region and about the sources of the Mississippi. During the War of 1812 he was able to furnish Governor Edwards valuable information in reference to the Indians in the Northwest. He filled the office of Postmaster at Cahokia for a number of years, and was Sheriff of St. Clair County from 1798 to 1818.

MOULTON, (Col.) George M., soldier and building contractor, was born at Readsburg, Vt., March 15, 1851, came early in life to Chicago, and was educated in the schools of that city. By profession he is a contractor and builder, the firm of which he is a member having been connected with the construction of a number of large buildings, including some extensive grain elevators. Colonel Moulton became a member of the Second Regiment Illinois National Guard in June, 1884, being elected to the office of Major, which he retained until January, 1893, when he was appointed Inspector of Rifle Practice on the staff of General Wheeler. A year later he was commissioned Colonel of the regiment, a position which he occupied at the time of the call by the President for troops to serve in the Spanish-American War in April, 1898. He promptly answered the call, and was sworn into the United States service at the head of his regiment early in May. The regiment was almost immediately ordered to Jacksonville, Fla., remaining there and at Savannah, Ga., until early in December, when it was transferred to Havana, Cuba. Here he was soon after appointed Chief of Police for the city of Havana, remaining in office until the middle of January, 1899, when he returned to his regiment, then stationed at Camp Columbia, near the city of Havana. In the latter part of March he returned with his regiment to Augusta, Ga., where it was mustered out, April 26, 1899, one year from the date of its arrival at Springfield. After leaving the service Colonel Moulton resumed his business as a contractor.

SHERMAN, Lawrence Y., legislator and Speaker of the Forty-first General Assembly, was born in Miami County, Ohio, Nov. 6, 1858; at 3 years of age came to Illinois, his parents settling at Industry, McDonough County. When he had reached the age of 10 years he went to Jasper County, where he grew to manhood, received his education in the common schools and in the law department of McKendree College, graduating from the latter, and, in 1881, located at Macomb, McDonough County. Here he began his career by driving a team upon the street in order to accumulate means enabling him to devote his entire attention to his chosen profession of law. He soon took an active interest in politics, was elected County Judge in 1886, and, at the expiration of his term, formed a partnership with George D. Tunnicliffe and D. G. Tunnicliffe, ex-Justice of the Supreme Court. In 1894 he was a candidate for the Republican nomination for Representative in the General Assembly, but withdrew to prevent a split in the party; was nominated and elected in 1896, and re-elected in 1898, and, at the succeeding session of the Forty-first General Assembly, was nominated by the Republican caucus and elected Speaker, as he was again of the Forty-second in 1901.

VINYARD, Philip, early legislator, was born in Pennsylvania in 1800, came to Illinois at an early day, and settled in Pope County, which he represented in the lower branch of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth General Assemblies. He married Miss Matilda McCoy, the daughter of a prominent Illinois pioneer, and served as Sheriff of Pope County for a number of years. Died, at Golconda, in 1862.

SUPPLEMENT NO. II.

BLACK HAWK WAR, THE. The episode known in history under the name of "The Black Hawk War," was the most formidable conflict between the whites and Indians, as well as the most far-reaching in its results, that ever occurred upon the soil of Illinois. It takes its name from the Indian Chief, of the Sac tribe, Black Hawk (Indian name, Makatai Meshekiakiak, meaning "Black Sparrow Hawk"), who was the leader of the hostile Indian band and a principal factor in the struggle. Black Hawk had been an ally of the British during the War of 1812-15, served with Tecumseh when the latter fell at the battle of the Thames in 1813, and, after the war, continued to maintain friendly relations with his "British father." The outbreak in Illinois had its origin in the construction put upon the treaty negotiated by Gen. William Henry Harrison with the Sac and Fox Indians on behalf of the United States Government, November 3, 1804, under which the Indians transferred to the Government nearly 15,000,000 acres of land comprising the region lying between the Wisconsin River on the north, Fox River of Illinois on the east and southeast, and the Mississippi on the west, for which the Government agreed to pay to the confederated tribes less than $2,500 in goods and the insignificant sum of $1,000 per annum in perpetuity. While the validity of the treaty was denied on the part of the Indians on the ground that it had originally been entered into by their chiefs under duress, while held as prisoners under a charge of murder at Jefferson Barracks, during which they had been kept in a state of constant intoxication, it had been repeatedly reaffirmed by parts or all of the tribe, especially in 1815, in 1816, in 1822 and in 1823, and finally recognized by Black Hawk himself in 1831. The part of the treaty of 1804 which was the immediate cause of the disagreement was that which stipulated that, so long as the lands ceded under it remained the property of the United States (that is, should not be transferred to private owners), "the Indians belonging to the said tribes shall enjoy the privilege of living or hunting upon them." Although these lands had not been put upon the market, or even surveyed, as "squatters" multiplied in this region little respect was paid to the treaty rights of the Indians, particularly with reference to those localities where, by reason of fertility of the soil or some other natural advantage, the Indians had established something like permanent homes and introduced a sort of crude cultivation. This was especially the case with reference to the Sac village of "Saukenuk" on the north bank of Rock River near its mouth, where the Indians, when not absent on the chase, had lived for over a century, had cultivated fields of corn and vegetables and had buried their dead. In the early part of the last century, it is estimated that some five hundred families had been accustomed to congregate here, making it the largest Indian village in the West. As early as 1823 the encroachments of squatters on the rights claimed by the Indians under the treaty of 1804 began; their fields were taken possession of by the intruders, their lodges burned and their women and children whipped and driven away during the absence of the men on their annual hunts. The dangers resulting from these conflicts led Governor Edwards, as early as 1828, to demand of the General Government the expulsion of the Indians from Illinois, which resulted in an order from President Jackson in 1829 for their removal west of the Mississippi. On application of Col. George Davenport, a trader of much influence with the Indians, the time was extended to April 1, 1830. During the preceding year Colonel Davenport and the firm of Davenport and Farnham bought from the United States Government most of the lands on Rock River occupied by Black Hawk's band, with the intention, as has been claimed, of permitting the Indians to remain. This was not so understood by Black Hawk, who was greatly incensed, although Davenport offered to take other lands from the Government in exchange or cancel the sale—an arrangement to which President Jackson would not consent. On their return in the spring of 1830, the Indians found whites in possession of their village. Prevented from cultivating their fields, and their annual hunt proving unsuccessful, the following winter proved for them one of great hardship. Black Hawk, having made a visit to his "British father" (the British Agent) at Malden, Canada, claimed to have received words of sympathy and encouragement, which induced him to determine to regain possession of their fields. In this he was encouraged by Neapope, his second in command, and by assurance of support from White Cloud, a half Sac and half Winnebago—known also as "The Prophet"—whose village (Prophet's Town) was some forty miles from the mouth of Rock River, and through whom Black Hawk claimed to have received promises of aid in guns, ammunition and provisions from the British. The reappearance of Black Hawk's band in the vicinity of his old haunts, in the spring of 1831, produced a wild panic among the frontier settlers. Messages were hurried to Governor Reynolds, who had succeeded Governor Edwards in December previous, appealing for protection against the savages. The Governor issued a call for 700 volunteers "to remove the band of Sac Indians" at Rock Island beyond the Mississippi. Although Gen. E. P. Gaines of the regular army, commanding the military district, thought the regulars sufficiently strong to cope with the situation, the Governor's proclamation was responded to by more than twice the number called for. The volunteers assembled early in June, 1831, at Beardstown, the place of rendezvous named in the call, and having been organized into two regiments under command of Col. James D. Henry and Col. Daniel Lieb, with a spy battalion under Gen. Joseph Duncan, marched across the country and, after effecting a junction with General Gaines' regulars, appeared before Black Hawk's village on the 25th of June. In the meantime General Gaines, having learned that the Pottawatomies, Winnebagos and Kickapoos had promised to join the Sacs in their uprising, asked the assistance of the battalion of mounted men previously offered by Governor Reynolds. The combined armies amounted to 2,500 men, while the fighting force of the Indians was 300. Finding himself overwhelmingly outnumbered, Black Hawk withdrew under cover of night to the west side of the Mississippi. After burning the village, General Gaines notified Black Hawk of his intention to pursue and attack his band, which had the effect to bring the fugitive chief to the General's headquarters, where, on June 30, a new treaty was entered into by which he bound himself and his people to remain west of the Mississippi unless permitted to return by the United States. This ended the campaign, and the volunteers returned to their homes, although the affair had produced an intense excitement along the whole frontier, and involved a heavy expense.

The next winter was spent by Black Hawk and his band on the site of old Fort Madison, in the present State of Iowa. Dissatisfied and humiliated by his repulse of the previous year, in disregard of his pledge to General Gaines, on April 6, 1832, at the head of 500 warriors and their families, he again crossed the Mississippi at Yellow Banks about the site of the present city of Oquawka, fifty miles below Rock Island, with the intention, as claimed, if not permitted to stop at his old village, to proceed to the Prophet's Town and raise a crop with the Winnebagoes. Here he was met by The Prophet with renewed assurances of aid from the Winnebagoes, which was still further strengthened by promises from the British Agent received through a visit by Neapope to Malden the previous autumn. An incident of this invasion was the effective warning given to the white settlers by Shabona, a friendly Ottawa chief, which probably had the effect to prevent a widespread massacre. Besides the towns of Galena and Chicago, the settlements in Illinois north of Fort Clark (Peoria) were limited to some thirty families on Bureau Creek with a few cabins at Hennepin, Peru, LaSalle, Ottawa, Indian Creek, Dixon, Kellogg's Grove, Apple Creek, and a few other points. Gen. Henry Atkinson, commanding the regulars at Fort Armstrong (Rock Island), having learned of the arrival of Black Hawk a week after he crossed the Mississippi, at once took steps to notify Governor Reynolds of the situation with a requisition for an adequate force of militia to cooperate with the regulars. Under date of April 16, 1832, the Governor issued his call for "a strong detachment of militia," to meet by April 23, Beardstown again being named as a place of rendezvous. The call resulted in the assembling of a force which was organized into four regiments under command of Cols. John DeWitt, Jacob Fry, John Thomas and Samuel M. Thompson, together with a spy battalion under Maj. James D. Henry, an odd battalion under Maj. Thomas James and a foot battalion under Maj. Thomas Long. To these were subsequently added two independent battalions of mounted men, under command of Majors Isaiah Stillman and David Bailey, which were finally consolidated as the Fifth Regiment under command of Col. James Johnson. The organization of the first four regiments at Beardstown was completed by April 27, and the force under command of Brigadier-General Whiteside (but accompanied by Governor Reynolds, who was allowed pay as Major General by the General Government) began its march to Fort Armstrong, arriving there May 7 and being mustered into the United States service. Among others accompanying the expedition who were then, or afterwards became, noted citizens of the State, were Vital Jarrot, Adjutant-General; Cyrus Edwards, Ordnance Officer; Murray McConnel, Staff Officer, and Abraham Lincoln, Captain of a company of volunteers from Sangamon County in the Fourth Regiment. Col. Zachary Taylor, then commander of a regiment of regulars, arrived at Fort Armstrong about the same time with reinforcements from Fort Leavenworth and Fort Crawford. The total force of militia amounted to 1,935 men, and of regulars about 1,000. An interesting story is told concerning a speech delivered to the volunteers by Colonel Taylor about this time. After reminding them of their duty to obey an order promptly, the future hero of the Mexican War added: "The safety of all depends upon the obedience and courage of all. You are citizen soldiers; some of you may fill high offices, or even be Presidents some day—but not if you refuse to do your duty. Forward, march!" A curious commentary upon this speech is furnished in the fact that, while Taylor himself afterwards became President, at least one of his hearers—a volunteer who probably then had no aspiration to that distinction (Abraham Lincoln)—reached the same position during the most dramatic period in the nation's history.

Two days after the arrival at Fort Armstrong, the advance up Rock River began, the main force of the volunteers proceeding by land under General Whiteside, while General Atkinson, with 400 regular and 300 volunteer foot soldiers, proceeded by boat, carrying with him the artillery, provisions and bulk of the baggage. Whiteside, advancing by the east bank of the river, was the first to arrive at the Prophet's Town, which, finding deserted, he pushed on to Dixon's Ferry (now Dixon), where he arrived May 12. Here he found the independent battalions of Stillman and Bailey with ammunition and supplies of which Whiteside stood in need. The mounted battalions under command of Major Stillman, having been sent forward by Whiteside as a scouting party, left Dixon on the 13th and, on the afternoon of the next day, went into camp in a strong position near the mouth of Sycamore Creek. As soon discovered, Black Hawk was in camp at the same time, as he afterwards claimed, with about forty of his braves, on Sycamore Creek, three miles distant, while the greater part of his band were encamped with the more war-like faction of the Pottawatomies some seven miles farther north on the Kishwaukee River. As claimed by Black Hawk in his autobiography, having been disappointed in his expectation of forming an alliance with the Winnebagoes and the Pottawatomies, he had at this juncture determined to return to the west side of the Mississippi. Hearing of the arrival of Stillman's command in the vicinity, and taking it for granted that this was the whole of Atkinson's command, he sent out three of his young men with a white flag, to arrange a parley and convey to Atkinson his offer to meet the latter in council. These were captured by some of Stillman's band regardless of their flag of truce, while a party of five other braves who followed to observe the treatment received by the flagbearers, were attacked and two of their number killed, the other three escaping to their camp. Black Hawk learning the fate of his truce party was aroused to the fiercest indignation. Tearing the flag to pieces with which he had intended to go into council with the whites, and appealing to his followers to avenge the murder of their comrades, he prepared for the attack. The rangers numbered 275 men, while Black Hawk's band has been estimated at less than forty. As the rangers caught sight of the Indians, they rushed forward in pell-mell fashion. Retiring behind a fringe of bushes, the Indians awaited the attack. As the rangers approached, Black Hawk and his party rose up with a war whoop, at the same time opening fire on their assailants. The further history of the affair was as much of a disgrace to Stillman's command as had been their desecration of the flag of truce. Thrown into panic by their reception by Black Hawk's little band, the rangers turned and, without firing a shot, began the retreat, dashing through their own camp and abandoning everything, which fell into the hands of the Indians. An attempt was made by one or two officers and a few of their men to check the retreat, but without success, the bulk of the fugitives continuing their mad rush for safety through the night until they reached Dixon, twenty-five miles distant, while many never stopped until they reached their homes, forty or fifty miles distant. The casualties to the rangers amounted to eleven killed and two wounded, while the Indian loss consisted of two spies and one of the flag-bearers, treacherously killed near Stillman's camp. This ill-starred affair, which has passed into history as "Stillman's defeat," produced a general panic along the frontier by inducing an exaggerated estimate of the strength of the Indian force, while it led Black Hawk to form a poor opinion of the courage of the white troops at the same time that it led to an exalted estimate of the prowess of his own little band—thus becoming an important factor in prolonging the war and in the bloody massacres which followed. Whiteside, with his force of 1,400 men, advanced to the scene of the defeat the next day and buried the dead, while on the 19th, Atkinson, with his force of regulars, proceeded up Rock River, leaving the remnant of Stillman's force to guard the wounded and supplies at Dixon. No sooner had he left than the demoralized fugitives of a few days before deserted their post for their homes, compelling Atkinson to return for the protection of his base of supplies, while Whiteside was ordered to follow the trail of Black Hawk who had started up the Kishwaukee for the swamps about Lake Koshkonong, nearly west of Milwaukee within the present State of Wisconsin.

At this point the really active stage of the campaign began. Black Hawk, leaving the women and children of his band in the fastnesses of the swamps, divided his followers into two bands, retaining about 200 under his own command, while the notorious half-breed, Mike Girty, led a band of one hundred renegade Pottawatomies. Returning to the vicinity of Rock Island, he gathered some recruits from the Pottawatomies and Winnebagoes, and the work of rapine and massacre among the frontier settlers began. One of the most notable of these was the Indian Creek Massacre in LaSalle County, about twelve miles north of Ottawa, on May 21, when sixteen persons were killed at the Home of William Davis, and two young girls—Sylvia and Rachel Hall, aged, respectively, 17 and 15 years—were carried away captives. The girls were subsequently released, having been ransomed for $2,000 in horses and trinkets through a Winnebago Chief and surrendered to sub-agent Henry Gratiot. Great as was the emergency at this juncture, the volunteers began to manifest evidence of dissatisfaction and, claiming that they had served out their term of enlistment, refused to follow the Indians into the swamps of Wisconsin. As the result of a council of war, the volunteers were ordered to Ottawa, where they were mustered out on May 28, by Lieut. Robt. Anderson, afterwards General Anderson of Fort Sumter fame. Meanwhile Governor Reynolds had issued his call (with that of 1831 the third,) for 2,000 men to serve during the war. Gen. Winfield Scott was also ordered from the East with 1,000 regulars although, owing to cholera breaking out among the troops, they did not arrive in time to take part in the campaign. The rank and file of volunteers responding under the new call was 3,148, with recruits and regulars then in Illinois making an army of 4,000. Pending the arrival of the troops under the new call, and to meet an immediate emergency, 300 men were enlisted from the disbanded rangers for a period of twenty days, and organized into a regiment under command of Col. Jacob Fry, with James D. Henry as Lieutenant Colonel and John Thomas as Major. Among those who enlisted as privates in this regiment were Brig.-Gen. Whiteside and Capt. Abraham Lincoln. A regiment of five companies, numbering 195 men, from Putnam County under command of Col. John Strawn, and another of eight companies from Vermilion County under Col. Isaac R. Moore, were organized and assigned to guard duty for a period of twenty days.

The new volunteers were rendezvoused at Fort Wilbourn, nearly opposite Peru, June 15, and organized into three brigades, each consisting of three regiments and a spy battalion. The First Brigade (915 strong) was placed under command of Brig.-Gen. Alexander Posey, the Second under Gen. Milton K. Alexander, and the third under Gen. James D. Henry. Others who served as officers in some of these several organizations, and afterwards became prominent in State history, were Lieut.-Col. Gurdon S. Hubbard of the Vermilion County regiment; John A. McClernand, on the staff of General Posey; Maj. John Dement; then State Treasurer; Stinson H. Anderson, afterwards Lieutenant-Governor; Lieut.-Gov. Zadoc Casey; Maj., William McHenry; Sidney Breese (afterwards Judge of the State Supreme Court and United States Senator); W. L. D. Ewing (as Major of a spy battalion, afterwards United States Senator and State Auditor); Alexander W. Jenkins (afterwards Lieutenant-Governor); James W. Semple (afterwards United States Senator); and William Weatherford (afterwards a Colonel in the Mexican War), and many more. Of the Illinois troops, Posey's brigade was assigned to the duty of dispersing the Indians between Galena and Rock River, Alexander's sent to intercept Black Hawk up the Rock River, while Henry's remained with Gen. Atkinson at Dixon. During the next two weeks engagements of a more or less serious character were had on the Pecatonica on the southern border of the present State of Wisconsin; at Apple River Fort fourteen miles east of Galena, which was successfully defended against a force under Black Hawk himself, and at Kellogg's Grove the next day (June 25), when the same band ambushed Maj. Dement's spy battalion, and came near inflicting a defeat, which was prevented by Dement's coolness and the timely arrival of reinforcements. In the latter engagement the whites lost five killed besides 47 horses which had been tethered outside their lines, the loss of the Indians being sixteen killed. Skirmishes also occurred with varying results, at Plum River Fort, Burr Oak Grove, Sinsinawa and Blue Mounds—the last two within the present State of Wisconsin.

Believing the bulk of the Indians to be camped in the vicinity of Lake Koshkonong, General Atkinson left Dixon June 27 with a combined force of regulars and volunteers numbering 2,600 men—the volunteers being under the command of General Henry. They reached the outlet of the Lake July 2, but found no Indians, being joined two days later by General Alexander's brigade, and on the 6th by Gen. Posey's. From here the commands of Generals Henry and Alexander were sent for supplies to Fort Winnebago, at the Portage of the Wisconsin; Colonel Ewing, with the Second Regiment of Posey's brigade descending Rock River to Dixon, Posey with the remainder, going to Fort Hamilton for the protection of settlers in the lead-mining region, while Atkinson, advancing with the regulars up Lake Koshkonong, began the erection of temporary fortifications on Bark River near the site of the present village of Fort Atkinson. At Fort Winnebago Alexander and Henry obtained evidence of the actual location of Black Hawk's camp through Pierre Poquette, a half-breed scout and trader in the employ of the American Fur Company, whom they employed with a number of Winnebagoes to act as guides. From this point Alexander's command returned to General Atkinson's headquarters, carrying with them twelve day's provisions for the main army, while General Henry's (600 strong), with Major Dodge's battalion numbering 150, with an equal quantity of supplies for themselves, started under the guidance of Poquette and his Winnebago aids to find Black Hawk's camp. Arriving on the 18th at the Winnebago village on Rock River where Black Hawk and his band had been located, their camp was found deserted, the Winnebago insisting that they had gone to Cranberry (now Horicon) Lake, a half-day's march up the river. Messengers were immediately dispatched to Atkinson's headquarters, thirty-five miles distant, to apprise him of this fact. When they had proceeded about half the distance, they struck a broad, fresh trail, which proved to be that of Black Hawk's band headed westward toward the Mississippi. The guide having deserted them in order to warn his tribesmen that further dissembling to deceive the whites as to the whereabouts of the Sacs was useless, the messengers were compelled to follow him to General Henry's camp. The discovery produced the wildest enthusiasm among the volunteers, and from this time events followed in rapid succession. Leaving as far as possible all incumbrances behind, the pursuit of the fugitives was begun without delay, the troops wading through swamps sometimes in water to their armpits. Soon evidence of the character of the flight the Indians were making, in the shape of exhausted horses, blankets, and camp equipage cast aside along the trail, began to appear, and straggling bands of Winnebagoes, who had now begun to desert Black Hawk, gave information that the Indians were only a few miles in advance. On the evening of the 20th of July Henry's forces encamped at "The Four Lakes," the present site of the city of Madison, Wis., Black Hawk's force lying in ambush the same night seven or eight miles distant. During the next afternoon the rear-guard of the Indians under Neapope was overtaken and skirmishing continued until the bluffs of the Wisconsin were reached. Black Hawk's avowed object was to protect the passage of the main body of his people across the stream. The loss of the Indians in these skirmishes has been estimated at 40 to 68, while Black Hawk claimed that it was only six killed, the loss of the whites being one killed and eight wounded. During the night Black Hawk succeeded in placing a considerable number of the women and children and old men on a raft and in canoes obtained from the Winnebagoes, and sent them down the river, believing that, as non-combatants, they would be permitted by the regulars to pass Fort Crawford, at the mouth of the Wisconsin, undisturbed. In this he was mistaken. A force sent from the fort under Colonel Ritner to intercept them, fired mercilessly upon the helpless fugitives, killing fifteen of their number, while about fifty were drowned and thirty-two women and children made prisoners. The remainder, escaping into the woods, with few exceptions died from starvation and exposure, or were massacred by their enemies, the Menominees, acting under white officers. During the night after the battle of Wisconsin Heights, a loud, shrill voice of some one speaking in an unknown tongue was heard in the direction where Black Hawk's band was supposed to be. This caused something of a panic in Henry's camp, as it was supposed to come from some one giving orders for an attack. It was afterwards learned that the speaker was Neapope speaking in the Winnebago language in the hope that he might be heard by Poquette and the Winnebago guides. He was describing the helpless condition of his people, claiming that the war had been forced upon them, that their women and children were starving, and that, if permitted peacefully to recross the Mississippi, they would give no further trouble. Unfortunately Poquette and the other guides had left for Fort Winnebago, so that no one was there to translate Neapope's appeal and it failed of its object.

General Henry's force having discovered that the Indians had escaped—Black Hawk heading with the bulk of his warriors towards the Mississippi—spent the next day and night on the field, but on the following day (July 23) started to meet General Atkinson, who had, in the meantime, been notified of the pursuit. The head of their columns met at Blue Mounds, the same evening, a complete junction between the regulars and the volunteers being effected at Helena, a deserted village on the Wisconsin. Here by using the logs of the deserted cabins for rafts, the army crossed the river on the 27th and the 28th and the pursuit of black Hawk's fugitive band was renewed. Evidence of their famishing condition was found in the trees stripped of bark for food, the carcasses of dead ponies, with here and there the dead body of an Indian.

On August 1, Black Hawk's depleted and famishing band reached the Mississippi two miles below the mouth of the Bad Ax, an insignificant stream, and immediately began trying to cross the river; but having only two or three canoes, the work was slow. About the middle of the afternoon the steam transport, "Warrior," appeared on the scene, having on board a score of regulars and volunteers, returning from a visit to the village of the Sioux Chief, Wabasha, to notify him that his old enemies, the Sacs, were headed in that direction. Black Hawk raised the white flag in token of surrender, but the officer in command claiming that he feared treachery or an ambush, demanded that Black Hawk should come on board. This he was unable to do, as he had no canoe. After waiting a few minutes a murderous fire of canister and musketry was opened from the steamer on the few Indians on shore, who made such feeble resistance as they were able. The result was the killing of one white man and twenty-three Indians. After this exploit the "Warrior" proceeded to Prairie du Chien, twelve or fifteen miles distant, for fuel. During the night a few more of the Indians crossed the river, but Black Hawk, seeing the hopelessness of further resistance, accompanied by the Prophet, and taking with him a party of ten warriors and thirty-five squaws and children, fled in the direction of "the dells" of the Wisconsin. On the morning of the 2d General Atkinson arrived within four or five miles of the Sac position. Disposing his forces with the regulars and Colonel Dodge's rangers in the center, the brigades of Posey and Alexander on the right and Henry's on the left, he began the pursuit, but was drawn by the Indian decoys up the river from the place where the main body of the Indians were trying to cross the stream. This had the effect of leaving General Henry in the rear practically without orders, but it became the means of making his command the prime factors in the climax which followed. Some of the spies attached to Henry's command having accidentally discovered the trail of the main body of the fugitives, he began the pursuit without waiting for orders and soon found himself engaged with some 300 savages, a force nearly equal to his own. It was here that the only thing like a regular battle occurred. The savages fought with the fury of despair, while Henry's force was no doubt nerved to greater deeds of courage by the insult which they conceived had been put upon them by General Atkinson. Atkinson, hearing the battle in progress and discovering that he was being led off on a false scent, soon joined Henry's force with his main army, and the steamer "Warrior," arriving from Prairie du Chien, opened a fire of canister upon the pent-up Indians. The battle soon degenerated into a massacre. In the course of the three hours through which it lasted, it is estimated that 150 Indians were killed by fire from the troops, an equal number of both sexes and all ages drowned while attempting to cross the river or by being driven into it, while about 50 (chiefly women and children) were made prisoners. The loss of the whites was 20 killed and 13 wounded. When the "battle" was nearing its close it is said that Black Hawk, having repented the abandonment of his people, returned within sight of the battle-ground, but seeing the slaughter in progress which he was powerless to avert, he turned and, with a howl of rage and horror, fled into the forest. About 300 Indians (mostly non-combatants) succeeded in crossing the river in a condition of exhaustion from hunger and fatigue, but these were set upon by the Sioux under Chief Wabasha, through the suggestion and agency of General Atkinson, and nearly one-half their number exterminated. Of the remainder many died from wounds and exhaustion, while still others perished while attempting to reach Keokuk's band who had refused to join in Black Hawk's desperate venture. Of one thousand who crossed to the east side of the river with Black Hawk in April, it is estimated that not more than 150 survived the tragic events of the next four months.

General Scott, having arrived at Prairie du Chien early in August, assumed command and, on August 15, mustered out the volunteers at Dixon, Ill. After witnessing the bloody climax at the Bad Axe of his ill-starred invasion, Black Hawk fled to the dells of the Wisconsin, where he and the Prophet surrendered themselves to the Winnebagoes, by whom they were delivered to the Indian Agent at Prairie du Chien. Having been taken to Fort Armstrong on September 21, he there signed a treaty of peace. Later he was taken to Jefferson Barracks (near St. Louis) in the custody of Jefferson Davis, then a Lieutenant in the regular army, where he was held a captive during the following winter. The connection of Davis with the Black Hawk War, mentioned by many historians, seems to have been confined to this act. In April, 1833, with the Prophet and Neapope, he was taken to Washington and then to Fortress Monroe, where they were detained as prisoners of war until June 4, when they were released. Black Hawk, after being taken to many principal cities in order to impress him with the strength of the American nation, was brought to Fort Armstrong, and there committed to the guardianship of his rival, Keokuk, but survived this humiliation only a few years, dying on a small reservation set apart for him in Davis County, Iowa, October 3, 1838.

Such is the story of the Black Hawk War, the most notable struggle with the aborigines in Illinois history. At its beginning both the State and national authorities were grossly misled by an exaggerated estimate of the strength of Black Hawk's force as to numbers and his plans for recovering the site of his old village, while

Black Hawk had conceived a low estimate of the numbers and courage of his white enemies, especially after the Stillman defeat. The cost of the war to the State and nation in money has been estimated at $2,000,000, and in sacrifice of life on both sides at not less than 1,200. The loss of life by the troops in irregular skirmishes, and in massacres of settlers by the Indians, aggregated about 250, while an equal number of regulars perished from a visitation of cholera at the various stations within the district affected by the war, especially at Detroit, Chicago, Fort Armstrong and Galena. Yet it is the judgment of later historians that nearly all this sacrifice of life and treasure might have been avoided, but for a series of blunders due to the blind or unscrupulous policy of officials or interloping squatters upon lands which the Indians had occupied under the treaty of 1804. A conspicuous blunder—to call it by no harsher name—was the violation by Stillman's command of the rules of civilized warfare in the attack made upon Black Hawk's messengers, sent under flag of truce to request a conference to settle terms under which he might return to the west side of the Mississippi—an act which resulted in a humiliating and disgraceful defeat for its authors and proved the first step in actual war. Another misfortune was the failure to understand Neapope's appeal for peace and permission for his people to pass beyond the Mississippi the night after the battle of Wisconsin Heights; and the third and most inexcusable blunder of all, was the refusal of the officer in command of the "Warrior" to respect Black Hawk's flag of truce and request for a conference just before the bloody massacre which has gone into history under the name of the "battle of the Bad Axe." Either of these events, properly availed of, would have prevented much of the butchery of that bloody episode which has left a stain upon the page of history, although this statement implies no disposition to detract from the patriotism and courage of some of the leading actors upon whom the responsibility was placed of protecting the frontier settler from outrage and massacre. One of the features of the war was the bitter jealousy engendered by the unwise policy pursued by General Atkinson towards some of the volunteers—especially the treatment of General James D. Henry, who, although subjected to repeated slights and insults, is regarded by Governor Ford and others as the real hero of the war. Too brave a soldier to shirk any responsibility and too modest to exploit his own deeds, he felt deeply the studied purpose of his superior to ignore him in the conduct of the campaign—a purpose which, as in the affair at the Bad Axe, was defeated by accident or by General Henry's soldierly sagacity and attention to duty, although he gave out to the public no utterance of complaint. Broken in health by the hardships and exposures of the campaign, he went South soon after the war and died of consumption, unknown and almost alone, in the city of New Orleans, less than two years later.

Aside from contemporaneous newspaper accounts, monographs, and manuscripts on file in public libraries relating to this epoch in State history, the most comprehensive records of the Black Hawk War are to be found in the "Life of Black Hawk," dictated by himself (1834); Wakefield's "History of the War between the United States and the Sac and Fox Nations" (1834); Drake's "Life of Black Hawk" (1854); Ford's "History of Illinois" (1854); Reynolds' "Pioneer History of Illinois; and "My Own Times"; Davidson & Stuve's and Moses' Histories of Illinois; Blanchard's "The Northwest and Chicago"; Armstrong's "The Sauks and the Black Hawk War," and Reuben G. Thwaite's "Story of the Black Hawk War" (1892.)

CHICAGO HEIGHTS, a village in the southern part of Cook County, twenty-eight miles south of the central part of Chicago, on the Chicago & Eastern Illinois, the Elgin, Joliet & Eastern and the Michigan Central Railroads; is located in an agricultural region, but has some manufactures as well as good schools—also has one newspaper. Population (1900), 5,100.

GRANITE, a city of Madison County, located five miles north of St. Louis on the lines of the Burlington; the Chicago & Alton; Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis; Chicago, Peoria & St. Louis (Illinois), and the Wabash Railways. It is adjacent to the Merchants' Terminal Bridge across the Mississippi and has considerable manufacturing and grain-storage business; has two newspapers. Population (1900), 3,122.

HARLEM, a village of Proviso Township, Cook County, and suburb of Chicago, on the line of the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad, nine miles west of the terminal station at Chicago. Harlem originally embraced the village of Oak Park, now a part of the city of Chicago, but, in 1884, was set off and incorporated as a village. Considerable manufacturing is done here. Population (1900), 4,085.

HARVEY, a city of Cook County, and an important manufacturing suburb of the city of Chicago, three miles southwest of the southern city limits. It is on the line of the Illinois Central and the Chicago & Grand Trunk Railways, and has extensive manufactures of harvesting, street and steam railway machinery, gasoline stoves, enameled ware, etc.; also has one newspaper and ample school facilities. Population (1900), 5,395.

IOWA CENTRAL RAILWAY, a railway line having its principal termini at Peoria, Ill., and Manly Junction, nine miles north of Mason City, Iowa, with several lateral branches making connections with Centerville, Newton, State Center, Story City, Algona and Northwood in the latter State. The total length of line owned, leased and operated by the Company, officially reported in 1899, was 508.98 miles, of which 89.76 miles—including 3.5 miles trackage facilities on the Peoria & Pekin Union between Iowa Junction and Peoria—were in Illinois. The Illinois division extends from Keithsburg—where it enters the State at the crossing of the Mississippi—to Peoria.—(HISTORY.) The Iowa Central Railway Company was originally chartered as the Central Railroad Company of Iowa and the road completed in October, 1871. In 1873 it passed into the hands of a receiver and, on June 4, 1879, was reorganized under the name of the Central Iowa Railway Company. In May, 1883, this company purchased the Peoria & Farmington Railroad, which was incorporated into the main line, but defaulted and passed into the hands of a receiver December 1, 1886; the line was sold under foreclosure in 1887 and 1888, to the Iowa Central Railway Company, which had effected a new organization on the basis of $11,000,000 common stock, $6,000,000 preferred stock and $1,379,625 temporary debt certificates convertible into preferred stock, and $7,500,000 first mortgage bonds. The transaction was completed, the receiver discharged and the road turned over to the new company, May 15, 1889.—(FINANCIAL.) The total capitalization of the road in 1899 was $21,337,558, of which $14,159,180 was in stock, $6,650,095 in bonds and $528,283 in other forms of indebtedness. The total earnings and income of the line in Illinois for the same year were $532,563, and the expenditures $566,333.

SPARTA, a city of Randolph County, situated on the Centralia & Chester and the Mobile & Ohio Railroads, twenty miles northwest of Chester and fifty miles southeast of St. Louis. It has a number of manufacturing establishments, including plow factories, a woolen mill, a cannery and creameries; also has natural gas. The first settler was James McClurken, from South Carolina, who settled here in 1818. He was joined by James Armour a few years later, who bought land of McClurken, and together they laid out a village, which first received the name of Columbus. About the same time Robert G. Shannon, who had been conducting a mercantile business in the vicinity, located in the town and became the first Postmaster. In 1839 the name of the town was changed to Sparta. Mr. McClurken, its earliest settler, appears to have been a man of considerable enterprise, as he is credited with having built the first cotton gin in this vicinity, besides still later, erecting saw and flour mills and a woolen mill. Sparta was incorporated as a village in 1837 and in 1859 as a city. A colony of members of the Reformed Presbyterian Church (Covenanters or "Seceders") established at Eden, a beautiful site about a mile from Sparta, about 1822, cut an important figure in the history of the latter place, as it became the means of attracting here an industrious and thriving population. At a later period it became one of the most important stations of the "Underground Railroad" (so called) in Illinois (which see). The population of Sparta (1890) was 1,979; (1900), 2,041.

TOLUCA, a city of Marshall County situated on the line of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad, 18 miles southwest of Streator. It is in the center of a rich agricultural district; has the usual church and educational facilities of cities of its rank, and two newspapers. Population (1900), 2,629.

WEST HAMMOND, a village situated in the northeast corner of Thornton Township, Cook County, adjacent to Hammond, Ind., from which it is separated by the Indiana State line. It is on the Michigan Central Railroad, one mile south of the Chicago City limits, and has convenient access to several other lines, including the Chicago & Erie; New York, Chicago & St. Louis, and Western Indiana Railroads. Like its Indiana neighbor, it is a manufacturing center of much importance, was incorporated as a village in 1892, and has grown rapidly within the last few years, having a population, according to the census of 1900, of 2,935.

HISTORICAL

GENERAL FEATURES.

Clark County is situated on the eastern border of Illinois, about midway between Chicago and Cairo. It is bounded on the north by Edgar and Coles Counties, on the west by Coles and Cumberland Counties, on the south by Jasper and Crawford Counties, and on the east by the Wabash River and Vigo County, Indiana.

The county is divided into fifteen political townships, now under township organization, and has a board of fifteen Supervisors, one for each township. The townships are named as follows: Anderson, Auburn, Casey, Darwin, Dolson, Douglas, Johnson, Marshall, Martinsville, Melrose, Orange, Parker, Westfield, Wabash and York. These townships vary in extent, but some are six miles square. Wabash is the largest, and Auburn the smallest in size. The county contains about five hundred and nineteen square miles, and about three hundred and thirty-one thousand acres of land. The surface in the western and southern parts is rolling prairie or level land from which the timber has been largely cleared away. In Douglas, Marshall, Wabash, Upper Darwin, Anderson, Melrose, Auburn and Martinsville, there are some hills, gullies and rough land, but not enough to detract materially from its value or utility for farming and grazing purposes. In portions of Westfield Township, especially in the "Rich Woods" district, the soil is of a rich black or dark gray formation, mixed with a little sand and yellow clay, and is wonderfully productive, blue grass and all other grazing and general farm produce growing with wonderful fecundity. In York, Darwin, and portions of Wabash Township, the soil is of a black or dark gray sand formation, consisting—of a rich, dark loam, warm, mellow, and usually level or slightly rolling land. Wheat, corn, oats, clover, alfalfa, melons, sweet potatoes, and all kinds of vegetables and garden truck, of fine quality, and usually with the utmost certainty, are grown here, and all of these crops, owing to the warm, sandy nature of the soil, are, on an average, several weeks ahead of those produced in other parts of the county. What are known as the Wabash, Big Creek, Raccoon Creek, Mill Creek, Hurricane Creek and the Embarrass bottom lands are also productive above the average, and adapted particularly to corn, wheat and hay, especially the former. In this region are produced, in good years, from forty to eighty and even as high as ninety bushels of corn per acre.

Walnut and Union Prairies, in Darwin and York Townships, are among the finest wheat lands in average acreage in the State, and the wheat grown there is of superior quality. James Mundy had one wheat field this year on Walnut Prairie that averaged more than forty-eight bushels per acre, and it is likely that the wheat lands of both Walnut and Union Prairies average twenty-five bushels per acre. The county is extensively tiled, and is also well drained by the north fork of the Embarrass River and Willow Creek in the west and southwest; by Big Creek and Hurricane Creek in the northeast and east; and by Mill, Raccoon and Snyder Creeks and the Wabash River in the middle-west, south and southeastern portions. The county is not particularly rich in building stone, if so it has not yet been developed, but it contains enough good sand, gravel, lime stone and sand stone, for mortar, grout, concrete, macadamizing and road, culvert and bridge purposes generally, while the drilling for coal, water, gas and oil in the various parts of the county, has amply shown that the county is practically underlaid, throughout its entire length and breadth, with rich veins of good quality coal, form two to seven and eight feet in thickness, and usually roofed with slate, stone, or some other substantial substance suitable to make this coal easily accessible for mining and commercial purposes. The coal is found at a depth of from three hundred to eight hundred feet. The western and middle-western parts of the county have also proven to be rich in oil and gas. These rich and useful products have always been found, and are still being found in large quantities, and at an average depth of about five hundred feet, so that gas and oil wells that cost on an average of twelve hundred dollars here, cost as much as two thousand dollars in Crawford County, where oil and gas are being found and marketed in large and valuable quantities. The oil of Clark County is of a high grade, and is selling at about seventy cents a barrel at the wells. Drilling for oil and gas were begun at Oil Fields, in Parker Township, in a rude and unsatisfactory way, many years ago, and although wells were put down over twelve hundred feet, and gas found, the prospectors did not discover oil in paying quantities, although now, Oil Field, as it was then and is now called, is honeycombed with paying wells at an average depth of between four or five hundred feet. These early drillings were begun and prosecuted on the farm of Timothy R. Young, in section 17, Parker Township, but although the ardent dreams of Mr. Young, the elder, were doomed to sore disappointment, his son and daughter, Kimball and Nellie Young, who were wise enough to retain the property after their honored father's death, are waxing richer every day from the twenty or twenty-five good producing wells now being operated night and day on the same identical lands. It now seems strange indeed that wells should have been drilled on these lands to a depth of eight and twelve hundred feet, and no oil in paying quantities discovered, when it is now being produced there in great quantities from wells of four and five hundred feet in depth. The discoveries and productions of these oil and gas wells of Westfield, Parker, Casey, Johnson, Orange and Martinsville Townships have been far beyond the dreams of the most sanguine land owner, lessee or operator, reference to which will be more fully made in a special chapter devoted to the gas and oil industries of Clark County, further along in these histories. The principal agricultural productions of the county, as before intimated, include corn, wheat, oats, hay, melons, fruits and broom corn, and practically all other kinds of agricultural productions indigenous to this latitude and climate, while cattle, horses, mules, hogs and poultry are raised in large quantities, and of good breed and quality. Butter, eggs and milk products are also produced in large and increasing quantities, and bring in quite a large total revenue to the citizens of the county.

Clark County is the fortunate possessor of two splendidly equipped and ably managed through lines of railroads, the Terre Haute & Indianapolis, usually called the Vandalia Railroad; and the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad, usually and popularly known as the Big Four. These great arteries of trade, of travel and of freight span the county from north to south, and from east to west, intersecting each other at Marshall, the county seat of Clark County. The county also has the Terre Haute & Peoria Railroad, running through the northeastern part of the county, and the Siddell & Olney Railroad, a branch of the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Railroad running through the western part of the county from Westfield, through Westfield, Parker and Casey Townships, and the city of Casey, on to Olney, and farther south. The great and useful macadamized National Road, about ninety feet wide, splendidly bridged and culverted, also passes from east to west through the county, touching Marshall, Auburn, Martinsville and Casey. This road was built many years ago by the government, and extends from Cumberland, Maryland, to St. Louis, Missouri. It was constructed, as all public works of the government are, of the best material and in the best possible way, and is still as good as it was when first opened up for travel, yes, a good deal better than it was then. It is now owned by the State or county, and is under control of the Highway Commissioners of the several townships through which it runs. An immense improvement has taken place in the roads and bridges of Clark County within the last fifteen years. New roads have been laid out, useless ones vacated, stone culverts and iron bridges have taken the place of the old wooden ones. In addition, a scientific and systematic improvement of farm lands may be noted with the result that they have practically doubled in value and selling price. Lands that fifteen years ago could have been bought for thirty-five and forty dollars per acre now bring sixty, seventy or eighty dollars per acre, and a few highly improved farms of York, and perhaps Darwin, Westfield and Marshall Townships, could be sold for as much as even ninety and one hundred dollars per acre: while the oil lands of Westfield, Parker, Johnson, Casey, Orange and Martinsville Townships, are simply not for sale. Astounding prices have, and are being paid for the gas and oil privileges of some of these lands. A consideration of forty or fifty dollars per acre, and one-sixth of the oil is not an unusual price, while as much as three and four hundred dollars per acre have been actually paid or refused.

Clark County has no bonded indebtedness. Her land owners are practically out of debt, and many of them have snug bank accounts, with the banking institutions of Marshall, Casey, Martinsville and Westfield, and many also have money loaned out at good interest, and on gilt-edged security. Of the principal cities, villages, towns and trading points of Clark County are Marshall, Casey, Martinsville, Westfield, West Union, York, Auburn (Clark Center) and Walnut Prairie. Besides these, there are also Melrose, Orange, Moonshine, Livingston (Cohn), McKeen, Dennison, Castle Finn, Doyles, and other points. Marshall, the county seat and principal city in the county, both in resident population, and municipal importance, is situated at about the geographical center of the county, and for beauty, healthfulness, and permanent and steady growing business importance, is unrivalled. Its side-walks, streets and alleys are noted for their clean, well kept, substantial character; its shade trees are noted for their beauty, size and abundance; the general lay of the land on which the city rests is ideal in contour for a city, the ground sloping gradually to all points of the compass from the Public, or Court House Square, making the city all that could be desired for drainage purposes. Its telephone, telegraph, water and electric light facilities and systems are well conceived, well regulated and well served; its supply of abundant and pure, healthful water, drawn from driven wells on the banks of Big Creek, two miles east of the city, is unsurpassed, if indeed equaled by any city or town of equal or anything like equal size in the State.

The Clark County Court House, at Marshall, while not as artistic and beautiful as some other buildings of the kind in the State, is better ventilated, better lighted, better arranged, and more convenient than the average in the state of Illinois. The public schools and school buildings are above the average, while its Township High School Building is not surpassed in beauty, arrangement and size, in any city of like population, or in any county of equal wealth and territory, in Illinois. It is an honor to the men who conceived, had charge of, and built it, and stands as a fitting monument to the progressive spirit and educational progress of Marshall and Marshall Township. The churches of Marshall are not up to the standard of cities and towns of its size and importance, in Illinois. Marshall has a condensary, two good mills and other industries, but no manufactories to speak of. Its business men are conservative and safe, and its people generally are noted for their self-restraint, ability and public spiritedness. Many good mining exploiters and promoters of other wildcat schemes, who had been eminently successful in other small cities, have run against a solid stone wall of indifference in Marshall, and in no town or city of the State do get-rich schemes fare so badly. The city has two good banks, two good hotels, fine restaurants, and several dry goods, hardware, clothing, boot and shoe stores. In Marshall, men and women come as near passing for what they are actually worth, from an honest, manly, good citizen standpoint, regardless of financial and ancestral standing, as in any other place in the State.

The Standard Oil Company has recently purchased the large and commodious Judge Fenton W. Booth residence, one block south of the Public Square, and in its nineteen large and well arranged rooms, have established offices for the handling of its vast oil industry of Illinois and the Wabash Valley; while the pipe lines of the company pass near Marshall from the oil fields of Clark County to Whiting, Indiana, where this giant corporation has an extensive refinery.

Casey, in the western part of Clark County, at the intersection of the Terre Haute & Indianapolis and Sidell & Olney Railroads, is the second city in size and importance in the county, its only possible rivals being Westfield and Martinsville. Casey is seventeen miles southwest of Marshall, and near the western border of the county. It has had a rapid growth in population, building and expansion of both business and trade during the past three years. In fact its material progress has been greater by far than any other city, village or town in the county, during that time, and, counting its transcendent gas and oil prospecting, owning and developing population, is almost equal to that of Marshall. It is the center of the oil and gas supply developing and shipping industry of the county. It has two good newspapers and Fred E. Moore, the publisher of the Casey Commercial, has through his paper, and through his individual labors done more for Casey, and the business of that city, than any hundred other men in it. The city government of Casey and the citizens in general of that hustling, thriving little city, deserve great credit for the way they have expanded, built up and improved their city, and for the way they have encouraged and handled the immense oil and gas industries, and other business interests that followed in their wake, and which all came rushing upon them from the discovery and development of the oil and gas fields of Westfield, Parker, Casey and Johnson Townships, in their immediate vicinity, and the contiguous territory of Cumberland County, as well as for the pushing and enterprising spirit of its people, and which has resulted in such substantial material prosperity, both to their city, their township and to their county, during the past few years. It is not improbable, if Casey can only hold its own and make advancement after the oil fields are all fully developed, that she may become the largest city or town in population in the county; but owing to what nature as well as her own citizens have done for Marshall, she can never, it is thought, become a serious rival of Marshall as a place to reside and enjoy life and good health. It should be said, however, that Casey has taken steps to put in improved streets, and water and sewerage systems, which will greatly improve her beauty and healthfulness, and make of it a much better city in which to live and enjoy the comforts and conveniences of modern urban life than before, and if so, then Marshall must look to her laurels, else she be made to take the second place in population, wealth and importance in Clark County.

Martinsville, the third city of Clark County in population and business importance, lies along the Terre Haute & Indianapolis Railroad, about twelve miles southwest of Marshall. It is a thrifty, thriving, prosperous little city, with good schools, good churches, and up to date business houses. Except Westfield and Casey, it is nearer than any town or city in the county to the principal oil and gas fields, and besides has paying oil and gas wells in its own township. The Illinois Oil and Gas Company, one of the largest of the kind in the county, was organized at Martinsville, and those owning the principal part of the stock reside there; and moreover, Martinsville is to have the pumping station for the Standard Oil Company's Clark County pipe line, and immense oil tanks, of giant capacity, are to be built and operated here. It is likely that, with the exception of Casey, Martinsville will be more benefited by the oil and gas developments than any town or city in the county. The principal, and some of the best gas wells in the county at this time are in Martinsville Township.

Westfield, the fourth town in the county, and the third as to profit by the oil and gas developments of her neighborhood, is in the extreme northwestern part of Clark County, on the Sidell & Olney Railroad. It is the seat of Westfield College, the only college in the county, is surrounded by rich, black fertile blue grass and corn lands, and is a clean, pretty well kept and well governed little village. Its people are industrious, intelligent and moral.

The towns of York and Darwin, down on the Wabash River, deserve special mention, for the reasons that it was upon the soil where they stand that the first settlers of Clark County, away back in the early days of the eighteenth century, first set their feet. They have the distinction of being the first towns, I do not count Aurora, to be spoken of more extensively hereafter, laid off in Clark County, and also at about the same time, though York was probably a little ahead in this regard. These ancient towns are surrounded by the richest, and, taken as a whole, most valuable farm lands of the county, but their star of ascendancy is on the wane, because of the failure of river navigation, through the continuous shallowing of the river and the inutility of river navigation, by reason of the Big Four Railroad running a mile and half west of York, and three miles west of Darwin, instead of through them, as it should have done, and other causes, the glory of these towns has departed, it is feared not soon, if indeed ever, to return. It does not seem that anything, unless it be the striking of oil and gas in their immediate vicinity, the development of the mines of coal which undoubtedly lie beneath them, or proper railroad facilities, interurban or otherwise, can ever breathe into their shrunken and still shrinking bodies the breath of a new and more prosperous life. Cut off from near railroad facilities on the west, and an unnavigable river on the east, their decay was certain, and it has, since about 1865, been slow but sure.

West Union, a comparatively new town, one that has sprung up in the western part of York Township, on the line of the Big Four Railroad, and about five miles northwest of York, has reached the dignity of being the fifth largest town, and the fifth best business point in Clark County. In fact, it is probable that it now contains more people than any other town in the county, except Marshall, Casey, Martinsville, and Westfield. It is the largest and the best business point on the line of the Big Four in Clark County, with the single exception of Marshall. It was at Aurora, two miles north of Darwin, on the Wabash River, that the first county seat of Clark County was established in 1819, and it was the town of Auburn (Clark Centre) five miles west of Marshall on the National Road, and at nearly the exact center of the county, when the location of a new county seat was voted on, in 1937, that came within 91 votes of victory over Marshall, its only competitor, the vote standing 453 for Marshall to 362 for Auburn.

CHAPTER II.

EARLY HISTORY—FORMATION OF COUNTY—LOCATION OF COUNTY SEATS—COURT HOUSES, ETC.

By an act of the Legislature passed in 1819, Clark County was created out of the largeness of Crawford County's extended territory.

At that time Crawford County embraced an enormous territory, including all of Eastern Illinois, and reaching as far north as the Canadian line, and as far west as Fayette County. At her organization Clark County was much larger than it is now. In 1821, Fayette County was formed partly from Crawford and Clark Counties. In 1823, Edgar County was formed from territory wholly belonging to Clark County, and in 1830, Coles County was formed from territory belonging to Clark and Edgar Counties. By the forming of Coles County, Clark County was reduced to the dimensions contemplated in the original act. But at the session of the Legislature of 1823, William Lowry, the Representative for Clark and Crawford Counties, had secured the passage of an act, at the urgent solicitation of the people of Edgar County, adding to that county three miles off the north end of Clark county, because Paris was in danger of losing the county seat, for the reason that it was not so centrally located as other points in the county which wanted and were liable to seek to secure the county seat. By adding three miles more territory to the south boundary of Edgar County, the position of Paris became so centrally located that she felt safe in her position as the county seat of Edgar County, and she has held it to this day, and doubtless always will. So Clark County's loss was the gain of Paris, and, also, of Edgar County, for the city of Paris, the present county seat of Edgar County, is the just pride, not only of the people of Paris and Edgar County, but of the people of eastern Illinois as well. By this act of the Legislature, Smith Shaw, Thomas Gill and James Watts, were named as Commissioners, and they were also directed by this act to meet at the house of Charles Neeley, of Walnut Prairie, on the first and second Mondays of May, 1819, to take an oath before some Justice of the Peace for the faithful discharge of their duties; and then to proceed to take into consideration the situation of the settlements, the geography of the county, and to establish the permanent County Seat of the infant county. This act also provided that until the County Commissioners, to be thereafter elected, should direct, the courts and elections of the county should be held at the house of Charles Neeley, in said county. This act also provided that the citizens of Clark County should be entitled to vote with those of Crawford County for Senators and Representatives in the State Legislature. It also provided that the county of Clark should form a part of the second judicial district, and that the courts therein should be held at such time and places as shall be directed in the act defining the duties of the Justice of the Supreme Court of Illinois. This act also gave the County Commissioners the power to lay out the lands selected as the future county seat of Clark County into town lots, and to sell same at such prices as they might deem proper, and to apply the proceeds to the construction of public buildings for the county. In order to remove all difficulties concerning any future division of Clark County, it was further provided in this act, that all that tract of country lying north of an east and west line dividing townships numbered twelve and thirteen north, should be the line between the county of Clark and any county which might be laid off north of same, but that until such county was established, all that part of Clark County lying north of the last mentioned line shall remain and be considered a part of said Clark County. This act was approved March 22, 1819, and was to be in effect from and after its passage. The county was named Clark, in this act, in honor of General George Rogers Clark, an officer of the Revolutionary War, born in Albemarle County, Virginia, November 19, 1752, and who died in Louisville, Kentucky, February 18, 1818, the year Illinois was admitted into the Union, and one year before Clark County was prescribed and christened with his honored name. Clark was the fifteenth county to be established in the newly made State of Illinois. On Monday, April 26, 1819, the first election ever held in Clark County, so far as any records show, was held at the house of Charles Neeley, on Walnut Prairie, as had been provided in the act establishing Clark County, and Joseph Shaw, John Chenoweth and Samuel Ashmore, were elected as the first County Commissioners for the new county of Clark. On the 7th of June, 1819, these thus highly honored and immortalized first County Commissioners of Clark County, held their first meeting at the house of Charles Neeley, and proceeded to appoint William B. Archer Clerk and William Lockard, Treasurer of Clark County. No better men could have been selected for these offices at that time in Clark County, or in any other county, before or since. They both were ideal men for the respective positions they were given. Smith Shaw, Thomas Gill and James Watts, the Commissioners appointed by the act of the Legislature to select a county seat for Clark County, were on hands, and promptly submitted their report. They reported that they had selected as the future county seat a tract of land, about two hundred and two acres in extent, lying on the west bank of the Wabash River, and about two miles north of the present town of Darwin. They reported that the land had been donated by Chester Fitch, John Chenoweth and John McClure. In some way Chenoweth and McClure seem to have disposed of their county seat lands to Fitch, and then Fitch donated the whole two hundred and two acres to the county for county seat purposes, unless the share of Fitch that was donated to the county happened to be the ground covered by the actually proposed town and public buildings site for the new seat of justice, for the State Commissioners reported, their report being dated May 6, 1819, that "Fitch is to be at one-half of the expense in mapping and surveying the county seat, and is to have every alternate lot in the whole town for himself and his heirs forever." This report the County Commissioners approved and they also gave to the newly proposed, and thus definitely established seat of justice for the new county of Clark the name of Aurora. From this name came the name of the bend in the Wabash River two miles north of Darwin, which since that time has been known as "Aurora Bend." On the 7th of June, 1819, when the County Commissioners approved the report of the State Commissioners and named the first county seat for Clark County Aurora, they named the first seat of justice of the county larger than the whole State of Connecticut. The county then had about nine hundred inhabitants, while at the National Census of 1900, the number had been increased to twenty-four thousand and thirty-three, and in 1907 doubtless has more than twenty-five thousand. It was under the auspices of such intelligent, brave and noble men as John Chenoweth, Joseph Shaw and Samuel Ashmore, as County Commissioners, William B. Archer, as County Clerk, William Lockard, as County Treasurer, and Smith Shaw, Thomas

Gill and James Watts, as State Commissioners, that the infant county started as an integral part of what has since grown to be one of the foremost States in the mightiest republic of either ancient, middle or modern times. What joy must gleam in the spirit eyes, and what satisfaction and pride must glow in the spirit bosoms of these noble men as one of the very greatest States, in absolutely the greatest nation the world has ever known.

When Aurora received its name in 1819 there was not a single town, village, or even trading post in the whole extended territory of Clark County, while Clark County now has not only the cities of Marshall, Casey and Martinsville, but also the towns, villages, trading points and postoffices of Westfield, West Union, York, Darwin, Melrose, Walnut Prairie, Ernst, Snyder, Orange, Moonshine, Neadmore, Auburn, Mt. Moriah, Livingston, McKeen, Dennison, State Line, Clarkesville, Doyles, Oak Point, Cleon, Castle Finn, Wells, Allright and perhaps others, twenty-eight in all. In fact in 1819 Clark County was a veritable wilderness, over whose extended prairies, and dense, unbroken forests of oak, hickory, elm, poplar, walnut, cottonwood, beech, ash, maple, sugar tree and interminable swamp lands, the wild deer, wild turkey, panther, bear, raccoon, opossum, wild cat, squirrel, quail, pheasant, and other wild animals and wild fowl roamed and fought and fluttered and screamed, with practically no one to disturb or make them afraid. None but the bow and arrow of the red Indian, and the occasional crack of the old flintlock rifle of the few white settlers, or of the Red man lucky enough to possess one, ever disturbed the repose of these denizens of the frontier. But upon the rifle of the fathers and sons of those early days in Clark County, were those early settlers and their families dependent for regular meat food, and often for the means to replenish their ammunition and get clothing and other absolute necessities of life for themselves and their families. But, for all this, they were given and taken in marriage, had their dances, parties, quilting parties, apple cuttings, log rollings, corn huskings, horse raisings, shooting matches, foot races, wolf hunts, fox chases, singing schools, spelling bees, and other diversions, usual and popular in those early days of Clark County, and were doubtless as happy and contented, perhaps more so, then than the average run of people in Clark County are today. Looking back to the boyhood days of the writer, it does seem to him, in all sincerity, that the people of the then comparative, recent times, got, upon the whole, more real, genuine satisfaction, and less worry and troubles out of life than they do upon the whole now; and he has no doubt the inhabitants of Clark County in the years between 1818 and 1849, when the writer was born, did the same; and especially so, seeing that happiness comes from within and not from without, and from a clear conscience and good digestion, rather than from any merely material and financial surroundings. The writer states it as a truism, that a young man and his lady love, in those early days, could probably enjoy themselves quite as well, and get as much genuine pleasure out of their courtships, for instance, astride a horse with the aforesaid lady love sitting sidewise behind him on the same horse, with her dear arms around him, with the sweet tones of her entrancing voice breaking like divine music in his ears, and her soft, warm breath, fanning his cheek, as they trotted along over the open prairies and through the dense wood lands of Clark County, in that early day, as they could possibly experience today, squeezed up in a twenty-six inch buggy, and spinning along at a three minute gait, over the smooth roads and the thickly populated neighborhoods of Clark County. So let the reader not get the idea that because the early settlers of Clark County were utter strangers to many, in fact nearly all, of what are now regarded as the absolute necessities of modern life, that, therefore, and for these reasons, they were necessarily unhappy and discontented. They were just as happy then, perhaps happier, and had more real pleasure, and less of the vexations of life, perhaps, than they have now.

On July 17, 1821, Joseph Shaw and John Chenoweth, two of the County Commissioners of Clark County, met at Aurora to stake off the new county seat, and designate the main street and Public Square. No court house was ever built at Aurora, but the county seems to have utilized a log house, about 12 by 15 feet, for that purpose. In after years, when the short-lived glory of Aurora had forever departed, this rude first court house of Clark County was made to preform the humble but useful duty of a corn crib for John Stockwell. Not a vestige of Aurora, nor of Clark County's first court house now remain, and it is doubtful if any living man or woman can tell with anything like certainty, the exact spot where this court house stood or even to within rods of it.

If the old court house of Aurora and of Darwin had been preserved, as they could have been, had anyone thought of preserving them, and had they been removed to Marshall and put up here and preserved as they were when they did duty as seats of justice at Aurora and Darwin, they would now be objects of genuine and pleasant curiosity, and would doubtless support some man and his family from contributions paid by those who desire to see and examine them. But no one ever thought of preserving them, and they have now decayed, crumbled to dust, passed away, to be seen no more, and their very existence to those now living is only a sweet, sad memory, and who know of them only from their vague and uncertain history, and the few who yet remember them, at least the one at Darwin, which was used until comparative recent years, as a stable for quadrupeds, and which many yet living in the county remember to have seen in that capacity at Darwin. The first town lot sold under the provision of the act of March 22, 1819, was at a public sale of lots at the new county seat at Aurora, August 5, 1819, and a man by the name of Dr. Septer Patrick bought it for twenty dollars. Thirty-seven lots were sold on that day, and at prices per lot of from twenty to three hundred dollars. Three hundred dollars was an enormous price to pay for lots in the bare town site of Aurora, in the wilds of Aurora Bend, in that early day. Measured by conditions and prices of today, land was then practically valueless, and could be had for practically nothing, and a lot in Marshall, valued at thousands, would be cheap by the side of a lot in Aurora in 1819, at three hundred dollars. Money was scarce, transportation, by the Wabash River, roads and bridges there were none, and land was wonderfully cheap, and hence three hundred dollars seems an extravagant price to pay for a town lot in Aurora; but it showed the confidence in the importance and future growth, and the fond hopes of its permanence as the seat of justice of Clark County, as nothing else could show. A jail, the invariable concomitant of civilization and order, was built at Aurora. It was twelve by eighteen feet, built of round logs, and two stories in height. In those good old days men and women were imprisoned for debt whenever their creditors demanded it, and for such length of time as they were willing to pay the Sheriff of county for feeding and rooming them, and so the jail was built two stories in height, the upper story being set apart for the infamous purpose of confining therein those too poor to pay their debts, and in this upper story, the poor victims of a barbarous law were confined. There were two grated windows to this debtor's prison, one on each side of the house, and the entrance was by means of a rude stair from the outside.

There was no connection between the debtor's prison up stairs and the jail for other prisoners below. From the windows of this debtor's prison, the unfortunate prisoners could gaze out upon the streets, or single street of Aurora, and out on the placid waters of the Wabash rippling on freely and sweetly to the Ohio and the Gulf, at the passers by or in the boats of this beautiful stream, while through the minds of those who looked up and saw their sad faces, doubtless often murmured the sentiments, if not the words, of the poet:

What has the grey-haired prisoner done?
Has murder stained his hands with gore?
Not so, his is a fouler crime,
God made the old man poor.

An estray pen was likewise built at Aurora, thirty-six feet square and six feet high. When court met any of the animals confined in the estray pen, that were not demanded and proved in open court, were put up and sold to the highest bidder, and if they did not fetch the cost of taking up, feeding and caring for them, they were knocked off to the person who found them and put them there, and they thenceforth became his property.

Our first county seat was also provided with a whipping post. This consisted of a substantial log of wood about twelve inches in diameter, with the bark peeled off so as to make it smooth, cool and nice to the touch of the bare arms and breast of the prospective victim of castigation, and to make the post firm and solid, it was placed in an upright position, with one end sunk three feet in the earth. The victim of this early species of legal torture, discipline and reformation was first stripped naked to his waist, his hands securely tied together around the post, and the lashes laid vigorously on his bare shoulders and loins. So far as the record shows only one person was ever publicly whipped at Aurora, a fellow by the name of Whitely, who had stolen hogs, a very heinous offense which ranked next to horse stealing, in those days. Aurora possessed a good river landing, and practically all of its first trading was done at Vincennes, Indiana, about fifty miles down the Wabash River. It was to Vincennes, and afterwards to Terre Haute, that the early settlers at Aurora and Darwin journeyed with ox teams or by boat to lay in their supply of ammunition stores, and general necessities. The Wabash River was much larger than at present, and it was also comparatively free from logs, drift, sand bars, shallows, and general obstructions, so common today and which now render it navigable only for boats of the shallowest draft, and then only for a few months in the year. This condition of the Wabash has been produced, largely, by the denudation of the land along its shores and back into the country on both sides, the timber which causes evaporation to go on more swiftly. The extensive tiling and ditching for long distances on both the Indiana and Illinois sides has caused the lands to drain rapidly into the river, thus creating in the formerly beautiful and useful stream rapid rises and falls, which seriously impair its navigability. But this loss to the people living along its shores has not been without compensation, for in place of traveling and shipping, they have the rich fish and pearl commerce that has grown up from its sand bars, mussel shoals, and placid depths. Hundreds of people make a good living from fish, with which the river is plentifully supplied, while for the past few years, thousands have been engaged in the profitable employment of extracting pearls of great beauty and large aggregate value from mussels found in great, but diminishing quantities. Pearls have been found ranging in selling prices from a few to eighteen hundred dollars each, and perhaps more than a million dollars in cash has already been received by the pearl fishers of the Wabash River. This estimate does not include the amounts realized from the "slugs"

taken from mussel shells, and which readily bring from two to two dollars and fifty cents per ounce; or the mussel shells themselves, which are disposed of to pearl button factories at Vincennes, Indiana, and elsewhere, for from six to eight dollars a ton.

Thus has the Wabash its present usefulness, as well as its splendid memories, and York, which but a short time ago was a slumbering river town, still is vital in the minds of those who recall its ten stores, its packing house, mills, wagon shops, beautiful homes, and river boats moored at the landings. But the greatest calamity that has ever befallen York fell upon her suddenly on Friday evening, June 7, 1907, at about six o'clock p. m. when a cyclone practically wiped out the town.

CHAPTER III.

THE COUNTY SEAT GOES TO DARWIN—DARWIN FEELS HER IMPORTANCE—EXPANDS AND PROSPERS—COUNTY SEAT AGAIN CHANGES—THIS TIME TO MARSHALL.

By an act of the Illinois Legislature approved January 21, 1823, the county seat of Clark County was ordered removed from Aurora to Darwin, two miles south of Aurora, on the high banks and level plateau adjacent thereto, of the Wabash River. The navigable rivers in all the countries, being the only public, well kept highways of travel, commerce and trade, were the natural selection of incipient communities, which rarely spring up anywhere else. Thus the next county seat was to still cling to the river. Darwin was much better located for a seat of justice than Aurora, and on the 2d of March, 1824, the County Commissioners directed that bids be submitted on the second day of the next Circuit Court for the erection of a new court house, to supplant the corn crib of John Stockwell at Aurora. This court house was to conform to the following specifications. "Twenty feet long in the clear, of hewn oak logs, with a lap shingle roof; two windows in front and one in the rear; a story and a half high; a partition upstairs, a small window at each end of the house; plank floor and rough plank stairs; the windows upstairs to contain six and those below twelve lights each; chink and plaster the cracks, and finish same in a workmanlike manner." It will be observed that nothing is said about the width of the house, or of the height of the story and a half, but it was presumably about square with the plank loft not more than the customary eight or ten feet from the ground floor.

It will be noted that the County Commissioners forgot to specify a fireplace, or to provide for any heating arrangement for the new court house, but this matter came up, as will be hereafter shown, later on. One Lucius Kibby was the lowest bidder for the Court House, and the contract was awarded to him for six hundred dollars. He was to finish the house in one year from the date of contract, but it was not completed and ready for occupancy until March 24, 1827, nearly three years later. It is surmised that the new county seat promoters became impatient, said rude things of Lucius, and doubtless made his life miserable for his delay in finishing the building. As soon as his work was done Kibby notified the Commissioners that the new official home of Clark County was ready for inspection and approval, and they appointed William Martin and Enoch Davis, "two workmen of approved honesty and skill" to inspect it and report the result of their findings. This Martin and Davis proceeded promptly to do, and as promptly reported that Kibby had not performed his work according to contract. Thereupon the Commissioners scaled down the six hundred dollars to five hundred and forty dollars, a deduction from the contract price of sixty dollars. However, they made slight compensation by allowing Kibby nine dollars for putting in a fire place; cheap enough, when it is remembered that he had to cut a hole in the logs for its construction, so the price finally paid him for his three years' labor was five hundred and forty nine dollars. Nothing is said about the chimney, but it is not unlikely that Lucius had to construct that with the fireplace, and, if so, his profit on his additional nine-dollar allowance could not have been large. In September, 1832, this hewed log county building was weatherboarded, and otherwise repaired, and a Presbyterian preacher, named Bouton, was kindly allowed to room upstairs and preach below in the court room proper.

In 1838 the county seat was removed from Darwin to Marshall. The Darwin Court House stood on lot 28 and in after years, when "the faces all" had ceased to "shine out in the back log's blaze", and after the shadows had ceased to "fall on the old hewed walls, as they did in the early days", it was made to perform the humble but useful purpose of a stable for Dr. Edward Pearce, then of Darwin, but now an honored citizen and competent and trusted physician of Marshall. Sic transit, gloria munda.

In 1823, a contract was let by the County Commissioners for a jail to be built at Darwin, and one John Welsh got the contract. It would appear that he simply tore down the jail at Aurora and hauled it to Darwin where it was used as a jail until 1830. In December, 1832, the County Commissioners let a contract to one Mechrom Main, Jr., the lowest bidder, for the construction of a hewn jail at Darwin, for the sum of four hundred dollars. It was used as a jail until the county seat went to Marshall. This building, like the rest at Aurora and Darwin, has also passed away. After the county seat went to Darwin, Aurora was partially fenced in, and the few inhabitants of the ancient county seat of Clark County began to move away. Those who had purchased lots at Aurora were allowed a certain credit on lots they saw fit to buy at Darwin, a concession intended doubtless to break the fall, salve the wounds, silence objections, and, in some slight measure compensate the residents and land owners of Aurora for the loss of the county seat. The site of Darwin was known in those days as McClure's Bluff, named for John McClure, who had long kept a ferry there, and who donated the land on which the new county seat was built. William Lockard laid off the town, which consisted originally of sixty-four lots, of which lots 21 and 28 were reserved for the Court House and Jail. The sale of lots took place on the first Monday of August, 1823, with John Chenoweth as auctioneer. To make the sale go off briskly, and to properly key the bidders up to the highest paying point, the commissioners ordered "that John Richardson procure ten gallons of whisky, to be 'drunk' on the day of the sale". This was, of course, paid for out of the County Treasury. It is only proper to say that Dr. Simon Jumper was not then there, and no objections to its payment was made and John Richardson was doubtless promptly and reasonably reimbursed for the liquid refreshments. Dr. Jumper in after years became an honored and respected citizen of Darwin, as he is now of Marshall, and this allusion to him has a local meaning in the county that will be readily appreciated and understood. John Richardson may himself have sampled this whisky before the sale began, as he bought the first lot for eighty dollars, a pretty stiff price, even for a man who had received a good price for his ten gallons of whisky. Lot 32 went to John Stafford for the still higher price of $111. The Richardson refreshments had seemingly begun to get in their work. John Chenoweth took lot 64 at $103. The county contribution was evidently still in evidence. The encouragement seemed to have run low as the sale wore on, for the price finally went down to $50, the lowest paid for any lot sold in Darwin that day. Seeing the scarcity of money, the difficulty of obtaining it, and the further fact that there was not on any of these lots a single improvement, these prices were exceedingly high. Darwin, however, rapidly increased in population, speedily rose in importance as a trading point, and justified the confidence reposed in it by its convivial projectors and subsequent residents. The territory as far west as Effingham, and as far north as Danville and Charleston, was laid under contribution to its commerce and trade. For the first five years of Darwin's history as a county seat its town lots were higher than in Chicago. Terre Haute took alarm at its rising importance and increasing population and trade and used every means in her power, legitimate and otherwise, to divert them to herself, and these efforts were not without effect. The rising importance of Terre Haute, the construction of the National Road through the central portion of the county, the prospective building of a railroad along the line of the National Road from east to west, and the flocking of settlers along these avenues of travel caused far-seeing men to turn their eyes and business energies to the north and central portions of the county. The rumor of another removal of the county seat fell like the shadows of night upon the hearts and business hopes of the people of Darwin. The geographical inconvenience of the town was seen only too plainly and petitions and influence began to reach the Legislature for and against the contemplated removal. The agitation was kept up until 1835, when the Legislature passed an act authorizing the people to vote upon the question of removing the county seat from Darwin, and appointing commissioners to locate a new one. The commissioners failed to agree upon a new site, and in March, 1837, another act was passed, submitting the question of the removal of the county seat to a vote of the people. There were then but seven voting precincts in Clark County: East Union, West Union, Dubois, Darwin, Washington, Cumberland and Richmond. There are now twenty. Marshall has three, Wabash two, Martinsville two and Casey two, while the other eleven townships have one each. All of the above seven voting precincts went against unfortunate and helpless Darwin, with the exception of East Union, which stood faithful to her by a vote of fifty-five to thirty-nine, and her own precinct, which stood for a retention of the county seat by a vote of 138 to 6. It is suspected that these six traitors to Darwin, and cold-blooded prospective destroyers of her present and future prosperity as a trading and business point, had either surmised her coming ruin, and bought land farther north, or else had looked in the cup of John Richardson's whisky when it was red. The total vote of the seven voting precincts stood 378 to 228 in favor of removal, the majority of 150 being a crushing defeat for Darwin, as only 606 votes were cast in the whole county. There were probably not that many voters, for feeling ran high, and the inducements for fraud and illegal voting was strong. The county now has about 6,000 votes. Now came the real tug of war, to determine what town, or point of the county, should get the third and new county seat. Marshall and Auburn were strenuous candidates for the honor, and the vote to settle which should possess the coveted prize came off in August, 1837. After one of the hottest, fiercest, most bitter and acrimonious battles ever seen in Clark County, Marshall, chiefly, it is said, through the moral honesty or stinginess of James Hillebert, a wealthy citizen of Auburn, and the leader in the fight for that town, was successful, by a rather close vote of 453 to 362, a majority of only 91, the total vote for both sites being 815. As the vote on the removal of the county seat from Darwin in March, 1837, was 606, while in August, 1837, four months afterwards, a total vote of 815, an increase of 209 votes, are shown, it would appear that many were indifferent about the removal from Darwin and did not vote, or that the usual proceedings, methods and appliances to increase the vote for the respective competing towns, always seen in these county seat wars, were not absent. It is not at all unlikely that the friends of both towns left no tricks known to the trade of vote getting untried and unpracticed to gain the coveted victory. The first, second and third terms of the Circuit Court in Darwin were held in the tavern of John McClure, and the fourth in the house of Jacob Harlan. The fifth convened May 8, 1828, in the newly completed court house, and thereafter was held there until the removal of the county seat to Marshall in 1838.

The third Clark County court house, at Marshall, completed in 1839, was torn down in 1887, to make room for the fourth, which was completely destroyed by fire December 31, 1902. This fire broke out about 3 o'clock on that wintry morning, and raged for more than five hours, despite the desperate efforts of the fire department, aided by the citizens of Marshall and surrounding country. The records and some little furniture were saved, but otherwise the loss of this artistic and commodious building was complete. Steps were at once taken to provide a temporary home for the officials and courts, the old D. D. Doll-Brown-Morton-McMullen Bank building on North Hamilton Street, and parts of the Knights of Pythias Temple, south of the public square, at the southeast corner of Market and Clinton Streets, being rented for the purpose. The fifth and last Clark County court house cost about $60,000, including changes in the office arrangement and furniture. It is much larger than the one destroyed by fire, while its arrangement is infinitely superior to it. A good deal of delay and additional expense was experienced before the final completion of this building, owing to ignorant and unskilled brickwork, faulty approaches, defective cement and collapsing floors, but it is a remarkably good building and an honor to the Board of Supervisors, committee on construction, the architects, builders, contractors and taxpayers of the county. This last court house of Clark County was dedicated on Saturday, July 2, 1904, the writer of these histories, by request of the Board of Supervisors of the county, delivering the dedicatory address. In closing his address upon that occasion, delivered in the beautiful and ample Circuit Court room, on the north side of the building, he said: "And now, my friends, with feelings of heartfelt thankfulness to the architects who gave us the plans for this building, to the contractors and sub-contractors for their final work, and to the county officials, especially the present honored Chairman of the Board of Supervisors, for their zeal, earnestness and laborious care to that useful and beneficent end, and at the request, and by the authority of the Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of Clark County, I dedicate this splendid building to the uses and purposes of our court and county officials, and to all the bar and people of Clark County, for their uses, purposes, pleasures and enjoyments, for all time, or until such time as the population, advancement and progress of our beloved county shall demand a more pretentious and commodious building."

The town (now city) of Marshall, and last county seat of Clark County, was laid out October 3, 1835, by the gentlemen who owned the land upon which it was to be located, W. B. Archer and Joseph Duncan, the latter of whom was afterwards Governor and United States Senator of and from Illinois. The town was named in honor of the greatest Chief Justice the American Union has ever known, or perhaps ever will know. The proprietors made liberal donations of land and lots for court house and other purposes. The first jail was a log one, as its predecessors at Aurora and Darwin had been, and was located on the rear end of the lot now owned and occupied by Ernest Howell as a residence, on West Market Street. The first court, after the removal of the seat of justice to Marshall, and before the new court house was finished, was held in a frame building, on the site now occupied by the widow of Joseph Lutz, deceased. Succeeding courts, before the completion of the court house, were held in a frame building south of the public square, where I. F. Pritchard has his undertaking and furniture establishment. The county seat question was not agitated again for a few years, but in 1848 the petitioners and memorializers induced the Illinois Legislature to again submit the question as to the location of the county seat to a vote of the people. The campaign was short and bitterly contested, and on the third Monday in May 1849, the opposing forces fought out the battle of the ballots, on the question of taking the county seat away from Marshall, as they had voted on taking it away from Darwin, but with a quite different result, for Marshall won by the dangerously close vote of 771 to 640, a majority of only 131 in a total vote of 1,411. Darwin stood by Marshall by a vote of 161 to 20; Clear Creek, by a vote of 99 to 0, rather suspicious; Mill Creek by 34 to 12; York by 70 to 46; Melrose by 104 to 89, and, of course, Marshall voted for Marshall, or rather against the removal by the vote of 194 to 2, a majority of 192 against removal. Johnson, Melrose, Richland, Martinsville, Cumberland and Auburn precincts voted for removal, but Auburn, that had its own eye on the county seat for itself, as it had when the vote was taken to remove it to Darwin, and when it was itself a candidate for the seat of justice honors, as against Marshall, voted for removal by only 82 to 29 against it. From its organization, in 1819, to 1854, the county government and legislative business were in the hands of three commissioners, but on the 7th day of November, 1854, township organization and its concomitant Board of Supervisors, consisting of one Supervisor from each township, were adopted by a vote of 1,277 to 528, a majority of 749 in a total vote of 1,805. The anxiety to hold the township offices of Supervisor, Town Clerk, Assessor, Collector, Commissioners of Highways, Justices of the Peace and Constables incident to each township under township organization, was too much for the County Commissioner system, and so it has remained until this day. It seems that no earthly power can change a county back to the system of three County Commissioners after township organization has been once adopted. The hostile influences are too numerous, too compact and too powerful to be overcome. The County Court, at its December term, 1854, appointed Randolph Lee, Charles H. Welsh and John B. Briscoe, Commissioners, to lay off the county into townships; and, pursuant to these duties, they established the townships as they exist now, as indicated in Chapter I of this History, with the exception that Douglas Township was established in 1859, and Auburn Township, by lands taken from Dolson, Martinsville, Marshall and Anderson Townships. Auburn is the central township of Clark County, and was the last and fifteenth established.

CHAPTER IV.

BENCH OF CLARK COUNTY—INCIDENTS THEREON—COMMENTS THEREON—EARLY TRIALS, ETC.

Clark County sustains a well deserved reputation in Eastern Illinois for the purity, ability and strength of its local bench and bar.

The first term of the Circuit Court of Clark County convened at Aurora on Monday, September 20, 1819, with Thomas C. Browne, the first Circuit Judge, presiding. The court lasted but part of one day, and its only business was the approval of the official bonds of William B. Archer, the first Circuit Clerk, of Isaac Parker, the first Sheriff of the county, and of the Coroner. The first case tried in the Circuit Court was heard Monday, April 17, 1820, at the second session, at which Judge Browne still presided, though he retired from office three days later, on April 20, 1820. In this first case Thomas Wilson was plaintiff and William B. Archer, executor of the estate of Lewis Bohn, the father of James Bohn, now a well-to-do and honored citizen of Darwin Township, was defendant. It was an appeal case from a Justice of the Peace named Charles Patrick, the first to hold that office in Clark County. There were five cases docketed at this term of court, though but three of them were disposed of, the other two going over for future consideration. Rather meager outlook, this, for the students of Blackstone and Coke and Christy. Petty actions, such as trespass, appeals, slander, assaults and batteries, affrays, riots and liquor selling without license largely predominated. Slander cases were of frequent occurrence in the early days, and resulted, as they usually do now, either in a verdict of not guilty or in ridiculously small judgments for the plaintiffs, as per the case of Sarah Coneway vs. George W. Catron. Sarah had brought suit against Catron for $5,000. The jury found George guilty of slandering Sarah, but only gave her damages, as a salve for her damaged reputation, of six and a fourth cents, and that, too, with a man like Joseph Shaw as foreman of the jury. The writer has not done even that well with his slander cases, for he was the attorney for the plaintiff in the only two cases for slander begun in our Circuit Court of Clark County within the past thirty years, and did not get as much as even six and a fourth cents in both of them. The only case of slander that ever netted anything worth having in favor of the plaintiff that ever was tried in Clark County was the case of Miss Malthace Badger vs. James Elam, reported in the Twenty-third Illinois Supreme Court cases, page 445. This was one of the most malicious cases ever tried in our Circuit Court, or that has ever been printed in the Supreme Court Reports of any State. Judge Justin Harlan was on the bench, and John Scholfield appeared for the plaintiff, the fair Malthace, while Charles C. Constable appeared for the unfortunate James Elam. The speech of Scholfield in behalf of the plaintiff is said to have been one of the most awful pieces of forensic denunciation and exhortation ever heard. Those who have known and heard John Scholfield before a jury, in any case in which he was thoroughly aroused, can perhaps imagine the terrific stream of the burning lava of eloquence, of argument and of invective that he threw into his speech to the jury. It is said that while it was being delivered Elam stood on the court house steps, and with tears pouring down his agonized face kept constantly moaning to those around him, "I am ruined! I am ruined!" The verdict was for $1,000, and it was sustained by Judge Breese, of the Supreme Court. Judges were given short terms and small salaries during the first few years of our county history. The early judges who succeeded Judge Browne were: William Wilson, James O. Wattles, James Hall and Justin Harlin. Judges Wilson and Harlan had to be satisfied with short terms of office. Judge Browne held the office from September, 1819, to April, 1820, less than one year. William Wilson from April, 1820, to May, 1825, a little over five years, as his first term. James O. Wattles, from May, 1825, to November, 1825, six months; James Hall, from November, 1825, to May, 1826, six months; James O. Wattles, second term, from May, 1826, to April, 1827, about one year; William Wilson, second term, from April, 1827, to April, 1835, eight years; Justin Harlan, from April, 1835, to October, 1835, six months; Alex F. Grant, from October, 1835, to May, 1836, six months; Justin Harlan, second term, from May, 1836, to May, 1841, five years; William Wilson, third term, from May, 1841, to May, 1849, eight years; Justin Harlan, third term, from May, 1849, to May, 1861, twelve years; Charles Constable, from May, 1861, to May, 1866, five years; Hiram B. Decius, from 1866, to 1872, six years; and Oliver L. Davis, from 1872 to 1879, seven years. Judge Wilson served on the Circuit bench of Clark County seventeen years, while Judge Harlan served seventeen years and six months, or for a longer period than any man who has held that position during the eighty-seven years of Clark County's history. No other Circuit Judge has surpassed him for sterling manhood and unshakable honesty of purpose, good, hard, common sense, natural legal and judicial acumen, and unbounded popularity with the bar, the litigant and the people of the county.

Charles H. Constable was an honest, upright man, courteous, gentle and manly, and a capable Judge; but withal as different from Judge Harlan, whom he succeeded, as it is possible to conceive. Judge Constable was the father-in-law of Judge Jacob W. Wilkin, the present distinguished Justice of the Supreme Court of Illinois, and who is, with the single exception of Judge John Scholfield, the most lovable and popular man that has ever practiced law or presided as a Judge in Clark County. He married the favorite daughter of Judge Constable for his first wife, and in giving her into his love and keeping, Judge Constable, who loved this daughter as he loved his soul, could have well said to the young and handsome Major just home from an honorable service in the Union Army, as did the father of Mrs. William McKinley, to young Major William McKinley, afterwards to be one of our three martyred Presidents, when he asked for the hand of his beloved and idolized daughter in marriage: "Yes, McKinley, you can have her, but you are the only man I have ever known, with whom I would be willing to entrust the happiness of my daughter." Judge Constable held our Circuit Court during the stormy days of the Civil War, when the skies were crimson from burning homes, the hills shook with the cannon's boom, and with dying groans. He was a fearless man, personally, as well as in the discharge of what he conceived to be his official duties, and an ardent Democrat. At one time while Judge he clashed with the military authorities of the United States Government, by discharging, on a writ of habeas corpus, a soldier arrested in Clark County and held by an officer of the Government as a deserter. This act of Judge Constable angered the military authorities, and Colonel Henry M. Carrington, with a company of United States troops, was sent to Marshall to arrest him. This he did, as the Judge sat upon the Circuit bench in the court house hearing cases. This act aroused the most intense excitement throughout the county, and provoked the bitterest feelings among the friends of the Judge. Some wild talk was indulged in, and steps taken by the enraged friends of the jurist to meet the soldiers at Big Creek, two miles east of Marshall, on the National Road, who were known to be marching on Marshall for his arrest. Wiser counsel, including that of Judge Constable, prevailed, and no resistance was made, the arrest being effected without opposition. Judge Scholfield, the leading lawyer of Clark County, accompanied Judge Constable to Terre Haute, where a hearing was had in chambers before Judge Elisha M. Huntington, of the Federal Court, and Judge Constable discharged and allowed to return to his home and duties at Marshall.

Judge Hiram B. Decius, of Cumberland County, who succeeded Judge Constable in 1866, was an honest, conscientious man, but not a great lawyer or a superior Judge. Oliver L. Davis of Danville, Vermilion County, who took his place in 1872, shared with Judge Harlan and Jacob W. Wilkin the distinction of being one of the most popular Judges, with both litigant and bar, that has ever occupied the circuit bench of Clark County. He faithfully, intelligently and satisfactorily served the people of Clark County as Circuit Judge from 1872 to 1879, a period of seven years, and was succeeded successively by William E. Nelson, of Decatur, Macon County; Colonel B. Smith and Oliver L. Davis, and Jacob W. Wilkin, of Marshall, Clark County.

Judge Wilkin, now dead, was born in Licking County, Ohio, June 7, 1837, and was the son of Isaac and Sarah Wilkin, who came to Crawford County, Ill., from Ohio, in 1845. He was a graduate of McKendree College, and in

1860 began to read law with Judge Constable, his future father-in-law. After the election of Mr. Constable to the Circuit bench he entered the law office of John Scholfield. He caught the war fever early, and feeling that his duty to his country was greater than his duty to Blackstone and Kent, he enlisted as Captain of Company K, One Hundred and Thirtieth Illinois Infantry, and served until September, 1865, when he was mustered out as Major of his regiment, and came home. Miss Alice E. Constable, the beautiful and charming daughter of Judge Constable, was waiting for him, with the fidelity of long waiting burning in her heart, and the light of her first and only love shining in her eyes. Jacob did not keep her longer waiting, for we find that on September 21, 1865, a few days after his returning feet touched the soil of Marshall, he made her his wife. In January, following, he was admitted to the bar, and opened a law office in Marshall. He was a Presidential Elector of the Republican party in 1872, and afterwards a candidate for Congress against John R. Eden, that staunch old Democratic war-horse of Sullivan, Moultrie County. Though defeated, he carried this then heavily Democratic county by about 800 majority. He was beaten when he first ran for Circuit Judge by William E. Nelson, but again demonstrated his hold upon the people and voters of Clark County by defeating his opponent by about 2,500 majority. Judge Wilkin's popularity is not surprising to those who know him as we know him in Clark County. He was one of the most courteous, kind-hearted, lovable and popular men, with all kinds and conditions of men and women and children, that Clark County has ever had the honor to number as one of its citizens. He was at one time a law partner of Thomas J. Golden, another splendid lawyer and noble citizen of Clark County, about whom we will have more to say farther along in this chapter, and afterwards he formed a partnership with John Scholfield, the greatest lawyer Clark County, and one of the very greatest lawyers Illinois has ever known. As a man, as a lawyer, as a citizen, or as a Judge, Judge Scholfield has been equaled by few, if any, and surpassed by none, in the whole eventful history of Clark County. It was with the law firm of Scholfield & Wilkin, and afterwards with the firm of Dulaney & Golden, that the writer pursued his studies of the law before his admission to the practice, and it is needless to say that their many acts of kindness, of help, of advice, of admonition, and of encouragement will linger in pleasant memory and be cherished and appreciated forever by him. Judge Wilkin was a man whose life was gentle, upright and pure, and one in whom the elements were so mixed that nature can stand up and say to all the world, "This is a man." He was unanimously re-elected about a year ago for another full term of nine years as an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of Illinois. His term would not have expired until 1915, when he would have been about seventy-eight years old, so that, even if he had not died, this probably would have been his last term on the bench of the Supreme Court of Illinois; but of one thing there is no doubt, and that is that Judge Jacob W. Wilkin has taken with him to his grave the lasting, sincere and heart-felt affection of the people of Clark County, regardless of politics, religion or creed. Judge Wilkin was first elected Circuit Judge June 1, 1879, and held the office until June 1, 1888, when he resigned to go upon the bench of the Supreme Court of Illinois, as an Associate Justice of that distinguished court. There he met his old preceptor, law partner and life-long friend, Judge John Scholfield.

On June 1, 1885, Colonel B. Smith (second term) and James F. Hughes, of Mattoon, Coles County, were elected Circuit Judges of Clark and other counties, and when Judge Wilkin resigned in 1888, Edward P. Vall, of Decatur, Macon County, took his place. On June 1, 1891, Ferdinand Bookwalter, of Danville, Vermillion County; Edward P. Vall, of Decatur, Macon County; and Francis M. Wright, now the United States District Judge for this district, of Urbana, Champaign County, were elected Circuit Judges for this circuit and for Clark County. On June 18, 1897, Ferdinand Bookwalter, Henry Van Sellar, of Paris, Edgar County, and Frank K. Dunn, of Charleston, Edgar County, were elected Circuit Judges for Clark County, and for this district. On September 17, 1902, Martin W. Thompson, of Danville, Vermillion County, was appointed by Governor Richard Yates to fill the vacancy as Circuit Judge occasioned by the death of Judge Bookwalter; and on June 18, 1903, Morton W. Thompson, E. R. E. Kimbrough, of Danville, Vermillion

County, and James W. Craig, of Mattoon, Coles County, were elected as the three Circuit Judges for this judicial circuit, and for Clark County. Judge Thompson is a Republican in politics, while Judge Kimbrough and Judge Craig are Democrats, though the Democracy of Judge Kimbrough is not of the steadfast and unshakable kind as that of Judge Craig, and he has sometimes acted independently in politics, and has even, at least upon one notable occasion, helped to defeat a Democratic National candidate for President. Judges Kimbrough and Craig are the first Democrats to be elected Circuit Judges in this district, or for Clark County, since the election of William E. Nelson, in August, 1877, nearly thirty years ago, and it is not likely that even they could have been elected in this judicial circuit, composed of Clark, Edgar, Cumberland, Coles and Vermillion Counties, which have an aggregate Republican majority of about 4,000, had it not been for the just anger of the Republicans of Coles County over the defeat of Judge Frank K. Dunn, of Charleston, Coles County, for re-nomination, and the nomination in his place of Judge Henry Van Sellar, of Edgar County. Judge Van Sellar had proven a very unsatisfactory Judge, both to the bar and to the litigants of the district, while Judge Dunn was universally loved and trusted for his many noble and sterling qualities of heart and mind. Judge Dunn has just taken the place of Judge Wilkin on the Illinois Supreme bench. It is needless to say that Judges Kimbrough, Craig and Thompson are giving the best of satisfaction to the local bars of the several counties of their district, as well as to all those having judicial business in their courts. Clark County has been remarkably fortunate in the character, ability and fitness of her Circuit Judges. From 1819 until the present time, at least in recent years, but one has failed to come up to the proper judicial standard, and but one has ever proven himself unworthy of the trust and confidence of the people of this county. Upon the ability, purity and absolute honesty of our Circuit Judges rests, in large measure, the present and future well-being of the property interests and personal safety of the people of this great and advancing commonwealth of Illinois. The true dignity, importance and power of our Circuit Judges are not fully realized by all, and it is a fact not generally known that they are the only civil officers in this country in whose hands is placed the terrible and dangerous power of life and death.

The first County Judge of Clark County was Samuel Prevo, who held the office from 1819 to 1823. Then came Charles Neeley, from 1823 to 1825, followed by Jacob Harlan from 1825 to 1835, ten years; Uri Manley, 1835 to 1843, eight years; Stephen Archer, 1843 to 1853, ten years; John Bartlett, 1853 to 1854, resigned, one year; John Stockwell, 1854 to 1857, three years; William C. Whitlock, 1857 to 1869, twelve years; William G. Griffith, 1869 to 1873, four years; Justin Harlan, 1873 to 1877, four years; W. R. Griffith, 1877 to 1882, four years; Eth Sutton, 1882 to 1886, four years; Henry Gassaway, 1886 to 1894, eight years; William T. Hollenbeck, 1894 to 1898, four years; J. C. Perdue, 1898 to January, 1902, when he resigned to accept the Marshall Postoffice, to which he had been appointed. Everett Connelly, appointed by Governor Yates in February, 1902, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Judge Perdue, was elected County Judge in November, 1902. His term of office will expire in December, 1906, when he will have served four years and ten months as County Judge. He is not a candidate for re-election, the salary of $500 per year not being sufficient to induce a man of his ability and faculty for money making to accept of this office as a gift. Of all these County Judges, Justin Harlan, who had been Circuit Judge for over seventeen years before his election as County Judge, in 1873, was probably a man of the best natural legal mind. It is certain that he made a model County Judge, as he had already made a model Circuit Judge. Uri Manley and William C. Whitlock were, as was Judge Harlan, practicing lawyers when elected to the bench. Eth Sutton, though he never practiced law prior to his election as County Judge, or much afterwards, was a man of good education, especially along business and clerical lines, a close student, as well as an indefatigable investigator of the law questions coming up in his court. He was always honest, conscientious and careful in the decisions, and made one of the best County Judges Clark County has ever had. Henry Gassaway, who succeeded Judge Sutton, though not a practicing lawyer, or even admitted to practice at the time of his election, yet he made a fine reputation as a Justice of the Peace of Martinsville Township. He studied law and was admitted to practice before he retired from office, and by his industry, honesty, devotion to his duties, hard common sense and business ability, succeeded as one of the four best Judges of recent years. Since his retirement from the bench he has been in the insurance, banking and other business in Martinsville, this county, where, by his good morals, gentlemanly deportment and general good citizenship, he has won the confidence and esteem of all who know him. He was born in Parke County, Ind., December 4, 1848.

William T. Hollenbeck made one of the best Judges the county ever had. He is a man of large experience in legal affairs, and more extensive probate and chancery practice than any man who has ever been County Judge of Clark County. He is a man of good general education, has been a close student of business affairs and of men, has traveled in Europe and elsewhere, and is conservative, progressive and safe in his law and business affairs. Mr. Hollenbeck is now about forty-five years old, having been born in York Township, Clark County, October 18, 1861. In probate, chancery and real-estate law he has few equals, and no superior, at the bar of Marshall, in recent years, at least. He is a graduate of the law department of the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, class of 1892, is a man of considerable property, and prominent in business and political affairs of Marshall and Clark County and in the Republican party of the county, of which he is the County Chairman, and of his Congressional, Judicial and Senatorial Districts, as well as of middle eastern Illinois. He is a man of energy, conviction and of unusual force of character, and would have made his mark in any community into which his fortunes might have been cast, as he has already done in Marshall and in Clark County. While County Judge he was firm, impartial, fair and usually markedly correct in his rulings and decisions. He has just been elected as a Representative in the Illinois Legislature from Clark, Coles and Douglas Counties.

J. C. Perdue, who succeeded Judge Hollenbeck, was not a lawyer, and his resignation in 1902 made way for the appointment and subsequent election of Everett Connelly, who, with Sutton, Gassaway and Hollenbeck, ranks as the four best Clark County Judges of recent years. At the time of his appointment by Governor Yates, in February, 1902, Mr. Connelly was one of the youngest, if not indeed the youngest, County Judges ever elected or appointed in Illinois. He was born on a farm in Parker Township, Clark County, September 8, 1877, and was therefore not yet twenty-five years old at the time of his first assumption of judicial duties. Judge Connelly is a young man of correct personal habits, extensive research along historic and general literary lines, and thoroughly familiar with the contents of his large and well selected library. He is a graduate of the law department of the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, is a public speaker of more than average eloquence and force, and has, by his energy, industry and thrift, acquired quite a little property. Since the salary of County Judge has been reduced from $800 to $500 per year, the position could hardly command the entire time of an incumbent of the office, and Judge Connelly had to absent himself from his office a good deal to look after other and more valuable monetary interests. Judge Connelly has a good legal mind, and was usually correct in his rulings and decisions, but he was severe in his punishment of certain kinds of misdemeanors, especially the selling, contrary to law, of intoxicants, for which he required enormous bonds and imposed exceptionally large fines or lengthy imprisonment. He was never accused of favoritism or of being controlled by any invidious influences likely to swerve him from what he may have conceived to be right and proper in the premises.

Fenton W. Booth, though not a Judge of any Clark County Court, is a Clark County product, and as one of the five Judges of the great and important Court of Claims at Washington, D. C., deserves a place with the bench of his native county. He was born in Marshall, May 12, 1869, and is a little past thirty-seven years old. He is the son of Lyman Booth, for many years an honored and prominent merchant of Marshall, and the nephew of the late Newton Booth, once Governor of California, and United States Senator from that State. Judge Booth was educated in the common schools of Marshall and at the De Pauw University, at Greencastle, Ind., and is a graduate of the law department of the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, class of 1892. His church affiliations are Episcopal, his politics are Republican, and he is a member of the Knights of Pythias, Elks, Red Men and Court of Honor. He has been a member of the Illinois Legislature, and was, until recently, the Chairman of the County Committee of his party. He was a candidate for Circuit Judge of this district with Thompson, Kimbrough, Van Sellar, Craig and Decius, at the election for Judges on June 18, 1903, and defeated by twenty-one votes, his first and only defeat. Judge Booth is a man upon whose birth the good angels smiled, and whom the Goddess of Good Fortune has been pelting with the choicest flowers ever since. He is a living example of the truism that often when we think we are cast down, we are to be exalted, and when we are apparently exalted, we are to be ruined. His defeat for Circuit Judge, an office lasting only six years, and paying but $3,500 per year, resulted in elevating him to the still higher and more exalted position of a Judge of the Court of Claims at Washington, D. C., for the term of his life, and at a salary of $6,000 per year. He is one of the youngest, if not the youngest, man that has ever reached membership in that great and important court—a court that has to do with larger pecuniary interests, and which disposes of more and larger monetary claims than any other court, National or State, in the Union. The judgments of this court often run into the millions, and the fees allowed attorneys practicing before it not infrequently run into the hundreds of thousands. Judge Booth, before he was appointed Judge of the Court of Claims, practiced law in Marshall, being a member of the firm of Golden, Scholfield & Booth, and he was distinctively the fighting trial lawyer of that strong firm. He is a man of fine personal appearance, pleasing address, is a good writer, and one of the best and most eloquent speakers Clark County has ever produced. He has a fine legal mind, is well grounded in the principles of the law, and, besides, is a man of considerable literary attainments. He is a blood cousin of Booth Tarkington, the noted writer of Indianapolis, Ind., came by his talent by inheritance, and has improved it by education and study. He is popular with all classes, of most excellent personal habits, and devoted to his wife and four daughters.

Judge John Scholfield, of Marshall, Clark County, Ill., was one of the greatest lawyers, one of the greatest Judges, and one of the greatest men that Clark County ever produced. He was born in a cabin just south of what is now the city of Martinsville, Clark County, August 1, 1834, of humble but respected parentage, and passed away at his home in Marshall, Monday, February 13, 1903, at fifteen minutes after twelve o'clock p. m. Judge Scholfield was an incarnation of the possibilities that lie in the pathway of every citizen of the Great Republic. His birth cry echoed against the walls of a cabin and was heard only by his kindred; his transition, though calm, conscious and painless, evoked messages of sympathy for his family and friends from the homes of the lofty, and smote painfully upon the consciousness of millions of his countrymen. Position, though most often gained by merit, may be an incident or an accident; but to live in the hearts and affections of the people who knew and loved him, as the people of Marshall and Clark County knew and loved Judge Scholfield, is to have lived in sympathy with the people; and no scholarship alone, no eloquence alone, no judicial attainments alone, no acquired information alone, and Judge Scholfield had all these, could have won for him the love which even now, after more than thirteen years from his transition, burns in the hearts and souls of the people of Clark County, when their minds dwell upon the many private and public virtues and the many noble qualities of heart and mind of Judge John Scholfield. The lesson of Judge Scholfield's life lies open for our perusal, and it is a lesson that may well put hope and encouragement into the humblest and most poverty-enviored heart. John Scholfield lost his mother in 1849, when he was fifteen years of age, and he went to live with his uncle, Jacob Anderson, who kept a tavern and a stable on the National Road in Martinsville. He did general work, such as feeding, currying and hitching horses, and attended the village school when he could. He was even then a constant reader of good books, some of which could always be found hid away in the stable loft. In 1851 he entered the private school conducted by Rev. Dean Andrews, then the Congregational minister at Marshall, and during his school days he was constantly seen with a book in his hands, his eyes glued to its precious pages, and utterly oblivious to all else, as he went to and from the school. He was a man, in his younger days, of giant strength, and easily mastered his schoolmates in athletic and other rough sports of that day, as he dominated them by his intellect, and by his constant study at his books. He taught and attended school alternately from 1851 to 1854, and attended law school at Louisville, Ky., receiving his diploma in 1856. He had been admitted to the bar for practice of the law before his graduation at Louisville, and had formed a partnership with James C. Robinson in 1855. In 1856 he was elected State's Attorney for the Fourth Judicial Circuit, then consisting of ten counties. This position he held for four years, and it is entirely safe to say that no such a State's Attorney, both for ability, energy and unshakable impartiality in the prosecution of violators of the law, and devotion to his duty as Prosecuting Attorney, has held the office of State's Attorney before or since in Illinois. As a prosecutor he was unsurpassed, and well-nigh unsurpassable. Few guilty men ever escaped conviction in the then Fourth Judicial Circuit while John Scholfield was State's Attorney. After the expiration of his term of office as State's Attorney he resumed his general law practice in Marshall, and his ability and absolute devotion to the interests of his clients soon brought him a large practice and wide reputation. In 1860 he was elected to the Legislature, and in 1869 was sent as a delegate from Clark and Cumberland Counties to the Constitutional Convention. In 1870 he became the general counsel of the Vandalia Railroad, now the Terre Haute & Indianapolis Railroad, for the State of Illinois. This position he resigned in 1873 to take the position upon the Supreme bench of Illinois made vacant by the resignation of Judge Anthony Thornton, of Shelbyville, Ill., being elected to fill the vacancy over Judge Kingsbury, of Hillsboro, Ill. It was during this campaign that an effort was made by Judge Kingsbury's friends to get Mr. Scholfield to say in advance of the election how he would decide certain questions if he should be elected Supreme Judge, and he answered them in the only way that Judge Scholfield could or would answer them, that he would tell no man or set of men how he would decide cases coming before him if elected Judge; that he had rather be beaten than do this, and if elected he would decide all cases coming before him as his judgment, after careful investigation, told him was right and proper. In 1879 and again in 1888 he had no opposition, and he served continuously on the Supreme bench of Illinois from 1873 until his death in 1893, a period of twenty years. No more able, laborious and conscientious Judge ever sat in that exalted and honorable position. He was modesty personified, so much so that it was absolutely impossible to get him to talk about himself, and it seemed to actually pain him to have others praise him in his presence. He had a remarkable memory, and his knowledge of history, ancient and modern, was prodigious. The writer of this history was for twelve years, from 1885 to 1897, employed in the Government service at Washington, D. C., and during that time he had the good fortune as well as pleasure to hear before the Supreme Court of the United States and in the Senate and House of Representatives some of the greatest lawyers, most able statesmen and and ablest debators in the country, and never has he seen or heard a greater or more profoundly eloquent, or a more learned man, or a speaker of more unshakable logic, address either Supreme Court, President of the Senate or Speaker of the House of Representatives than John Scholfield. His speech made to a jury of Clark County in defense of William Hardway for the killing of Jerre Blakemen, if it had been reported and printed, would have undoubtedly given him a national reputation, both as a lawyer and as a forensic advocate. It is known that Judge Scholfield could have had the position of United States District Judge at Springfield, Ill., afterward obtained by Judge Allen, or the exalted position of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, afterwards obtained by Judge Fuller, of Chicago. But he declined them both, or rather absolutely refused to allow his friends to seek either of these places for him. Yet it was well known in Washington at the time that President Cleveland would have appointed him to either of these positions could he have been induced to overcome his innate modesty and accept them. It was one of the greatest disappointments in the life of the writer and other of his friends that he could not be induced by any arguments they could use to become either United States District Judge or Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. As a rule, before the lips of mortuary eloquence have grown still, the irresistible tide of events has drifted the hurrying sands over the rocks, and other sails whiten where the mighty ship has gone down; but it is not so with Judge Scholfield. He will live in the hearts and memories of the people of Clark County, where he was born, raised, educated, labored, lived and died, as long as the county itself shall endure; and that his noble and exalted spirit still lives and knows and remembers is to the writer not a matter of mere belief or hope or faith, but of absolute conviction. Let those sneer at the hope of an after life who will, but he must be an egotist and an atheist indeed who will not pause long and fearfully before lifting the dead latch to materialism under the light of such strength, fidelity, and such noble manhood as guided the ways of this man of the people. When a great man dies we gaze at his unfinished efforts and cry out for some proof that the work goes on. Dullards we are all! Cannot we discern that the testimony of the soul is the only testimony we dare not challenge? That thought is a witness never suborned? That the echo we so fain would grasp repeats immortality in every voiceless atom, in every viewless, measureless length of space? Lived ever in the conscientiousness of the people of Marshall and of Clark County, who knew, respected, honored and loved this great and good man and upright Judge, more surely, more patiently than he lives today, though no more living in the flesh than the radiant denizen of a star? Were years of intense study and toil the only compensation wrung from a life of such great usefulness, such unceasing, laborious, uncomplaining, conscientious industry as his? Ah no! with us abides the loss, but this is a universe of compensations, and somewhere and somehow there must be an equivalent gain. As was well said by his life-long and devoted friend and associate at the bar and in Marshall, the Hon. Thomas J. Golden, himself a man of great learning, great industry and great legal ability, in an article contributed to the memory of his friend: "In death as in life he was the same unassuming man that had so long walked in and out before us. Grand in and by his simplicity, he has left his impress on the jurisprudence of his State, and a worthy example of honesty and industry to inspire the youth of coming generations.

When a great man dies
 For years beyond our ken,
 The light he leaves behind him
 Lies along the path of men.

The noble and exalted spirit of Judge John Scholfield, with all the garnered riches of wisdom and virtue, with its personality beautified, but not absorbed by the new light that broke on its resplendent vision in that other and higher life, sailed out of this earthly night into the radiant morning of another and better existence. Upon that morning our mortal vision can never rest. At its threshold we part for a while with our preceptor, counselor and friend; but only until the hour when each of us shall go forth upon the long journey, saying with the philosopher of Greece, 'Ye are to live, oh judges, and I am to die! Which is best, the gods alone do know.' Good friend, faithful advisor, helper in days of discouragement and of direst need, hail and farewell! Thy work is done.

But while the races of mankind endure
 Let thy great example stand,
 Colossal seen of every land,
 To keep the soldier firm, the judges pure,
 Till in all lands, and through all human story
 The path of duty be the way of glory."

THE BAR OF CLARK COUNTY—COUNTY OFFICIALS—APPOINTEES FROM CLARK COUNTY, AND INCIDENTS, COMMENTS, ETC., THEREON.

Clark County has had a long line of competent and distinguished State's Attorneys. Of John M. Robinson, the first, Edwin B. Webb, the second, and O. B. Ficklin, the third, only the last is well remembered today. His first appearance here appears to have been in September, 1830, when he rode into Darwin, the county seat, on a day memorable, not so much for the arrival of the future Prosecuting Attorney of Clark County as for the discovery of an immense den of snakes, "as large as a bale of hay," as Mr. Ficklin afterwards declared.

These snakes, on being uncovered, started out in every direction through the town, and the whole population seemed to be busily engaged in the killing. O. B. Ficklin was born in Scott County, Ky., December 16, 1808, and hence was only twenty-two years old when he reached Darwin. He had come from Missouri to Mt. Carmel, Ill., where he became a member of the Wabash bar. He was a member of the Illinois Legislature in 1834, when the State capital was at Vandalia, and there met Lincoln, Douglas, John T. Stewart, Dubois and many others who afterwards achieved State and National fame. Of this bright galaxy, Ficklin regarded Stewart as the superior, both intellectually and physically; but Stewart was a Whig, and as that party did not suit the people of Illinois he was never so much heard of in after years as Lincoln, Douglas and Dubois. In 1835 Mr. Ficklin was chosen State's Attorney of the Wabash County District, which included Clark County. In 1837 he removed to Charleston, Coles County, where he lived and practiced his profession until his death. In 1843 he was elected to Congress from the Coles County District, and in this capacity was associated with Douglas, John A. McClelland and Wentworth. He was re-elected in 1846, and found an associate representative from Illinois in the renowned Lincoln, whom he had first met at Vandalia in 1834, twelve years before. He was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention in 1856, when Buchanan was nominated, and was also a delegate to the Charleston Convention in 1860. He was again elected a member of the Illinois Legislature in 1876. In 1846, while a member of Congress from Illinois, he married Elizabeth H. Colquitt, a daughter of United States Senator Walter T. Colquitt, of Georgia. Alfred Colquitt, the brother of Mrs. Ficklin, was afterwards a United States Senator from Georgia. At his death, Mr. Ficklin was the father of the Illinois bar. He was present on the platform with Lincoln and Douglas at the time of their renowned debate at Charleston, on which occasion Lincoln adroitly and effectively used Mr. Ficklin, who was a Democrat, and had been with him in Congress at the time of the beginning of the Mexican War, to repel the charge made by Douglas that Lincoln had voted against some measure looking to the vigorous prosecution of the Mexican War. Of the two earlier State's Attorneys of Clark County, John

M. Robinson was afterwards a soldier in the Mexican War, served four consecutive terms in Congress, to which he was first elected in 1858, was the successful Democratic nominee for Governor in 1864, and died at Springfield, Ill., November 3, 1886. Edwin B. Webb, the second, was State's Attorney of White County as well as of Clark, a member of the Legislature of Illinois from 1834 to 1842, and State Senator from 1842 to 1846. He was a Whig Presidential Elector in 1844, and when nominated by the Whig party for Governor in 1852 was beaten by Joel A. Matteson, his Democratic opponent. He was also an unsuccessful candidate for Supreme Judge against Judge Scotes. He died October 14, 1858, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. His immediate official successor, Augustus C. French, was a resident of Crawford County, and afterwards member of the Illinois Legislature, Receiver of the Land Office at Palestine, Democratic Governor of Illinois for two terms, being elected to that office in 1846 and again in 1848, Bank Commissioner of Illinois, and professor of law in McKendree College at Lebanon. He was nominated by the Douglas wing of the Democratic party in 1858 and defeated for Superintendent of Public Instruction, was a member of the Constitutional Convention from St. Clair County in 1862, and died at his home in Lebanon, September 4, 1864. Of Gardner B. Shellady, the fifth State's Attorney of Clark County, history is silent; but Aaron Shaw, the sixth to hold that office, was a Democratic member of Congress in 1856 and 1882, and also served as Circuit Judge. He was born in New York in 1811, and died at his home in Olney, Ill. He was one of the ablest and most remorseless Prosecuting Attorneys that Eastern Illinois ever saw, being surpassed only by John Scholfield. Alfred Kitchel was the seventh State's Attorney, John Scholfield the eighth and James R. Cunningham, of Charleston, Ill., was the ninth.

Silas S. Whitehead, the tenth State's Attorney, was born in Putnam County, Ill., June 18, 1829, and came to Clark County with his parents in 1830. He was educated in the common schools, studied law with Judge Scholfield, his boyhood companion and friend, at Marshall, and was admitted to the bar in 1862. He was School Commissioner five terms, and was elected State's Attorney in 1864 and 1868. He possessed great force of character, and at one time was a leading practitioner at the bar of Clark County. He was a man of intense prejudice, not always well placed, and in his capacity as editor of various publications was bitter and unrelenting in his pursuit of his enemies, real or imaginary, often attacking those who had been his most devoted and self-sacrificing friends. He had the misfortune to shoot and kill John L. Ryan, who succeeded him as the eleventh State's Attorney of Clark County, in Marshall, on June 9, 1877. This act was bitterly resented by a large portion of the people of the county, especially the party associates of Ryan, as he was the first Republican State's Attorney Clark County had ever had, and it darkened and embittered all of Mr. Whitehead's subsequent life. In the first trial, at Marshall, in November, 1877, he was vigorously prosecuted by T. J. Golden and H. C. Bell, of Clark County, and by E. Callahan, of Crawford County, and ably defended by Jacob W. Wilkin, James C. Robinson, of Springfield, and others. Judge Oliver L. Davis presided, and Whitehead was convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary for one year. A new trial was allowed by Judge Davis, the case was taken to Crawford County on a change of venue and in a subsequent trial in Robinson, before Judge John H. Halley, of Jasper County, Whitehead was acquitted. The killing took place in the law office of the writer, which was also the office of Benson Martin, Justice of the Peace, in the room over the postoffice, on the east side of the Public Square, now occupied by B. F. Johnson as a loan and real-estate office. One Austin Fitzsimmons had cut Ryan in the head with a knife. The City Attorney, Ralph W. Love, assisted by the writer, was prosecuting Fitzsimmons, and Whitehead was defending him. Ryan was being cross-examined as a witness for the prosecution by Whitehead when the trouble arose which culminated in a fight between Whitehead and Ryan, during which Whitehead shot Ryan, the ball passing through his bowels and lodging in his spinal column and resulting in his death the following day, which was Sunday, June 10, 1877, at about 8 o'clock in the morning. It is proper to say that Ryan struck the first blow. No homicide in Clark County ever provoked so much angry feeling and bad blood as this. It made enemies out of life-long friends, and the bad effect of it did not die away for years afterwards. A subscription of over $800 was subscribed to aid in the prosecution of Whitehead, and the feelings of the people, already wrought up to the highest and bitterest pitch of excitement and fury, were still further intensified and embittered by the conduct and action of Whitehead himself, who constantly, through his newspaper, the "Eastern Illinoisian," attacked in the bitterest and most unjust way the attorneys for the people, the witnesses who testified against him and the jury that convicted him; and finally Wilkin, who had defended him in the courts, as well as Edwin Harlan, T. L. Orndorff, D. LeGore and others, who had stood by him manfully in his troubles. Many people did not consider that Whitehead was justified in shooting Ryan, although the latter was not a man of good personal habits, was a giant in strength, and at times exceedingly quarrelsome and dangerous, and many who knew him feared him greatly. A bitter feeling had existed between himself and Whitehead for some time, and as Ryan had undoubtedly made threats of personal violence, Whitehead may really have believed, as he swore at his trials, that he was actually in danger of losing his life or of receiving great bodily harm. John L. Ryan, the eleventh Prosecuting Attorney of Clark County, who succeeded Silas Whitehead in 1872, held the office until 1876, a period of four years. He was a man of great physical and mental strength, over six feet high, weighed about 250 pounds, and for a man of his proportions was remarkably active. He had a fine legal mind, and with perhaps the exception of Scholfield and Whitehead was one of the strongest and most successful men who have presided over the State's Attorney's office in Clark County. Competent judges had great confidence in his ability to make his mark in his profession, but his sad death, in the very zenith of his career, put an end to bright prophecies and deprived the community of an able and many-sided citizen.

Thomas L. Orndorff, who succeeded John L. Ryan, was born in Guernsey County, Ohio, March 24, 1839, and came to Clark County with his parents in the early fall of 1854, his mother dying soon afterward. He was educated, principally, at Zanesville, Ohio. In our Civil War he was a First-Lieutenant of Company G, One Hundred and Fifty-second Illinois Infantry. In 1874 he came to Marshall and read law with James C. Robinson, and was admitted to the bar in 1877, one year after he had been elected State's Attorney. In all Mr. Orndorff was State's Attorney for sixteen years and was a candidate for the fifth term in 1900, receiving his first defeat at the hands of M. B. Davison. He was first elected in November, 1876, and again in 1880. In 1884 he was succeeded by Newton Tibbs, who served until 1888, when Mr. Orndorff was again elected, and re-elected in 1892, finally retiring from the office in December, 1896, making, as before stated, four full terms of four years each, the longest term of service in that office of any man in Clark County. While not a profound lawyer, especially in pleadings, Mr. Orndorff was a man of fine common sense and one of the best examiners of witnesses the county has ever had. He was an exceedingly forcible advocate before a jury, and an exceedingly dangerous one for his opponents, as when he had the closing speech it was a difficult matter to keep him from either winning his case or hanging the jury. He was a splendid mixer among the common people, conciliatory, winning, generous, forgiving and popular, and was liked by even those whom his position compelled him to prosecute. He seldom made enemies of defendants in criminal cases, and, as was said by the most eloquent orator America has ever produced, on a certain notable occasion: "Were every one for whom Thomas L. Orndorff did some generous and loving act to drop a blossom on his grave, he would sleep tonight beneath a wilderness of flowers." After life's fitful fever he sleeps well. Requiescat in pace.

Newton Tibbs, of Martinsville Township, the successor of Thomas L. Orndorff in 1884, was a man of indefatigable industry, strict integrity and a good knowledge of the fundamental principles of the law. His devotion to duty, strict integrity, impartiality and vigor of his prosecutions soon made him one of the best Prosecutors Clark County has ever had. He was born in Kentucky and came to Clark County in 1860, where his mother died in 1864. He attended the common schools, taught school and studied law at night, Saturdays and Sundays. In 1860 he went to Kansas, completed his law readings with Elihu Davis, of that State, and was admitted to the Kansas bar in 1880. After his retirement from office he practiced alone in Marshall for a time, then formed a partnership with James W. Graham, which continued until his death, September 15, 1899. Mr. Tibbs left a stainless reputation, both as a lawyer and man, and his death was distinctly a loss to the legal profession of Clark County. Samuel M. Scholfield, the fifth son of Judge John Scholfield, and who succeeded Mr. Tibbs, was born in Marshall, August 21, 1872, was educated in the common schools of Clark County, at Notre Dame, Ind., and at Ann Arbor, Mich., read law with W. B. Scholfield, his brother, and was admitted to practice by the Supreme Court of Illinois in 1895. He was elected State's Attorney in November, 1896, and retired from office in December to make way for his successor, M. B. Davison, who had given Thomas L. Orndorff his first defeat, and who was, up to that time, with the exception of John L. Ryan, the only Republican State's Attorney ever elected in Clark County. Mr. Scholfield made a clean, vigorous and successful State's Attorney, and retired from office with the respect and esteem of all. He next opened a law office in Marshall, and upon the retirement of Judge Fenton W. Booth from the law firm of Golden, Scholfield & Booth became a member of the new firm of Golden, Scholfield & Scholfield, with which he since has been connected. Mr. Scholfield is an honest and industrious young man, and the firm has the best paying law practice in the county.

M. B. Davison, who succeeded Mr. Scholfield, is a product of Clark County, having been born in Wabash Township, February 17, 1872, and was therefore thirty-four years old on the 18th of February, 1906. He was elected in November, 1900, and retired from office in December, 1904, to be succeeded by Arthur Poorman, the present State's Attorney. Mr. Davison was educated in the common schools of Clark County and at the State Normal, at Terre Haute, Ind. He taught school for several years, read law with W. B. Scholfield, in Marshall, and was admitted to the practice in 1896. He is a member of the Law and Ritual Committee of the Court of Honor, and is now serving his second term in that capacity. Mr. Davison is a young man of pleasing address, honest, energetic, pushing and popular; is a good all-round lawyer and made a capable and successful State's Attorney. Since his retirement from office he has been senior member of the firm of Davison & Bartlett, which firm has a good paying practice and has the respect and confidence of the entire community.

Arthur Poorman, the present State's Attorney of Clark County, was born in Harper County, Kan., where his parents then temporarily resided, August 2, 1880, and is therefore but about twenty-six years of age, and was only a little past twenty-four years of age at the time of his election in November, 1904. With the exception of John Scholfield, he is the youngest man and third Republican ever elected State's Attorney in Clark County. He was brought up in West Union, York Township, Clark County, and educated in its common schools and at Merom College, of Merom, Ind., and graduated from the law department of Michigan University, at Ann Arbor, in the class of 1903. Mr. Poorman is a clean, honest, intelligent, genial and popular young man, and liked by all who know him. He is devoted to his duties, looks carefully and impartially after violations of the criminal statutes of the State, and has run his own affairs as State's Attorney without dictation or improper influences from any one. There never has been any scandal connected with the State's Attorney's office in Clark County under Mr. Poorman's administration. Mr. Poorman has a good heart as well as a good head, and, inasmuch as the office of State's Attorney is essentially a judicial one, and the public prosecutor is often called upon to temper justice with mercy, a good heart as well as a cool head is needed.

The Circuit Clerks of Clark County have been as follows: William B. Archer, 1819 to 1820, first term, one year; Jacob Harlan, 1823 to 1836, thirteen years; Jonathan Rathbone, 1836 to 1837, one year; Uri Manley, 1837 to 1842, five years; Newton Harlan, 1842 to 1848, six years; William B. Archer, second term, 1848 to 1852, four years; William P. Bennett, 1852 to 1860, eight years; Thomas W. Cole, 1860 to 1872, twelve years; Daniel J. Davidson, 1872 to 1880, eight years; William B. Hodge, Jr., 1880 to 1888, eight years; Joshua Montgomery, 1888 to 1892, four years; Harry Redman, 1892 to 1896, four years; J. Q. Snedeker, 1896 to 1900, four years; John A. Sweet, 1900 to 1904, four years; and Daniel Emerson, who was elected in November, 1904, and whose term of four years will expire in December, 1908. Of the fourteen Circuit Clerks of Clark County, none but William B. Archer achieved a State or National reputation. He was a member of the Illinois Legislature in 1824, State Senator in 1832, Captain in the Black Hawk War, candidate for Lieutenant-Governor in 1834, member of the Board of Commissioners of the Illinois and Michigan Canal in 1835, again a Representative in the Illinois Legislature from 1840 to 1846, and candidate for Congress in 1854 against James C. Allen. When Allen got the certificate of election and Archer contested, the office was declared vacant, and in 1856 he again ran against Allen, but was defeated. He was a delegate from Illinois to the first Republican National Convention at Philadelphia, Pa., in 1856, where he vigorously supported Abraham Lincoln for Vice-President, and was one of the founders of the county seat at Marshall. He died in Clark County, August 9, 1870, in the seventy-ninth year of his age. Thomas W. Cole was next best known to the people of Clark County, and during his life enjoyed a greater measure of personal popularity than any other Circuit Clerk of Clark County. He was a man whose great and tender heart beat sympathetically for every son and daughter of Adam who was in distress and in need of help. He gave away more money to the poor and unfortunate than any other man who has ever lived in Clark County. He was unfortunate as County Treasurer, and this and the troubles that came afterwards to his idolized son, who succeeded him as County Treasurer, in his efforts to save from blame his father, whom he loved with singular devotion, broke this good man's heart and darkened all of his future life. But no man who knew Thomas W. Cole can ever believe that he maliciously and purposely was a defaulter as County Treasurer. He simply could not resist the cry of the poor and distressed for help, nor the pleadings of those who got receipts for taxes on promise of future payment to him, and his friends made a mistake when they virtually forced this office upon him. He gave away in charity, and lost in advancements to others, more than $20,000 during the days of his popularity, his strength and his early and middle manhood. He had a long and lingering illness, but bore it like a martyr, and finally passed away like a philosopher, in firm reliance upon the goodness and mercy of his God, and in the reality of a conscious life beyond the grave. He was rich in saving common sense, and, as only the wiser are, sublime in his simplicity. This life is measured not by the opinions of men, but by the soul's advance, the enlargement of the powers of heart and mind that God has given us; the expanded field wherein it ranges, until it burns and glows with heavenly joy, and with high and heavenly hope. Thus lived and thus died one of the best-hearted, most forgiving and charitable of men, and it seems certain that he passed away in the joyful assurance that he had nothing to fear in the other life at the hands of Him who doth all things well.

The good die not. This heritage they have,
The record of a life in goodness spent;
For our own loss at parting though we grieve,
Lives such as theirs build their own monument.

William B. Hodge, Jr., was the first Republican elected Clerk of the Circuit Court of Clark County. He was born in York, Clark County, April 27, 1853, and is a grandson of James C. Hillebert, one of the early and prominent citizens of the county. Educated in the common schools and in a commercial college at Terre Haute, Ind., he has served as County Clerk of Clark County, Postmaster at Marshall, in the State service in Springfield, and is now Receiver of the Government Land Office at Guthrie, Okla. He was a popular, faithful and satisfactory Circuit Clerk, and has filled all positions with ability and credit. The Circuit Clerks of Clark County have usually been men of character and fitness, and the office has never suffered or the work been ill done at their hands.

In 1836 the Circuit and County Clerks were separated, and on September 5, 1836, Jonathan Rathbone was chosen as the first County Clerk. He served one year, or until 1837, when Joshua P. Cooper was appointed to fill the vacancy. He served only from March to September, 1837, when Darius Phillips was elected and held the office until 1851, when he resigned. Mr. Phillips was a competent officer, who, though accidentally crippled in his right hand and had to learn to write with his left, was nevertheless an accomplished scribe. He was very popular for a time, and possessed the unlimited confidence of the people, but was finally suspected of giving information to the notorious band of "Banditti of the Prairies," composed of Bob Birch, the Longs, William Fox, the Hodges, and others, some of whom murdered old Colonel George Davenport near Rock Island, Ill., on July 4, 1845, and committed other deviltry in this and other States to enable them to escape arrest. Phillips always maintained his innocence, and there was little real evidence against him; but one day in 1851, together with his son, Tom Phillips, he was unmercifully whipped by a posse with whom he was hunting for the Birches on Mill Creek, west of Marshall, his shirt being cut into ribbons and saturated with his blood. As soon as the whipping had ended, Phillips mounted a stump, and in a brief but affecting speech to his torturers, declared his innocence, resigned his office, fled the county and was seen in Marshall and Clark County no more. Howard Harlan, Sr., filled the vacancy until 1852, when John Stockwell came in and held the office until December, 1853.

Allen B. Briscoe, the next County Clerk, held the office continuously until December, 1877, a period of twenty-four years, the longest term of official service ever given to any man in this part of Illinois, with the single exception of Benson Martin, Marshall's competent, faithful, trusted and beloved Justice of the Peace, who has held this office continuously for more than thirty years. Mr. Briscoe was defeated after six successive elections, by Captain Harrison Black, in November, 1877. No man in Clark County was ever more universally liked, personally, than Allen B. Briscoe, and no man has ever had a more dominating power in Clark County politics than he had for more than a quarter of a century. Never was there a more kind-hearted, genial, generous and clever man than he, and his common sense and knowledge of men was conclusively demonstrated by his long and continuous service. Allen B. Briscoe was born near Louisville, Ky., February 14, 1832, and came to Clark County with his parents in 1835, locating near Westfield. He was regarded as a most excellent officer in his day, but his methods of doing business would hardly pass as satisfactory today. He knew just where to put his hand upon any document, record or paper any person might want, but it is needless to say that no one else could find them unassisted. Under the improved methods of doing business of Harrison Black, his successor, and, by the way, the first Republican that was ever elected to this office, the people soon saw the difference between a methodical, systematic, business way of conducting the office, and that which had existed prior to that time. Mr. Black held the office until 1885, again defeating Mr. Briscoe in 1881. Captain Black, aided by Thomas W. Cole as his deputy, than whom no more competent man or one of better clerical ability ever held office in the county, made one of the most competent and satisfactory officers the county has ever known. Harrison Black was born July 17, 1838, in Westfield Township, Clark County. He was educated in the common schools of the county, and is a man of fine common sense, large knowledge of men and things, and splendid clerical ability, which was still further demonstrated by his long and thoroughly satisfactory service as a clerk in the office of the State Auditor at Springfield, Ill., where he now resides. He was a Captain in the Twenty-first Illinois Volunteers, Grant's old regiment, during the War of the Rebellion, and was known as the bravest of the brave. In 1885 he was succeeded by John Brooks, of Casey Township, who served the people acceptably as County Clerk until December, 1889. Thomas Hamilton Sutton, of Marshall, the next County Clerk, was in many respects the most remarkable man that ever held the office, or Clark County ever produced. He had fine legal and clerical ability, was an excellent linguist, a strong and elegant writer, and a poet of no mean ability. He it was who wrote Part Second of the History of Clark County published by O. L. Baskin & Co. in 1883, and no more competent man for this work could have been found in the county. He was born in Wabash County, Ind., November 6, 1843, and came to Clark County with his parents in 1851. He was educated in the common schools and at Marshall College, kept by Rev. Silas D. Wilkin. While getting his education he worked as an office boy Saturdays and Sundays in the "Eastern Illinoisian," a paper published in Marshall by Silas S. Whitehead. He was a soldier in the Union Army, was Clerk of the Military Examining Board at Memphis, Tenn., and at one time had charge of the Bureau of Health of that city. After his return from the army he worked as a compositor in the office of the "Marshall Messenger." He was Deputy County Clerk from 1867 to 1873, and together with Thomas W. Cole commenced the abstract of titles to the lands of Clark County. For one year, in connection with Eth Sutton, he published the "Marshall Messenger." He was a writer for the "Terre Haute Express" for some years, his contributions being entitled "Marshall Splinters." He was four times Mayor of Marshall in succession, and was often the Secretary of Democratic State and Congressional Conventions. He was a well-reared, genial, witty and popular man, and made a most excellent County Clerk. Mr. Sutton died in office and William S. Lowry, of Casey Township, was appointed to fill the vacancy, and he in turn was elected for a full term of four years as County Clerk. He made a very good officer, and was succeeded by William B. Hodge, Jr., who was followed by Charles H. Thatcher, of Wabash Township, and he by John W. Fredenberger, of Auburn Township, the present occupant of the office, and a candidate for re-election on the Republican ticket. Mr. Fredenberger is faithful in the discharge of his duties, in genial, pleasant, accommodating, moral and popular. He is not only a good officer himself, as he is a good man, but he has had the good sense to retain as his deputy William T. Martin, a popular and competent county officer.

Clark County has had twenty-five Sheriffs during its history. The first was Isaac Parker, 1819 to 1820, one year; John Welsh, 1820 to 1823, three years; Joseph A. Morrison, 1823 to 1824, one year; James P. Jones, 1824 to 1831, seven years; John Stockwell, 1831 to 1838, seven years; James Lockard, 1838 to 1842, four years; William P. Bennett, 1842 to 1848, six years; Samuel McClure, 1848 to 1850, two years; Thomas Handy, 1850 to 1852, two years; Samuel McClure, second term, 1852 to 1854, two years; Horace E. Ritchie, 1854 to 1856, two years; Morrison Spenny, 1856 to 1858, two years; John B. Briscoe, 1858 to 1860, two years; Nicholas Hurst, 1860 to 1862, two years; Andrew J. Smith, 1862 to 1864, two years; Timothy H. Connelly, 1864 to 1866, two years; Joseph A. Howe, 1866 to 1868, two years; Timothy H. Connelly, 1868 to 1870, two years; Samuel Lacy, 1870 to 1872, two years; Warren Bartlett, 1872 to 1876, four years; William T. Flood, 1876 to 1878, two years; William H. Beadle, 1878 to 1880, two years; Henry Sherman, 1880 to 1882, two years; Jacob N. Farr, 1882 to 1886, four years; Henry Sherman, 1886 to 1890, four years; Allen Hurst, 1890 to 1894, four years; John W. Lewis, 1894 to 1898, four years; Allen Hurst, second term, 1898 to 1902, four years; and Millard Hedrick, 1902 to 1906, four years; John H. Davison, the present Sheriff, whose term expires in 1910. Not many of these Sheriffs have been given more than one term. The office of Sheriff of Clark County has been generally well filled, and with very few exceptions they have been clean, honorable, conscientious men, and have left office carrying with them the respect and esteem of their fellow-citizens.

John W. Lewis, after he ceased to be Sheriff, served one term as a Representative in the Illinois Legislature from Clark County, has been Mayor of Marshall, and is now the Republican candidate for County Treasurer. He is a man of fine business sense, is proprietor of the Marshall House, the leading hotel of Clark County, a man of considerable means, obtained by his industry and thrift, and well liked by all. He was born in Wabash Township, January 25, 1860.

The County Treasurers of Clark County, so far as we have been able to ascertain their names and terms of service, are as follows: William Lockard was, of course, the first, and Hathaway Linton and Nicholas Hurst also served a term of terms as County Treasurer. The first we find named in the records of the county was William H. Coons, 1863 to 1869, six years; George W. Lanigor, 1869 to 1873, four years; re-elected in 1873, failed to qualify and Burns Archer was elected to fill the vacancy and the office until 1882, nine years; John Coughlan, 1882 to 1883, died in office, and Thomas W. Cole was appointed and elected in 1883 and served until 1886, three years; Aaron Cole, 1886 to 1890, four years; John Brookes, elected in 1890, but refused to qualify, and Thompson R. Cornwall, elected and served until 1894, four years; Doit Young, 1894 to 1898, four years; Henry H. Knipe, 1898 to 1902, four years; and Wallace Young, 1902 to 1906, four years. John W. Lewis, of Marshall, is now County Treasurer. Of all the County Treasurers, Burns Archer was the first to thoroughly systematize the work of the office.

Edwin Harlan, though never having held any county office in Clark County, yet he has been Mayor of Marshall, Representative from Clark County in the Illinois Legislature and State Senator. He is one of the oldest and most prominent and well known citizens of Clark County. He was born in Clark County, February 15, 1838, and is therefore in his seventieth year. He read law with John Scholfield, his brother-in-law, attended law school at Cincinnati, and has a license to practice law, though he has never availed himself of it. He was a Captain in Company H in the Twenty-first Illinois Infantry, Grant's old regiment, and was one of the fifteen men who signed the petition to Governor Yates by which Grant was advanced to the rank of Colonel. He was desperately wounded at the battle of Chickamauga. Mr. Harlan was a member of the Chicago Convention that nominated George B. McClelland for President. He is a man of note in Clark County and perhaps can claim acquaintance with as many public men in the State as any man in it. He is a zealous Grand Army man, and is noted for his timely speeches at Decoration exercises, campfires and soldiers' meetings generally.

Charles A. Purdunn is another Marshall citizen who has acquired a State reputation. He has been Mayor and City Treasurer of Marshall, member of the Illinois Legislature for three terms, and is now President of the State Board of Prison Industries of Illinois and Secretary of the Clark County Building and Loan Association. He is a man whose intelligence, force of character, progressiveness and business ability would make him a controlling factor for good in any community in which his preference or his fortune might locate him. He has strong and unshakable convictions, is remarkably faithful and true to his friends, and loyal in every relation of life. He was born at Trenton, N. J., June 27, 1854, came to Illinois in 1857, and to Clark County in March, 1880, where he has since resided.

The nestor of the Clark County bar, though not now in the active practice, is Thomas J. Golden. Mr. Golden is one of the best read and scholarly men Clark County has ever contained, and with the single exception of Judge John Scholfield, the greatest lawyer the Clark County bar has ever had. Judge Scholfield was often heard to express profound respect for the legal ability of Mr. Golden, and no man was more capable of giving a correct opinion on such matters than he. He is of Irish parentage, and was born in Wayne County, Ind., December 21, 1841, and is therefore approaching sixty-five years of age. He came with his parents to Clark County in 1857, when young Thomas was sixteen years of age. His father died in 1868, but his mother still survives. He received the rudiments of his education at Madison, Ind., where he, with his parents, once lived, and at Marshall, though he is essentially a self-educated man, having been a voracious reader of law and of general literature all his life, as well as an intense student along many and varied lines of thought. He was a First-Lieutenant in Company F, First Missouri Cavalry, and was regimental and brigade and division Quartermaster. He was at the battles of Pea Ridge, Cross Hollows, Jenkins Ferry, as well as other engagements. He read law with Jacob W. Wilkin, now Supreme Judge Wilkin, attended law school at Ann Arbor, and was admitted for practice in 1867. He was a member of the Illinois Legislature in 1872, a delegate to the Republican National Convention at Cincinnati, Ohio, from Illinois, in 1876, and stood firmly by Bristow for President against the "plumed knight" from Maine, despite the surpassing torrent of eloquence poured out upon the convention for Blaine by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, one of the greatest orators the world has seen. He was on the military staff of Governor (now Senator) Cullom, with the rank of Colonel. For many years he was the attorney for Illinois for the Indianapolis & Terre Haute Railroad Company, and for a time was general counsel for that corporation. John G. Williams, the general counsel of that railroad, and who is himself a great lawyer, has a high opinion of Mr. Golden's legal genius and ability. Mr. Golden is, with perhaps the exception of two or three men, the wealthiest man in the county. He is a man who would do honor for his honesty and ability to any community.

At the present time James W. Graham is one of the leading lawyers at the Clark County bar. He was born in Hocking County, Ohio, April 8, 1849, and is past fifty-seven years of age. Mr. Graham was educated in the common schools of Clark County, taught school at sixteen and finished his education at the Illinois State Normal, at Normal, Ill. But it must not be understood that his education ended here, for he has been a constant student of law and general literature for more than forty years. He read law with Scholfield & Wilkin, and was admitted to practice after an examination before the Supreme Court of Illinois, at Mt. Vernon, Ill., June 17, 1875. He represented this district in the Illinois Legislature in 1878-79. Mr. Graham is a lawyer of much more than average ability, and one of the finest advocates and trial lawyers the Clark County bar has produced. He is exceedingly successful with court and jury, ranking up with Wilkin, Golden, Hamill and other noted trial lawyers who have adorned the bar of Clark County. When any lawyer gets through the trial of a case with James W. Graham, whether probate, chancery, common law or criminal case, he will know he has been in a legal fight, and he will be lucky, unless he has an exceedingly good case, if he does not get defeated. He is quick-witted, swift to take instant advantage of any weak point in his adversary's side of the case, as well as of the strong and unexpected ones that show up on his side. Besides all this, he is thoroughly honest in his profession, and in his private and business relations, and is a good citizen in the largest and best sense of that term.

William B. Scholfield, a son of the late Judge Scholfield, and law partner of his brother, Samuel M. Scholfield, is another able and successful lawyer of the Clark County bar. He was born at Marshall, June 21, 1869, and is therefore about thirty-seven years of age. He was educated in the common schools of Clark County and at Notre Dame, Ind., read law with his father, Judge Scholfield, and was admitted for practice in 1891. Mr. Scholfield is a man of strong personality and fine legal discernment. The Scholfield boys have one of the largest law libraries in Eastern Illinois, and William B. has acquired considerable property, through his own labors and good business sense.

Harry M. Janney, another prominent and respected member of the present Clark County bar, is a son of Eldridge S. Janney, a native of Virginia, and who came to Illinois in 1827. Harry M. was born in Marshall, June 15, 1855, and is about fifty-one years of age. He was educated in the public schools of Marshall, read law with Wilkin & Wilkin, and was admitted to practice September 16, 1879. He has been Mayor and City Attorney of Marshall and filled these and other positions with credit to himself and honor to his friends. Mr. Janney is a much better lawyer than he has ever gotten credit for being, especially in chancery and probate law, and he also ranks well as a trial lawyer. He is clean, temperate, moral and honest, and a man whom you know where to find seven days in each week and twenty-four hours in each day. Mr. Janney has always been a hard student of good books, and possesses a general literary knowledge of no mean order.

Edwin D. Jones, another member of the Clark County bar, was born in Coshocton county, Ohio, August 15, 1852, was educated in the common schools of Clark County and at Lee's Academy at Stockton, Ill.; taught school in Clark, Douglas and Champaign Counties, read law in the meantime with Whitehead & Jones, at Marshall, and with J. W. Langley, at Champaign, Ill., and finally, after surmounting many financial and other difficulties that often accompany young men of humble means who are anxious to advance in the world, passed a successful examination before the Supreme Court of Illinois, at Springfield, in 1878. He practiced law at Terre Haute, Ind., for about two years, and then came to Marshall and formed a partnership with Silas S. Whitehead, under the firm name of Whitehead & Jones, with whom he remained until establishing his present independent practice. Mr. Jones has been City Attorney of Marshall for fourteen years, the longest term of any incumbent of that office, and the only man who has held it for more than two years. Mr. Jones is an honest, temperate, industrious, well read attorney, and liked by all who know him for his many sterling qualities of head and heart.

Fred J. Bartlett, a cousin of the Scholfield boys and a nephew of Judge Scholfield, was born in Marshall, September 28, 1867. He was educated in the common schools of Marshall and graduated from the high school in 1885. He read law with Golden & Wilkin, and also with Golden & Hamill, and was admitted for practice in 1888. He has been City Attorney and Alderman of Marshall, and Master in Chancery, and is a man of good, steady, moral habits, and is honest, popular and well liked by all who know him. Mr. Bartlett is well read and well grounded in the fundamental principles of the law, and is especially strong in pleadings and practice, and in marshalling authorities, sustaining the positions he may take before court and jury. He is now the junior member of the law firm of Davison & Bartlett, which has a good practice.

Herschel V. Snively, youngest member of the present Clark County bar, was born at Martinsville, February 2, 1882, and hence was twenty-four years old last February. He is a graduate of the Martinsville High School, graduated from the law department of Ann Arbor in 1903, and was admitted for the practice of law by the Supreme Court of Illinois in September of the same year. He is the Assistant State's Attorney of Clark County. He was elected County Judge in November, 1906, and is making a fine official.

Henry Clinton Bell, the writer, was born about a mile west of York, in Clark County, in the house now owned and occupied by James Nicol, January 5, 1849. He was educated in the common schools of Clark County, at Westfield College, and at Carbondale, Ill. He was a soldier in the Union Army, having enlisted as a private in Company K, Twenty-ninth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, when not yet sixteen years of age, served out his term of enlistment and was honorably discharged. At this date he is the youngest living Union soldier in Clark County, and, so far as he knows, in Southeastern Illinois. He read law with Scholfeld & Wilkin and Dulaney & Golden at Marshall, and was admitted for practice, after examination before the Supreme Court of Illinois, at Mr. Vernon, Ill., June 17, 1875. He has been Superintendent of Schools of Clark County, City Attorney of Marshall, and was for twelve years, from July, 1885, to April, 1897, an employe of the Pension Bureau at Washington, D. C., the first four years as Chief of the Finance Division, the next four years as Chief of the Criminal Law and Prosecuting Section of the Law Department, and member of the Board of Review, the highest court of the Pension Bureau; and the last four years as Deputy Commissioner of Pensions by appointment of President Cleveland. He resigned the latter position March 4, 1897, and his resignation was accepted by President McKinley April 5, 1897. He then went to Indianapolis, where he engaged in the practice of law for a few months, then went to Springfield, Ill., where he practiced his profession for two years. In the meantime he was defeated for the Democratic nomination for State's Attorney of Sangamon County, and returned to Marshall, his old home, in June, 1900, and since has remained there continuously in the practice of his profession. He is the son of Wiley O. and Sarah E. Bell, of West York, Clark County, Ill., near which place he was born and raised, and where his mother, brother and sisters and other relatives reside. While reading law he alternated his labors in that direction with school teaching in order to make both ends meet. His parents were comparatively poor people, unable to assist him in his general or professional education, and he is the architect of whatever success in life has come to him. He was married, July 22, 1895, at Hutsonville, Crawford County, Ill., to Miss Stella Irene Wilhite, the daughter of James and Nancy C. (Cox) Wilhite, who was born August 18, 1855, and whom he first met when a girl of fifteen while she was his pupil and he the schoolmaster at that place. This union has been blessed with two children, Edna and Roscoe C. Bell, and with more than thirty-one years of undisturbed and continuous married happiness. With the writer, distinctively, marriage has not been a failure.

Few counties in the State of the size and population of Clark County can show a better or more honorable professional record. Within the last forty or fifty years there have gone forth from the bar of the county three Circuit Judges, Harlan, Constable and Jacob W. Wilkin; two Supreme Judges, Scholfeld and Jacob W. Wilkin; one Judge of the Court of Claims at Washington, D. C., Fenton W. Booth; three general counsels of three important railroad systems, Scholfeld, Golden and Robert E. Hamill; and one Deputy Commissioner of Pensions at Washington, D. C., Henry Clinton Bell. The record of Marshall and Clark County above set forth would seem distinctly creditable for a city of but 2,500 people, and a county of perhaps less than 25,000 people.

But we cannot leave this branch of our subject without mentioning the names of Robert E. Hamill, William A. Wilkin, Perry A. McKain, Samuel Kimblin and Andrew McClure. These five brilliant young attorneys of Clark County passed away, all of them except Hamill, while their feet rested on the lower rung of the ladder of professional usefulness and renown. All were young men of enormous capacity and promise. Robert E. Hamill was one of the best all-around lawyers that the bar of Marshall ever developed, and at his death was general counsel for the Big Four Railroad System, with headquarters at Cincinnati, Ohio. He and the lamented Will Wilkin, as he was affectionately called by his associates and friends, may be said to have literally worked themselves to death, and died fighting manfully to the last for the interests of their clients. Wilkin was the youngest brother of Judge Jacob W. Wilkin and Hamill had been the law partner of Hon. T. J. Golden, at Marshall, and of Palmer, Lester & Shutt, of Springfield, Ill.

Perry A. McKain is spoken of by those who knew him best as an exceptionally gentle, conscientious, studious, courteous and lovable man, and the recollection of his painful death, on that May morning in 1875, amid the crash of thunder, the vivid flash of lightning, the darkness of the heavens and the downpour of rain, as the brave and gentle spirit took its flight to regions fair, have left a sad but vivid impression upon the mind and heart of more than one who loved and hoped for him. No gentler, purer, nobler, finer spirit ever left the scenes of earth and changed for the regions of bliss than that of hard-working, honest, manly and brilliant Perry A. McKain.

In the estimation of many, Samuel Kimlin had in his soul and mind the philosophy, keenness, goodness, and the general all-round intellectual genius to have become, had the opportunity presented itself, the equal of the immortal Lincoln, whom Kimlin resembled, not only physically, but in wit, depth of thought and general mental characteristics.

Andrew McClure was also a young man of splendid parts, who had first introduced the system and methods of normal teaching in Clark County, who was studying law, and who would undoubtedly have made a brilliant lawyer. His moral character was also, like those of Kimlin, Will Wilkin, Perry A. McKain and Robert E. Hamill, as spotless as a star.

Robert L. Dulaney, the founder of Dulaney's National Bank, also practiced law in Marshall for many years, but was living in retirement at the time of his death at an advanced age. For many years he was the law partner of Hon. T. J. Golden, under the firm name of Dulaney & Golden. He excelled in chancery and probate law, and was an excellent cross-examiner of witnesses. He was a far-sighted business man, and the richest in the county, his possessions being in the neighborhood of $300,000. He was originally from Kentucky, was one of the earliest settlers of York, and was the brother-in-law of Judge John Scholfeld and Hon. Edwin Harlan, of Marshall.

CHAPTER VI.

EARLY SETTLERS—OLD-TIME LAWYERS—OLD-TIME DOCTORS—OLD-TIME PROMINENT MEN—STRIKING INCIDENTS, OCCURRENCES, ETC., OF EARLY CLARK COUNTY HISTORY.

The first settlement of Clark County appears to have been in York Township, on the Wabash River, and among the first to arrive was Thomas Handy and family, who, in 1814, came from New York by way of the Allegheny, Ohio and Wabash Rivers to Vincennes, Ind., and from there by boat to the spot where the village of York now stands. After a short time they went on to Section 18, in York Township, where they erected temporary shelter, but not being able to enter land at that time, they removed in 1816 to Section 16, where they made their future home. In 1816 came William Hogue, from Virginia, who soon went on to Terre Haute, Ind. David Hogue and the Richardson and Fitch families came also this same year. There were two of the Richardson boys, John and Joseph, and they came from New York, where they had formerly been prosperous business men, but having suffered reverses, they sought the rich and fertile but wild land of York Township as their future homes. Most of the early and more prominent settlers of York came from New York, and to this fact does the township owe its ancient and euphonious name. John F. Richardson, son of John Richardson, was a keen, far-seeing business man, and he entered, in his own name and that of his kindred and friends, large tracts of the rich prairie lands of York Township. His brother, George, was also a fine business man, who subsequently went to Texas, where he amassed quite a fortune. Chester Fitch, a relative of the Richardsons, came with them. Jonathan Lindley, accompanied by his brothers, came about this time from North Carolina, but the brothers stopped in Crawford County. Jonathan settled on Section 3, in York Township, in the neighborhood of the fine farms of William and John Marvin, on Lower Walnut Prairie. About this time landed, from the Wabash, and also from New York, James C. Hillebert, and in walking the single plank which led from the boat to the shore, Mrs. Hillebert fell off into the river, but a man by the name of Welsh was on hand, and after great difficulty, and after she had nearly drowned him, succeeded in saving her life by pulling her out by the hair. She is the first person of whom history speaks as having been involuntarily immersed in the waters of the beautiful Wabash. James C. Hillebert was the father-in-law of William B. Hodge, who was a mere child when he came to York with his parents, having been born two years previous at Terre Haute, Ind., May 23, 1818. He is the oldest living resident of the ancient village, which has been his home for about eighty-six years. James Bennet, who still lives at West York, was born within a mile of York, January 25, 1822, and is doubtless the oldest living native son of the community. Samuel Lacy and John S. Bradbury, both over eighty years of age, have lived in the vicinity all their lives, though Mr. Bradbury was about six years of age when he came here with his parents from North Carolina. James C. Hillebert, who was also the grandfather, on his maternal side, of William B. Hodge, Jr., was a man of brains and energy, who soon acquired a large amount of property for those times. He was always very prominent in county and community affairs, especially in the bitter wars of Auburn and Marshall for the county seat, in which he championed Auburn.

Joseph Shaw also arrived at York in 1818, from Kentucky. He was an aristocrat of the old school, but a fine business man, and soon acquired quite a fortune.

Isaac Moore and John Chenoweth, the former from Virginia and the latter from Kentucky, also came in 1816, though Chenoweth had arrived at Vincennes in 1814. Moore died at Natchez, La., in the spring of 1835, while returning from New Orleans, where he had gone with a raft from York. Chenoweth grew rich and prosperous, but subsequently suffered reverses, and went to Edgar County in 1855. His grandson, M. R. Chenoweth, one of the best known and wealthiest men in the county, still lives at Marshall, and still owns about 600 acres of the fine land in York Township, upon which his grandfather settled in 1816.

George Catron came in 1817, from Tennessee, where he was a member of one of the most prominent families of that State, his brother being at that time an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. Samuel Prevo, the ancestor of the innumerable Prevos of York, Darwin and Marshall Townships, Clark County, and of Sullivan County, Ind., came also from North Carolina in 1817. He was the first County Judge of Clark County, and was known as "Judge Prevo" and "Headstrong Prevo," being regarded as the most willful, stubborn and headstrong man in the county. He ran for the Legislature and was beaten, but his son, Samuel Prevo, father of the present Samuel Prevo, of Marshall, who is Chairman of the Board of Supervisors, and an ex-officio member of the Board of Review of Clark County, received the honor his father desired, and was elected to the Legislature of Illinois from Clark County. In 1818 came, from New York, John Parker, who was drowned in Raccoon Creek while crossing this stream at high water.

William Ketchum came also from New York in 1818, and his name has persisted in York for more than eighty years. William Ketchum was a carpenter, and soon had plenty of work. Reuben Crowe also came in from North Carolina the same year, and his descendants still live in York and Melrose Townships. Ambrose Pease arrived about this time from Sacket Harbor, N. Y., having traveled by sleigh to the Allegheny, and thence by boat to York.

Zachariah Archer came also this year, following his brother Charles, who had arrived the year before. In 1819, Reason Bell came from North Carolina, he and his wife riding on horseback, and their only child, Wiley O. Bell, father of the writer, held in his mother's arms, he having been born two years before in Randolph County, N. C. Wiley O. Bell lived in York Township for eighty-four consecutive years, never more than two miles from York, and died at West York, September 23, 1901, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. At his death he was the oldest living resident of York Township. Reason Bell, the grandfather of the writer, entered the quarter-section of land in Section 32 where James Nicol now resides, and built the brick house still occupied by Mr. Nicol, it being the first brick residence in York Township. In this house the writer was born January 5, 1849, and within 300 feet of it, on the public highway, his youngest brother, Charles L. Bell, was murdered on July 14, 1896, by David McDonald and John Clements, McDonald firing the fatal shot that pierced his heart. Reason Bell was a prominent, well-to-do early settler, and died at his home in York

View after the Cyclone of 1904, near Marshall, Illinois

Township in January, 1834, when about forty years of age. Samuel Prevo, the son of Judge Samuel Prevo, was his administrator, and among the estate papers is an account filed against the estate in the handwriting of Robert L. Dulaney, who was then clerking in his Uncle Woodford Dulaney's general store, which shows that whisky and tobacco were articles of prime necessity in every well regulated household in those early days. The Dulaney's, Woodford and Robert L. were among the early settlers of York. In 1815 came, from New York, Lawrence Hollenbeck, who was the father of thirteen children, among them being Lawrence, John, David, Peter, William, Nathan, Hannah and Elizabeth. He was the grandfather of John Milton Hollenbeck, who still resides in Darwin Township, and who is the father of Judge William T. Hollenbeck, and still has in his possession at his home in Hatton, Darwin Township, a powder horn made in 1816. In 1820 came Jesse Miller, who afterwards had to flee the county to escape death at the hands of the enraged citizens, who believed that he had poisoned his wife to make room for a young woman then living in his family. Miller was not a doctor, and his wife having become sick, he prescribed for her with what certainly appeared to be suspicious results.

In 1824 Reese Pritchard and his family came to York from Virginia, among them Stephen Pritchard, who lived all his life in York, and died there a few years ago. Ira, William, Henry and Samuel Prevo, the sons of Samuel Prevo, the son of Judge Prevo, were all born, lived and died at ripe old ages in York Township.

Until his recent death Perry C. Murphy was, with the exception of William B. Hodge, the oldest living resident of the village of York. Mr. Hodge is approaching ninety years of age, and lives in York. Mr. Murphy was a man of property, an ardent Free Mason, and one of the best known, most highly respected and prominent citizens of that part of the county.

Considerable trouble was given the people of York in those early times by the Indians, who had enlisted under the flag of Great Britain in the War of 1812, and who were slow to find out that the war had closed with the defeat of those for whom they had fought. William Hogue, who had come to York in 1816, was a great hunter—the Nimrod of that part of the county—and he was known to have shot and killed two Indians. The first was killed just across the river from York, after he had first shot at and missed Hogue, and the other was killed as he was skulking up on Hogue's little son, who had started home on horseback with a deer he had killed. Hogue was following behind his son, and seeing the Indian skulking from tree to tree along the way the son was going, and manifestly intending to kill him and secure the horse and deer as soon as he got out of the sight and hearing of his father, fired and killed the Indian to save the boy. Many Indians, principally Kickapoo, who were generally friendly to the white settlers, came to York to trade the skins of wild animals for ammunition, trinkets, whisky and dry-goods, but after 1830 they were seen only at rare intervals, as they passed through York on their way to the farther and more thinly settled West.

Dr. Tutt was one of the early practicing physicians of York, as was also Dr. Charles Johnson (Abijah Edmunds), who had come for some mysterious cause from Boston, and was a man of fine education and great force of character. He at first kept a store at York, but afterwards studied medicine, and for many years was one of the leading physicians and most influential men of the county. Dr. Charles Gorham, Dr. D. O. McCord, Dr. John M. Janes, Drs. Brown, Prewett, the McBride boys, Thomas and Clary, all practiced medicine with marked success, and Drs. Johnson, Gorham, McCord and Janes acquired more than local renown.

The business of flat boating was an early and profitable one in York, and remained so until after the completion of the north and south railroad through that part of the county. Darwin, York, Hutsonville and other river towns ran many such boats to New Orleans, and a good deal of money was made in that way by John Richardson, Ambrose and Lewis Pease, his son, John Hollenbeck, Isaac Moore, Wiley O. Bell, Hathaway Linton and others who engaged quite extensively in river commerce. Wiley Bell, Lewis Pease, Linton and others lost heavily in the great Natchez storm of the thirties, as most of their boats that were tied up there at the time were destroyed or damaged. Wiley Bell was often heard to tell how, when the storm caught the boat, and while it was tossing in the angry waves of the Mississippi, an old negro was observed on board with a large Bible under his arm. After the storm had subsided, and while the boat was lying high on the banks of the river, where it had been thrown by the wind and waves, the Bible was found soaked with water, but still intact, but the old negro was seen or heard of no more. The Bible Mr. Bell brought home and kept for many years, and it was even in existence a few years ago in York Township.

Several early incidents of a striking character in York Township are remembered and talked of, even to this day. The great circus fight between the Dolson boys, Samuel, Tunis, Jacob, Ham, Daniels, Stephen Fears, Stephen Pritchard and others, and the circus men, resulted in several mutilations and one or two deaths. The fight, about which men and women talked for years, was started by Samuel Dolson, and grew out of the ruin of the new spring hat of Dolson's wife by the rain. A terrific storm of wind and rain came up while the show was going on, and the tent had to be lowered to prevent it from being torn into ribbons. In doing so, the rain poured in upon the people and the aforesaid new spring hat was ruined. Dolson resented this, quarreled with one of the showmen, and finally struck him. The fight then became general, vicious, brutal and bloody. Tent stakes, neck-yokes from wagons, clubs, stones and fists were all used, and several men badly injured. The showmen had the best of the first round, but that night the injured citizens and their friends rallied and drove the circus from town without any night performance. It is related that Stephen Fears, who was a quiet, powerful, well-known fighting machine of that early day, was busily engaged in slipping upon the different fighting showmen and felling them one after another with well directed blows behind the ears from his powerful fist. His pastime, however, was finally discovered, and one of the showmen struck him an awful blow with the neck-yoke of a wagon, knocking him down and under a wagon, where he lay for some time with the blood running out of his ears. The "subsequent proceedings interested him no more." The murder of one Lacy by Joseph Evans, sixty-five years ago, the first homicide ever committed in York, created intense excitement, and was talked of for years. Evans was the son of Benjamin Evans, one of the early settlers and most prominent and respected men in York vicinity, and this fact, added to the prominence of Lacy, and the circumstances following the killing, but added to the widespread interest of the tragedy. Evans was a carpenter, and was building a house for Lacy on the southwest corner of the block in York where John Keller now resides, and just west of the old Bardell residence, which still stands. Evans had been drinking, and when Lacy abused him he became so enraged that he struck the latter on the head with a large plane he was using and killed him. Evans was arrested and taken to jail at Marshall, but was soon released by his friends and returned to his father, who then lived in the old Evans-Bradbury house about sixty rods south of the present home of John S. Bradbury, in Crawford County. Here he was secreted in wheat fields and other places for about a month, and finally was taken in a canoe by William White down the Wabash River to a boat at Vincennes, Ind., aboard which he passed into the great wilderness of the Southwest to be seen or heard of no more in this part of the country. What became of him was never known. He had married Sophia Long, and had one child, now an inmate of the Soldiers' Home at Quincy, Ill. His wife lived for many years in York, and died after vainly hoping and praying that she might see the husband and father again. Evans had many brothers, sisters, relatives and friends, and his misfortune cast a gloom over them all that was never lifted. The writer remembers well, when a boy, often seeing "Aunt Sophia," as the wife of Joseph Evans was affectionately called, press her hands pathetically to her broken heart and burst into tears as she rushed from the presence of those around her, but he did not then know the cause of it all, as the mother of the writer was the niece of the absent Evans, and of course interested in maintaining the Evans secret. It was in fact so well kept by all the large family of relatives that it was only in recent years that any of them could be induced to talk of it at all. This was one of the saddest cases of misfortune, absence, waiting, heart-broken love and devotion, on the part of the wife and son, brothers, sisters and other relatives of Joseph Evans, that Clark County has ever had. His last surviving brother, Nixon Evans, died in Melrose Township a few years ago.

The shooting of William H. Ayers by Jack

Dixon, accompanied by Thomas Files, in 1869 or 1870, at York, Ill., also created great excitement. Ayers was a desperado from Richford, Tioga County, N. Y., who came to York shortly after the Civil War. He was a man of energy and push, but had a violent temper and was so dishonest and criminal in his methods of doing business that he kept the south part of the county in a turmoil of excitement and trouble for years. For the ten years of his residence in York the criminal dockets of the Clark County courts were rarely free from cases of The People vs. William H. Ayers. He was a known bigamist, four times repeated, having left a wife at Richford, N. Y., and having married at least four other women in Clark County, in Indiana and Michigan. Dixon and Files, who were officers, were trying to levy an execution on a horse and buggy belonging to Ayers, when he resisted, drew a weapon on the officers, and was shot by Dixon. The wound was not fatal and Evans recovered. Dixon and Files were tried in the Circuit Court of Clark County for shooting Ayers and acquitted through the able defense of John Scholfield and James C. Robinson. Ayers was frequently shot at, several times wounded, shot at several men himself, and was finally driven out of the town of York by its enraged citizens. As Ayers, with a string of wagons carrying his goods, passed out of the town, he was followed by a posse beating tin pans, drums and other instruments of noise making, as an expression of their great pleasure at getting rid of him.

The murder of Charles L. Bell, the youngest brother of the writer, near the Nicol residence, a mile west of York, on July 14, 1896, by David McDonald and John Clements, was the next startling occurrence in York Township. Great excitement and intense feeling prevailed in Clark and Crawford Counties, Ill., and in Sullivan County, Ind., where Bell was well known, and where he had many friends and some bitter enemies. Bell was the son of Wiley O. Bell, one of the early settlers of York Township, and his murder was so wanton, brutal and inexcusable, that feeling ran high for a time. He had had no trouble whatever with his slayers, though he had had a difficulty with a relative of McDonald and Clements a few hours before, in which Bell had struck this relative and been fined for it. As soon as McDonald and Clements heard of this, they unhitched their horses from their plows in a field near York, hitched a team of mules to a wagon, procured ammunition, cleaned their pistols, practiced shooting for a time, then got into the wagon and went west of York along the public highway where they knew they would meet Bell, as he came from West York. They did meet him, as they expected, coming into York in a buggy, and McDonald deliberately shot him through the heart as he was jumping from his buggy to get away from them. He was left dead in the road, while McDonald and Clements, whipping up their mule team, drove on west a few miles to the home of their relative, Daniel Clements, who had had the trouble with Bell in the morning, where they were arrested the same night by the Sheriff and taken to Marshall. They were indicted and tried at the following December term, 1896, of the Clark Circuit Court, convicted and sent to the penitentiary, at Chester, Ill., for an indeterminate period. After serving a year or more in the penitentiary their parole was secured by the aid of their attorneys and powerful political friends, whereupon they returned to York, where in less than a week Clements died of pneumonia. McDonald still lives. They were prosecuted by H. C. Bell, P. G. Bradbury, a cousin of Charles L. Bell, T. L. Orndorff and Adam Gard, and defended by Graham & Tibbs, E. Callahan and George N. Parker. Judge Bookwalter, of Danville, presided at the trial, overruled a motion for a new trial, and intimated that the defendants should have been convicted of murder.

Settlers began to locate in Darwin Township about the time or a little after they began arriving at York. Among the early arrivals were A. Snyder and Charles Neeley, who reached there in 1816. Neeley was the second County Judge, and at his house the first elections were held, and the County Commissioners' Court held its first meeting. In the same year came John Davidson, Jesse Ezra and others. In 1817, Lewis Bohn, the father of James Bohn, still of Darwin Township, arrived from Pennsylvania. He came by wagon and was weeks on the way. The Leonard brothers also came from New York the same year and located near the site of the future county seat at Aurora. They subsequently sold out to Dr. Septer Patrick, the first Justice of the Peace, as well as one of the first physicians of Clark County. In June, 1818, came Zachius Hassell, from Tennessee. He cleared up a good farm, made money and sold out to Zachariah Linton, moving first to Wabash Township and later to Paris. Linton was a native of Ohio, and ran a few flat boats down the river, as did his son Hathaway some time later. On one of his first trips to New Orleans the former had loaded his boat with wood, and while in New Orleans he got into trouble with some person, struck him on the head with a stick of wood and killed him. Thereupon he was seized, summarily tried and as speedily hanged. His son Hathaway continued on his farm in Darwin Township, became a fine scholar, was very prominent in all county affairs, and was several times County Treasurer. In 1821, Samuel Yocum, a native of Kentucky, reached Darwin, and died soon after. He was a brother-in-law of Nathaniel McClure. In this year also came Jacob Harlan from Ohio, and William B. Archer, then County Clerk, took him in the office with him. He afterwards married the daughter of John Chenoweth and became Postmaster, Clerk of the County Commissioners' Court, Recorder, County Judge and Notary Public, holding, frequently, several of these offices at one and the same time. John Chenoweth, his father-in-law, was in good financial circumstances, for the times, and Jacob, having taken unto himself a rich man's daughter as his wife, proceeded to get luxurious and built a hewed log house, something unusually fine in those primitive times. Nathaniel McClure came in from Kentucky in 1819, but died soon afterwards. He had started to Fayette County, but liked Darwin and stopped there. William Nixon also came from Kentucky about the same time. In 1822, James P. Jones came to Darwin from New York. He kept a tavern at Darwin and was elected Sheriff in 1824, serving until 1831, seven years, an unusually long term for a Sheriff.

Darwin, the mecca of all these early settlers, was named by Dr. Septer Patrick, who appeared to have been a man of some literary attainments, after Charles Darwin, the noted naturalist and scientist. Justin Harlan reached Darwin from Ohio in 1825, and he, together with Uri Manley, W. P. Bennett, O. B. Ficklin, T. C. Cone, E. B. Webb, Nathaniel Huntington, Jacob Cole, John McLean, John M. Robinson, Wickliffe Kitchell, Henry W. Dunford, one

Nash, Eldridge S. Janney, Aaron Shaw, Joshua McRoberts, Kirby Benedict, A. C. French, Charles Emerson, Alfred and Edward Kitchell and Josiah P. Cooper, were among the early lawyers that made the old and diminutive county court houses of Aurora and Darwin ring with the forensic eloquence in their defense and denunciation of litigants. Oratory was much more in vogue then than now and had much more influence in swaying court and jury, while the crowds were always there, and hung on the words of those orators as they have probably not since that time. There seems also to have been a lawyer by the name of Bell practicing in Darwin in those early times, but whether he was related to any of the other Bells of York and Darwin Township is not known. John McLean was the first Congressman from Illinois, was also United States Senator, and was elected three times to the Illinois Legislature. He was born in 1791, in North Carolina, and came to Illinois in 1815. He was one of the most brilliant and eloquent men Illinois ever knew, and died at Shawneetown, October 14, 1830. Wickliffe Kitchell, lawyer, was born in New Jersey, May 21, 1789, and died January 2, 1869. He was a member of the Illinois Legislature from Crawford County, and also Attorney-General of Illinois. Alfred Kitchell was born at Palestine, March 29, 1820, was State's Attorney, member of the Constitutional Convention of 1847, County Judge of Richland County, and Circuit Judge. Edward Kitchell, brother of Alfred, was born at Palestine, December 21, 1829, and died at Olney, July 11, 1869. He went to the gold fields of California in 1852, was a Colonel in the War of the Rebellion, and mustered out as Brigadier-General by Brevet; ran for Congress in 1866, was Collector of Internal Revenue in 1868, and Presidential Elector in 1868. Aaron Shaw was afterwards several times Circuit Judge, and also a member of Congress. He was born in New York in 1811, and died some years since in Olney.

Wabash, the next township to be settled, had as first arrivals the Black family, which came in 1816. They came from Indiana, though originally from Kentucky. Mr. Black had five sons, John, William, James, Joseph and Thomas, and all were men of energy and influence. Richard Armstrong came with the Blacks. In 1816 came also the Perrys, Kuykendalls and the Cowens. The Perrys were from Ohio, the Kuykendalls from Kentucky, though they came here from Vincennes. Hugh Henderson and Jesse Esery came in 1817 and the former built the first mill in Wabash Township. It was of the tread wheel variety. James McCabe came from Tennessee about this time and was one of the first Methodist preachers to appear in that part of the county. Harry Shackton, one Sheets—who kept a ferry—Thomas Thompson and James Cox came in 1819, and also Jonathan Wiley, a great hunter of bees. Jonathan Hicklin, also a great hunter, a friend and acquaintance of Daniel Boone, and a spy in the Indian wars of Kentucky, was an early arrival who always had plenty of money and was supposed to be connected with a band of counterfeiters. He died at the age of 106 years, the oldest person Clark County ever knew. James Lovelace, Samuel Elam and the Taylor, Ashmore and Groves families came in 1822. Following them were Abraham Washburn, the herb doctor, and William Wood, the devout Presbyterian. The Plasters, McGregor, Dunlap, West, Hutchinson and Rhodes families arrived in the early 'thirties, and from that on, the National Road being under way, the settlers flocked in increasing numbers to Wabash Township. In 1832 a man named Durrell built a water mill as a rival to the Henderson tread mill, before mentioned. A saw mill was added some time later to the Durrell water mill, and then came Horace Richie, who built a steam and grist mill two miles east of Livingston. Mr. Richie sold out to one Welsh, and he in turn to Rufus Neal. The first public road to be laid out, or viewed out, was the work of David Wyrick, Henry Taylor and Stephen Archer, and was called the "Darwin Road." In 1820 the Terre Haute Road was viewed out through the south part of the township by W. B. Woods, Goldberry and Dunlap. The National Road ran through the county in a southeasterly direction, and of course through Wabash Township. Livingston was laid out by Robert Ferguson, and David Wyrick built a tavern there in 1833, the first in the township. A little later James Twilley built another tavern.

Melrose Township had as its first settler Joseph Willard, who came from North Carolina in 1816. The next year came James Bartlett and several other families from New York. Stephen Handy, who came from York Township about this time, was the first Justice of the Peace of the township, and was also Surveyor of Clark County. In 1823 came Benjamin Dolson from New York; John Morecraft came in 1827, and in 1828 arrived Jonathan Metsker, from Kentucky, and Benjamin Ogden, Benjamin Long, Joseph Evans and others. The Coopers arrived in 1831, Nathan Wells and Peter Doshier in 1832, and Isaac Weldon in 1836. Wolves and deer, as well as other wild animals indigenous to that locality, were there in large numbers, and hunting was not only a pastime but a necessity. Levi Wells, William Maxwell and William Maples were noted hunters of their day. Lewis Huckaby put up the first mill, and Jacob Shelter built a saw mill on Raccoon Creek, and also made brick when the water was too low to run his mill. Benjamin Ogden was a blacksmith, Metsker a wagon and plow maker, and Armitage Kindred a carpenter, and all of them found plenty of work in their several lines of usefulness. Nathan Wells and Susan Willard were the first couple to marry, and Samuel Ogden and Martha Morgan the second. Melrose was platted in 1847, the land belonging to Nathan Wells, Joseph Edwards and Samuel Keline. John Gwinn put in the first store in 1847, and one Sibley put up a $4,000 mill in 1868.

Dolson Township was settled as early as 1828 by John Duke, William Rogers and William Smith. David and Isaac Murrey arrived in 1830, and Isaac erected a rude carding mill some time afterward. A small horse mill was built in the township as early as 1838, and Christian Clapp built a water mill on Mill Creek in 1840.

Clarksville was laid out by George Lee in 1851, the surveying being done by James Lawrence, County Surveyor. The Doughtys, Harrisons, Haslitts, Elleges, Rogers, Bartmess, Heath, Lees, Fitzgeralds, Boyers, Coons, Welsh and Claypools were among the early settlers of Dolson Township.

Martinsville Township was occupied first in 1829 by John Chancellor, and Amos Potts reached there from Ohio in 1830. The Weisner, Chriss and Scholfield families came in a little later. Thomas Scholfield, father of the late Judge John Scholfield, came to Melrose Township from Ohio in 1828, and moved to Martinsville Township in 1832. He went to Oregon in 1856.

Joseph Martin laid out Martinsville Township in 1832.

Anderson Township was settled by Joseph Archer about 1830. In 1832 came John Birch, father of Robert Birch and Timothy Birch, the former of whom was the most noted outlaw of the county. He was a leading member of the Fox-Long-Birch gang of cut-throats, robbers, horse thieves and murderers that so long infested Illinois, Missouri, Iowa and Indiana, and who murdered old Colonel Davenport near Rock Island, July 4, 1845. The gang is fully described in the "Banditti of the Prairies," a book published by Edward Donney, the detective, who, assuming to be in sympathy with the gang, landed some of them in prison, caused others to be hanged, and finally broke up and dispersed the others. It was the publication of this book that caused the whipping in Anderson Township of Davis Phillips, his son, Thomas Phillips, and others. A feature of the book is a conversation between Bonney and old John Birch, called the "Old Coon," in which Birch stated that the "Clerk of the Court" at Marshall was his friend, and always gave him advance information of any trouble that was threatened him or any member of the gang by the authorities. The "Old Coon" did not name the Clerk, but suspicion fell at once on Phillips, and so he and his son Tom, who were out with a posse that was scouring the woods for the gang in the neighborhood of the Birch cabin, in Anderson Township, were seized upon, tied to trees and unmercifully whipped. There was no evidence against the Phillips, except the bare statement of old John Long, and few people in Marshall who were here then and conversant with all the facts in the case, believe that either Darius Phillips or his son Tom were guilty, and the whipping of them is now regarded as an outrage. Phillips then lived in the house now kept by Mrs. Falley as a boarding house on West Main street, and when seen there soon after by Homer Quick and others his back was in a badly lacerated condition, his son Tom being in the same condition. Phillips resigned his office and he and his family went West, never to return. Two of his sons, including Tom, have been back once each, but did not make their presence generally known. It is thought they may have been looking for some of those who committed the outrage upon the father and brother, with the intention of getting even with them, as this was expected by a good many people for years after the Phillips family left. It is noted that the former history of Clark County, published in 1883 by O. L. Baskin & Co., intimates that Bonney, the detective, had been himself a counterfeiter, and was himself a criminal, but this intimation is, we think, refuted by the result of his trial, on the charge of counterfeiting, wherein he was acquitted in the United States Court at Springfield, Ill., at the December term, 1846. Besides, ten of the jurymen who tried Bonney signed a statement addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, in which they completely exonerated him. Moreover, on January 6, 1847, Governor Thomas Ford, of Illinois, gave to the public and to Bonney a certificate in which he states that he was present at the trial, heard the evidence, fully concurs in the statement of exoneration and innocence published by the jury, and believes that he was innocent, and further that the indictment for counterfeiting against Bonney was procured by perjury and in an attempt to get even with him for his pursuit and punishment of the Fox-Long-Birch gang. Surely these statements, by men most competent to judge of the guilt or innocence of the accused, should settle the matter for all time. Bonney had to pretend to be a member of the gang, and to take some little unimportant action in their rascalities in order to obtain and hold their confidence until he could apprehend them.

The settlement of Orange Township began with the arrival of Newton Howerton and Moses Engle about 1836. Enock Thompson came in 1837, and in 1838 came the Harrisons, Canady, Maples, Foster and Rubottom families. Maples was a gambler and a desperado, committed many acts of lawlessness and finally sold out to John S. Hicks and left the county with another man's wife. In 1840 came the Malone, Beauchamps and Bennett families, and soon after the Hix, Prindle and Elliotts. The first marriage in the township was that of John Hix and Olive Blakeman in 1840, and Francis Hardway, the son of Andrew and Margaret Hardway, was the first person born there. Robert and Thomas Bailiff, father and son, both Cumberland Presbyterians, were among the first and best known and best beloved preachers, and T. C. Balliff, a grandson of Robert and a son of Thomas, still keeps up the good work there.

John Burris was the first actual settler of Johnson Township, arriving in 1833, and the same year came a man by the name of Ingraham. Daniel Doughty, a Baptist preacher, came in 1836, and Jacob Janney came in 1837. The Alexander Mount and Megeath families also came in 1836. James Mount was the first Justice of the Peace of Johnson Township. In 1836 came also the Crouch, Davee, Hilburn and Owings families. Dr. Henry King, afterwards a noted physician of Illinois and Oregon, was also one of the early settlers of Johnson Township, as were also James Henderson and Hawley Childs. David Ingraham was killed about 1837, and his was the first death to occur in the township. John Burris, the son of John and Elizabeth Burris, was the first child to be born there, in 1836, and in 1838 occurred the first marriage, that of Amos Carlan and Amanda Brewster. George Janney and Eliza Williamson, and Joseph Howe and Letty Foster soon followed their good example. William Blundell was preaching there as early as 1838.

Parker Township's first settler was Hezeriah Martin, who arrived in 1827, and in 1828 came George Parker, after whom the township was named. John G. Morrell came in 1830, Lewis Walker came in 1831, and in 1832 came Morris Carruthers, Thomas Lamb, David Easton and Stanley B. Walker, the latter an Old-School Baptist preacher. In 1833 came William Lee, John Johnson and Calvin Boyd, the latter of whom ran for the Legislature but was defeated. Isaac Bean and L. D. Robinson were also early arrivals, and the latter was a brother of the famous James C. Robinson, who was a Clark County and Springfield lawyer, member of Congress, candidate for Governor, a noted campaign speaker, and one of the brainiest men in Clark County. The Connellys, Houghtons, Hammonds and Barbees also came early, and their descendants are a controlling force in business and politics at the present time.

The settlement of Auburn Township was begun when Jonathan Rathbone arrived in 1832. He was soon followed by Ralph Haskett, Orndorff, Robert Downs, John Fredenberger, Samuel Williams and others. Nicholas Hurst, a prominent early settler of Auburn, was Sheriff, Associate Judge and County Treasurer. He was the father of Seymour Hurst, of Marshall, who is Chairman of the County Democratic Committee, has been Postmaster of Marshall, and a candidate for State Senator. He is now a candidate for the lower branch of the Illinois Legislature. He is a fine business man, a leader in his party, and one of the most prominent and useful citizens of Clark County. Archibald Stack was also an early settler of Auburn, was once quite wealthy in land, but became involved in a lawsuit with James C. Hillebert and suffered heavy losses, as did nearly all who became involved in lawsuits with that keen, pugnacious, enterprising, wide-awake early settler of Clark County.

The town of Auburn, in a comparatively early day, was the scene of the notorious and long-talked-of personal encounter between John Welsh and John Fitzsimmons. Fitzsimmons was a noted fighter, and had conquered every man up to the time he met John Welsh. Mr. Welsh was a peaceable man in the main, but was of giant strength, desperate courage and fierce temper. The fight occurred at a great barbecue, and Welsh was one of the managers, and had charge of the tables. Fitzsimmons was drinking some, and as usual spoiling for a fight. In the good old days in Clark County men fought only with the weapons nature had given them. The revolver was unknown, the sling-shot and brass or steel knuckles were unheard of, clubs, stones and knives unthought of as they are today, and therefore encounters rarely resulted in anything more fatal than broken noses, blackened eyes, loss of teeth, and sometimes a few broken bones. Fights were fair, neither was allowed any help, and they continued until one of the contestants said he had enough. After the fight was over that was generally the end of it, and the persons thus engaged in fistic encounters were usually later the best of friends. In the good old scrapping days Ham Daniels, Steve Pritchard and Jim Fears, of York; John Welsh, John Fitzsimmons, Nelse Shaffner, John Williams, who was shot and killed at Nelse Shaffner's house by Bill Haddix, a Deputy Sheriff of Clark County, there were no deadly weapons used, and no help given to either man, but the best man was allowed to win. At the Auburn barbecue Fitzsimmons became unruly, boisterous and threatening, and finally struck John Welsh, who had tried to quiet him. Soon one of the hardest, most desperate and long-continued fistic encounters ever fought in Clark County was on. Both men were giants in physical strength, had desperate courage and both were in the prime of young and vigorous manhood. Welsh finally whipped Fitzsimmons, and it was the last fight he ever had. He never recovered fully from the effects of the mauling he had received from Welsh, but the men afterwards became friends as they had been before. When Fitzsimmons was on his deathbed he told Welsh, who had called to see his old antagonist, that he was dying from the effects of their Auburn fight, but that he himself was the aggressor and did not blame him. The killing of Williams by Haddick, while justified in law, as Haddix was a Deputy Sheriff, and, in company with Jack Harlow, another Deputy Sheriff, was trying to serve a warrant on Williams, who ran out of the back door of Shaffner's house, where Haddix was standing, and refusing to halt when called upon to do so, was shot by Haddix as he ran along Shaffner's garden fence, the ball striking him squarely at the base of the brain, killing him instantly. Haddix nearly lost his mind through remorse over the killing, and he never recovered from the effects. It was at the Coroner's inquest over the body of Williams, at Shaffner's house, that Dr. George Center, then a practicing physician of Clark County, exhibited one of his usual but cruel freaks as a surgeon. He was a vivisectionist of the most merciless and radical type, and was wont to indulge in the intellectual pastime of nailing the four feet of cats and other small animals to boards, and while stretched out on their backs, alive, in a helpless position, would coolly and deliberately cut away the hide, muscles and tendons in the regions of the heart, stomach, lungs and other internal organs, until he could, through the thin covering of these organs, or with no covering whatever, note the heart beats, the circulation of the blood, the action of air in the lungs, and the digestion of food in the stomach. He kept at this merciless business while at Marshall until the practice became so unbearable to its people that he was obliged to desist. At the Williams inquest Center called upon Mr. Shaffner to get him a saw to saw into the head of the deceased in order to locate the bullet that had killed him. Shaffner refused, and he then tried to get some one to get him an axe so that he might chop into the skull. This so enraged those present that they peremptorily and threateningly forbade Center to go any farther in his investigation. He afterwards moved to Evansville, Ind., where he became a demonstrator of anatomy in a medical college there, and was quite successful. While here he came near being shot on several occasions on account of his brutality or imagined brutality to patients in his capacity as a surgeon.

Among the early settlers of Douglas Township may be mentioned the Ashmores, Forsythes, Davis, Galbraith and Lycan families. In 1853 occurred the murder of Robert Ashmore by William Forsythe. Both men were Kentuckians and the best of friends until Forsythe lost a valuable calf and accused Ashmore of stealing it. Ashmore sued Forsythe for slander, whereupon Forsythe swore vengeance and declared he would kill him if he did not withdraw the suit. Ashmore refused to do this, but went on with his preparations for the trial. On the morning court was to convene, Ashmore, while in the act of saddling his horse, was shot from ambush and instantly killed. Forsythe was arrested, tried, convicted and sentenced to be hanged, but the Governor commuted his sentence to a life term in the penitentiary. He became afflicted with a terrible cancer of the face while in the penitentiary, and after serving eight years was released and came home to die the same year. This was one of the most noted murder cases ever tried in Clark County, was the talk of the county for years, and is still talked of by those who remember the murder and the incidents that followed it. Douglas Township contains a large Irish Catholic population, and they are among the most industrious, thrifty, well-behaved people of the county. Castle Finn is the only town, or rather hamlet, for it has no town or village organization.

The first settlement of Casey began with the construction of the National Road through the county, and the first permanent resident was John Doughty, who located near the present site of Cumberland, east of the city of Casey proper, in 1833. In 1834 came Silas Whitehead, the father of Silas S. Whitehead, and in 1835 Joshua Chancellor. The latter had formerly lived in Martinsville Township, having located in 1829. In 1835 arrived James O. Hedges and his son, James V. Hedges, and in 1836 came Asa W. Dolson, Thomas Scholfield, Henry Bromwell, the Chisms, John and William, Addison Barbour, William Shook, William Sullivan and Levi Mumford. They were followed in 1837 by Dixon Cobb, a violent, hot-headed, prejudiced, unreasonable fellow, who had a good deal of trouble with his neighbors. Cobb finally accused William Shook of stealing hogs and upon being sued for slander was found guilty and left the county. He went to Vincennes, where subsequently his son, Thomas R. Cobb, was elected a member of Congress. The village of Casey was incorporated in 1871.

James Shaw, one of the first settlers of Westfield Township, arrived in 1829, the same year as Daniel Evinger, Absalom Kester and Thomas Frazier. In 1830 came Esau Morris, William Comstock, James Jones, David Bennett and others. Bennett was killed by falling from his horse in 1834, and his was the first death that occurred in the township. William Goodman, George Goodman, Henry Randall, Elijah Stark and James Bell came there in 1831. Bell was a man of education and a fine violinist. The Lowrys, Eastons, Biggs, Macks, Brookes, Barbees and Joseph Briscoe came in 1832. Henry Briscoe came in 1835 and soon after Coleman Dun. In 1838 William Lee erected the first saw mill in the township. It was an ox tread-wheel mill, but did good service until it was abandoned in 1848.

Clark County has had its share of distressing homicides, but it has never had a hanging or lynching. Darwin has had its killing of James Oxendine by Frank Jeffers, for which he was acquitted; and Albert Hall, one of the most peaceable and well liked men in that township, had the misfortune some years ago to shoot and kill John Wells, whom he early in the morning mistook for a turkey while hunting for turkey in the elbow brush west of Darwin. It was a distressing mistake, for which Hall was in no wise blameable, but it has grieved and troubled him incessantly since that time. The killing of Dr. Duncan, in Marshall, by Hamilton Eaton, as well as that of Mack Morton by his wife in Marshall; also that of Trenck Towsley by Richard Myles, in Darwin, created intense excitement and no little bad feeling in their respective localities at the times of their commission, but those who had the misfortune to do the killing were all tried and acquitted—Jeffers and Eaton on the plea of self-defense; the wife of Morton on the plea of insanity, and Myles, by virtue of the "unwritten law," which rarely allows a man to be convicted where the killing is done in defense of the honor of his home and family. The trial and acquittal of the wife of Burns Dixon, also of Darwin, on an indictment charging her with the crime of poisoning her husband, and her acquittal, created great dissatisfaction in the county. She was ably defended by James W. Graham, while John Scholfield defended Hamilton Eaton. Thomas J. Golden defended Richard Myles, and Golden, Scholfield & Booth defended the slayer of Mack Morton. The killing of "General" Craig, in Anderson Township, by young Paul Sweet, also created great excitement. Craig was an influential man in his neighborhood, and his death was the result of ill feeling over a woman who was a domestic in Craig's household. Sweet was defended by Golden and W. A. Wilkin, and though vigorously prosecuted by attorneys employed by the brother of Craig, he was acquitted. Clark County has been the scene, fortunately, of but few of the more loathsome, indecent and unnatural kind of crimes, and the mob spirit has never, be it said to her honor, manifested itself in the county. The people, no matter what the offenses against the criminal status have been, have always manifested a willingness to allow the law to take its course. Among the noted doctors of Marshall, Martinsville, Casey and Westfield Townships who have practiced in the county during comparative recent years, we desire to mention Dr. Fleming Rice Payne, Dr. F. H. Jennings and Dr. J. M. Janes, of Marshall; Dr. W. H. McNary and Dr. Gard, of Martinsville; Dr. Richard Williams, of Casey, and Dr. James Parcel, of Westfield. These men all stood high in their profession, and their respective deaths were a distinct loss to the medical fraternity of Clark County. No stronger, abler physicians, or men of finer common sense, have ever lived and practiced in Clark County than Drs. Payne, McNary, Williams and Parcel, and we wish to bear especial tribute to their memories, both as doctors and as men.

Dr. Tom Williams, the worthy son of an honored father, is an intelligent, progressive physician of Casey at this time, enjoys a fine practice, has the confidence of his people, and is well liked by all who know him, both as a physician and man. Among the older and more prominent physicians of Clark County in active practice at this time we wish to make honorable mention of Dr. Robert H. Bradley, Dr. G. W. Prewett, Dr. H. W. Haslit, Dr. E. M. Duncan and Dr. Edward Pearce, of Marshall, and Dr. W. W. Bruce, of Casey. These men are all old practitioners in Clark County, and have the confidence and esteem of all who know them, not only as physicians but as citizens and men. There are other bright and up-to-date physicians in the county of less years of practice, among them Dr. John Weir, of West Union; Drs. L. C. Weir, P. P. Haslit, J. J. Rose and J. W. Smith, of Marshall; Drs. Phelps, Wilkin and Wilhite, of Martinsville, and Dr. Phelps, of Casey, and others. These are sufficient to show that Clark County is not behind her sister counties in good doctors, but maintains in that regard, as she has always done in the past, a high standard of professional ability and standing among her professional men of the medical fraternity. The dental profession is also ably represented in the county by Drs. W. R. Turman and J. B. Taylor, of Marshall, and by W. Kelly, of Martinsville, and others.

CHAPTER VII.

TOWNS AND TOWNSHIPS—CITIES AND VILLAGES— NEWSPAPERS.

As already stated, Clark County consists of fifteen townships, of whose cities, villages and towns brief mention has been made.

Marshall Township is bounded on the north by Douglas, on the east by Wabash, on the south by Anderson, and on the west by Auburn and Dolson Townships. It was known in the original survey as Town 11 North, Range 12 West, and for about twenty years afterwards had no more specific title. It was originally a small part of Washington and Dubois Townships, as they were then called, and was not christened Marshall Township until Marshall was laid out as a town, and after it had been designated as the county seat in 1837. Mill Creek on the west and Big Creek on the north and east of Marshall form important features of Marshall Township. It is from gravel, fed from Big Creek, and the numerous springs twenty feet below the surface of the ground just north of the National Road, two miles east of the city of Marshall, that the city's unsurpassed supply of water is obtained. The establishment of the National Road through the township in 1827 gave to the present location of the city of Marshall a distinguishing and valuable feature that caused rapid settlement of the township, and did much to obtain for it the county seat of Clark County, though of course Auburn, in Auburn Township, was blessed by that great and useful public improvement. Far-seeing men, believing that the site of the present city of Marshall was to become the permanent location of the county seat, entered the lands comprising it as early as 1835. The most significant of these entries were made in Sections 13 and 24 by William B. Archer and Governor Joseph Duncan. William B. Archer, with his usual foresightedness, saw that in Sections 13 and 24 the future capital of Clark County was sure to spring up. Reason Wiley entered lands in the township in 1827, Mecum Main in 1838, and Thomas Casey and Thomas Wilson in 1831. John Stockwell, Orlando B. Ficklin, William P. Twilley, John Riggs, Cornelius Lamb, Milton Lake, Stephen Archer, Dr. William Tutt and David A. Prichard came in 1835, but only the last four were fortunate enough to get in on the ground floor of land ownership in coveted Sections 13 and 24. In 1836 came William Blundell, Abram Washburn, Abel English, Jonathan Jones, and Woodford Dulaney, the last named locating in Sections 13 and 24. The same year came Oliver Davis, Albert B. Kitchell, William Sullivan, Jacob and Justin Harlan, John Bartley, John Hollenbeck, George B. Richardson, John Huston, Wichliffe Kitchell, Thomas Weathers, John McManus, A. Davis, Abraham Lewis, the two Thatcher boys, William Craig, Levi Stark, William Bartlett and William McKeen. Arrivals in 1837 included Henry Cole, Michael Ripple, Samuel Galbreath, John Betres, Zachariah Wood, James B. Anderson, Washington Cole, Hugh Malone, William Ketchum, Robert Mitchell, Maywood Davis, Richard Grace, Eldridge Janney, James C. Hillebert, and Vincent Handy, Washington Cole and Richard Grace entering lands in Sections 13 and 24. In 1838 entries were made by Robert Ashmore, Richard Airy, Stephen Lee, James McCoy, O. H. P. Miller, Michael Meeker, John Combs, John B. Mitchell, James L. Clapp, Darius Phillips, Fred Quick, Ezra Neal, and others, but Michael Meeker alone in the desirable Section 13. In 1839 lands were entered by William King, Rely Madison, Richard Clapp, Leonard Umbarger, Christian Orndorff, John A. Fredenberger, Archibald Irwin, and Isaac M. Martin and others.

Marshall was platted by William B. Archer, as before stated, in October, 1835. Most of the early settlers of the township were from York and Darwin Townships. The first hotel of Marshall was built by John Bartlett, a double log house of hickory logs, on the spot now occupied by the old Greenough residence, east of the James Dunn livery and feed stable. In this hotel James Whitlock opened the first store in the town. James Mathews and Willard Center were the first carpenters, and Linda Patterson had the first blacksmith shop. A blacksmith was an important as well as an exceedingly useful citizen in those days. Ezra Neal was the first wagon maker. Justin Harlan, the Circuit Judge, and Darius Phillips, County Clerk, did not come to Marshall until 1839. Jack Hadden was among the first business men of Marshall, and with James Waters, of Darwin, arrived in 1836. James B. Anderson, the father of "Our Barney," was also an old-time merchant of Marshall. He was a native of Ireland and came to Clark County as early as 1820. Jonathan Greenough, another pioneer merchant, first went into business with William Whitlock, whose daughter he married, and afterwards formed a partnership with Beebe Booth, the father of Lyman Booth, and the grandfather of Fenton W., Edwin Harry and Truman Booth, still of Marshall. The Cole boys, David, Edwin, Harry and Jerome, came early and were prominent in local affairs, as was also De Lance Cole, son of Harry, and father of Walter, Vernon, Lou, Edward, Charles and Frank Cole. These six sons of De Lance Cole are all in the abstract, loan and mercantile business in Marshall, and are among the most enterprising, intelligent and well-to-do men of the community.

John B. King, the first tailor, came in 1837, and Uri Manley was among the first professional men. Dr. Allison was probably the first

Marshall physician, but Dr. William Tutt, of York, came in 1838, and was soon followed by Dr. Poole. A man of the name of Blaze committed the first homicide in the county by shooting and killing Sharp. Blaze, though persistently hunted, was never captured. The first grist and saw mill was erected on Big Creek by Burwell, Blaze & Sharp about 1838. Burwell ran the mill for some time, then sold it to one Nance, after whose death it passed into the hands of David Cole, who had married the daughter of Nance. The first mill in Marshall was erected by Philip B. Smith in 1839, and the same year the first tannery was started by Frederick Craiglow. Captain Tift was the first dancing master, and Whaley agitated the cat gut, while the young people, guided by Captain Tift, tipped the light fantastic toe. In 1875 was established the Clark County Bank, of which the original stockholders were Robert Brown, John Morton, Jonathan Hogue, D. D. Doll, and David S. McMullen, with Brown as President, Doll as Vice-President, and McMullen as Cashier.

It was not until 1848 that Marshall boasted a newspaper, called the "Illinois State Democrat." It was Democratic in politics, and was managed by John M. Crane and Nathan Willard. Crane soon withdrew and Willard ran it alone until 1853, when it was sold to J. C. Robinson and Jacob Zimmerman, who merged it with the "Marshall Telegraph" under the name of "The Eastern Illinoisian." "The Eastern Illinoisian" was published by Robinson and Zimmerman until 1856, when Silas S. Whitehead became the proprietor. In 1861 Whitehead sold it to H. H. Peyton, but soon bought it back. Whitehead ran the paper until 1865, when he sold it to John Littlefield, who soon after discontinued it. In 1873 Whitehead resurrected it under its old name, using it for the combined purpose of defending his killing of John L. Ryan in May, 1877, and of punishing his enemies. He finally sold the paper to Benjamin Sweet, Joshua Montgomery, Ira J. Bell and others, when its name was again changed to the "Clark County Democrat." Bell and Montgomery soon sold out to Sweet, and he in turn sold to Sol Handy, who now conducts the paper as its sole editor and proprietor. It is the official organ of the Democratic party. Whitehead was the ablest newspaper writer Clark County ever had, and as a political writer it is doubtful if Eastern Illinois ever knew his equal.

The "Illinoisian," as well as both Whitehead and Robinson, were hostile to the prosecution of the war for the Union. To oppose this feeling, as well as to answer the editorials of Whitehead, John Littlefield, in 1861, started a little paper called the "Flag." It was squarely for the Union cause, and in his first editorial Mr. Littlefield said: "We shall contend for a strict construction of the Constitution and the enforcement of the laws. We shall ignore politics and discussions as to the cause of the war, but fight the battles of our country first, and talk about the causes afterwards." In 1865 Mr. Littlefield bought and suppressed the "Illinoisian," and started the "Marshall Messenger," which he conducted until he died, and afterwards his relatives conducted it until it was absorbed by the "Clark County Democrat" and the "Clark County Herald," by purchase by the proprietors of those papers. The "Marshall Telegraph" was a little paper started in 1852 by Jones & Farley, editors and proprietors. It was a Whig paper, and as the Whig party was then a dead party, it soon passed into the hands of Charles Summers, who sold it to his Democratic contemporary in 1853. In April or May, 1854, E. Callahan and S. F. Andrews started a paper with "Know Nothing" proclivities called the "Marshall Telegraph." Mr. Callahan soon retired, and Andrews conducted the paper for a time in the interest of the Republican party, then making its rise in the political world. This paper was suspended in 1858, and in June, 1859, N. S. McKeen and John Whitlock started the "Marshall Journal," also in the interest of the Republican party. Dr. W. S. Goodell, one of our old-time doctors, bought this paper, and ran it for a time as an independent paper. In 1868 M. O. Frost established the "Clark County Herald," the first issue appearing August 28, 1868. The "Marshall Messenger" was at that time the sole other newspaper in the county, and its jealousy was instantly aroused, and the bitterest personal warfare broke out between Frost and Littlefield through the columns of their respective papers. This enmity was kept up incessantly until Frost, through the discovery and publication of his scandalous relations with a domestic in his family, was forced to sell his paper and leave the county. M. O. Frost was one of the best newspaper men and published one of the best papers in Clark County. He sold the "Herald" to L. S. Kilborn, who, with his son, Orrie Kilborn, conducted it for some years, and then sold it to George Baird, the present editor. L. S. Kilborn is an honest, well educated man, of high moral character, and the "Marshall Herald" was always run on a high plane of excellence while the Kilborns had it. Orrie Kilborn is one of the best newspaper writers in this part of Illinois, and always fights his newspaper battles in a fair and decent manner. The "Church Progress," a Catholic newspaper, was started in 1878, and some years afterwards was removed to another point. The "Clark County Acorn" was established by J. J. Sewell in 1879, and in 1897 was purchased by Thomas W. Clark, who has since been its sole editor and proprietor. Both the "Herald" and "Acorn" are Republican papers, and the former is the official organ of the party in Clark County. The editor of the "Acorn" was a soldier in the Union Army in the War of the Rebellion, has been Mayor of Marshall, and is a prominent and respected citizen. As a newspaper man he is judicious, fair and eminently free from that abuse of his political opponents which often characterizes men of his calling. The same may be said of the editors of the "Democrat" and "Herald," though Handy and Baird sometimes touch each other up through the columns of their respective publications in good, old-fashioned county newspaper style, but personally their relations are pleasant. Mr. Handy was Mayor of Marshall for four years and one of the leaders of his party. Baird has also held public office, and both of them have made satisfactory officers. Mr. Handy is a descendant of Thomas Handy, the first settler of Clark County, and the family has always been prominent in their respective localities, as well as in the larger affairs of the county.

In 1838 came Dean Andrews, the first Congregational minister of Marshall, one of the best educated, most enterprising and lovable men the county ever had. He was a graduate of Bowdoin College, was first to open a private school of the higher and better type in Marshall, and he afterwards taught in a college ordered for his benefit and use. The Dean Andrews school building afterwards passed into the hands of the Methodist denomination, and under the name of "Marshall College" did not greatly prosper. In 1871 it reverted to the public school authorities of Marshall, and on its site has arisen the present North Side School building.

N. B. DevoI was the first public dentist of Marshall, establishing his business in 1852, more than fifty-four years ago. He is not only the oldest dentist in practice in Clark County, but he is likewise one of the oldest citizens of Marshall, both in honor and years. Not even the suspicion of wrong-doing has touched the hem of Noah B. DevoI's mantle of fidelity, honesty, truth and good citizenship.

John Shipe, the first tinsmith, is among the oldest living inhabitants of Marshall. He was born in Pennsylvania, moved from there to Quincy, Adams County, Ill., from there to Crawford County, and from there to Marshall in 1861. He is one of the best known and most highly respected men of this city, as are also his three sons, Charles, Theodore, "Dode," as he is called, and W. A., who, with their families, live near each other on West Main Street.

Dr. Simon Jumper, now of Marshall, is the oldest physician of Clark County, both in years and length of practice. He came to Darwin in 1855, and practiced medicine there for more than twenty-five years before he moved to Marshall. He is now living retired, and is in comfortable circumstances. Dr. Jumper is a man of the strictest integrity, and a citizen of whom any community might well be proud. He has always been noted for his kindness and encouragement to young men striving to do something honorable and worthy in the world, and has always been greatly loved and respected by them. The writer remembers with gratitude the encouragement and commendation he gave him on the occasion of his first public speech, delivered from the tail end of a wagon at York, July 4, 1868. Among the oldest living residents of Marshall may be mentioned Josiah, W. T. and Benson Martin; Edwin, William and Wilson Harlan; M. R. Chenoweth and wife; Homer and Susan Quick; George W. Smith, Enos L. Cole, Mrs. Julia Smith, and Peter Conaha, all among the best and highly respected people of Marshall.

Among other things, York Township is distinguished because of its early settlement and the superior education and refinement of its pioneer class. It lies in the extreme southeastern corner of the county, and the village of York was formerly a part of Crawford County. The township is bounded on the east by the Wabash River, on the south by Crawford County, on the west by Melrose and on the north by Darwin Township. Mill Creek, in the northern part, is quite a stream, is well supplied with fish, and drains a large part of that section. The Welsh Pond, but recently drained by a ditch, to be spoken of later, was formerly a large inland body of water and a noted resort for fishing parties. It was always partly drained by Snyder Creek, and is now dry land like its surroundings. Its location was in the northeastern part of the township, in Sections 10 and 11. Snyder Pond lies about two miles southeast of the Welsh Pond, in Section 23, and is owned by Joseph Snyder, one of the oldest living residents of York Township. It is also a famous fishing resort, but the drainage canal is reaching for it, and despite the utmost opposition of "Uncle Joe," as he is sometimes called, it is not improbable that Snyder Pond before long will be the home of corn rather than of fish, turtle and the wild duck. Mr. Snyder holds this pond as the apple of his eye, and none can blame him for trying to preserve it intact. He is an old soldier, is full of fight and vigor, and though living in Marshall has the foresight to hold on to his fine farm in the region of Snyder's Pond. York is one of the most fertile and certain crop-producing townships in the county. Many of its farms have been in continuous cultivation for more than sixty years, and seem to be improving in fertility and productiveness. The prairie land of the township is of a rich, dark gray sand loam, that of the timber lands usually of a rich, yellow clay, frequently mixed with sand. The soil of Union Prairie is remarkably warm, rich and productive. In some places, especially around the station called Walnut Prairie, watermelons, cantaloupes and all kinds of garden truck come early, and are of a superior quality, while wheat, corn, broom corn and clover are grown abundantly and usually with the utmost certainty. The "old bed" of the Wabash River, as it is called, just below York, on the Indiana side of the river, is a famous resort for fishermen as well as for tourists from as far north as Paris, as far east as Sullivan, Ind., as far south as Hutsonville, and as far west as Casey and Cumberland Counties.

Like York, Darwin Township sprang into importance in the early history of the county, and owns to the distinction of having had two county seats, two jails, two court houses, as well as an estray pen and whipping post. Darwin lies immediately north of York, and is bounded on the east by the Wabash River, on the north by Wabash and on the west by Anderson Township. It was named by Dr. Patrick for Charles Darwin, the noted scientist, who gave to the world the great work of "Origin of Species," which now has become the accepted theory of the scientific world. Big Creek, Sugar Creek and Patrick's Creek lie in the north, and drain that part of the township into the Wabash River. Bohn Creek also helps to carry off the waste water of the township. Walnut Prairie includes four or five sections of fine land, the soil of which is similar to that of York, as are also the river and creek bottom lands. Darwin Township was formerly called Dubois Township, or precinct. Dr. Simon Jumper, before mentioned, Dr. J. D. Mitchell, Dr. Leachman, Dr. Know, Dr. Stover, Dr. Hatfield and Dr. Edward Pearce, now practicing at Marshall, practiced medicine in and around Darwin for many years. Dr. Mitchell was a prominent physician of Clark County, and his son, Dr. O. Mitchell, who died a few years ago at Marshall, was also highly respected, and enjoyed a large and paying practice. York was the first and Darwin the second town to be platted in Clark County.

Casey Township is one of the four western townships of the county, and is bounded on the north by Parker, on the east by Martinsville, on the south by Johnson and on the west by Cumberland County. The first settlers of the township located a mile east of Casey, where the town of Cumberland now stands. The soil of the township is of a rich, black loam, usually level, and very adaptive to corn and hay. The north fork of the Embarrass River cuts through the southeast part of the township. Quarry's Branch touches the west, and Turkey Run also runs through a part of it. Early trading was with York and Darwin, about twenty-five miles to the southeast. The town of Casey sprang into existence about the year 1853, and was named for one of the three Casey boys, all of whom were quite prominent in Illinois history; but whether the name was intended to honor Zadoc, Newton R. or the Hon. Thomas S. Casey cannot be definitely ascertained, though it was probably the latter. The town of Casey was platted in 1854 on land owned by John Cole, the surveying being done by D. H. Helmer. Casey is the second city in size in the county, closely if not indeed nearly equaling Marshall. It is the principal town of Clark County touching the oil industry, which has given it quite a boom, and at one time it was thought it might even surpass Marshall in resident population, as it formerly did as a receiving and shipping point. But the oil lands of that part of the county, especially those owned by independent prospectors, are mostly developed now, and it is thought that Casey has touched high water mark. The village of Casey was incorporated in May, 1871, and the present city was incorporated a few years ago. The first mill in Casey was erected by Rufus Neal in 1869. The first bank, called the Home Bank, was started by David Steeples in 1873. In 1874 the Casey Bank was established by Charles Clements, of Rutland, Vt., and in 1877 Fugua & Sanford added a banking business. The town now has three good banks, the Casey National, the First National and the Eagle Bank. John Garrison and B. F. Ward started the first paper at Casey in 1872, called the "Casey Times." H. A. Boyd bought out Garrison in about seven months, and B. F. Ward became the sole proprietor of the paper a year later. It was formerly independent, then a Green Back organ, then a full-fledged Democratic paper, and when moved to Marshall in 1878 was merged with the "Eastern Illinoisan." In 1877 Edward Hitchcock started the "Exponent," an out and out Republican paper, which he moved elsewhere in 1878. He was one of the best newspaper men in the county. In June, 1881, H. G. Morris, now of Olney, Ill., started the "Advocate." The "Casey Banner" was started in January, 1879, by B. F. Ward, who still conducts it as a Republican paper. The "Casey Commercial," the leading paper of the county outside of Marshall, is now owned and edited by Fred E. Moore, the earliest, most persistent, most earnest and able friend of the oil developing industry of Clark County has had.

its principal citizens intelligent, enterprising and moral, and its oil development and prospects unsurpassed. It is in the extreme northwestern part of the county, as York is the extreme southeastern part, and is bounded on the north by Coles County, on the west by Cumberland County, on the south by Parker, and on the east by Dolson Township. Westfield Township is, together with York and Darwin, the garden spot of the county, and the old Walter Briscoe farm, one mile east of the village of Westfield, is by many considered the most beautiful and valuable farm in the county. It would be hard to find a finer farm for all purposes. Its rich, dark soil, its fine blue grass pastures, its neatly kept fences, houses and barns, and the general lay of its land are not excelled anywhere in this part of Illinois. New Richmond, now a part of the village of Westfield, was laid out in 1836 by B. I. White, and the village of Westfield proper by Colonel William B. Archer in 1839. In 1841 Charles Whitlock, of Marshall, opened the first store at Westfield, and in 1844 William Hampton opened the second. In two years Hampton sold out to Thomas Moore, and one year later, in 1847, he entered into partnership with Michael York. York was one of the most energetic, long-headed business men Westfield ever had, and in 1877 erected the first brick building block in the town. Later J. R. Redmon & Co. and C. F. Knapp & Co. erected a large brick block. The Watson block was built in 1849, where Captain Tefft had formerly kept a hotel for seven years, from 1841 to 1848. In 1879 the "Westfield Index," the first newspaper, was established by George L. Watson, who two years later sold it to M. R. Bair—"Mike" Bair, as he was called—who changed its name to the "Pantagraph." In 1881 the paper passed into the hands of S. W. Zeller, who, in 1882, sold it to his son, J. R. Zeller, who gave it the name of the "Visitor." He soon sold it to Martin and Baker, and soon afterwards Charles Martin became its sole proprietor. The only paper now published at Westfield, as the successor of these several named papers, is the "Westfield Review," by James Dolson, the father of Roscoe Dolson, former editor of the paper. James Dolson was at one time Superintendent of Schools of Clark County.

The village of Westfield was incorporated in March, 1866, J. C. Van Sickle, James H. Parcel, H. H. Cash, Isaac Bolton and B. H. Hayes being the first Trustees. The pride of Westfield Township for many years, and justly so, has been the college, known as Westfield College.

Wabash Township is bounded by the Wabash River and Vigo County on the east, by Edgar County on the north, by Marshall and Douglas Townships on the west, and by Darwin Township on the south. It contains, among others, the towns and postoffices of Livingston, McKeen, Dennison, Farrington, State Line and Armstrong. It is nearly nine miles square, being nearly two townships in size. Its name is derived from the fact that the beautiful Wabash River touches its borders in the southeast part, as Westfield Township was named "Westfield" for the reason that it is the extreme northwestern part of Clark County. At one time Denison and McKeen had flourishing sawlog and lumber mills, owned by Dulaney & Booth, of Marshall, several good stores and a substantial trade, but the sawing up of all the timber in that part of the county available for lumber purposes caused the mills to suspend operations, thus withdrawing all commercial resource. Hence their practically hopeless condition today. In place of the timber of this rich lumber region there is the substantial compensation of some of the finest farms in eastern Clark County. Big Creek and Sugar Creek are the principal drainage canals for the township. There is a good deal of broken and hilly land, but many good farms and prosperous farmers. The Kuykendalls, Thompsons, Corks, Wyricks, Dunlaps, Armstrongs, Murphys, Davisons, McCoys and others too numerous to mention all have good farms, and are progressive and wealthy tillers of the soil.

Martinsville Township is bounded on the west by Casey and Parker, on the north by Dolson and Auburn, on the east by Auburn and Anderson, and on the south by Orange Township. Both the Vandalia Railroad and the National Road pass through the city of Martinsville. Martinsville is one of the best townships in the county, and stands at the head in morality, freedom from small criminal classes that often infest certain parts of the county, and in the good conduct and good order of its people. No saloon is ever allowed to open its doors in Martinsville, and violators of the liquor statutes are mercilessly prosecuted.

Fewer crimes are committed and the bearers of criminal warrants make fewer trips to Martinsville than to any other city or township in the county. This fact speaks volumes for the industry, sobriety, morality and law-abiding character of its people. Martinsville has two good newspapers, the "Martinsville Planet" and the "Martinsville News." It was established in 1885 by E. H. Porter, who sold it to Fred Arney, who four years later sold it to A. L. Hemphill, who in turn sold it to L. H. Chapin, who kept it until February 2, 1897, when it was bought by its present proprietor, E. S. Clayton. Mr. Clayton has enlarged the paper and put in a cylinder press in place of the old Washington press. It is now a six-column, twelve-page sheet, and one of the neatest, best conducted papers in the county. Its circulation and business have more than doubled since Mr. Clayton obtained possession of it. He is a competent, enterprising and intelligent newspaper man and deserves the success which has come to him. The "Martinsville News" is a six-column quarto paper, and is independent in politics. It was founded September 2, 1904, by J. W. Rowe, its present owner and editor, is published every Thursday afternoon, and has a circulation of five hundred. It is a neatly printed, newsy, well conducted publication, and a creditable acquisition to the news dissemination of the county.

Dolson Township, one of the northern tier of townships, is bounded on the north by Edgar County, on the east by Douglas and Marshall, on the south by Auburn and Martinsville, and on the west by Westfield and Parker. Dolson Prairie lies in this township and the land is generally fertile. The north fork of the Embarrass River is its principal drainage, although Slater's Branch, Mill Creek and Blue Grass Creek contribute to this beneficent end. It is the home of the Welsh, Claypool, Schwartz, Kelly, Clapp, Beadle and other large and influential families, and who are among the most energetic and thrifty farmers in the county.

Anderson Township is bounded on the north by Marshall and Auburn, on the east by Marshall and Darwin, on the south by Melrose, and on the east by Auburn and Martinsville Townships. Except along the creeks it is very hilly and broken, but there is, however, a large amount of creek bottom lands. It is not very productive, comparatively speaking. Anderson is inhabited by many Germans, who, as all know, are an industrious, frugal, intelligent, law-abiding people. Allright is the only town and trading point in the township. The farms are unusually small, being owned by more different people than almost any other township in the county. Large farms are the exception in Anderson, though the Craig, Spittler, Meehling, Freeman, Williams and other families own quite a good deal of good land. Some of it, especially the bottom lands of Mill Creek owned by Thomas Craig, Joe Williams and others, is wonderfully productive, especially for corn. Thomas Craig has one of the best farms in the county and he knows how to farm it profitably.

Orange Township is another prairie township, not of particularly rich or productive character. It is bounded by Martinsville on the north, Melrose on the east, Johnson Township on the west, and Crawford County on the south. It is one of the four south tier of townships, the others being York, Melrose and Johnson. It is drained by Willow Creek and other streams, and is the home of the McDaniel, Spraker, Blankenbaker, Swope, Philippi, Mills and other large and influential families. Moonshine, Neadmore and Orange are the trading points. It has prospects in oil and gas.

Melrose Township is bounded on the north by Anderson, on the east by York, on the west by Orange Township, and on the south by Crawford County. Its only town is Melrose, named, perhaps, as well as the township, from Melrose Abbey, in England. Its original heavy growth of timber has been practically all cut away. There are some good farms, but the land of Melrose is not as valuable or productive as in some other parts of the county. Raccoon and Mill Creek touch the township on the east, southeast and northwest, and the creek bottom lands of these streams are unusually productive. S. D. Cooper, Iredel Evan, James and P. G. Bradbury, the Buckners, Wallace, F. M. and Fred, the Gards, Richards, Harrison, Crowe, Bailiff, Life, Nidey and other families have splendid farms, and are among the prosperous and well-to-do landowners of the county.

Johnson Township lies in the extreme southwestern part of the county and is bounded on the west by Jasper County, on the south by

Ohio Oil Company Building, Marshall, Illinois

Pythian Temple, Marshall, Illinois

Crawford County, on the east by Orange, and on the north by Casey Townships. It is drained by the north fork of the Embarrass River and by Willow Creek. Oak Point is the principal trading point. It has a good deal of rough land, but many good farms, especially in the Embarrass bottoms, and bids fair to prove rich in oil and gas. The Reed, Howe, Baughman, Bennett, Orndorff, Weaver and other influential families reside in Johnson Township.

Parker Township is bounded on the north by Westfield, on the east by Dolson and Martinsville, on the south by Casey Township, and on the west by Cumberland County. Parker is distinctively an oil producing township, and more paying wells are located here than in all the rest of the county combined. In the western part the music of the pumping machinery, running night and day, falls forever on the delighted farmers' ears. There are more than a thousand wells scattered over the surface of Parker Township, and the monetary value of the oil that has been and is being extracted from its soil is in the aggregate enormous.

Douglas Township is the home of the Irish race in Clark County. It is Catholic in religion and Democratic in politics. It also contains a fair sprinkle of people who came here in an early day from England, and representing whom are the large families of John and George Hornbrook, both still living. This family of children, grandchildren, nephews and nieces are an industrious, honest, thrifty and well-to-do people. Douglas Township was named in honor of the "Little Giant," Stephen A. Douglas, and it still maintains the political faith of its great namesake. It is bounded on the north by Edgar County, on the east by Wabash, on the south by Marshall, and on the west by Dolson Township.

Auburn Township is the last and smallest township in Clark County. It is bounded on the north by Dolson and Marshall, on the east by Marshall and Anderson, on the south by Anderson and Martinsville, and on the west by Martinsville Township. It became a township in 1859, and it is formed of slices of Marshall, Anderson and Martinsville Townships. The object of this new township is not known, but probably grew out of a desire of some influential people to hold township offices. Its only trading point is "Auburn, sweet Auburn, loveliest village of the plain," as Goldsmith once sweetly sang. It is the ancient enemy of Marshall for the county seat, is the home of the large and influential Hurst family, and has furnished a County Treasurer, County Judge and several Sheriffs to Clark County. Seymour Hurst, the son of Judge Nicholas Hurst, now of Marshall, has been Postmaster of Marshall, a candidate for State Senator, and is now one of the Democratic candidates for Representative in this district. He is a man of good education, fine business ability, exemplary habits and unquestioned popularity, and one of Marshall's best and most prominent citizens.

CHAPTER VIII.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS—THE NATIONAL ROAD—
THE VANDALIA, BIG FOUR AND OTHER RAILROADS—DRAINAGE, DITCHES, LEVEES, PEARL FISHING, ETC.

The National Road was one of the earliest public improvements of Clark County, and created great interest in the then thinly settled community. It was originally called the Cumberland Road, in honor of the old stage road from Washington, D. C., to Cumberland, Md. The National Road was a National work, to be paid for out of the proceeds of five per cent. reserved out of the sale of public lands in Indiana, Illinois and other States through which it ran in its course from Cumberland, Md., to St. Louis, Mo. Appropriations were made by Congress to prosecute the work of building the road, but the act of appropriation always provided that the money so appropriated should subsequently be replaced out of the sums afterwards to be realized by the States of Maryland, Virginia (now West Virginia), Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Missouri, through which the proposed road was to run, or enter. The work of construction was begun in Clark County as early as 1827, by cutting away the timber along the proposed line of the road. It was pushed rapidly to practical completion as far west as the east line of Fayette County, and in a halting and unsteady way as far west as Vandalia, when, the last appropriation of Congress becoming exhausted, the work upon this great highway as a public and at least quasi-national character ceased. Afterwards the counties along the line of the road as far as Vandalia improved and added to the road, and the counties beyond Vandalia to St. Louis took the matter up as county and State ventures. Finally a great highway of travel and of traffic was completed from Cumberland, Md., to East St. Louis. As to Marshall, it is the broad street running through the city in a westerly direction from east to west, north of the court house square, and it is known as East and West Main Street. It was a great public travel route before the coming of the railroads, and especially the Vandalia Railroad, through Marshall and Clark County, but the railroads came, in fact a little too soon to allow the completion of the National Road through the entire State of Illinois, but not soon enough to prevent its building as far west as Vandalia. A branch of this great highway of travel left the main line at Zanesville, Ohio, crossed the Ohio River at Maysville, Ky., passed through Lexington, Ky., to Nashville, Tenn., and thence on to New Orleans, La. The Vandalia Railroad, now the Terre Haute & Indianapolis Railroad, was the first built in Clark County, and was projected as early as 1835. In 1846 an attempt was made to obtain a charter for the road through Clark County could be obtained two other roads, one north of Clark County and the other south, were chartered and commenced. The first ran through Paris, Ill., from east to west, and was called the Terre Haute & Alton Railroad, and is now a branch of the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad, commonly called the Big Four, and the latter running from east to west through Lawrence County, then the Ohio & Mississippi Railroad, now the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. The company for the building of the Vandalia Railroad was not formed until 1850, and it was done by virtue of a general law passed by the Illinois Legislature for that purpose in 1849. A survey of the line of the road from Terre Haute, Ind., to St. Louis, Mo., was pushed rapidly to completion, but the contracts were not let or work thereon commenced until 1854. Difficulties with Eastern moneyed men arose, until finally, in February, 1859, a new charter was obtained, and a new company organized under the name of the Highland & St. Louis Railroad Company, with power to build and complete the road from Terre Haute to St. Louis. All this time Clark County was taking a lively interest in the building of the road, and as early as 1854 a proposition for the county to subscribe $75,000 for that purpose was submitted to the people, and the vote carried by 500 majority. On the 10th of February, 1865, another and more liberal charter was obtained to build this road, then called the St. Louis, Vandalia & Terre Haute Railroad. The line designated in this charter was to commence on the east bank of the Mississippi River at St. Louis and run in an easterly direction through Greenville, Bond County, Vandalia, Fayette County, and thence to the Wabash River. The counties along the line of this proposed road now got busy, and Clark County was not behind her sister counties in that regard. On the 14th of November, 1865, the Board of Incorporators held their first meeting at Vandalia, and John Scholfield and Charles Duncan, of Clark County, were elected as two of the nine Directors. But it was not until August 22, 1866, that the final contract to build the road was let to General E. F. Winslow, and was confirmed by the Board of Directors, November 14, 1866, following, an additional agreement being entered into November 28, 1866. In 1867 the first mortgage bonds, amounting to $1,900,000 were issued. In February, 1868, the property was leased, and $2,600,000 additional bonds issued, and preferred stock to the amount of $1,544,700 was also issued. By the charter the company was authorized to issue first mortgage bonds not to exceed $12,000 per mile. By July 1, 1868, the road was completed from St. Louis to Highland, but the first regular passenger train was not run to that point until August 20, 1868. The road was completed from St. Louis to Terre Haute in 1870, the first regular passenger train being run over the whole line on the 12th of June, 1870. The total cost of the construction and equipment of the road to July 1, 1870, was $7,171,355.89, which was increased by additional rolling stock, betterment, etc., until October, 1880, when the total cost of the road had arisen to $8,330,410.75. The actual length of this road, from Terre Haute, Ind., to East St. Louis, Ill., is about 165 miles, 158 miles of which are in the State of Illinois, it being about seven miles from the Illinois and Indiana State line, just east of Farrington, to Terre Haute. This road is now one of the great roads of the country, being part of the great Pennsylvania system of railroads.

The Wabash Valley Railroad, now a branch of the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad, or the Big Four Railroad, was the next railroad to be built in Clark County. It was projected as early as 1855, and on the 5th of May, 1855, the people of Clark County, by a vote, subscribed $50,000 to the road. A line from Chicago, Ill., to Vincennes, Ind., was soon surveyed, and the work of clearing the right of way and grading vigorously carried on for a time, when funds failed and further building became impossible. After the close of the Civil War, it was revived under the name of the Chicago, Danville & Vincennes Railroad, and as such was completed to Danville. A new company, called the Paris & Danville, was then formed, and under this name the road was built through Clark County in the winter of 1874-75. During the summer of 1875 it was completed to the Ohio & Mississippi, now the Baltimore & Ohio road, in Lawrence County. Regular trains were not run into Vincennes until some time in 1876.

Extensive track, bridge and culvert improvements of the Big Four Line between Danville and Cairo are now nearing completion, at a cost of about $6,000,000. The track has been straightened, grades lowered, depressions elevated, concrete culverts put in, iron and concrete bridges over Raccoon Creek, in Crawford County, Mill, Snyder and Big Creeks, in Clark County, constructed, the tracks run under those of the Terre Haute & Indianapolis road east of Marshall, an immense double-track arched bridge of concrete and iron laid over Big Creek, two miles northeast of Marshall, and other great and substantial improvements and changes made on the line of this great road that are too numerous to mention here. These improvements and changes in the roadbed include a deflection of the line around Marshall, from about a mile south of the city, to where it passes under the Terre Haute & Indianapolis road, and on to the new crossing over Big Creek, thus contemplating the abandonment of Michigan Avenue, and one of the best streets in Marshall, for railroad purposes. The new depot of the Big Four is to be erected about a quarter of a mile east of the public square, and on the north side of East Main, or National Road Street, as it is sometimes called. These improvements and changes, when entirely completed, as they will soon be, will make of the Big Four a main line of travel and traffic from Chicago to Cairo, and on to the South, second to no road in the State, and rivaled only by the Illinois Central and the Chicago & Eastern Illinois roads. These vast improvements have already resulted in an immense increase in passenger and freight traffic on this line, and the future looks encouragingly good for the road.

The above are the two principal railroads of Clark County, but the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton (C., H. & D.) Railroad runs through the west part of the county from Westfield to a few miles south of Casey, and on account of the great oil industry of Westfield, Parker, Casey and Johnson Townships, has become of vital importance to the western part of Clark County. The Terre Haute & Peoria Railroad also nicks Clark County in its northeast corner, but is of little practical importance except as the quickest and most convenient way to reach the State capital of Illinois from Marshall and Clark County.

Drainage ditches in Parker and York Townships, and the fine levee of William T. Hollenbeck, in Darwin Township, which cost its owner $5,000, and which protects not only his own farm of 600 acres, but 1,200 acres of other people's lands from Wabash overflows, as well as other internal improvements that have been of great value to the farmers residing in Parker, Darwin and York Townships, have been made. As a private undertaking the levees of Judge Hollenbeck have cost more money and been of more monetary and sanitary value to the people affected thereby than any other private enterprise for the internal improvement of the county. The building of immense supply tanks for the reception of crude oil by the Ohio Oil Company at Casey and Martinsville, as well as the laying of pipe lines, gas mains, the building of pumping stations, etc., by this and other companies, have also been of material advantage. In addition to these, a vast amount of tile for the improvement of the wet lands have been laid within the past few years, which have added to the prosperity and healthfulness of the county. Electric light plants, water works, condensaries and township high school buildings have also been constructed, enlarged and improved within recent years, until finally Clark County has come into its own, and has become one of the important and progressive counties of one of the greatest commonwealths in the country. All of these improvements have been obtained with little public debt of any kind. The county has no bonded indebtedness, while Marshall, its county seat, with its fine water works, electric light plant and sewerage system, owned by the city, only has a bonded indebtedness of about $9,000.

PEARL FISHING.—The pearl industry of the Wabash River is an important one. The pearl is a peculiar product of certain marine fresh water mollusks, or shell fish. In the Wabash River these pearls are found exclusively in what are commonly called the mussel, which many have seen, and all who have fished in the Wabash have doubtless used as bait. It was not until within the last three or four years, however, that anybody in Clark County even dreamed that within the shells of the common, ordinary mussels was hidden gems more precious than gold, and even exceeding diamonds in value. These pearls of commerce and fashion are doubtless the result of purely accidental causes, such as the intrusion of a grain of sand or other foreign substance, which, by irritating the tender body of the mussel, obliges it, in self-defense, to cover the cause of offense, which it has no power to remove; and as the secretion goes on regularly to supply the growth and wear of the shell, the included foreign substance constantly gets its share, and thereby continues to increase in size until it becomes a pearl. These pearls, or rather what are called the "slugs," that are also obtained from these mussels, are often in the exact shape of a common Wabash River turtle, and it is supposed that the young turtle, after its birth, gets into the mussel shell, or, more likely, the egg of the turtle may actually get into the mussel shell, and there hatch, thus causing the necessary irritation to start the "slug" formation, which goes on being added to and increasing in size until a "slug," often nearly an inch in length, and the fifth of an inch in thickness, and more than half an inch wide, and formed precisely like a very small turtle, is produced. The writer has seen one of these "slugs" that was probably worth as much as fifty dollars. This theory as to the formation of these "turtle backs," as they are called, is borne out by the fact that for ages the Chinese have been in the habit of introducing grains of sand, little knots of wire and diminutive idols into the shell of mussels or marine mollusks in order that the mollusk, to relieve itself from the irritation thus caused, may coat the foreign substance or design with pearl, and in this way they obtain pearls of different shapes and designs. Of course it is a slow process, and requires infinite care and patience, but the Chinese, in company with all Orientals, have both of these in abundance. M. Boulan, a French scientist, has even bored holes in mussels, and by putting in a small grain of sand or a very tiny pearl, and by sealing up the hole with cement, caused the production of an original or an enlarged pearl. It is said that only about two years are required to produce the large pearls, such as are found in the mussels of the Wabash River. It is said further that thus manufactured pearl cannot be distinguished from the ordinary and genuine pearl. The most famous pearls are those from the East, and the coast off Ceylon is the most famous in the whole world for the largest and finest of pearls. Panama, in Central America, St. Margarita, in the West Indies, the Coramandel coast, the shores of the Sulu Islands, the Bahrein Islands and the islands of Karak and Corgo, in the Persian Gulf, are also noted for their fine pearls. Here the pearls are obtained from what are called the pearl oyster, which, however, are of the same species, if not of the same size and appearance, as the Wabash River mussels. Some of these pearls are of immense value. The one that Cleopatra dissolved and drank to the health of Mark Anthony is said to have been valued at $400,000. Rather an expensive drink, but as the Egyptian Queen was madly drunk with the intoxicating nectar of love when she drank it, some such insane foolishness from the "Sorceress of the Nile" was not unexpected. Sir Thomas Gresham, in Queen Elizabeth's reign, had a pearl valued at $75,000, which the old dotard, in honor of his profane, obscene and dissolute old Queen, is said to have treated as Cleopatra did with hers. It is said, as before intimated, that more than a million dollars' worth of pearls have been taken from the mussels of the Wabash River between

Looking East on Main Street, Marshall, Illinois

Lafayette, Ind., and Mt. Carmel, Ill., within the past three or four years. Some have sold for as much as $1,800, and this was probably not one-fifth the real value. One boy in York, Ill., sold a "turtle back" slug for fifty cents, which the purchaser sold for fifty dollars, and another boy sold a pearl at St. Francisville for fifty cents that was afterwards said to have brought $1,200. None but experts know the real value of the Wabash pearls, but they have a high market value, and are already known all over the world, where wealth and fashion and luxury and extravagance prevail. One pearl buyer at Hutsonville, Ill., is said to have bought and completed a matched pearl necklace within the past three years which he is said to have expressed the opinion that he would be able to obtain as much $30,000 for in Paris, France, where he expects to take it. There is absolutely no limit to the price that can be obtained for one of these "matched" or "mated" necklaces, as they are called. Splendid appearing pearls are produced artificially by blowing up thin bulbs or beads or bubbles of thin glass, and then filling them with a mixture of liquid ammonia and the white matter from the scales of the bleak, and sometimes the dace, and perhaps other fishes. This foundation matter for these artificial pearls is produced by removing the scales from the lower part or belly of the fish; these must be carefully washed, after which they are put to soak in pure, clean, distilled water, when the pearly film of the fish scales fall off and forms a sediment at the bottom of the vessel, which is then removed and placed in liquid ammonia for future use, and when so made, by an expert, only an expert pearl expert can distinguish them from the genuine pearl. Since pearls have been found in the Wabash River people from far and near, old and young, educated and uneducated, women and men, boys and girls, have flocked to the east and west banks of the river, until the shores of the river from Lafayette, Ind., to Mt. Carmel, Ill., are simply dotted with tents and shanties and boats and cookers, and there are constantly seen in the spring, summer and fall months, hundreds, yes, even thousands, of people busily engaged in the great industry of pearl, slug and shell fishing, for all have their value. The past season has been especially rich in these pearl finds. At York, Hutsonville, Merom, Vincennes,

St. Francisville and Mt. Carmel, finds of pearls valued at three hundred, six hundred and one thousand dollars each have been too common to even mention. The pearls grow inside of the shell of the mussel and are liable to be found tucked away almost anywhere, but almost invariably buried, or partially buried, in the body or meaty part of the mussel itself. These mussels lie at the bottom of the river, and are obtained by means of small wire hooks, constructed like ordinary grappling hooks, and fastened by short strings to horizontal iron bars, common gas pipe or small water pipe being the best, and this bar, with the numerous hooks so fastened to it, is dragged behind the boat of the pearl fisher down the stream. In this way the mussel, which usually lies with its shell open, is caught by the hooks dragging into its open shell, which, as soon as the hook is felt in the open shell, closes up, something like a land terrapin, and holds on, so that when the horizontal bar is pulled to the top of the water the mussels are taken off the hooks and into the boat of the pearl fisher. On account of the condition from snags, logs, driftwood, etc., which lies at the bottom of the river, this method, however, is not much in vogue. They are now obtained principally by means of long, steel-fingered tongs, or grappling hooks, that work something like a pair of scissors. The long wooden handles of these steel-fingered tongs, as they may be called, when spread wide apart, opens wide the steel-fingered scissor-like grappling hooks resting, with steel jaws thus distended, on the bottom of the river. The pearl fisher, standing in his flat-bottomed boat, then carefully and steadily presses the wooden arms of these grappling hooks together, which causes the steel fingers resting on the bottom of the river to close, scraping the bottom of the river and digging in the mud and sand as they do so. When they come together both below and above the water, the pearl fisher carefully lifts the whole apparatus straight up out of the water, when the mussels will be found firmly held in the steel-like basket, or receptacle, and from where they are removed to the boat, and the same process gone over again and again, the fisherman hoisting his anchor and moving his boat as occasion requires, until he has enough mussels to fill his cooker, when he rows ashore and dumps his find into the cooker. The cooker is a cheap affair that anybody can make. It consists simply of wooden sides of oak lumber, about twelve inches wide, two inches thick and perhaps six or eight feet long. They are shaped at one end like a sled runner, placed about two feet apart and a sheet-iron bottom nailed on, something like an ordinary vat for making sorghum molasses. This box, so constructed, is then placed over a long trench dug in the earth, dirt heaped up along the sides and one end to keep the fire from licking the wooden sides, an opening, or furnace, left open at one end, and on the other stuck an ordinary stovepipe, water and the mussels put in, the fire started, an old piece of carpet, tucked snugly over the mussel in the shells, to hold in the steam, when soon the mussel shells begin to pop open. As soon as the water boils for a few moments, and the steam begins to make the carpet puff up and "hump" itself, Sir Mussel is ready for examination, and his pearls, if he has any, taken possession of. The cooked or steamed mussels are then scooped up on a long, box-like table, and the business of removing the steamed mollusks from the now open shells begins. As soon as this is done, and the shells thrown on the heap, the serious business of going carefully over each mussel, one by one, and carefully examining, with both fingers and eyes, for the pearls, or "slugs," or "turtle backs," or "spikes," and all of which possess value, that these now denuded and cooked mussels may contain. Any mussel you pick up may contain a prize beauty of great value, and this it is that makes the work so fascinating. This work, though not particularly laborious, yet is tedious to a degree, and it usually takes one person about four hours steady work to search the cooked mussels usually produced from the five or six hundred pounds of mussels in the shell put into the cooking vat. The work of hoisting the mussels from the bottom of the river, and the carrying of them, in the usually 100-pound boxes, up the steep river banks to the cooking vat is work indeed, and the very hardest kind of work at that, besides being excessively hot work in the hot spring, summer and fall weather. And this, in brief, is the history of the pearl industry of Clark County, as well as all other counties from the Wabash River. A complete pearl fishing outfit, such as is used on the Wabash, consisting of boat, grappling hooks, tongs, cooking vat, searching table, mussel box, etc., can be had for about $25, and will last for several seasons.

CHAPTER IX.

CHURCHES—SECRET AND BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES— SOLDIERS—PENSIONS.

The spirit of religious zeal which has clung persistently to certain communities of the Central West ever since their first invasion by the pale face has never been a predominating characteristic of Clark County. On the contrary, the whole-heartedness and energy of its people in pursuing their various avocations have seemed to create an intensely practical and business-like atmosphere, quite at variance with orthodox spiritual enlargement as conceived by those who gauge the spiritual man by his external religious observances. In spite of a manifest independence of opinion and preference, there is not wanting an inspiring religious history, and notwithstanding the discontinuance of many places of worship—especially in the silent and largely depopulated river towns—the resentment of evangelists, and the discouragement of many of the able clergy, the people grow better here as elsewhere, the county is dotted with well attended and well equipped churches, and many men of large faith and splendid eloquence labor intelligently and practically to elevate the ideals and achievements of a generous and worthy people.

The Congregational and Methodist Episcopal churches were the first to be regularly organized in Marshall. The former was started upon its career of usefulness the 3d of April, 1841, by Dean Andrews, John Black, Eliza Neal, A. M. Chapin, and Willard Center, assisted by Rev. A. M. Jewett, of Terre Haute, Ind. Dean Andrews was licensed as a minister on the 7th of April, 1842, and ordained as the pastor of this church in May, 1843. He continued in this capacity until October, 1852, and again took charge from September, 1864, until his death, in September, 1872. Rev. Jacob P. Chapman was pastor of the church between 1852 and 1864. After the death of the Rev. Dean Andrews, Rev. J. T. Graves was pastor until October, 1876, after which there was a vacancy until 1880, although service was conducted at irregular intervals by Rev. M. A. Jewett, S. S. Martin and others. In September, 1880, Rev. H. M. Burr became its pastor, and served in that capacity until 1882. Since 1883 the pulpit has been filled by Revs. Deighton, Sherrill, Lamb, Smith, Atkinson, Elliot, Murray and Denney. It was during the pastorate of Rev. Dana Sherrill that the present church was built, dedicated in March, 1892. It stands at the corner of North Hamilton and Mechanics Streets, and is a well constructed, convenient and commodious frame building. Some of the leading men and women of Marshall are members of this church, and Rev. Denney, the former pastor, was a zealous organizer and worker. He continually increased the church membership, and with his genial and intelligent wife was well liked and popular.

The Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in June, 1841, and Abel English and wife, Uri Manley and wife, Thornton F. Day and wife, James Martin and wife, Hannah Chapman, and Mrs. Hays were among the first members. Abel English was formerly a preacher of that denomination in New Jersey, and it was under his leadership that this church was organized. The first meetings were held in the Dean Andrews frame school house, and in 1845 steps were taken to build a church, Mr. Day undertaking the work of circulating the petition. After a good deal of effort he raised about $800 and the work of construction was begun on the site on South Hamilton Street now occupied by the "Clark County Herald" office. In 1849 this church was completed and dedicated by a preacher by the name of Hiram Brick. The building was used until 1873, when the present structure was erected on the corner of Franklin and Mechanic Streets, the old church having become so unsuitable as to necessitate the holding of meetings in the court house, Uri Manley's office and the Congregational Church. It was during the pastorate of Rev. A. M. Pilcher, one of the three ablest and best preachers the Marshall Methodist Church has ever had, and by far the best revivalist, that the church experienced a remarkable revival, resulting in 300 additions to the church, and making possible the present church building. Rev. Pilcher was a beautiful singer, a magnetic speaker, with a splendid voice, and popular with all classes and conditions of men. Among the pastors who have officiated since Rev. Pilcher may be mentioned Revs. Slagle, Obenschain, Burket, McVey, Robert McIntyre, David Howe, Mills, White, Hailey, and Moore, the present pastor. Rev. McIntyre has since obtained a national reputation as a preacher, poet, lecturer and writer, and Rev. Howe a State reputation as a pulpit orator and public speaker. The Rev. F. W. Moore, present pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church here, is a young man of fine ability and pleasing personality, and a pulpit orator of much more than average ability. He has been successful in pleasing his congregation and in gaining the love and respect of the people within and without the church.

The first Catholic to settle in Marshall was Patrick Conahy, the father of Peter and Mary Conahy, and who was a brother of the Bishop of Kilmore, Ireland. Father Bouteau was the first priest to visit Marshall, and after him came, occasionally, Father Lallemier, of Terre Haute. The first resident priest was Father Hugh Brady, who came in 1848, and it was he who began the construction of the first Catholic church in Marshall and Clark County. He died suddenly while on his way to Chicago to see the Bishop, and afterward the little congregation was ministered to by Fathers Ingolsby, Hamilton and Ryan, the latter of whom completed the first Catholic church. The Catholic grave yard was donated in the time of Father Ryan, after whom came Fathers Byrne and Vahey. In 1851 Bishop Van de Velde, of Chicago, the first Catholic Bishop to visit Marshall, came here and administered the sacrament of confirmation. In 1860 Father Horen came to Marshall, and it was he who purchased the square of ground on South Hamilton Street where the present fine Catholic Church buildings now stand. In 1867 Father Mark became the pastor of the congregation and completed the present church, and which was dedicated on the 20th of October, 1872, by Fathers Mark, Stick and Francis. Father Mark also put up the school building on the west part of the block in 1872, and at a time when the church was heavily in debt. The Franciscan Fathers, of Teutopolis, looked after the congregation until May, 1874, when Father Wagener was appointed pastor, and remained in that capacity until June, 1876. Father Kuhlman was appointed pastor in December, 1876, and remained for some years. The membership of the church consists principally of Irish families, or people of Irish descent, and for some reason Father Kuhlman, who was a German priest, did not get along well with his parishioners. He was removed and his place taken by Father Marooney, a genial, lovable and popular priest, who poured oil on the troubled waters, but lacked the push and business ability necessary for the practical progress of the church. The church, parsonage and grounds were in need of extensive repairs, and to accomplish this imperative work Father P. R. Ducey, an energetic, intelligent, pushing and business-like priest, was sent here to succeed Father Marooney. How well he has accomplished the work the improved grounds, parsonage, church buildings proper and additions thereto amply attest. Father Ducey is a good public speaker and a man of fine mind and superior education. He is more than ordinarily popular, not only with his parishioners, but with the people of Marshall and of Clark County generally.

On the 25th of April, 1846, a committee, consisting of Revs. H. I. Venerable and R. M. Lilly, and Elders James Welsh and T. M. Brooks, met at Martinsville and organized the Marshall Presbyterian Church. It was not, however, until 1858 that the church building was erected on South Hamilton Street. Among its regular pastors for some years after its construction were the Revs. Howell, McKinney, Spencer and Davis. For some years the church was without a regular pastor, preaching was at rare intervals, the building began to fall into decay, and was likely to be pulled down, and its very site abandoned as a place of worship. In this emergency the United Brethren Church, by arrangement with the leading men and women among the few Presbyterians left in Marshall, agreed to repair, remodel and improve the church building, and obtained possession of it by deed. Since that time the United Brethren people have fully kept their contract, and the result has been that they now own, in the old Presbyterian Church property, one of the neatest, most beautifully located and most satisfying little churches in the city. Its pulpit is now filled by Rev. D. R. Seneff, an earnest, logical and instructive pulpit speaker, who is universally liked for his earnest devotion to his work and fine qualities of head and heart.

The first services of the German Evangelical congregation were begun in Marshall in 1855, and held at the residences of G. Markel and others. The church was built on Mechanic Street, where it still stands, in 1849, and a few years later a parsonage was added by Rev. John Schreffly, who has been succeeded, among others, by Revs. Augustein, Lindner, Nicoloi, Platz and Kauffman.

The Baptists and Church of Christ also have good church buildings and good congregations. The latter congregation has recently spent a large amount of money in adding to and improving its church building on West Market Street, and it is now one of the finest religious structures in Clark County.

The Protestant Methodists of York built a frame church as early as 1845, which cost about $1,000. The building stood on the hill overlooking York and the Wabash River, but its glory has departed, the building is sadly dilapidated and services have been held there only at intervals for a number of years past. It has had no regular congregation for some time. In days long past its destiny was presided over by many, among them Revs. Doyle, Witherspoon, Richard, Wright, Crawford, Green, Hamilton and Burket. This church was destroyed by a cyclone, June 7, 1907.

The Rock Hill Methodist Episcopal Church, of York Township, was built in 1868, under the supervision of Rev. May, on ground donated by Jonathan Hogue. It flourished for a time, but fell into decay after Mr. Hogue's death, and has since been pulled down and taken away.

The York Presbyterian Church was founded as early as 1825, and was the first religious organization in the county. The society subsequently built a church which was burned in 1862. In 1865 the present Presbyterian Church building, in the center of the village of York, was built at a cost of about $1,200. The society of Presbyterians, despite their new and more commodious church building, died out, but was revived and reorganized in 1869 by Rev. Thomas Spencer, a devout and scholarly man, who kept up regular services there until about 1882, when he removed to Palestine, and died there at an advanced age. Services are now held in that church by the Methodists and any other denomination which may desire to use it. Church services and Sabbath school are usually held there at regular intervals, but the glory of the churches in York, as in Darwin, Melrose, Livingston and other small towns in Clark County, has long since departed. They have been revived, but the outlook is not encouraging. In the newer towns of the county, like West York and West Union, regular services are held, and an interest taken in church work. In 1835 the Old School Baptist Church was organized at York, but it has long since passed away.

The first church in Darwin was organized by Rev. Enoch Bouten, a Presbyterian, who held services in the court house. There are now no regular church services of any denomination at Darwin. James McCabe organized a Methodist church there in an early day, and services were held for a time in the court house. In 1843 a good church building of brick and costing about $1,100 was erected.

Two winters ago Richard Layton, one of the country preachers of the denomination of the Church of Christ, who lives in the south part of the county, took more than one hundred new members into the church.

The first religious services in Casey were conducted by the Baptists at Cumberland, east of where the city of Casey proper now stands. This was as early as 1838, but no church building was erected until about 1855, when one costing about $1,200 was constructed, and dedicated in 1856 by Jared Riley. Elder John M. Doughty preached for this congregation from its first regular organization in 1838 until about 1868, a period of thirty years. The Baptist Church was at one time the strongest in the western part of the county, but it has fallen behind in members of late years, and is outdistanced by several other denominations. The Casey Methodist Church was organized in 1853 by Rev. Slater, but no building was erected until 1855, and that cost about $1,800. An elegant new Methodist church has been erected in quite recent years upon the old site on Cumberland Street, in the eastern part of the city, it is a brick, and is still the best, most commodious and well arranged Methodist Church in Clark County. Its present pastor is Rev. Mills, who is well supported and well liked, both as a preacher and as a man. Past ministers of the church have included Revs. Hungerford, Harris, Barthlow, Orr, Gay, Palmer, Mitchell, Hornold, Shields, Carrington, Shelby, Aldrich, Cabric, Hedges, Shoemaker, Dillen, Pattle, Ganaway, Graham, Potter and Mills.

The Roman Catholics also have a church in Casey, which was established by Father Kuhlman in 1879.

The Old School Baptists were the first to organize a congregation at Westfield. This was about 1831, and Coleman B. Dawson was about the first preacher of any denomination to locate there. In 1832 the regular Predestination Baptist Church was organized at Westfield, Daniel Parker, of Crawford County, being the active and moving spirit therein. Its first regular pastor was Richard M. Newport, who lived in Crawford County and who did not move to Westfield until 1855. After about twelve years he went to Coles County, and from there to Missouri, where he died. He was a man of remarkable physical strength and endurance and an orator and debator of no mean ability. As a Fourth of July orator he was in great demand. He dabbled constantly in politics, and was once beaten by Timothy R. Young for the Legislature. The moral character of Newport was not unassailable, but he was immensely popular as a preacher, beloved by his parishioners, and his ability and eloquence commanded larger crowds than any preacher in the County in his day. Goop Hope Baptist Church was organized in 1832 by Newport, but no church was built until 1862, when a frame one was erected at a cost of $1,600. The pastors have included Revs. Walker, Doty, Milton, Hawkins, Humphrey, Riley, Thompson, James B. Walker, Jones and Reynolds. The Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in Westfield in 1850 by Rev. Burks. A frame church costing $600 was first erected, and this was replaced in 1865 by a brick church with a seating capacity of about three hundred. The United Brethren Church of Westfield, and the dominant church there, was organized in 1852. The pastors have included Revs. Smith, Shuey, Griffith, Helton, Bussard, J. G. Shuey, Ewell, Chittenden, Snyder, Mills, Prengle and Jones.

A frame building costing about $1,000 was erected in Westfield by the United Brethren congregation in 1852, but sold in 1862, after the establishment there of the United Brethren College. Since that time the college chapel has been used as the house of worship. Professor W. R. Shuey for many years was in charge of the large and flourishing Sabbath school of this denomination, and no purer, better, more gentle and lovable man ever lived. For a number of years he was professor of penmanship and bookkeeping, and afterward of mathematics, and is still connected with the school in an honorable capacity, after more than forty years of continuous service. None ever knew Professor Shuey but to respect, admire and love him, and his noble example lives in his present students and in the children and grandchildren of others who at some time in their lives have been under the careful training of this splendid Christian gentleman. Westfield College was first a mere seminary, with no thought or ambition to develop into a college, but the college came in its own good time, and has accomplished a large amount of educational and moral good in the world. The Zetegathean and Colomentian literary and debating societies have turned out some of the best preachers, lawyers, public speakers and writers in the country, while the Philaethean Literary Society for women has produced some fine literary scholars and writers. The people of Westfield and Martinsville are better patrons of churches than are those of any other towns in the county. There has not been an open, legalized saloon in Westfield or Martinsville in a quarter of a century.

The first Methodist church society of Martinsville was organized in 1838 by Rev. Mr. Chenoweth. The first church building was of hewed logs and stood on the National Road in the eastern part of the town. The first pastor was Lewis Amdson, who was succeeded by Rev. Oliver, and he, in turn, by Jesse Hail, from North Carolina, the latter a man of fine education. Rev. Joseph McMurtry, William C. Blundell and Thomas Lopez followed Hail, and the last named was an able preacher, under whom the church increased greatly. In the latter part of 1854 the old hewed log church gave way to a substantial frame structure, costing about $1,200. Revs. McElfiesh and Ames, a son of Bishop Ames, have also occupied this pastorate. Rev. Tharp is now the pastor, and a more than average one he is. The Methodist people have two or three churches in the country districts of Martinsville Township. The United Brethren people have a brick church in the western part of the township that cost about $2,000 and is one of the best country churches in the county. The Adventists have a church south of Mar-tinsville. The Baptist Church of Martinsville was organized in 1879 and has had among its pastors Revs. Parker and Thornton. The church is not as strong as it once was. The Church of Christ has a neat little church of brick, and the same denomination, under Elder C. W. Hill, organized the Mount Pleasant Church in 1879. One of its leading members is Rev. James Hill.

In 1867 the first church edifice in Anderson township was erected on ground donated by William Craig near the Marshall and Melrose Road, and probably under the incentive of Elder Houston, by the "Christian" denomination. Sebastian Fox, afterwards thrown from his horse, dragged by his foot catching in the stirrup and horribly mangled before death came to end his sufferings, was the first to hold religious services in the township. The United Brethren and German Evangelical denominations also have churches there.

Orange Township has been for fifty years the field of religious labor of the Bailiffs—Robert, Thomas and Thomas C., grandfather, father and son. No better or more conscientious man ever lived in Clark County than dear old Uncle Robert Bailiff. His son Thomas was also a long and earnest laborer in the field of the Lord, and Rev. Thomas C. Bailiff, son of Thomas and grandson of Robert, of West York, Illinois, is faithfully following in the footsteps of his sires and still preaching without money and without price to the people of Melrose, Orange and Johnson Townships. A better, more conscientious and universally liked man does not live in Clark County today. The Bailiffs have always been Cumberland Presbyterians. A church was built many years ago, first of logs and then a frame structure near the lifelong residence of Robert Bailiff, in the southeastern part of Melrose Township, and called the Bailiff Church. In these churches Robert Bailiff, his son Thomas, and his grandson Thomas C. Bailiff have respectively preached and prayed and sang for more than half a century. Near by is the Bailiff Cemetery, where peacefully rest the father and son and where, in the course of time, will sleep the grandson—thus completing the three generations of preachers. Robert Bailiff came to Clark County in 1831 and after a life spent in doing good sank peacefully to rest in the year 1879.

The Wesley Chapel Methodist Episcopal Church in Orange Township was organized in 1846, and the first frame building to be called Wesley Chapel was built in 1853. In 1879 this was found too small, and was superseded by a fine church of brick, costing about $3,000.

Plymouth Methodist Church, in which the Rev. Nixon Evans preached for many years, was built in 1859 at a cost of $1,000. Rev. Evans was one of the logical and forcible country preachers of Clark County. Potter Hall United Brethren Church was erected in the northern part of Melrose Township in 1863, and at a cost of about $1,000.

The Old School Baptists and Methodists were the first organized churches in Johnson Township, and services were conducted by these organizations as early as 1838, by Richard Newport, Baptist, and William C. Blundell, Methodist. The Mount Olivet Christian Church denomination was organized as early as 1857 and is the oldest church organization in the township. The Mount Olivet Church is in the eastern part of the township. The Mount Moriah Christian Church was erected in the fall of 1872. The Missionary Baptists, Reformed Christians, the Christian Church, Southern Methodist Church, the Universalists, the Winebrennarian, and practically all denominations have places of worship in Johnson Township, so that no one need go astray for the want of the opportunity to pick his chosen church route to the better land.

Preaching in an early day in Clark County was of an entirely different character than it now is. It was then far more vigorous, radical, inflammatory and terrifying than at present. The doctrine of a personal devil, seeking recruits for his dark and fiery domain, of a literal hell and endless and indescribable torture, were then proclaimed from all the pulpits of the county, and during the spring, summer and fall months outdoor preaching and camp meetings were numerous and popular, and the forests rang with the vivid and awful pictures of the damned writhing in endless and hopeless torment.

SECRET AND BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES.

The Marshall Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons, No. 133, was chartered October 8, 1856, by James H. Hibbard, Grand Master of the State of Illinois, and with James Robinson, Nathan Willard, Jacob Zimmerman, J. P. Woodside, Thomas Brown, William S. Price and J. S. Gambrel as charter members. All are now dead except Jacob Zimmerman, who lives at Mt. Carmel, Illinois. The Marshall Chapter of Royal Arch Masons was chartered October 7, 1864, and with James McCabe, Samuel Parks, Samuel Midkiff, W. T. Martin, Sr., James C. Bryan, Nelson Hoddy, Edward L. Hote, N. S. Holmes, W. H. Coons, Robert Twilley, George Stephens, J. Cooper, H. C. Fortune, W. C. Blundell, Ellis Howell, A. H. Michael, T. W. Cole and John Scholfield as charter members. Of these only William T. Martin, Sr., of Marshall, and Nelson Hoddy, of Omaha, Nebraska, are now living.

Eureka Lodge, No. 64, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, was organized July 15, 1850, with Robert L. Dulaney, Newton Harlan, Nathan Willard, Albert D. Safford, Howard Harlan, Samuel Safford and Benjamin Stover as charter members, all of whom have since passed away. Marshall Lodge, No. 133, the Marshall Chapter of Royal Arch Masons, and Eureka Lodge, No. 64, of Odd Fellows, are all still in prosperous condition. William B. Archer Post, G. A. R., was organized February 21, 1881, with L. S. Kilbourne, M. O. Frost, Milton Harris, George Slusser and others as charter members. The Post still flourishes. The Knights of Honor was the first mutual benefit insurance order ever established in Marshall and this was on the 16th of June, 1881. The Knights of Pythias, Improved Order of Red Men and the Order of Eagles all have flourishing lodges, and the Red Men have perhaps the largest secret benevolent order in the city. It was organized November 13, 1883, with ninety-six charter members, the largest organization of charter members ever taken into any order, secret or otherwise, in Marshall. H. Black, P. L. Bland, John Catron, W. L. Chenoweth, D. J. Davidson, D. D. Doll, William Duke, James Doherty, M. Grabenheimer, W. R. Green, Sol Handy, Millard Hedrick, S. S. Whitehead, E. D. Jones, P. R. Lee, Thomas Logan, O. P. Liston, James Myers, Dr. O. Mitchell, F. R. Neal and T. L. Orndorff were among the number. York Lodge of Masons, No. 313, was chartered October 5, 1859, and Charles Johnson, Abijah Edmunds, J. L. Cox, W. H. C. Coleman, Samuel Dougty, Charles Graham, L. D. McClure, Enoch Meeker, J. A. Parker, Richard Falley and John Ketchum were the charter members. All of them except

J. L. Cox, of Hutsonville, Illinois, have since passed away, J. A. Parker being the last to die. The York Lodge building in York was burned on the night of the 21st of November, 1904, and the Lodge was dispensed to move to West Union August 26, 1905, where meetings have since been held. It has about fifty members.

Casey Masonic Lodge, No. 442, was chartered October 4, 1865, with the following charter members: J. M. McClary, G. S. Henderson, Henry Sherman, John Wolford, A. Jacobs, A. W. McCurry, J. W. Wallace, John Classon, A. S. Ross, William Carlisle, M. Jacobus and A. Minor. J. M. Clary was the first Master of the Lodge and H. P. H. Brownwell the first Grand Master.

New Hope Lodge, No. 620, of Masons, of Livingston, was chartered October 5, 1869, with Jacob A. Patten, T. W. Clark, Addison Robinson, William R. Little, W. H. H. McCloud, J. M. Fishback, Joseph S. Fishback, B. C. Chrisman, J. L. Guisert, J. W. Walker, V. E. Page, W. W. Blankenship, W. M. Robinson, J. P. Fishback, Jacob Fishback, T. L. Orndorff, James A. Hadden, Isaac N. Flesher, W. F. Rhoades and Moses E. Bland. Of these twenty-one charter members only nine are living and only two are still members of the lodge.

Clark Lodge, No. 603, of Masons, of Martinsville, was organized October 6, 1868, with A. G. Feters, Thomas Milligan, Samuel Medkiff, George Stevens, Charles Duncan, John Gambel, Alex Ryan, G. W. Ewalt, J. Fulton and John F. Alexander as charter members. Martinsville Lodge, No. 134, of Odd Fellows, was organized February 28, 1853, the charter members being Benjamin McKeen, B. F. McClure, Jonathan Rains, George Canger, T. B. McClure, William Lindsay, Daniel Gard, Morrison Spenny and Jacob Anderson.

SOLDIERS IN WARS.—Clark County has ever done her whole duty and furnished her full share of soldiers to fight the battles of her county and state. In the Black Hawk War, in response to the proclamation of Governor Reynolds, issued in 1832, it raised two companies of volunteers to fight the Indians then committing acts of vandalism and murder in Illinois and Indiana. These two companies were composed of about eighty men each. Of the first, William B. Archer was captain, Daniel Poorman First and Royal A. Knott Second Lieutenants. Captain Archer was soon assigned to the staff of the general in command, with the rank of colonel, whereupon Knott was elected captain of the company. The captain of the second company was John F. Richardson, while Woodford Dulaney was first and Justin Harlan Second Lieutenant. In the Mexican War of 1846 one company of about seventy-five men was raised, of which William B. Archer was Captain, Nicholas Hurst First and Charles Whitlock Second Lieutenant. The company went as far as Alton, but was discharged on the 27th day of June, 1846, the State's quota being already filled. Several members of the company subsequently re-enlisted in the same war. Among those who saw actual service in Mexico were James C. Robinson, David Dolson, Austin Handy, Daniel and Luther Groves and James Bennett. In the War of the Rebellion Clark County soldiers took an active part. Among the first to enlist in the cause of the Union were Edwin Harlan, N. S. McKeen, A. G. Austin, T. J. Golden, Jacob W. Wilkin, the Martin boys and Ogden Greenough. Harlan was captain of Company H, Twenty-first Illinois Infantry, Grant's old regiment. Company G of the Tenth Infantry, Company F of the Thirtieth, Company G of the Forty-fourth, Company C of the Sixty-second, Company G of the Seventieth, Company I of the Seventy-ninth, Colonel Allen Buckner's regiment, Company K of the One Hundred and Thirtieth, Company G of the One Hundred and Fifty-second, Company G of the Sixty-third, and Company B of the Second Artillery, were all largely composed of the sons of Clark County, and all did valiant service in defense of their country. The names of the Union soldiers who reflected glory upon Clark County are too numerous to mention here. Captain H. Black, Captain Edwin Harlan, W. A. Harlan, N. S. McKeen, Ogden Greenough were among those who performed conspicuous service. In Captain Archer's company in the Black Hawk War we notice the familiar names of Stephen Archer, James Lockard, Thomas Bennett, Theophilus Cooper, Martin L. Chenoweth, Samuel Dolson, Samuel Poorman and Samuel Prevost. In the company of John F. Richardson we note the familiar names of Woodford Dulaney, Justin Harlan, Jacob Dolson, Nathan Hollenbeck, Samuel M. Biggs, Franklin Cooper, Joseph Hogue, Nineveh Shaw, Robert Taylor and the White boys, Gideon, Samuel, Luther and Robert. In Company K

of the First Illinois Regiment that did active service in the Mexican War, we find such well known names as David Dolson, Isaac English, Lyman Guinnip, Austin Handy and W. H. Robinson; while in Company D of the Third Illinois Regiment, which also saw service in the Mexican War, we find the familiar names of Captain W. W. Bishop, Sergeant Burns Harlan and Corporal James C. Robinson. In Company H of the Fourth Illinois Regiment of the Mexican War, commanded by Colonel Edward D. Baker, one of the most splendid orators in Illinois and who afterwards fell while a United States Senator at the battle of Ball's Bluff, we find the name of Robert H. Eaton, commonly known as "Ham" Eaton, who afterwards was acquitted of the murder of Dr. Duncan.

In the Spanish-American War the Clark County soldiers who fought in Cuba, Costa Rica and the Philippine Islands included Charles Leslie, Fred W. Baker, Adam Gard and the Harlan boys.

PENSIONS.—The institution of pensions has materially added to the prosperity of Clark County. At this time there are upon the rolls about eight hundred pensioners, who receive an average of thirty-six dollars each quarter, or $28,000 every three months, making a total per year to Clark County of $115,260. About two hundred of these pensioners get their mail at Marshall, so that more than $28,000 per year is paid out in pensions to soldiers, widows and orphans in and around Marshall. This annual distribution of $115,000 must have considerable effect upon the business, as it certainly has upon the comfort and well-being of the pensioners and their dependents.

CHAPTER X.

EDUCATIONAL INTERESTS—OIL AND GAS.

The educational interests of Clark as well as all other counties of Illinois had their inception in the Act of Congress of April 18, 1818. This act enabled the people to form a State Constitution, and it also provided that they set aside Section 16 in each township, the proceeds of which when sold should go to the establishment and support of schools of the State. This act also provided that five per cent. of all lands sold by Congress, after deducting the expenses of sale, should be applied to the common school fund, to be apportioned among its several counties as they might subsequently be established. In other words, Congress donated one-thirty-sixth of all the lands in Illinois for school purposes, which donation amounted to about one million acres, Clark County having about nine thousand acres. Laws were enacted directing the County Commissioners to appoint three Trustees for the school lands in each township, and Samuel Prevo, William Lockard and William B. Archer were the first School Land Trustees to be so appointed on December 2, 1819, for Union, now York Township. Charles Neeley, Zacheus Hassel and John McClure were appointed for Dubois, now Darwin Township; Thomas Black, Richard Armstrong and Samuel Peery, for Washington, now Wabash Township; and Jonathan Mayo, Lewis Murphy and John Stratton for a township then in Clark County, located about seven miles north of the present city of Paris, in what is now Edgar County. The Commissioners also appointed trustees for the school section lying about two miles east of the present city of Danville, which was then a part of Clark County. The Trustees had power to lease these school lands to the highest public bidders, but population was sparse, other lands were plentiful and cheap, and but little money was obtained from their rental. This condition of affairs ran along until 1825, when Joseph Duncan introduced a bill in the Illinois Legislature, and which became a law, providing for the support of the common schools by a public tax. This law gave the educational interests of Clark County a powerful and lasting impetus, and paved the way for the higher standards of instruction now prevailing in the common, graded and township high school of Clark County and Illinois generally. In the early days of Clark County salaries for teachers were small, and school taxes could be paid in either money or produce at the market price. Pelts were received in full payment for school taxes, and one teacher, named Malcolm, is said to have been paid wholly in coon skins, which he had to carry on his back from Vincennes, over thirty miles to sell. The Duncan school law of 1825 remained in force about two years. This law gave the voters of the respective school districts the power to levy a sufficient tax to pay the whole or one-half the cost of maintaining a school in their district. If they voted that only one-half of this cost be levied and collected as a public tax, the other half fell upon the parents, masters and guardians of the children who attended school. No one could be taxed for the support of any free school except by his own consent, expressed in writing, and no one, unless willing to be so taxed, could send his children to any free school. There was not that desire among parents to have their children educated that exists at present. In fact, many of the early settlers of Clark County believed that education was a detriment rather than an advantage, and refused to be taxed, or to send their children to school. In 1825 there were only three or four schools in Clark County. In 1829 a law was passed enabling the School Trustees to sell the school lands and loan the proceeds on good personal or real estate security for the payment of teachers. But as the Trustees could sell the lands only upon the petition of nine-tenths of the freeholders of the township, the law was repealed in 1831, and it was provided that the lands could be sold upon the petition of three-fourths of the white male inhabitants of any township. This law also gave any five citizens of any school district the power to borrow not exceeding $200 for a period not exceeding ten years for the purpose of building a school house. No standard of education or efficiency was enacted by law at that time. If teachers could satisfy the patrons of the school that they were competent to teach there was no statute to dispute their claim. Reading, writing and arithmetic were crudely taught by teachers who had little more education than their pupils, and grammar and geography were omitted as being more ornamental than useful. The early school-houses were of the rudest and most inconvenient character. They were invariably built of logs, with puncheon floors, stick chimneys and the coarsest and cheapest furniture, usually hewed out of logs of wood. As a rule, school-houses were covered with cheap boards weighted down with poles held in place by wooden pins driven into the poles running lengthwise with the house, that served as the rafters. The proverb of Solomon, "Spare the rod and spoil the child," was religiously believed in by both teacher and parent, and hence the duties of the early teacher were along physical as well as intellectual lines. Despite the fact that the teacher was not very well educated in those days, he was a man of great importance in the community, and as he "boarded around" with the parents of the children, he exerted a large social, political and business influence. His religion, if he had any, was usually of the Hard-Shell Baptist variety, and his politics was strictly Democratic. As before intimated, the Marshall Academy was incorporated in 1839, by the passage of a law by the Illinois Legislature. The first Trustees Keen, Woodford Dulaney, Stephen Archer, James Whitlock, William C. Griffith, Channing Madison, Justin Harlan, Nineveh Shaw, William McKeen, Oodford Dulaney, Stephen Archer, James Plasters, John Bartlett, Jonathan K. Greenough, James P. Tutt, Nathan Tefft, Thomas T. Wethers, and Joshua P. Cooper, all of whom have long since passed away. The academy met with indifferent success, though Dean Andrews, one of the best educated and most lovable men Clark County ever contained, was placed in charge. In 1839 a law incorporating the Marshall Female Academy was passed, but the institution never materialized. In 1845 a law was passed making the Secretary of State ex-officio Superintendent of Schools, and authorizing a tax for school purposes, subject to the decision of the voters, to be levied for school purposes. In 1847 the Secretary of State reported that the schools of Illinois, with a few exceptions, were in a deplorable condition. Shortly after the adoption of the Illinois State Constitution of 1848, the school law of Illinois was revised and changed in all its details, and a County School Commissioner, who was ex-officio Superintendent of Schools, was provided for. This law provided that any and all school lands could be sold by the School Commissioners whenever two-thirds of the white male inhabitants of the county over twenty-one years of age should petition for such sale. Each congressional township was established for school purposes, three School Trustees in each township were provided for, and said Trustees had absolute power in school matters. These Trustees divided the townships into school districts, in each of which School Directors were elected whose duty it was and is to employ teachers, build and repair school-houses, provide for books and furniture for such school-houses, as well as to perform other necessary duties. This law also for the first time fixed the qualification of teachers by providing that they should be conversant with reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, grammar, geography and history of the United States and should exhibit a certificate from the School Commissioner before they could be legally employed. This revision of the school law of Illinois is the foundation upon which rests the present school system. The Illinois constitution of 1818 was silent upon the subject of education; the constitution of 1848 said that the General Assembly might provide a system of free schools, but it was not until 1870 that our organic law as a State made education mandatory by declaring that "the General Assembly shall provide a thorough and efficient system of the free schools, whereby all children of this State may receive a good common school education." The county now has graded schools in Marshall, Casey, Martinsville and Westfield. The Township High School at Marshall is one of the best township high school buildings in the State. Records fail to show the names of the School Commissioners of Clark County under the act of 1848. The County Superintendents of Schools, under a later act of our Legislature, have been as follows: Silas Whitehead, Darius Legore, James Dawson, William T. Adams, Perry A. McKain, H. C. Bell, Edward Pearce, Albert Porter, Edward Shaw, Robert E. Hamill, Benjamin Sweet, Charles C. Perdue, John D. Shoemaker and Harry B. Drake, who has just been elected over Norman Bennett, the Democratic candidate, for four years from December, 1906. Perry A. McKain died in office about six months after he was elected, and H. C. Bell was appointed his successor by the Board of Supervisors of Clark County and served for about six months, when he was succeeded by Edward Pearce, who held the office for three years, from December, 1875. Robert E. Hamill was also appointed by the Board of Supervisors to fill a short vacancy, occasioned by the change of the time of election. Of the Superintendents of Schools, James Dawson, Albert Porter, Benjamin Sweet and John D. Shoemaker are worthy of special mention. John D. Shoemaker has evidenced great devotion to his duties and has made one of the best Superintendents of Schools that Clark County has ever had. Silas S. Whitehead was the first County School Commissioner, and either he or Darius Legore was the first Superintendent of Schools after that office was established. The first certificate to teach school in Clark County was issued by James Dawson, then Superintendent of Schools, now an honored and most estimable citizen of Westfield Township.

Probably the first school in Clark County was located west of York, on lower Union Prairie, and was opened about the year 1820, with Peleg Spencer as teacher. The next school appears to have been taught by one Robert Taylor, on Walnut Prairie. A man of the name of Johnson taught a school in Washington, now Wabash, Township about 1825. From a mere pittance paid to teachers in the earlier history of the county, the remuneration has increased to an average salary of from forty-five or fifty dollars per month for about twenty-two days' labor and about six hours each day of actual schoolroom service.

The total amount paid in Clark County for all school purposes for the year ending June 30, 1882, as shown by the O. L. Baskin History of 1883, was $54,143.43. There were at that time one hundred and two school districts, one hundred and four school buildings, and one hundred and seventy-seven teachers, who gave instruction to six thousand and thirty-eight pupils for some portions of that year. Six of the one hundred and four schools were graded and two only, at Marshall and Martinsville, were what was then called high schools.

Following are some statistics furnished by John D. Shoemaker, the efficient retiring County Superintendent of Schools, made up by him from the annual reports by the County Superintendent of Schools of Clark County to the State Superintendent of Schools, with comments thereon by Mr. Shoemaker, and showing total days attendance, average number of days attended by each child, total number of pupils enrolled and average number of months of school each year.

Year closing June 30.	Ave. No. mos. per yr.	Total no. pupils enrolled.	Ave. no. days attended by each child per yr.	Grand total no. days' attendance.
1890	6.5	6,105	81	493,518
1891	6.9	6,016	86	517,311
1892	7	6,003	86	520,222
1893	7	6,002	89	537,864
1894	7	6,100	93	568,901
1895	7	6,046	92	560,526
1896	7.3	6,148	93	574,671
1897	7.1	6,588	84	554,781
1898	7.3	6,680	97	647,640
1899	7.1	6,366	97	620,796
1900	7.4	6,359	95	604,143
1901	7.2	6,348	94.7	601,125
1902	7.4	6,089	100	613,275
1903	7	5,916	104.8	620,095
1904	7.1	5,952	95	569,569
Av. for 15 years..	7.1	6,181	92.8	573,636
1905	7.2	5,677	106	601,679
Difference1	504	13.2	28,043

In comparing the report for 1905 with the average for the previous fifteen years, it will be seen that while the school year for 1905 was but one-tenth month longer than the average school year, the enrollment had decreased 504 pupils, yet the attendance for each child enrolled for the year was 13.2 days more than the average, and the grand total days' attendance increased 28,043 days over the average grand total attendance.

In commenting on the above table of school statistics Mr. Shoemaker has this to say of the closing school year of 1906: "The year closing makes even a better showing in regularity and punctuality of attendance than the year closing June 30, 1905. With a small increase in the number of pupils enrolled and in the length of school term the year 1906 shows an increase of 41,434 days above the attendance in 1905, and an increase of 69,477 days above the average attendance for the fifteen years previous to 1905." This certainly is excellent, as showing the increasing regularity of school attendance, and strongly indicates the character of the school spirit throughout the county.

Other information kindly furnished by Mr. Shoemaker shows that there are now enrolled pupils to the number of five thousand seven hundred and twenty-one; the total number of school houses is one hundred and six, twenty-seven brick and seventy-nine frame; there are one hundred and seventy-nine teachers, sixty-six male and one hundred and thirteen female; one hundred and forty separate schoolrooms; four high schools, three of which are on the accredited list of the State University, and the one at Marshall is a township high school. Mr. Shoemaker states that during the school year of 1905, $22,150.21 was paid out in salaries to male and $22,523.52 to female teachers, making a total of $44,673.73, an average per month to male teachers of $51.06 and to female teachers of $36.31. The grand total expended for educational purposes in Clark County for the school year of 1905 was $69,980.23, an increase of $15,836.80 over the amount spent for the school year of 1882, as given in Baskin's History. There are now 7,451 persons of school age in Clark County.

CHAPTER XI.

OIL AND GAS DISCOVERY, DEVELOPMENT AND PRODUCTION OF CLARK COUNTY.

Twenty-three years ago Thomas Hamilton Sutton, familiarly known as "Ham" Sutton, in his history of Clark County, wrote: "Petroleum exists in many parts of the county, and yet flows from the Young well in Parker Township. Capital will, at no distant future, explore the hidden depths and compel it to become an important factor in the wealth and commerce of the county." The prophecy of Ham Sutton is now an established fact. How thoroughly this prediction has been realized the thousands of oil and gas wells of Westfield, Parker, Casey, Martinsville, Orange and Johnson Townships amply attest. On these oil and gas wells, especially the former, undreamed of sums of money have been spent and realized. At the time this prediction was made by Mr. Sutton few expected that it would come true, and it was received with the incredulity and disdain that almost always greets the man who sees things from a little different plane than the common run of humanity. Ham, who was regarded as a mere dreamer, is hailed as a prophet now, and a prophet, too, who is honored in his own county.

"The dreamer lives forever
But the toiler dies in a day."

The fact that oil and gas existed in Parker Township was suspected more than fifty years ago, but it was not until the early '60s that any united or systematic effort was made to develop it or to ascertain its extent. The first boring for oil and gas in Parker Township was made between 1865 and 1870 on the lands of T. R. Young, where both oil and gas were found, but in too small quantities to warrant great expenditure. The Young well was drilled to a depth of about twelve hundred feet, when, owing to the breaking of a drill, work was abandoned and never resumed until, in 1904, J. J. Hoblitzell, of Pennsylvania, came with money in his pockets, hope and determination in his soul and with a head full of practical oil and gas mining ideas. He went to work with courage nothing could daunt, and zeal that no discouragement could conquer, and leased and developed what subsequently proved to be some of the best oil lands of the county, spending, it is said, about $90,000 in leases, royalties, oil development supplies, labor and other outlays incident to fuel mining. He was eminently successful, and finally sold out his holdings to the Standard, or Ohio Oil Company, for $250,000, a clear and well earned gain of $160,000 for his two years' work in the oil fields of Clark County. When he reached Clark County the oil interest had long since passed away, and few men would have been willing to risk so large a sum of money on a venture which had formerly proved a dismal and disastrous failure. Now the regions around Oil City, now Oil Field, in Parker and Westfield Townships, and in large portions of Casey, Martinsville, Orange and Johnson Townships, have become a perfect wilderness of derricks, pumping engines and pumping stations, oil tanks and oil and gas supplies, all substantial and lasting monuments to the pluck, zeal, energy, daring and far-seeing business sense of J. J. Hoblitzell. To him, more than to any other one man, does Clark, Cumberland, Crawford, Coles, Edgar and Lawrence Counties, Illinois, and now, also, Vigo County, Indiana, for gas has been discovered in paying quantities there, owe their present importance in the oil and gas industries of the county. To but one other man, next to J. J. Hoblitzell, do these counties owe a debt of gratitude they can never adequately repay, and that man is Fred E. Moore, editor of the Casey Commercial. In season and out of season, at all times and under all circumstances, has Mr. Moore, through his paper and by action and word of mouth, with tongue and pen and with all the energies of his mind and body, persistently and intelligently boomed Casey, his home town, and the oil and gas industries of Clark County and of Illinois. And he, as in the case of "Ham" Sutton years ago, as well as all other men and women in all counties and in all times who have seen visions and dreamed dreams, was scoffed at and denounced in the beginning. But Fred's faith never wavered, his pencil never slackened, his courage never faltered, nor was his confidence ever shaken, and he has lived to see, in the brief space of about three years, his most sanguine expectations and predictions more than realized. He has seen his native town grow into a city more than one-third larger than it was three years ago, and arise and spread itself in business strength and importance. He has also lived to see Marshall, Martinsville and Westfield grow prosperous and happy, and a smile come upon the faces of hundreds of farmers of Clark County that does not pass away, as a result of the immense amount of money which the oil and gas men of the East and of the country have poured in upon Eastern Illinois and left there in payment for these oil and gas developments. Although Mr. Moore, who is a native of Casey, has not financially realized what his labors have been worth, he will live in history as having done more for the development of the gas and oil industries of Clark County than any other one man within its borders.

The fact that the Young well of the early '60s, drilled to a depth of about twelve hundred feet, should have failed to establish a paying oil business in Parker Township, while other wells around Oil City, drilled to a depth of from five to eight hundred feet, produce in enormous quantities, can only be explained upon the theory that the men prosecuting these early experiments did not understand their business, and, further, that these wells were not "shot" with dynamite, as is now the custom. T. R. Young died on his farm at Oil City before any of his former bright dreams of boundless wealth had been realized, and probably after all hopes of ever finding oil and gas under his lands had passed away.

Along about 1883 ineffectual efforts were made to reopen developments on Mr. Young's lands at Oil City and it remained for a stranger within our gates to utilize the stone the builders had rejected, and to bring to the knowledge of all men the boundless wealth that for ages had slept undiscovered and undreamed of under thousands of acres of the lands of Clark, Cumberland, Crawford, Coles, Edgar and Lawrence Counties. During the latter part of 1906 the Standard Oil Company, which buys all the oil produced in the Illinois field, fixed its own price per barrel, limited the production, put down the price and thus caused great dissatisfaction among the producers and owners of oil lands. The Standard has advanced the perhaps truthful claim that until it gets its pipe lines and storage tanks in Clark and Crawford Counties completed and its pumping station at Martinsville in running order it cannot handle the vast amount of oil the Illinois field is capable of furnishing. Despite the discouragement to operators on account of the limiting of receipts of oil and the reduction of price per barrel by the Standard Oil Company, the drilling of new wells in the Illinois field goes merrily on. During the week ending November 10, 1906, the new wells completed in Clark County amounted to thirty-five, of which six were dry wells, and with an estimated total weekly product of 1,994 barrels. For the whole month of October, 1906, the total number of new wells completed in Crawford, Lawrence, Coles, Cumberland and Edgar Counties was four hundred and fifty-three, of which forty-seven were dry wells, and with a total estimated capacity of 14,039 barrels. For the week ending November 10, 1906, there were ninety-seven new wells, of which thirteen were dry wells, and with an estimated weekly capacity of 8,879 barrels. For the week ending November 10, 1906, the total number of new wells completed in West Virginia was only twenty-nine, of which eleven were dry wells, with a total weekly estimated product of 578 barrels. The total number of new wells for the states of Indiana, Ohio, West Virginia and Kentucky for the week ending November 10, 1906, was only one hundred and twenty, of which thirty-one were dry wells and with only a total weekly output of 2,232 barrels, against 8,870 barrels for the same week for Illinois. The total number of new wells completed for the whole country during the month of October, 1906, was 1,498, of which three hundred and fourteen were dry wells, and with an output for the month of 29,412 barrels. Of these, as before shown, the Illinois field, consisting of the six counties above named, alone completed four hundred and fifty-three new wells, forty-seven of which were dry wells, and with an output for that month of 14,039 barrels, or about one-half of all the oil produced in the whole country, and that, too, on a very greatly limited receipt of its oil product by its only buyer, the Standard Oil Company. This shows the vastly preponderating importance of the Illinois oil field over any other State in the Union. Its only real rivals are Kansas and the Indian Territory. And as the Standard Oil Company has put down its receipts there to the lowest possible limit for some months past, it is not definitely or even approximately known what the real output of those oil fields would be if all the oil that they are capable of producing were being taken. They are known, however, to be equal, if not even superior, to the oil field of Illinois. How much greater the output of oil in the Illinois oil field may yet become, or how long it will last, no man can tell, though it has probably already reached its full capacity, and new wells in the future are not likely to much more than make up for the failure in oil producing wells already completed. At least this is the opinion of the best oil experts of the county at this time.

In addition to the wonderful advantage that has come to the land owners and oil producers of Clark County from the vast pools of petroleum found under its surface, great advantages have also been realized from the wonderful gas deposits that have been already opened up. These gas wells are paying good earnings to a number of farmers, as well as furnishing natural gas for power, heat and illuminating purposes to Casey, Martinsville and Marshall, supplying power for pumping and drilling purposes and heat and light for numerous farm houses contiguous to the gas wells practically free of cost. The discovery, development and production of gas and oil have been of immense benefit to the land owners and people in general of Clark County, placing it among the richest districts in the State, and making it one of the most desirable localities in which to reside and enjoy life. It has made many rich that before were comparatively poor; has enabled many to lift mortgages and make many new investments of capital; has furnished work and at good prices to many laboring men and their families; has enabled the hotel, restaurant and saloon owners of Casey and Marshall to wax rich and prosperous, and materially helped all of these businesses in like ratio, except saloons, in Martinsville and Westfield, where these liquid evidences of alleged progress and sound business prosperity do not exist. But there is another and less encouraging view of the situation. The discoveries have raised rents and cost of living to the poor and well-to-do and has discouraged the farmer who must still till his soil for a living. His rows seem longer, the customary earnings of his farm more unsatisfactory, because of the undreamed of wealth that has rolled in upon the brother agriculturist whose lands, unlike his own, are soaked with oil and shaken by the outrush of escaping gas. Moreover, he finds it almost impossible to get help to plant and harvest his crops, as the oil and gas people, by the payment of higher prices for labor than he can afford, have drained off his usual supply of help.

CHAPTER XII.

CONCLUSION.

We have now reached the final chapter of our History of Clark County. The work of its preparation has been more laborious and extensive than we anticipated when it was begun, but it has not been without its pleasures and its satisfactions; and if it shall even approach the expectations of our friends we shall be glad, while if it should more than meet them, which we hardly hope, we shall be indeed delighted. We appreciate fully the kind and partial commendations which brought us and our humble fitness for this important work to the attention of the Middle West Publishing Company, which has the work in hand, and only hope that we have in some slight measure realized the high compliments paid us in these recommendations. We have been materially aided in the preparation of this history by the facts in the history of O. L. Baskin & Co., heretofore published; by Bateman and Selby's Encyclopedic History of Illinois, as well as by the several county officials and others who have taken an interest in its publication. We have tried to adhere strictly to facts in chronicling county events and history, and in our comments upon men we have tried to be impartial and true.

This, as just intimated, is the second history Clark County will have had, the first having been published by O. L. Baskin & Co., of Chicago, in 1883. The principal parts of the Baskin History of Clark County were prepared by Thomas Hamilton Sutton, familiarly known as "Ham" Sutton, of Marshall, and it was done in a way that the writer of this present history very much fears he has been unable to improve on or even equal. We have tried to make the present History of Clark County readable, as well as reliable and instructive, and hope the history will not prove disappointing in these regards.

At this date, November 25, 1906, John W. Fredenberger, of Auburn Township, has just been re-elected County Clerk for four years over John E. King, of Casey, by a majority of two hundred and sixty-four; Herschel R. Snaveley, of Martinsville, County Judge over H. J. Buxbaum, of the same city, by a plurality of one hundred and eighty-two; John W. Lewis, of Marshall, County Treasurer over Thomas W. Richards, of York Township, by a plurality of ninety-three; Harry W. Drake, of Darwin Township, Superintendent of Schools over Norman Bennett, of Johnson Township, by a majority of three hundred and thirty-seven; John H. Davison, of Wabash Township, for sheriff over W. G. Lee, of Parker Township, by a plurality of fifty-three, while Seymour Hurst and William T. Hollenbeck, both of Marshall, have both been elected Representatives from this Senatorial district in the Illinois Legislature. John D. Shoemaker is now Superintendent of Schools and Millard Hedrick Sheriff. Both have but one month to serve. Daniel Emerson is Circuit Clerk and Arthur Poorman State's Attorney for two years yet, and Sol Handy is Mayor of Marshall and E. D. Jones City Attorney. Their terms of office expire next April, 1907.

In looking over the long list of biographies published in the Baskin History we find that many of the noblemen whose names and histories are chronicled therein have since passed away from the scenes of their earthly labors and into the other and higher life. In Marshall Township, of the eighty-three names whose biographies are given in the first history, published in 1883, thirty-five of them have been taken from among us by what the world mistakenly, we think, calls death. How many of those who are alive in the flesh today and whose names shall appear in the present history will be alive in 1929, twenty-three years hence, who can say? But it is safe to say that by that time as equal proportion of them will at that time be seen no more among the men of earth. And so this new and later History of Clark County becomes of additional importance. In looking over the long list of names which appear in the Baskin History we find that among those who have since gone to that bourne from which none are said ever to return may be mentioned genial, smiling Joseph L. Allison; honest, competent, trusted and trustworthy Burns Archer; brilliant but unfortunate Ivan G. Barlow; honest, sturdy old Herbert Benedict; my old and genial schoolboy friend and associate, William L. Bishop; generous, forgiving, great-hearted Allen B. Briscoe; faithful, manly and honest James C. Bryan; generous, charitable, noble-hearted and popular Lyman Booth; dear old generous hearted, well-read, poetic souled Thomas W. Cole; young, noble and lovable John Coughlan; the two genial and loyal Davidson brothers, Richard and Daniel; light-hearted, laughing, careless John Doherty; keen, intellectual business man Robert L. Dulaney; large minded, judicious and noble Justin Harlan; the two faithful, devoted and valuable and valued friends of the writer, Dr. John M. James and "Uncle" John Littlefield, the latter of whom touched the heart and aroused the latent ambition of the writer with the first newspaper commendation; the somewhat peculiar but honest, manly and true old Scotch banker, John Morton, who took the chances of loaning the writer the money with which his first home was bought, and was not deceived by but thereby made of him a devoted friend until Mr. Morton's death, and who fondly cherishes his memory even now; unfortunate, long-suffering Fleming R. Neal; great hearted, generous, genial, sensible Thomas L. Orndorff; great minded, vastly learned, honest, sturdy, universally loved John Scholfield; genial and gentlemanly William Shaw; honest, rugged, plain spoken, faithful, patient and long-suffering Oliver G. Stephenson; brilliant, witty and versatile "Ham" Sutton; vindictive, unjust and merciless Silas S. Whitehead; sturdy, popular and sensible but unfortunate John Gamble; industrious, ever-working, always pushing, intelligent and true Newton Tibbs; bluff, dominating, plain spoken, uncompromising, hot tempered but honest Dr. W. H. McNary; genial, intelligent, long headed and conservative William Lindsay; bright, well educated, genial and popular college chum of other days, Charles K. Douglas, and many more we might mention. And so it is, in like proportion, with the other men whose names appear in Baskin's History of Clark County of twenty-three years ago. It is well to mention these men, so that their names may live preserved for the information and guidance of those of us today or who may come after us. Where in any county or in any State will you find better men than calm, steady going Jacob Fishback; excitable but honest, noble and manly Dr. James Madison; fun-loving, genial, money making Liberty Murphy, of Wabash Township; honest as the day is long William Kimlin; genial, bright, loyal and lovable (God bless his memory) Henry B. Lee, of Casey; solid, pugnacious, progressive, sensible Washington Sanford; gentle, honest and honorable Henry Sherman; bluff, honest, open hearted, vigorous, brainy, plain spoken, sensible Dr. Richard F. Williams, of Casey; zealous, somewhat exacting and rugged but honest, big brained, unyielding, unshaken and unshakable, Christian gentleman, President Samuel B. Allen, of Westfield College; long headed and sensible John B. Briscoe, or bright, genial, progressive, successful business man, C. F. Knapp,

Residence of James Rush, Martinsville, Illinois

of Westfield; industrious, honest, pushing and saving Robert Brown, of Douglas; "Uncle" Felix Blankenbaker, of Orange; Warren Bartlett, Solomon Brown and big hearted, big brained, manly and noble Nixon Evans, and honest, industrious, faithful and true old Uncle Allen T. Gard, one of our first teachers, of Melrose; and intensely laborious, honest, universally beloved Wiley O. Bell, of West York, father of the writer.

And where can you now find, and where can you ever find in Clark County or in any other county, better men than William J. Malone, Ambrose Milam, James Mount, William Murphy, Stephen Prichard, John Ketchum, Joseph Books, Samuel Lacey, Moses C. Dolson, or Henry and Ira Prevo, of York. These sturdy and manly men were of a fibre and character which, unfortunately, is becoming all too rare in the world today. Few men in want of work or of helpful charity ever left the doors of these noble men disappointed. All of these men, noble and fitting types of the earlier residents of Clark County, have passed away within the past twenty-three years, or since the first History of Clark County was published. Their places cannot be and will not be readily filled.

How many of the names appearing in the present history will be able to answer roll call twenty years hence none can tell, but to those who, with the writer, have an unflinching faith in the belief and knowledge that conscious life and memory and love and hope does not vanish forever at the portals of the tomb it matters little when we shall go, provided our earthly lives have been as they should have been, for in any event we shall all doubtless meet again in that other and more desirable state of existence where death never enters, where partings never come, where the flowers ever bloom, where the trees are ever green and the birds ever sing, where the sun ever shines, where the beautiful waters of the Jasper Sea, as they roll over crystal beds, will forever murmur sweet messages of peace and love, and where the gentle waves of beautiful sunlit summer seas forever break in low sweet songs of fadeless joy on the golden sands of endless bliss, for

"There is no death, the stars go down,
To rise upon some fairer shore,

And bright in Heaven's jeweled crown
They shine forever more."

BRIEF HISTORY OF ST. MARY'S CHURCH.—(By Rev. Father P. R. Ducey, Pastor.)—Previous to the Revolutionary War that part of the State of Illinois known as the Diocese of Alton was subject to the spiritual jurisdiction of the Bishop of Quebec, Canada. In 1789 it formed a part of the Episcopal See of Baltimore. In 1808, when the diocese of Bardstown, Ky., was detached from Baltimore See, Bishop Flaget became the ecclesiastical superior of the territory now embraced within the State of Illinois. Mgr. Dubugh, consecrated in 1815 Bishop of New Orleans, made St. Louis, Mo., the place of his residence till 1823, during which time he provided for the spiritual wants of Catholics settled on the eastern banks of the Mississippi River. From creation of diocese in St. Louis, 1826, until 1834, creation of diocese of Vincennes, Catholics of Illinois were attended from St. Louis. In 1834 Illinois Catholics were attended on the east from diocese of Vincennes, on the west from diocese of St. Louis. In 1844 Chicago was created an Episcopal See, with the whole State of Illinois as its territory. With these prefatory remarks we begin the history of St. Mary's. The purpose of this history is to recall to memory those early days when Catholics were few and far between, and to remind the succeeding generations of those early pioneer days of the hardships, trials and labors endured by the early settlers, who were firm, lowly and constant in faith and ardent in their love of God. That faith and love of God is the legacy which they left their descendants, to be handed down to their descendants' descendants, that for all time, by reason of conduct of succeeding generations, the memory of the pioneer settlers of St. Mary's might be held in everlasting benediction.

While there are no church records of the pioneer missionaries, yet in the family traditions and memory of some of the living today we learn that as early as 1838 Father Butuex from the diocese of Vincennes (who was probably the first priest of North Arm, Ill.) visited these surroundings. Here we must mention, perhaps, the first Catholic resident of the community—Patrick Conohy—a man universally known in his day in the whole country. Patrick came about 1838. He was foremost in his time in doing his utmost to help the cause of the church. Father Brady, the first resident priest, recognized his sterling worth and made his home with Patrick while attending this mission. Later came Mrs. Nancy Benedict, another of the self-sacrificing pioneers of St. Mary's. In 1843 Father Lalumiere, successor of Father Buteux, said mass in Mrs. Murphy's house at Livingston, Ill. At some later period the same father said mass in houses of Conrad Sans and Peter Schwab, Sr.

In the spring of 1840 Conrad Sans, L. Forebeck, Peter Schwab, Sr., and Peter Staub came to Marshall. They took up their abode in the timber south of Marshall. Here they labored with patience, a proof of which may be seen from the lands now held by their descendants. Of these above named settlers some idea of their patience and sturdy nature may be gathered from their travels to Marshall. They walked from Dayton, Ohio, by way of Cincinnati, Ohio; Louisville, Ky.; Evansville and Terre Haute, Ind. A distance of fifteen miles to mill and market was of little moment in those days. The news that the priest was to celebrate holy mass in some house was heralded with delight. From every corner came the scattered Catholics to confess, to receive holy communion, to have their children baptized and to marry. Of the above named, with their families, consisting of twenty-two persons, all have gone to their eternal reward except two, namely: Mrs. Elizabeth Michaels, in her eighty-sixth year, who is the oldest living member of the congregation, and Peter Schwab, Jr., who is in his eighty-fourth year.

As already stated, Father Brady, of Easton, Pa., was the first resident priest, coming in September, 1847. Father Brady contracted with Major Griffith for the construction of the old church. Father Brady left in 1848, after covering old church building. Father Hamilton, from North Arm, then attended this mission for about a year. During his time Bishop Vandeveld, of Chicago, confirmed in October, 1849, the following persons: John and James Welsh, Daniel Callahan and wife, Mrs. Michael Madden, Mary Conohy, Michael Loeb and John Hamel.

In 1850 Father Thomas Ryan, of North Arm, was the first to say mass in the old church.

Said mass in the house of Rachael Wilson, now deceased, in the then promising center of Castletin. Father Ryan, while living at North Arm and Paris, visited Marshall till 1860.

Priests after Father Ryan: Father D. Byrne, 1860 to August, 1861; Father Herbert Hoffman, about six months; Father H. I. Hoven, October 5, 1862, to 1863.

Under administration of Father Hoven new church building was begun, during which time foundation of church building was laid.

Priests in charge after Father Hoven's time: Father A. Zingsheim, 1864-65; Father J. A. Sullivan, March to May, 1865; Father A. B. Ritches, July, 1865, to May, 1866; Father J. A. Sullivan, 1866 to April, 1867; Father Marks, April, 1867, to October, 1872.

During Father Mark's administration new church building was erected; also school building and parochial residence. Church was open for mass in the fall of 1869.

The new church was dedicated October 20, 1872, under the title "Assumption of B. V. Mary," by Bishop Baltes, then Bishop of Alton. On same occasion Bishop confirmed twenty-nine persons.

Ten years before dedication of church Bishop Henry Damien Junker, the first Bishop of Alton, on October 10, 1862, confirmed a class of nineteen boys and twenty-one girls. Of that class these are members of the congregation. The others either have gone to eternal reward or moved: John Forebeck, Jacob Meehling, Barney Caffery, Daniel Curran, William Walsh, Peter Conohy, Joe Welsh, Joe Ferebeck, Nick Schwab, Mary Madden, Margaret Delaney, Bridget Golden, Kate Maney, Margaret Benedict, Elizabeth Forebeck, Margaret Meehling.

Patrick and Mary Conohy were sponsors. H. I. Hoven, Pastor.

First Baptismal Record: "Mary, daughter of Owen Rodgers and Mary Riley, born August 16, 1860, baptized September 7, 1860. Sponsors were John and Mary Rodgers. D. BYRNE, "Priest."

There is a tradition that Daniel Daley, of Big Creek, was the first baptized by Father Brady.

Earliest Mortuary Record: "Barbara Schwab gave her soul to God in year 1858, 8th day of October. Her body was buried on 9th day of October. J. A. MARK, Priest."

First marriage recorded: "On the 16th day of November, 1862, Edward Geraty and Catherine Magan, in the presence of Martin Russell and Margaret Hunter, were married.

"H. I. HOVEN, Priest."

The earliest marriage in memory of some of the congregation was that of Mr. Hans with half-sister of Mrs. Elizabeth Michaels in year 1848.

Priests in charge from Father Mark's time: Father Francis Albers, O. F. M., October, 1872, to 1874; Father Sylvester Wegener, 1874 to June, 1876; Father Rayverens, O. F. M., August, 1876, to October, 1876; Father Charles Kuhlman, fall of 1876 to 1891; Father David Moroney, July 12, 1891, to September 1, 1900; Father P. R. Ducey, September 1, 1900.

Old Catholic Church was deeded to Lawrence Forebeck, consideration $1,000, as part payment of money handed over to Father Marks. Deed made June 15, 1874. The old church is now being torn down.

The youngest person confirmed in history of congregation was Rosanna Conohy, in her tenth year, now Sister Ida, member of the Order of Sisters of Providence. Her class was confirmed during pastorate of Father Ryan, September, 1853.

A parochial school was opened about the year 1881, which was taught by day teacher until 1885, when the Dominican Sisters took charge and held school up to 1900.

First record of borrowed money: May 21, 1867, Lawrence Forebeck, 8 per cent., $400; May 21, 1867, Conrad Sans, 8 per cent., $200.

Names of those who paid off the first note, note of Ellen Prindeville $200, interest $46: John Forebeck, $41; Vitus Scheider, $41; John Reynolds, $41; collections, $41; Lawrence Forebeck, $41; James Hans, $41.

We cannot fail to make mention of Colonel William Archer, who generously donated about the time of Father Ryan, the present Catholic Cemetery.

In conclusion we must also record the fact that the people of Marshall have from the early days to the present writing always shown themselves most cordial and generous in their relation with the Catholics of this community. We trust that this same feeling will continue always to exist.

BIOGRAPHICAL

ADAMS, James William.—Farming, school teaching, office holding and merchandising have contributed to the experience of James W. Adams, a Clark County arrival of 1855, and at present conducting a general grocery business in the town of Marshall. Mr. Adams comes of a Southern family long identified with the Old Dominion, and he himself was born in Loudoun County, Virginia, November 19, 1847. In the same State and county were born also his parents, Mason C. and Armenia (Hutchinson) Adams, the former in 1822 and the latter October 20, 1825.

Mason C. Adams was reared on a farm, and in youth learned the miller's trade, which he combined with agriculture for many years. In 1855 he brought his family to Clark County, settled in Wabash Township, and arose to political and general importance in the community. He was a staunch Democrat, and served four years as Township Collector and several terms as Assessor. He brought success out of scant early opportunities, and was honored for his integrity and general worth. Mr. Adams died July 5, 1886, but is survived by his wife, who still is a resident of Wabash Township.

Eight years old when he came to Clark County, James W. Adams was educated in its public schools, and finally equipped himself for teaching school, an occupation he followed in connection with farming for twenty years. Like his father before him, he early evidenced an interest in politics, was a member of the School Board and its Treasurer fifteen years, and Tax Collector two terms, resigning from the former office upon his removal to Marshall in 1902. December 27, 1870, he was united in marriage to Celia Travioli, a native of Clark County, and daughter of Clark County pioneers who came from Licking County, Ohio. Mr. and Mrs. Adams are the parents of seven children, four sons and three daughters. Of the sons, Mason C., who lives in California, was born Christmas day, 1873; Frank Otis was born St.

Valentine's day, 1876; Ernest E. was born May 28, 1884; and George W. was born August 15, 1886. Of the daughters, Mrs. Edith Nye was born August 13, 1878; Mrs. Idel Taylor was born February 25, 1882, and married Dr. Taylor, of Marshall; and Nettie was born May 27, 1889.

Mr. Adams is a man of deep religious convictions, and an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In large degree he has the qualities which tend to successful merchandising, and not the least conspicuous of which are tact, obligingness and integrity. He is well known throughout this part of the county, and has contributed to its advancement along practical and permanently beneficial lines.

ADAMS, W. H.—A recognized position, due to long residence in the locality and substantial worth of character, is held by Mr. Adams, who owns and occupies one of the improved farms of Clark County, a tract of valuable land lying in Section 21 of Wabash Township and bearing the improvements that mark the owner as a man of thrift and enterprise. Ever since starting out for himself he has made his home on this property, which he has transformed from a tract largely in timber to a tillable, fertile and valuable farm. While he has not become a specialist in any department of agriculture, but has devoted attention to every form of agricultural activity, yet he has been especially interested in the dairy business for a number of years and maintains a herd of exceptional quality from the dairyman's standpoint.

Having passed almost his entire life in Clark County, Mr. Adams is familiar with its soil and possibilities. He was only four years of age when the family removed to Illinois and settled among the pioneers of this county, where his father, Mason C. Adams (to whose biography on another page the reader is referred for the family history), became a leading farmer and progressive citizen. It was during the year 1854 that the family migrated westward from Virginia, where W. H. had been born in Loudon County, September 29, 1850. Though he received no greater educational advantages than such as were offered by the township schools of that day, he was so ambitious to gain an education that he acquired a breadth of knowledge not always secured by the more favored youth of the present century. During vacations he aided his father in the clearing of the home farm and in all the work incident to the upbuilding of a large tract of land.

About the year 1871 Mr. Adams commenced to teach school in Wabash Township, and for nearly twenty years he followed that work during the winter months, while in the intervening summer seasons he cultivated the farm which he had purchased and which he still owns. In 1876 he married Miss Lalla Hutchinson, who was born in Virginia in June, 1855, being a daughter of James Hutchinson, a farmer of that State. When about twenty years of age Miss Hutchinson left her home in the Old Dominion and came west to Illinois, settling in Clark County, where she began to teach school in Wabash Township. Soon, however, she resigned school teaching in order to take up the duties of home-making, and since then she has been her husband's efficient counselor and helpmate. After their marriage they settled on their present farm, where they have since labored with energy and sagacity in the improvement of the place, while at the same time they have been devoted parents and broad-minded citizens. Five children were born of their union, namely: Joseph T., James S., Clyde V., William M. (deceased), and Eleanor, all of whom were born on the homestead in Wabash Township.

In religious connections the family holds membership with the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which Mr. Adams has rendered faithful service as a local preacher, and to the support of which he has always given as his means permitted. Politically he has always voted the Democratic ticket and has been a firm advocate of the principles of the party. As would be expected of a man who for years engaged in teaching, he maintains a deep interest in educational matters and keeps posted concerning the needs and development of the public school system. For a long period he held office as a School Director and during his incumbency of the office he gave much time and thought to the upbuilding of the local schools, realizing then, as now, that the future progress of the country is dependent upon the educational opportunities afforded to the rising generation.

ALEXANDER, Edwin R.—M. R. Alexander was born in Anderson County, Ky., in 1832, and moved to Clark County in 1834. His father settled in York Township at an early date. Mr. Alexander has occupied his present farm for more than thirty-two years. He was married in 1866 to Mary Marvin, who was a native of Illinois, by whom our subject has had twelve children, seven boys and five girls, all living but one boy. Eight of these children are now married and all except one boy, who lives in Indianapolis, reside near the old homestead. Mr. Alexander enlisted in August, 1861, in the Thirtieth Illinois Infantry and was mustered out at Camp Butler, in Springfield, at the end of his term of service. He was in the battle of Bellmont, the first battle of Grant, Logan and McClelland, Fort Henry, Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Corinth, Britain's Lane, siege of Vicksburg, Fort Gibson, Raymond, Champion Hills and the siege of Atlanta, and marched to the sea with Sherman, and during all of these battles and marches he never received a scratch. Mr. Alexander had one brother, one nephew, nine cousins and one brother-in-law killed in the War of the Rebellion. He is the owner of a fine farm of seventy acres, and a prominent citizen of his neighborhood and township. His father and three brothers of his father were in the Black Hawk War. His grandfather fought at the battle of New Orleans and lost a leg in that battle. Mr. Alexander has reason to feel proud of his army service, and of his success as a citizen and as a man. Mr. Alexander is a Republican. The following children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Alexander: M. A. Alexander, born September 9, 1867, wife of W. A. White, and has six children; H. L. Alexander, born March 7, 1869, and lives at home; George W., born September 6, 1870, married Nellie Grant, lives in Melrose Township, and has seven children; Sarah C., born July 19, 1872, married Earl Arbuckle, lives in Melrose Township, and has four children; John W., born April 1, 1874, married Carrie Woods, lives in Melrose; Dora J., born February 9, 1876, married Claude Rainey, lives in Anderson Township, and has three children; Edwin R., born March 6, 1878, married Della Wood, and lives in Indianapolis; Daisy D., born October 30, 1879, married Thomas Garland, lives in Mt. Carmel, Ill., and has one child; Annie M., born September 30, 1881, married Orla Shotwell, lives in Melrose Township, and has one child; James B., born October 14, 1884, lives at home; E. Carson, born October 20, 1886, lives at home; one son died in infancy.

ANDREWS, Dean.—At a time when the demands of his calling tried the fibre of men, entailing continuous self-sacrifice, and bringing meager financial returns, Dean Andrews cast his lot with the fortunes of Clark County, and as school teacher and minister in the Congregational Church won enduring place in the history of a struggling community. That his death occurred so long ago as September 14, 1872, in no way lessens his influence or the fundamental usefulness of his life. Born along the Atlantic edge of the continent, in far-off Maine, February 15, 1808, he spent his youth as did the other farmers' sons of that region, but because he had cravings beyond the average of his playmates, he sacrificed and labored more than they, thereby securing not only a common school but a college education.

Upon the termination of his course at Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Me., Mr. Andrews heard the call of the wild, and came to Marshall, Clark County, where he engaged in school teaching in the infant community. Success on a small scale came to him, and in 1840 he married Louise Shaw, the following year adding to his responsibilities that of preaching in the Congregational Church. For many years he both taught and preached, and fulfilled with conscientious exactitude the multitudinous obligations connected with his calling. After two sons and as many daughters had been added to his family, his wife died, and November 3, 1859, he was united in marriage to Eleanor McMilen, a native of Rocville, Park County, Ind. Of this union there were two daughters and one son, of whom William M., a civil engineer, lives with his mother, and Fannie, also living at home, is a teacher in the Marshall high school.

Mr. Andrews is a man of precision of character and uncompromising attitude toward right and wrong. As a teacher he was a stern disciplinarian, yet patience personified toward the willing pupil. His teaching, both spiritual and general, sank deep into the lives of those around him, and left their impress upon their character, ideals and accomplishments.

BAILEY, Bert F.—The twentieth century is emphatically an area of progress, and in no instance is this fact more pronounced than in the development of many industries to which preceding ages devoted little attention. Within the limits of Clark County, where during the nineteenth century the pioneers labored to till the soil and harvest the crops of grain, the present generation is devoting much attention to the development of the oil industry, and not a few have found the later industry more remunerative and less laborious than the older occupation. Numbered among the young farmers who are devoting their attention to oil may be mentioned Bert F. Bailey, who owns a farm of forty acres within the oil district and at this writing has developed one producing well on the property.

The entire life of Mr. Bailey thus far has been passed within the limits of Clark County, where he was born in Johnson Township January 9, 1877, being a son of Wayne and Charlotte Bailey, the former of whom died in 1880. Some years later the mother became the wife of David Groves and they now make Casey their home. As a boy Bert F. Bailey was sent to the country schools, where he gained the rudiments of a thorough education, and since leaving school he has supplemented his text-book education by knowledge acquired from reading and habits of close observation. While in young manhood he established domestic ties, being united in marriage, January 18, 1899, with Miss Fannie Olive, daughter of S. R. and Elizabeth Schoffstoll, prominent residents of the township. They are the parents of three daughters, namely: Esta Belle, born June 22, 1901; Audrey M., November 15, 1902; and Eva May, August 23, 1903. The bright and attractive children complete a charming family circle, whose friends are many throughout the entire township.

Ever since attaining his majority Mr. Bailey has been a supporter of Republican principles and in national elections he always casts his ballot for that party. The first office he ever held was that of Constable, to which he was elected in the spring of 1907 and which he now fills to the satisfaction of those concerned. Fraternally he holds membership with the Modern Woodmen of America at Moriah, this county. Although at present not largely interested in agriculture nor disposed to allow that occupation to engross his attention, Mr. Bailey is an active and busy man, for he engages in teaming and also superintends the oil well on his farm, so that his activities are varied and important, while at the same time they are goring in their promise of profitable returns. Having passed his life in Johnson Township, he is well known one to the people of the locality, and his farm on Section 13 is known as one of the promising locations for oil, a promise that already has given evidence of fruition in the producing well operated by the owner

BAIRD, George Oliver.—George Oliver Baird, editor and half owner of the "Clark County Herald," was born in Marshall, Clark County, Ill., March 13, 1873, and is a son of Harvey Lyle and Anna Barbara (Kennedy) Baird. Harvey Lyle Baird was a carpenter by trade, who entered the Civil War at the age of seventeen years, served forty-nine months in Company K, First Missouri Cavalry, and died in 1886 as a result of disorders contracted by exposure and other vicissitudes of warfare. He is survived by his wife and by his four sons, Frank Lyle, George Oliver, Robert Lincoln and Samuel Kennedy, who, at the time of his death, were aged sixteen, thirteen, seven and four years, respectively. Frank, the oldest son, went to Chicago to work as an elevator boy in a wholesale house, finally being advanced to his present position as traveling salesman with the same concern, at the same time making his home in Marshall with his wife; George O. is editor of the "Herald"; Robert L. is married and has a small daughter; and Samuel K. is single, lives with his mother, and is foreman of the "Democrat." James Martin, father of Mrs. Baird, was a Methodist Episcopalian preacher who came from Pennsylvania in the early history of Illinois, and was pastor of the first church of his denomination in the city of Marshall. This church formerly stood on the site now occupied by the "Herald" office building, and the old back wall, of hewed timber and split lath, is still standing. By her many friends in Marshall Mrs. Baird is considered a remarkable woman. Her left arm having been amputated at the elbow after an injury when she was thirteen years old, about fourteen years ago she broke the stub of the arm, which necessitated the further loss of about two inches. Notwithstanding this calamity, she has trained herself to perform all household duties in a painstaking and exact manner, and in fact is as skillful, if not more so, than the average woman in possession of her normal members.

George Oliver Baird started penniless in the world of labor. At the time of his father's death he was obliged to leave the public school in order to assist with the maintenance of his widowed mother and younger brothers. In this emergency he entered the office of the "Herald" to learn the printer's trade, and for nineteen consecutive years he labored at this hard and uninteresting work, with few vacations, and those short and far between. The self-sacrifice involved in this early and strenuous application can be appreciated only by people constituted as Mr. Baird, than whom no one is more in harmony with woods and water and the outdoor sportsman's life, and who, to this day, regards fishing as the ideal of human recreations. At the age of twenty the former printer's "devil" became manager of the "Marshall Messenger," then owned by Mrs. Margaret Littlefield, who afterward sold the paper to the "Democrat" and "Herald." In May, 1900, Mr. Baird gave up his position as foreman of the "Democrat" and purchased a half interest in the "Herald," since which time he has increased the business of the paper a hundred per cent. and caused it to be regarded as a substantial and reliable opinion-moulder factor. From a second-rate periodical it has been advanced to one of the best papers in the lower half of the State, and its office is one of the best equipped to be found in the Central West. The building, which is owned by the editor, was built expressly for newspaper publishing, and has five presses and all modern printing appliances. The management and equipment of the establishment represents the best that its owner has to give, and reflects painstaking attention to the little details of business. For a short time Mr. Baird was press representative for Illinois at the St. Louis Fair in 1904, receiving the appointment entirely unsolicited. In politics Mr. Baird is a Republican, and his active political career began at the age of twenty-four, when, in 1897, he was elected Alderman of the Second Ward by a plurality lacking only five votes of being double the number received by his opponent. At the time his opponent was a prominent business man, while Mr. Baird himself was a printer who had not even the support of the paper he worked for. In 1901 he was elected City Clerk without opposition. He also has served as Secretary of the County Republican Central Committee and as Committeeman of the First Precinct of Marshall. Fraternally he is connected with the Knights of Pythias, Court of Honor and Modern Woodmen of America. As long as that organization existed in Marshall he was a member of the Sons of Veterans. He finds a religious home in the Methodist Episcopal Church, which he joined in 1895.

Geo. O. Baird

October 22, 1896, Mr. Baird was united in marriage to Estella M. Mitchell, only daughter of J. A. Mitchell, now of Indianapolis. The mother of Mrs. Baird died when she was nine years old, and thereafter she made her home with her grandparents, Dr. J. D. Mitchell and wife, of York Township, and with her brother, J. D. Mitchell, a business man of Westminster, Ind. On both sides Mrs. Baird traces her ancestry to the Revolutionary War, and on the maternal side there have been many musicians who have achieved world-wide reputations. An aunt, Margaret Anderson, now in London, England, is a writer of music, and in addition to being pronounced the world's leading flutist, is skilled also with violin, harp and piano. Clyde Fitch, the noted playwright, is a cousin to Margaret Anderson. Mrs. Baird is greatly interested in church, and sacrifices many of her social duties as a member of various women's clubs to the work of the church. Mr. and Mrs. Baird are the parents of a daughter, Barbara, who is eligible by at least three ways to the Daughters of the American Revolution.

BARTLETT, Frederick John.—By those in a position to gauge the relative possibilities of occupations it is claimed, other things being equal, the man who is learned in the science of law is equipped for success in more lines of business than is the devotee of any other calling. Evidence supporting this conclusion is found in the fact that lawyers more and more are using their knowledge as a means, rather than an end, and as an adjunct rather than a profession. This largely is due to the greater enlightenment and more general comprehension of law by the layman, to the end that he settles many of his difficulties out of court, or at best, by knowing how to avoid pitfalls and complications, is able to direct his activities into safe, prescribed and legalized channels of energy. Belonging to that class who best fulfill the present intent and purpose of the calling of law, Frederick John Bartlett not only is adding to the professional stability of his native town of Marshall, but is maintaining the all-around standing of a family, the immediate and remote connections of which have shared its fortunes since the laying of its civic foundations.

Mr. Bartlett was born September 28, 1867, in Marshall, and in the same town was born his father, Archer Bartlett, October 1, 1824, and his mother, Martha Bartlett, August 8, 1825. Both in kind and extent, the lives of this pioneer couple ran almost parallel, for while less than a year intervened between their births, but little more than a year separated the death of the former, July 16, 1904, from that of the latter, September 22, 1905. Archer Bartlett was a farmer by occupation, and the grandson of James Bartlett, who followed the martial fortunes of Washington during the Revolutionary War. Colonel W. M. B. Archer, after whom Archer Bartlett was named, and the latter's uncle, was prominent in the early political undertakings of Illinois, was several times a member of the Legislature, and was Commissioner of the great drainage canal built in the northern part of the State. Archer Avenue, Chicago, since made famous by Mr. Dooley, was named after him, and he was the civic father of Marshall, which he founded and laid out in 1835.

After graduating from the Marshall high school in May, 1885, Mr. Bartlett engaged in teaching at the Washington School, Darwin Township, during the winter of 1886-87. During the winter of 1887-88 he attended De Pauw University, and while there became a member of the recently organized Greek letter fraternity, Delta Upsilon. His school days, however, included much not to be found between the covers of books, for he had an energetic and inquiring mind, and set a pace not easily followed by boys less resourceful. Among other youthful undertakings was the publication of a local paper called "The Early Bird," the title of which was in no way misleading. The editorial partner in this venture was Fenton W. Booth, a neighbor and playfellow, who since has become Judge of the United States Court of Claims. In connection with his paper, Mr. Bartlett learned the printer's trade, and he subsequently learned the art of telegraphing while filling positions at various local railway stations.

Mr. Bartlett studied law in the office of Golden & Wilkin, later Golden & Hamill, and at the examination held before the Appellate Court in Springfield, this State, in November, 1888, was admitted to practice at the bar of Illinois. Locating in Marshall soon after, he was elected City Attorney in 1889, and in October, 1899, was appointed Master in Chancery of Clark County, which office he held until October, 1903. He served one term as Alderman of Marshall, and was Chairman of the Water and Light Committee when the present system of water supply was installed in the winter of 1900-01. At present he is a member of the Board of Education. He is a staunch supporter of Republican politics. Mr. Bartlett in 1896 was defeated for the office of State's Attorney by his cousin, Hon. S. M. Schofield. He is a member of the law firm of Davison & Bartlett.

December 23, 1891, Mr. Bartlett was united in marriage to Mary R. Stephens, of Casey, Ill., a granddaughter of the late Susan Jane Brooks, a respected pioneer who lived south of Casey. The death of Mrs. Bartlett occurred in July, 1892, and October 8, 1893, Mr. Bartlett married Mary E. Wooster, also of Casey, and of the union four children have been born: Bertha Alice, deceased; Lloyd Archer, eleven years old; Sidney Ganong, six years old; and Ralph Quick, ten months old. To thorough grounding in the fundamentals of his calling, Mr. Bartlett adds an honorable and straightforward nature, clear insight into the motives and temptations of mankind, and the faculty of presenting clearly and in convincing manner his case before judge and jury. No matter how large the demand upon his resources, one feels that there are forces still unexhausted, and this tendency to

In November, 1906, Mr. Bartlett became a member of the Congregational Church of Marshall, and his religious preference is shared by all of the members of his family. He is a member and had held high office in all of the following fraternities: Marshall Lodge No. 133, A. F. & A. M.; Eureka Lodge No. 64, I. O. O. F.; Lancelot Lodge No. 67, K. of P.; Seminole Tribe, I. O. R. M., and the Court of Honor.

BAUGHMAN, Jesse Filmore.—Jesse F. Baughman, for twenty-eight years owner and operator of the grist mill at Casey, who has never made his home outside of Clark County, and is one of the most respected citizens now residing in it, was born in Johnson Township, May 4, 1850. He is a son of David and Lucy H. (Buck) Baughman, the father born in Muskingum County, Ohio, on May 19, 1820, and the mother in Morrow County, that State, on the 26th of September, 1821. David Baughman was a farmer, a merchant and for forty-one years was Postmaster of Oak Point, in this county. He came to Clark County from Ohio in 1841, and engaged in farming there until 1848, where he went into the mercantile business at Oak Point. President Lincoln appointed him Postmaster at that place, where, as stated, he held the position for forty-one years. His son, Jesse F., still has in his possession the original appointment signed by the immortal President. The elder Baughman relinquished the postoffice only owing to its discontinuance caused by the establishment of rural free delivery routes. The grandfather, Christian Baughman, was born and reared in Pennsylvania and moved to Muskingum County, Ohio, about 1797, where he lived until his death in 1837.

Jesse F. Baughman passed his early years upon his father's farm in Johnson Township and assisted him in its cultivation, as well as in the running of the store and the postoffice. He still has good cause to remember the cold day of 1863, when the thermometer registered twenty-two degrees below zero, for one of his tasks was to drive a bunch of stubborn cattle through deep snow for a distance of one mile, after which he had to walk back to the store. After getting what education he could from the common schools of Johnson Township, he attended Westfield United Brethren College for about two years, and then returned to work on the home farm.

G. Behner

Mr. Baughman left the family homestead in Johnson Township in 1872, and, locating in Casey, bought the grist mill at that place, which he operated continuously and successfully until 1898, when he sold out and assumed the management of the old farm, for which he cared until the death of his father, April 19, 1906, his mother having passed away on the 27th of April, 1896. Mr. Baughman has always been a Republican, and was once elected an Alderman of Casey, but after thus serving two years he became disgusted with politics and has since refused to be a candidate for any office. He is a member of the Presbyterian Church, is strictly honest, industrious, a good business man, universally respected, and an honorable neighbor and citizen in every sense of the word.

Jesse F. Baughman was married September 24, 1874, to Barbara Ellen Carr, who was born in Morgan County, Ind., November 29, 1853, and is the eldest daughter of the seven children of C. A. Carr, whose biography is elsewhere given. Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Baughman, as follows: S. Goldie Baughman, January 6, 1876, who was married to Carey S. Welsh August 14, 1901; David Carr, born May 11, 1886, and Allen H., born October 20, 1893.

BEARD, Wesley.—The identification of the Beard family with the development of Clark County dates back to the year 1832, when Benjamin J. Beard, a youth of sixteen years, visited this section of the country on a prospecting tour, and, deciding to remain, took up a tract of Government land in Wabash Township. However, after two years he returned to his native locality, and it was not until about 1840 that he again came to the State and county. The second settlement proved to be permanent and from that day to this members of the family have contributed to the material growth and agricultural progress of Darwin and Wabash Townships. Not the least conspicuous member of the family is Wesley Beard, the enterprising farmer and stock-raiser who resides on Section 9, Darwin Township, and who was born on the same farm February 7, 1853. The greater part of his life has been spent at the same location, where now he owns 150 acres of improved land and cultivates the land with skill and sagacity.

The Beard family in years gone by held a prominent position in their part of Kentucky, and Benjamin J. Beard was born in that State May 16, 1816, receiving such meager advantages as the day and locality afforded. As previously stated, he came from Kentucky to Illinois at the age of sixteen, settled in Wabash Township, Clark County, but two years later returned to Kentucky, thence crossed the Ohio River into Indiana. There he married Elizabeth Maxedon, who was born in Orange County, that State, March 5, 1823. From Indiana he again came to Clark County in 1840 and bought eighty acres, which he cleared and placed under cultivation. All of his children, five sons and one daughter, were born in Darwin or Wabash Township, Clark County, and the family was influential from the period of its earliest residence in these localities. During the existence of the Grange he was one of the leading members of the local organization. Until the disintegration of the Whig party he advocated its principles and later became a staunch Democrat. During a service of twenty-three years as Road Commissioner he accomplished much toward the opening of new roads and the proper grading of those already opened. No one in the community was more deeply interested than he in the building of new roads, for he recognized their importance to the farmer in the hauling of produce to the markets. When in his seventy-third year he passed from the scenes of earth, comforted at the last, as he had been uplifted through life, by the faith of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, to which he had belonged for many years.

The district schools of Darwin Township gave Wesley Beard such advantages as he received in the way of education. July 1, 1880, he was united in marriage with Lucy R., daughter of William and Theresa Kieran, early settlers of Wabash Township. Mrs. Beard was born September 25, 1861, and at the age of eight years accompanied her parents to Clark County, settling in Wabash Township, where she received a country school education. Of her marriage to Mr. Beard four children were born. The eldest daughter is now the wife of James Bell and lives on a farm in this county. The younger children, Roy, Lydia May and Coral, are yet at home. For eight years after his marriage Mr. Beard resided on a farm in Cumberland County, but at the expiration of that time he brought his family back to Clark County and settled on the old family homestead. Here he has engaged in general farm pursuits with gratifying success. Active in political matters, he serves as Chairman of the Democratic Committee of Darwin Township and has held a number of township offices, including that of Supervisor. The Grange numbers him among its members and he also holds membership with the Masonic Blue Lodge at Marshall.

BEASLEY, Timothy A.—Included in the list of men to whom the finding of oil in certain portion of Eastern Illinois has proved of financial benefit we mention Timothy A. Beasley, a native-born son of Clark County and a lifelong resident of this region. Of an energetic and stirring nature, resolute in his determination to achieve independence, he toiled indefatigably as a farmer and by dint of perseverance and unwearied toil he gained a place of his own. However, the struggle had been a hard one, and hence he was highly gratified when the discovery of oil on his farm enhanced its value many times the original price. Already three producing wells have been placed on the land and it is the intention to drill others from time to time. The increased prosperity resulting from the development of oil enables Mr. Beasley to retire to some extent from the heaviest of his farm labors and he plans for the future years a greater degree of rest and relaxation than was possible during the struggles of the past.

About the beginning of the nineteenth century the Beasley family was established in America by Richard Beasley, a native of Ireland, and a pioneer of the then wilds of Indiana. Joel J., son of Richard, was born and reared in Indiana, and there, in September, 1852, he married Martha Montgomery, who was born in that state of German ancestry. About 1856 the young couple migrated to Illinois and settled in Clark County, where they have since made their home. Among their children was a son, Timothy A., who was born in Clark County March 31, 1862, and who received such advantages as the country schools of that day afforded. Upon starting out for himself he established domestic ties. June 2, 1887, he was united in marriage with Lucy K. Funk, a daughter of John and Amanda J. (Shaw) Funk, whose sketch will be found upon another page of this volume. The seven children of Mr. and Mrs. Beasley are named as follows: Dessa May, born May 8, 1888; Flossie J., November 20, 1890; Myrtie M., November 21, 1892; Zonie Nell, December 27, 1895; Madge Amanda, March 15, 1898; Cecil Maria, June 4, 1902; and Timothy Alta, August 11, 1904. The children are intelligent and charming, and their presence fills the home with joy.

The first start as a land-owner which Mr. Beasley made was in 1887, when he bought twenty acres from his father. Two years later he bought an adjoining tract of the same size. However, in 1892 he sold out and bought seventy-three acres known as the Lindsey farm. During 1896 he again sold out. His next purchase comprises a thirty-acre tract in Casey Township and forty-five acres across the township line in Johnson Township, when he purchased from George Fisher. A year later he added to his possessions by the purchase of twenty acres, since which time he has devoted his attention to the care of his property. While he has not been deeply interested in politics, he has kept well posted concerning public affairs and has given staunch allegiance to the Democratic party.

BEESON, Lewis R.—A prominent farmer, an old soldier and a good, able citizen of public affairs, the late Lewis R. Beeson, who passed away in 1889, at his homestead in Johnson Township, was a man who had made his way to every honorable position in life by the force of his straightforward character and his useful and intelligently directed actions. He was born in Harrison County, Ohio, on the 15th of January, 1837, and was the son of Richard and Elizabeth (Hanshaw) Beeson, both parents being natives of Virginia who migrated to that county about the year 1825. Richard Beeson the grandfather bought each of his two sons, Richard and Lewis, 160 acres of land, and the latter remained in Ohio until 1853, when he returned to live in Virginia. Richard, father of Lewis R., came to Illinois in 1850, farmed in Edgar County for three years, and then removed to Johnson Township, Clark County, where he died about 1856.

Norman Bennett

Lewis R. Beeson made his home with his father until the latter's death when, at the age of about twenty, he bought a farm six miles southeast of Casey and resided upon it for the remainder of his life, which ceased March 9, 1889. When he purchased the 160 acres comprising the homestead, the land was mostly wooded, but by dint of unceasing industry, determination and intelligent work he cleared and cultivated it, added improvements of fencing, convenient buildings, etc., until today it is as fine and well improved as any farm in Johnson Township. His friendships were widely scattered and firm, as he was a popular, honest and substantial man.

On December 1, 1861, two weeks before his marriage, Lewis R. Beeson enlisted in Company B, Second Illinois Light Artillery, and served for three years, participating in the battles of Corinth, Shiloh, and other noted engagements. After his honorable discharge from the service, he returned to the peaceful duties of the citizen farmer, industriously following his calling and well serving his county in such positions as Supervisor and Tax Collector. Politically he was a firm Republican, and was a follower of the Methodist faith.

Mr. Beeson married Miss Florello Whitaker, daughter of Neri and Ruth (Buck) Whitaker, on the 15th of December, 1861. Her father was a native of Muskingum County, Ohio, born about 1818, who came to Illinois only about two months before his death, which occurred August 3, 1847. The mother, an Ohio woman, was born in Delaware County, April 19, 1820, and died February 4, 1888, the maternal grandparents being natives respectively of York State and Vermont. Six children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Lewis R. Beeson, viz.: Emma, Nathan, Viola, John, Etta and Myrtle, all of whom are living; and Annie and an infant son, who are deceased. The two sons are married and living on the old home farm and are useful and respected members of the community.

BEHNER, C. F.—Because of his skill as a veterinary surgeon, C. F. Behner is in demand not only in Illinois but in the adjoining State of Indiana. Since his graduation from the Ontario Veterinary College in Toronto, Canada, in 1894, and his almost immediate settlement in Marshall, he has witnessed a steady rise in his professional fortunes, and now is considered one of the most capable in his line in the Central West.

Dr. Behner is a native of Illinois, and was born in Edgar County, January 28, 1872. He is the sixth oldest of the five sons and eight daughters of Lewis and Phoebe (Daugherty) Behner, the former of whom was born in Stark County, Ohio, and the latter in Clark County, Ill. Dr. Behner was educated in the public schools of Edgar County, and at the age of twenty left home and went to Canada, where, as before stated, he became interested in his present work. Special honors have been conferred upon him from time to time, including the appointment as Assistant State Veterinarian of Illinois, April 1, 1896, and the office of veterinary surgeon for the Illinois State Fair in 1904.

Dr. Behner is a Democrat in politics, and fraternally is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Lodge No. 64. October 17, 1894, he was united in marriage to Mary E. Whitehead, daughter of Hon. Silas S. Whitehead, a prominent attorney of Marshall, now deceased. Mrs. Behner was born in Marshall and is a graduate of the high schools of her native town. Dr. Behner is enthusiastically devoted to his work, being inspired by motives of humanity in large degree. The burden bearers of man in this section have no better or more helpful friend than this earnest and capable student of their needs, the methods employed being in harmony with the latest scientific discoveries in medicine and surgery.

BEHNER, Gottlieb.—Transplanted to this side of the Atlantic ocean, where they adapt themselves to the widest possible range of New World opportunities, the sons of the German Fatherland have ever added substantiality and worth to the localities in which they have elected to reside. As farmers they are unexcelled because of their patience and thoroughness, their love of home, and their natural kinship with the soil, and invariably they live within their means and have something ready for the proverbial rainy day. Two generations of the Behner family have confirmed the general estimate of the Teuton in Marshall Township, the founder of the family, Christian F. Behner, and his son, Gottlieb, both having achieved enviable reputations as agriculturists and stock-raisers.

Christian F. Behner was born in Germany, and had the school and other advantages of the peasant class. As do the average of his countrymen, he early established a home of his own, marrying Dorothy Abel, with whom he sailed for America in March, 1830. Locating on a farm in Pennsylvania, he began the task of succeeding among people who spoke a strange tongue and practiced strange customs, and nine months after his arrival, November 29, 1830, his second son, Gottlieb, was born. His oldest son was christened Christian F., and following Gottlieb came Michael, Lewis, Rose Ann, Chester, Elizabeth, Katherine and Sophia, of whom Elizabeth and Sophia are deceased. From Pennsylvania Mr. Behner moved his family overland in a wagon to Stark County, Ohio, later settling in Clark County, and purchasing eighty acres of timber land in Marshall Township, in August, 1841. Gottlieb at that time was eleven years old, and during the following winter he helped his father and brother clear the land, and prepare the soil for the seed in the springtime. His mother made the rude little home comfortable, made the clothing, mended and cooked for her husband and children, and soon more land was purchased, a finer house erected, and success perched on the banner of the wayfarers from the other side of the water. In time Mr. Behner owned six hundred acres of land, yet he brought little with him as a nucleus for this splendid reward for labor. He lived to see his children grow up around him, and to divide with them the competence that they had jointly earned. He was a Democrat in politics, and a member of the Evangelical Church, at Marshall, the service of which was read over him at his burial in 1887. His wife died in 1884. He was a man of strict integrity, and in his household laxity or laziness were never tolerated. He reared his children to independence of thought and action, and to that economy in small things which is the surest road to wealth.

At the age of seventy-seven years Gottlieb Behner is the possessor of 240 acres of land, every acre being the result of his and his wife's hard labor, and long since has laid aside his implements of labor. He has been an interested spectator of the growth of this part of Clark County, and has taken an intelligent and helpful part in agriculture, education, politics and religion. He married, July 22, 1855, Catherine Theis, a native of Germany, and born March 7, 1833. Mrs. Behner is a daughter of John and Margaret, (Mischler) Theis, both of whom are deceased, and she came to America at the age of twenty years, and to Marshall in 1854. Mr. and Mrs. Behner are the parents of three sons and four daughters: Michael; Rebecca; Liddy; James Allen; Edward B.; Rose E., deceased; Florence Sidney; and Emma Loretta. Mr. Behner usually votes the Democratic ticket, but reserves the right to choose the man best fitted for the office in question. He has been a School Director fifteen years, and during that time helped to maintain a high standard of instruction. He is a quiet and unostentatious man, kind in his judgment of others, and generous in his contributions to worthy causes. He has led an upright and useful life, and is liked and respected by all who know him.

BELL, James.—Although not numbered among the pioneer population of Clark County, the Bell family has been identified with the agricultural interests of the region for a period sufficiently long to bring them to a prominent position among neighboring farmers and to give them the confidence of acquaintances. The head of the family at the time of their arrival in Illinois was Elias Bell, who was born in Ohio about 1827 and traced his genealogy to German ancestors. Reared in the Buckeye State, he there married in 1850 Miss Elizabeth Oberholtzer, who was born in Pennsylvania about 1828 and belonged to a German family. Two years after their marriage the young couple removed to Indiana and during the spring of 1871 they came further west, settling in Clark County, Illinois, where they soon became known for sterling worth of character and the highest integrity in every business transaction.

During the residence of Elias and Elizabeth Bell in Owen County, Ind., their son, James, was born February 5, 1859, and at the time of removing to Illinois he was a boy of twelve years. Five children besides himself are living and all are married with the exception of the youngest daughter. Two children died in infancy. Educated primarily in country schools, later James Bell was sent to the Casey high school and after leaving that institution he gave his attention wholly to the cultivation of the home farm. After the death of his father, which occurred September 18, 1882, he continued to make his home with his mother and superintended the estate in her interests and those of the other heirs. At the time of his marriage he owned thirty acres of the old homestead. Afterward he purchased seventy-two acres from a brother and sister, also bought twelve acres from another brother, and in addition he has purchased twenty acres from Nathan Barr, so that now he owns all of the home farm excepting forty acres belonging to a sister.

On establishing home ties Mr. Bell was married, May 15, 1892, to Mrs. Margaret (Wilson) Barr, a native of Clark County. Her parents, James W. and Mary A. (Fort) Wilson, were natives respectively of Virginia and Indiana, the latter of German extraction; the former was of English parentage, the family having come across the ocean to America, about the year 1770. The family of James Bell comprises three children, namely: Zona O., who was born August 12, 1894; Lloyd E., June 3, 1897; and Fenton W., September 29, 1900. The United Brethren Church receives the allegiance and support of Mr. Bell, who is a sincere believer in its doctrines and a contributor to movements for the cause of Christianity. Realizing that much of the villainy wrought upon the earth is the result of the indiscriminate sale of intoxicants, he has long been an enemy of the saloon and has given the cause of Prohibition his firm and hearty support. Often he has been honored with election to local offices of trust, all of which he has filled with intelligence and the utmost fidelity. Among the positions he has held may be mentioned those of Assessor, Tax Collector, Town Clerk and Justice of the Peace.

Through assiduous efforts and sagacious management Mr. Bell has converted his land into as fine a farm as may be found for miles around, and the place stands as a monument to his thrift, integrity and enterprise. The possibility of the presence of oil on the farm has led him to take some initial steps toward investigating the same, and already he owns one-fourth interest in forty acres of as fine oil land as may be found in this belt, the tract having ten of the largest producing wells in the entire district. The oil industry with its attendant possibilities has received the enthusiastic support of Mr. Bell, who sees in its development a larger success for the property-owners of the district than could be achieved from agricultural pursuits. In his dealings with all he has shown wise judgment and great tact, and it is conceded among all his associates that he is one of the most capable farmers of the township.

BENNETT, Frederick R.—So closely and continuously has the Bennett family been identified with Westfield Township since 1832, that a history of either would be incomplete without mention of the other. No name in this splendid section of Clark County, with its unrivalled advantages of soil, climate and general business, has conformed more resolutely and naturally to its need, or kept more intelligent pace with its progress. The dividing of the ways, occasioned by the awakening of the members of a family to their respective life preferences, resulted in a continuation by Frederick R. Bennett, of the occupation in which he had been reared, and his subsequent retirement to his present home in the town of Westfield.

Mr. Bennett was born on the paternal farm in the eastern part of Westfield Township, July 8, 1841, and is a son of Harvey and Elizabeth C. (Clinton) Bennett, seven of whose fourteen children still are living. Idleness or dependence were never encouraged or countenanced in the Bennett household, and the children grew to a serious comprehension of responsibility. The Civil War found many steadfast supporters in the old Bennett farm house, and Frederick R., then twenty years old, willingly gave his services as a private in Company H, Twenty-first Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in what was known as General Grant's Regiment. In the Army of the Cumberland he was in the thick of the fight in many important battles, and saw active service at Frederickstown, Mo., Stone River, Buzzard's Roost, Hoover's Gap, Big Shanty, Chattanooga, Pea Ridge, Siege of Knoxville, Mossy Creek, Missionary Ridge, Franklin, Chickamauga, and many others. He served from June 11, 1861, to July 9, 1864, and after his honorable discharge at Louisville, Ky., reached his old home in Westfield Township July 15th.

December 25, 1864, Mr. Bennett was united in marriage to Catherine Jane Parker, the daughter of a neighboring farmer, with whom he had gone to school, and whom he had known as long as he could remember. For thirty-seven years this couple lived together, and steadfastly labored for the best good of their home, their friends and the community, never failing in their mutual respect and consideration, or losing, during the stress of raising seven sons and four daughters, and the grief of burying two loved ones in childhood, the serene affection which had crowned the beginning of their journey together. Mrs. Bennett died in August, 1904, the year after Mr. Bennett had left the farm upon which all of their married life had been spent, and retired to Westfield. In 1905 Mr. Bennett married Mrs. Stella (Edwards) Sisk. He is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, and identified with the Republican party. Mr. Bennett has added to the agricultural prestige of this township, and has taught its rising generation a lesson in good judgment, perseverance, good nature and good intent. To know him is to respect and like him, for he has the strong and fundamental qualities upon which rest the real worth and character of communities.

BENNETT, Harlin A.—The distinction of being the most extensive breeder of coach horses in Clark County unquestionably belongs to Harlin A. Bennett. He was the first to introduce the German coach horse in this part of the State, which was in 1899. He worked hard to convince the people of the merits of this breed of horses, but they have been convinced and have taken up with them equally with Mr. Bennett. He started in this business with one German coach stallion, Einfarbe (Old Swift), and on account of the increase of business was forced to add three more fine stallions to his barns. Mr. Bennett is a man of affairs, well educated, well informed and particularly well equipped and designed for the important and interesting occupation which is claiming his attention. His domain of action is a hundred-acre tract of desirable land, upon which are two barns of modern construction, a large and comfortable brick dwelling, and those general accompaniments of country existence necessary for both the pursuit of his labor and the disposal of his leisure. He also is part owner of other valuable properties in Clark County, and not in a month's travel would one find a more sincere admirer of good horses, or a more enthusiastic promoter of their breeding, than this popular and genial landsman.

Mr. Bennett was born in Parker Township, Clark County, August 19, 1866, and is a son of Hardin and Deba Ann (Houghton) Bennett, the former of whom was born in Kentucky in 1816 and died in this county, and the latter of whom was born in West Virginia in 1821. The parents came to Clark County with their children, and the mother now lives in Parker with her son Alfred. Harlin A. Bennett had few advantages shared by other farmers' sons, but he was energetic and persevering, and always had a great idea of specializing in order to get the best agricultural results. That he had grasped the tendency of the age is evident from his splendid success along the line chosen. He remained on the paternal farm until his marriage, in 1891, to Allie Keller, since which his family has been augmented by a son, Ernie O. With his young wife he located in Martinsville and engaged in the hardware and implement business for four years, at the end of that time disposing of his stock and locating on the farm he since has occupied. He conducts general farming on a large scale, but his special pride are the magnificent specimens of horse flesh which find their way to all parts of the country and which have captured many prizes by way of encouragement to their large-hearted and capable owner.

Though no partisan, Mr. Bennett is a loyal adherent of the Republican party, and he has served its local interests in various capacities. He is fraternally prominent, and identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Modern Woodmen of America and the Loyal Americans. He is an excellent neighbor, loyal friend, interesting companion and honorable and dependable country gentleman.

BENNETT, Nathan Riley.—With the awful silence of the prairies around him, and with nothing to sustain his ambition but a sublime hope, Harvey Bennett, in the loneliness and isolation of his little cabin in Westfield Township in 1830, drew the horoscope of his surroundings, and planned and built and worked to make his dream come true. Sixty-three years later, when the log cabin had disappeared in the haze of history, and the vision of the early seer, of the gathering multitude and the bewildering hum of industries and trade had been realized, Nathan Riley Bennett, son of the path-finder, recognizing the need of its facilities, established with Mr. Collins what now is the Westfield Bank, of which he since has been President, and which is the first monetary institution in the township. Thus has the fundamental occupation of agriculture, and the resultant and equally important occupation of banking, been pioneered and promoted by a family which, in addition to innumerable other claims upon the consideration of the community, has been identified with its interests continuously since the third year of its settlement, or for a period of seventy-three years.

Sincerely,

The life history of Harvey Bennett, enlarged upon elsewhere in this work, went parallel with Westfield Township for more than half a century, or until his death in 1886, at the age of seventy-six years. His wife also was born in Kentucky, and came with her parents to Paris, Ill. She was married in 1836, and died in 1891, at the age of seventy-five years. In girlhood she was known as Elizabeth C. Clinton, and she became the mother of fourteen children, eight of whom attained maturity, and seven of whom still are living. Of these, Nathan Riley was born on the farm taken up from the Government in the eastern part of Westfield Township, February 12, 1856. Notwithstanding the fact of his father's growing prosperity, the son was trained in the gospel of thrift and industry, and early developed adaptiveness and keen realization of the possibilities and responsibilities of his position. He married, in 1877, Eliza J. Moffett, daughter of Elder S. H. Moffett, a native of Kentucky, and early settler of Edgar County. The young people went to housekeeping on the old Bennett farm, remaining there until the family removal to the town of Westfield in 1893. As a farmer Mr. Bennett represented all that science and enlightenment thus far has devised for the profit and convenience of the rural dweller, and as is repeatedly demonstrated, the mastery of the essentials of the best agricultural practice fitted him for participation in a diversity of interests remote from the farm. He accumulated substantial wealth in products, stock and lands, and at present still owns two hundred acres of the old homestead, as well as other valuable properties in different parts of the county.

With conservatism and caution as his basic principles, Mr. Bennett has proved an invaluable business adjunct to the growing community of Westfield. There is nothing of the experimentalist or visionary in his make-up, and he never is carried away by unstable enthusiasms. He naturally has been attracted to the unchanging institution of banking, for which the stability of his character and his high standing in the community admirably prepared him, and the bank established by Bennett & Collins June 6, 1895, started upon its monetary career under the most favorable of circumstances. The name of the institution eventually was changed to the Westfield Bank, and is owned and controlled by the firm of Bennett, Spelbring & Company. It is a private concern, and is a strong and dependable institution doing a purely commercial business. In addition, Mr. Bennett is President of the Farmersburg (Indiana) Bank, and he is also a large stockholder in the bank at Cloverdale, Ind.

The oil industry in the vicinity of Westfield owes much of its past development and future promise to the conspicuous support of Mr. Bennett. He is a staunch supporter of institutions that have for their object the development of the young, and education has no more enthusiastic friend than he. For several terms he was a member of the Board of Education, and for years he served as Treasurer of Westfield College. While never seeking the rewards of politics, his devotion to Republican tenets has resulted in his election to several minor offices, including that of Collector and Road Commissioner. In religion he follows the family precedent, and like his father is a member of the primitive Baptist Church, towards the support of which he has contributed generously for many years. Mr. and Mrs. Bennett have two sons, of whom Clarence is Assistant Cashier of the Westfield Bank, and Clayton still is in school. The life of Mr. Bennett serves the great purpose of providing useful lessons—lessons in patience, persistence, integrity, adaptiveness, far-sightedness and public-spiritedness. In him is realized the high potentiality of the pathfinder, could that exemplification of initiative and courage have continued his pilgrimage and usefulness into the present century. The Bennett name today stands for all that is substantial and worth while in human endeavor, and for all that is intelligent, dependable and upright in character.

BENNETT, Norman.—Thus far the active life of Norman Bennett has subscribed to the great need of popular education, and it is safe to say that no obligation assumed by the workers of the world is of greater relative importance. That Mr. Bennett finds his work congenial, that he brings to it the qualities of insight, patience and understanding, and an authoritative character in which is the iron of determination and the force of reserve, but adds to his usefulness as a factor for good, and emphasizes his fitness for many avenues of activity.

Born in Johnson Township, Clark County, Ill., January 29, 1873, Mr. Bennett is of Scotch-Irish ancestry on the paternal, and German ancestry on the maternal side of his family. His paternal grandparents came from New York to Ohio when the Buckeye State still was a wilderness, settling in Delaware County, where Theodore Bennett, father of Norman, was born in 1841. In 1853, when the lad was twelve years old, the family located in Orange Township, Clark County, Ill., where he attained maturity, and in the course of time married Nancy M. Dehl. A remote Dehl forefather came from Germany to the colony of Pennsylvania, from where the parents of Mrs. Bennett removed to Illinois in 1856. After his marriage Mr. Bennett built a house across the line in Johnson Township, and with a small property as a nucleus, succeeded, in spite of many obstacles, in surrounding himself with a paid-for possession of six hundred and forty acres of land, upon which he still makes his home. He is a prominent Democrat, and has held the township offices of Assessor, Collector, Supervisor and Highway Commissioner. He represents the sturdy, honest, temperate and industrious class upon whose shoulders rests the dependable foundations of community existence.

Primarily, Norman Bennett was educated in the common schools, and he eventually entered Westfield College, from which he graduated in 1898 with the degrees of B. S. and M. S. He holds a life State teacher's certificate, and a license to practice law in the State of Illinois. Combining school teaching with the acquiring of his higher education until his graduation, he thereafter filled the position of principal of the Westfield public schools for four years, was principal of the schools of Arthur, Ill., for one year, Superintendent at Martinsville for two years, and Superintendent at Marshall for one year, resigning from the latter responsibility to make the race for County Superintendent of Schools on the Democratic ticket. Although nominated August 4, 1906, he was defeated at the election the following November.

During the Spanish-American War Mr. Bennett enlisted in a Clark County regiment, but was never requisitioned for active service. He became a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in 1906, and is permanent Secretary of Eureka Lodge No. 64, of Marshall. At Westfield, Ill., July 14, 1895, he was united in marriage to Nora Barbee, of which union there is a son, Grendel F., six years of age. Mrs. Bennett, who, previous to her marriage, was an educator, is a daughter of Clark L. and Caroline (Bryant) Barbee, pioneers of Clark County, the former of Westfield and the latter of Wabash Township. Mr. Bennett is not a member of any church, but he attends the Christian Church, and contributes generously towards church and charitable organizations. His wife is connected with the United Brethren Church. Mr. Bennett is a promoter of the gospel of industry, and he is in close touch with an age which has set up practical standards and established practical demands. It is his wish to teach the youth of the land to do things, to adjust their forces, comprehend their limitations, and create out of their environment the greatest possible usefulness and the greatest possible happiness. Mr. Bennett is now the editor and proprietor of the "Democrat," a county weekly with a good circulation.

BENSON, James P.—Although not one of the large landed interests of Wabash Township, the farm of James P. Benson, in Section 29, is so wisely and practically conducted that it nets its owner a comfortable living, and has enabled him to lay aside a competence for the proverbial rainy day. Mr. Benson is a Virginian, and was born September 22, 1837. His father, Alexander Benson, died in early life, and his mother subsequently married John Kesler, who settled in Clark County during the early '40s, but subsequently located in Minnesota, where he died at an advanced age. Mr. and Mrs. Kesler had four sons and three daughters.

James P. Benson was reared on the Wabash Township farm of seventy-five acres, and in 1863 married Sarah Snedeker, daughter of Josiah Snedeker, one of the early settlers of Clark County. After the marriage the young people moved to the farm which they now occupy, and where were born and reared their four sons and three daughters. Of these, Lola is the wife of Charles Ball, in the sawmill business near Brazil, Ind.; Frank married Nellie Marlett, and they reside in Terre Haute, Ind., Ralph married Maggie Lowery, who died June 13, 1906, leaving a son, James B.; Maude, the wife of Robert A. Wallace, a saw dresser living in the State of Washington; Delbert; and Vaughn. Mr. Benson is a Democrat in politics, but he has never been active in office seeking. He is an honorable and highly respected man, and has the best wishes of the community in which has been passed the greater part of his life.

BIGELOW, Charles E.—Success, which is doing that which we have to do to the best of our ability, has dignified the fortunes of the Bigelow family ever since its establishment in Illinois in 1853. Its range of usefulness has extended from the trades of farming and masonry as followed in Edgar and Coles Counties by Andrew J. Bigelow, in the early days to the high educational attainments and shrewd business sagacity evidenced by Charles E. Bigelow, son of the tradesman, in the more recent history of Clark County. Back of the worthy endeavor of the men bearing the name is direct participation in the colonial affairs of New England, and long association with the State of Massachusetts, where Andrew Bigelow was born in 1829. The narrow New England environment pressed heavily upon the spirit of the lad as he grew to maturity, and at the age of twenty-one he journeyed westward to Edgar County, Ill., where he soon found work, and married Addie F. Green, who was born in his own native State. While living on a farm he worked at plastering and brick laying with such success that his services were in demand throughout the county, and he was earning a comfortable living when called from accustomed tasks and creative tools to wield the accoutrements of destruction in the Civil War. He served for three years in the Seventy-ninth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, undergoing practically all of the tortures of war, including eighteen months imprisonment in Libby and other Southern prisons. With the establishment of peace he located in Coles County, this State, on a farm, and in the spring of 1884 moved to Westfield, where he henceforth lived in retirement. He is a Republican in politics, and a member of the Grand Army of the Republic. He has two living children, Charles E. and Effie, the latter the wife of Harry M. McGee, of Chicago.

Charles E. Bigelow was born on his father's farm in Coles County, Ill., December 6, 1868, and at the age of fourteen entered the Westfield College as a student, little thinking that his mature powers would be enlisted as a member of the institution's faculty. Upon graduating in 1888, at the expiration of six years, he took a course at Eastman's National Business College, in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and thereupon became associated with his alma mater in Westfield as lecturer in English, at the expiration of the first year filling the chairs of bookkeeping and mathematics until his retirement in 1903. From 1902 until 1903 he was Vice-president of the College, and he still is a member of its executive committee. Mr. Bigelow possessed sympathy and understanding, two great essentials in educational work, and his efforts left little to be desired from the standpoint of thoroughness and practicability. He was personally highly esteemed by his pupils and fellow teachers, and in his retirement it was felt that a nobly sustaining influence had been withdrawn.

In August, 1903, Mr. Biglow established in Westfield the Bigelow Lumber Company, whose short lease of life already has been productive of gratifying financial results. He married, in 1889, Cora Shuey, daughter of the Rev. J. G. Shuey. Mr. Bigelow subscribes to the principles of the Republican party, but has ever been averse to sharing local political responsibilities. Fraternally he is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Modern Woodmen of America. He finds a religious home in the United Brethren Church.

BLACK, John K., a retired business man of Marshall, Ill., was born on the 4th of January, 1848, in Wabash Township, Clark County. He was the second child in a family of eleven children, and a son of John A. and Nancy Baird Black, both of whom are now dead, the latter passing away September 23, 1889, and the former on September 7, 1904. The parents of the subject of this sketch were among the earliest settlers of Clark County. John K. Black was educated in the common schools of Clark County, and at the age of seventeen he entered the harness shop of Warden Griffith for the purpose of learning the harness makers' trade, quite an honorable, useful and paying business in Clark County forty years ago. After completing his apprenticeship he worked at his trade for a time in Mattoon, Ill., and married his first wife, Miss Mary Matilda Ownby, in Coles County, who was born at Lawrenceburg, Ind., on July 7, 1848. She died at Marshall, Ill., February 24, 1875, two days after the birth of their only child, a son, and which infant son also died February 23, 1875, and was buried in the same casket with its mother. Mr. Black was married to Miss Mary L. Warriner, at Mattoon, Ill., on March 1, 1881, and who was born at Greensburg, Ind., on June 8, 1857. The second marriage of Mr. Black has been blessed with two children, both daughters, the first Ida Elnora, born in Marshall, March 6, 1883, and the second Clara Matilda, born at Marshall, March 26, 1888. Elnora was married June 21, 1904, to Walter F. Hutchinson, an employe of the Bureau of Fisheries of the United States Government at Washington, D. C., and who is now stationed at Manchester, Iowa, where he and his wife now reside.

Mr. Black was engaged for thirty years in the grocery and poultry business at Marshall, and had the continued confidence and esteem of all who knew him during all that time, and in both businesses. He was one of the most successful business men of Marshall. He is a man of most excellent habits and character. He has been Deputy Sheriff of Clark County, Constable of Marshall Township, member of the Marshall School Board, and he is now and has been for eleven years a member of the Board of Supreme Directors of the Court of Honor and for three years Chairman of that Board. He has just been re-elected for another term of four years. Mr. Black is a member of the Congregational Church of Marshall, while his wife and daughter Clara are members of the Christian Church of Marshall. Mr. Black is a member in good standing of the Masonic Fraternity and Odd Fellows' Order, as well as a member of the following social and mutual benefit orders and societies: the Court of Honor, Modern Woodmen, Modern American,

Loyal American and Daughters of Rebekah. Mr. Black is a man of fine business sense, sterling honesty, pleasing address, and few men in the county are personally more popular and well liked than he.

BOOTH, Fenton W.—Of none of her native sons whose mental clarity, high character and genius for law have elevated them to positions of national importance is the town of Marshall more justifiably proud than of Fenton W. Booth. Mr. Booth, who is one, if not the youngest to sit in that August body, is one of the five judges of the Court of Claims, in Washington, D. C., an office which carries with it a life tenure, and which pays six thousand dollars a year. The Court of Claims disposes of more monetary business than does any other court in the United States. It has for its object the investigation of claims against the Government, and as its judgments often run up into millions of dollars, the fees of the attorneys practicing before it often approach enormous figures.

Mr. Booth is the logical conclusion of his inheritance and environment. He comes of a family of which much reasonably might be expected. His father, Lyman Booth, a native of Salem, Ind., was an honored and successful merchant in Marshall for many years; his uncle, the late Newton Booth, was prominent in the history of California as Governor and United States Senator; and his cousin, Booth Tarkington, the Hoosier writer, long since has made his mark upon American literature. His mother, formerly Fayette A. Booth, was a native of Vandalia, Ill., and though not a relative, represented one of the substantial early families of the State.

Mr. Booth was born in Marshall, May 12, 1869, and was educated primarily in the public schools. He subsequently studied at the De Pauw University, at Greencastle, Ind., and graduated in 1892 from the law department of the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor. Locating in Marshall, he became a member of the firm of Golden, Scholfield & Booth, and soon became known as one of the strongest trial lawyers in this part of the State. He had the elements of popularity strongly developed, was of fine personal appearance, possessed a strong and well modulated voice and had a more than average command of the English language. In time he developed exceptional oratorical powers, comparing favorably with the best speakers in the State. A man of splendid enthusiasms, of diversified interests, scholarly attainments and profound legal acumen, he is gifted also as a writer, and thus are many avenues of preferment and usefulness open to him.

Politically Mr. Booth is a Republican, but with no narrow partisan attachment. He served as a member of the Illinois Legislature and was chairman of the county committee of his party. At the election of June 18, 1903, he suffered his only public defeat as a candidate for Circuit Judge of the Marshall district, losing out by twenty-one votes. The law of compensation, however, seems to have been abroad at this period of his life, turning defeat into victory, and acknowledging capacity for more substantial compensations. In losing a position lasting only six years and paying but thirty-five hundred dollars a year he gained an office of honor stretching indefinitely to the end of his working days; one of the most gratifying and desirable within the jurisprudence of the United States.

Judge Booth is fraternally connected with the Knights of Pythias, Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, Red Men and Court of Honor. He married Mable Dean, who was born in Lincoln, Ill., June 14, 1874, and of the union there are four daughters: Margaret, Virginia, Marian and Louise.

BRADLEY, R. H.—In his capacity as physician and surgeon Dr. R. H. Bradley has achieved large results and enviable distinction in Clark County, of which he has been a resident for fifty-five years, and where, in addition to an extensive general practice, he has been pension examiner since 1872, and surgeon for the Wabash Railroad Company since 1882.

The first nine years of his life Dr. Bradley spent in Gallia County, Ohio, where he was born October 2, 1843. His surroundings were humble, and the creed of industry rigidly enforced, but he had the generally recognized advantages of being reared in a large family, the household at the time of his coming having already seven children, and after him came two more. His father, Lewis N. Bradley, was born in New York State August 9, 1805, and December 24, 1827, married Nancy C. Knox, born in Delaware, August 8, 1808, a daughter of Charles G. Knox. The family came from Ohio to Clark County in 1852, where the mother died in 1893, and the father, March 24, 1880. The latter left little means, owing to the large demand upon his resources, but in the hearts of the children who survive him is enshrined as an honorable and upright man, a wise and generous father, and excellent disciplinarian.

After completing his training in the district schools, Dr. Bradley graduated from the Marshall College in 1860, and in 1867 began the study of medicine under Dr. F. B. Payne. Eventually he entered the Chicago Medical College, and after completing the course in March, 1873, established his practice in Marshall, his present home. In Coshocton County, Ohio, January 30, 1878, Dr. Bradley was united in marriage to Isabella Campbell, born in Coshocton County, October 30, 1848, a daughter of Thomas and Martha Campbell. Of this union there have been born three children, of whom Martha L., born January 2, 1879, is the wife of Otho Tibbs, of Marshall, and has three children: Ralph B., Isabella and Robert N.; Stephen was born December 10, 1880; and Mary J. was born September 4, 1887. Dr. Bradley is a member of the American Medical Association, Illinois State Medical Society, Aesculapian Society and the Clark County Medical Society. He is fraternally connected with the Masons, and in politics, is a Republican. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Supplementing his professional equipment are such aids as a pleasing personality, magnetism, sympathy, good nature and unbounded confidence in his beneficent and inexhaustible science.

BRIGGS, Horatio L.—The honored farmer and citizen of Johnson Township, Clark County, whose name heads this sketch, was born in Covington, Ind., on the 5th of August, 1834, and died in that section of the county February 22, 1890. He was the son of David and Nancy Briggs, his father being a native of Virginia who was also enrolled in the sturdy ranks of the American yeomanry, in the United States, as in all other parts of the world, at the basis of the substantial national prosperity and the solid national character. Mr. Briggs' parents, who were of German descent, migrated from Virginia to Indiana about 1800, and became pioneer farmers of that State and identified with its early agricultural progress.

Horatio L. Briggs obtained only a limited education in the district schools of his home neighborhood, and continued to farm near the old Indiana homestead until 1882, when he located on a tract of land near Casey, Clark County, where he remained for three years. His next change of location was to Johnson Township, where he resided and continued to engage in agricultural labors until the time of his death five years later. In fact, Mr. Briggs was a life-long farmer with the exception of about five years when he worked at the cooper's trade, and while residing in Johnson Township was called upon for several years to perform the duties of Justice of the Peace. He was a Democrat, although not an active partisan, and from his youth was a member of the Missionary Baptist Church.

Horatio L. Briggs was married in Coles County, Ill., on June 11, 1857, to Sarah A. Doty, born in the county named July 19, 1839, her father being a native of Kentucky and her mother, of Tennessee. The family was of German birth and well connected. Five children born to Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Briggs were as follows: Charles M. Briggs, August 13, 1858, married and a resident of Clark County; George T., July 22, 1860, also married and living in this county; William R., born June 14, 1862, and died August 20, 1867; James M., born September 6, 1864, and died August 29, 1889; Seville E., born September 2, 1870, and died August 29, 1889. The honored wife and widow is still living, and is the owner of thirty-eight acres of land in the oil district which she has leased on profitable terms.

BRISCOE, William T., M. D.—The life of Dr. William T. Briscoe was raised to observance upon the qualities which sink deep into the foundations of communities, and which sustain, with the inevitability of truth itself, the best mental, moral and material standards of the human race. The ancestral and immediate history of Dr. Briscoe is dealt with on another page of this work, and here it is sufficient to state that his father, Henry Briscoe, a native of Kentucky, was a soldier in the Revolutionary War, and was present at the surrender of Cornwallis, at Yorktown. He survived his emigration from Kentucky to Illinois only about one year, but the death of his wife, formerly Catherine Brookhart, occurred shortly after the building of the log cabin in which was enacted, with its settings of privation and loneliness, the frontier experience of a family which expressed the best in character and influence among the arrivals of 1835. In this chronicle of a noble and well beloved citizen, it seems eminently fitting that preference should be given the impression of one who knew him long and intimately, and who, in addition to a fine reading of his friend's character, has expressed himself with sincerity and great moderation:

"Dr. William T. Briscoe, one of Clark County's pioneers, was born in Jefferson County, Ky., January 27, 1825, and died at his home near Westfield, Ill., May 1, 1891. When he was ten years of age he emigrated with his parents to Clark County, Ill., where he has since lived. Early in life he manifested great prudence, industry and the strong business characteristics that made him so successful in after years. Having saved sufficient money to pay his expenses, he attended the academy under the charge of Mr. Dean Andrews, at Marshall, Ill., and later became a pupil in the school taught by the Rev. H. J. Venerable, at Paris, Ill. His professional education was gained at the Rush Medical College, Chicago. He was admitted to practice medicine in 1849, and continued in active practice until 1870, when he was elected to the Legislature, which position he honorably and ably filled. Since then he has chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits at his well known farms, 'Round Grove,' and at his beautiful home south of Westfield. In common with many of his neighbors, Dr. Briscoe found that oil existed on his land, and so impressed was he with its value that he aided in the organization of a company for its development in 1865. Oil was found on almost all the property he left, and on the old homestead of eighty acres there are twelve wells, each well producing on an average twenty-five barrels of oil a day. There are 940 acres in the Round Grove property.

"Although so benevolently inclined as to spend large sums in aiding others, Dr. Briscoe accumulated a large amount of property, but the greatest fortunes he has left to his family is the invaluable heritage of his irreproachable character. He was temperate, industrious, honest and reliable, and careful and prompt in all business transactions. He always kept his word, and was true to everyone. In this way he inspired public confidence, and opened the way to future prosperity. These things are spoken of more particularly for the benefit of the young, who are so liable to succumb to discouragements in early life. Most of our great men have commenced life in a humble way and were obliged to encounter and overcome many difficulties.

"In 1850, when twenty-five years of age, he was united in marriage to Miss Rosanna L. Keller, near New Albany, Ind. Soon after they came to Westfield Township, and located near the homestead farm known as the old Briscoe place, which is still in the family, a memento of the parents who died when the subject of this sketch, their tenth child, was eleven years old. Success followed his efforts, patronage increased and prosperity came. Several of his business associates of those days survive him and they can testify to the integrity that distinguished him in youth and age. He never indulged in speculation, but dealt exclusively in his legitimate trade. Step by step, he ascended the ladder of wealth, working his way up by hard labor and practice of sterling business qualities, and no one admired honesty in others, or detested fraud, dishonesty or deception more than he did. His rectitude in business was unquestioned. His friendship when secured, never failed. He was always ready to help the deserving, and lend his assistance to the honest laborer. His knowledge of human nature was so acute it seemed like an intuition. A kind heart beat in his bosom, filled with generous motives. He was especially fond of children, and they loved him in return. Hundreds now grown to mature years knew him always as "Uncle Doctor." Among a great number who mourn his death, there are many who add benefactor to friend in their tributes. Many who will say 'I was sick and poor but Dr. Briscoe visited me, waited on me day and night and charged no bill.' Others who will say 'All that I am now or ever shall be, I owe, under God, to Dr. Briscoe.' I was penniless, friendless and discouraged, but he gave me wise council and made me understand that honest labor was honorable, and that character, not money, made the man."

"It was the writer's fortune to know Dr. Briscoe since boyhood. In latter years the acquaintance ripened into warm friendship and close intimacy. In personal appearance he was a man of fine and distinguished presence, one to be noticed among the multitude, and to be remembered by those who had the pleasure of making his acquaintance, as a gentleman possessing the most pleasing social qualities, and marked intellectual ability. Wherever he went he left a favorable and lasting impression. He was known and admired by cultured and prominent people in many States, and he often entertained such persons at his home. But his charming hospitality was not reserved for those favored by fame or fortune. The most humble worthy being received his kindly attention, and the best his board afforded. Dr. Briscoe was a kind and indulgent husband and father. His daughters, the Misses Ada and Hettie, survive him. Zenie, another daughter, died March 9, 1894, and the following May would have been forty years old. Two of the six children in the family died in infancy, and a son, Heber Rexford, died at the age of thirteen years. Mrs. Briscoe was a remarkable help to her husband, and was a woman of more than average mental and spiritual endowments. The fourth oldest of the seven children of Daniel and Zerniah (Starr) Keller, natives of Virginia, she was educated in the public schools, and was well read in medicine, often calling on the sick when her husband was otherwise engaged. When it is known that he often slept on his horse, being overcome by the incessant demand for his services throughout the county, it is not surprising that his faithful wife should wish to share his responsibilities, and often should saddle a horse and start upon her errands of mercy at all times of the day and night. The Doctor's fondest hopes were centered in his children, and he gave them the educational advantages afforded by the convent school 'St Mary's of the Woods,' in Indiana. His last winter was spent mostly in Battle Creek, Mich., under the care of skilled physicians, but the treatment failed to accomplish the restoration which his shattered system needed. His constitution had been slowly undermined by chronic difficulties, and weak as it was, could offer but a feeble resistance to the terrible disease of la grippe, which lent its aid to their deadly work.

"Dr. Briscoe was liberal in his religious views and very tolerant. He had confidence in the mercy and fatherhood of God. He dreamed of a better world beyond the river of death. Those favored with his friendship always found him social and genial. His fund of information was large, and he fully understood and conversed eloquently on all important questions, rendering him a delightful and entertaining companion. He had read much, reflected, reasoned and deduced. All through life he was a stanch Democrat of the old Jefferson type. However, he was always ready to give others their privileges, and was honored and respected by all political parties. He has passed to the vast and impenetrable unknown, the mystery of mysteries. Ripe in years, honored and loved by his family and friends. His life is a proud example for young men to imitate, and his early struggles and successes will teach them not to be discouraged. He was a noble pattern of the true American, a self-made, honest man."

BROWN, J. Frank.—J. F. Brown was a kindly, popular and a Christian citizen of Casey, whose memory as a man is warmly cherished by hundreds of residents of Clark County and whose career as a merchant and a druggist showed ability and the strictest rectitude. He was an especial lover of little children and was, in turn, beloved by them, and when a man is both tender and strong he is of the highest type; he is the true gentleman. These were the dominant traits in the character of J. F. Brown.

Mr. Brown was a Canadian of Stamford, born on the 15th of June, 1844, and died in Casey, Clark County, in November, 1895. He was the son of Thomas and Margaret J. (McDonough) Brown, his father being a native of Yorkshire, England, born December 8, 1819, and his mother, of Rochester, N. Y., and her birthday December 29, 1829. The mother outlived the son whose sketch is here presented by eleven years, passing away May 6, 1906, at the age of seventy-seven years. The grandparents, John and Alice (Kell) Brown, were natives of England, descended from an old Scotch family, who emigrated to Canada at an early day, removed thence to Lockport, N. Y., in 1848, and there the grandfather died. The other members of the family came to Clark County in 1854, and first settled at Marshall. The maternal grandfather, Henry McDonough, was related to Commodore McDonough, and for several years served in the regular army of Great Britain as a band master.

J. Frank Brown was educated in the schools of Marshall until he was sixteen years of age, and then worked for a time in the office of the "Eastern Illinoisan," after which he moved to Westfield, this county, and for four years was employed on the farm of J. B. Briscoe. At the age of twenty, in 1864, he joined the quartermaster's department of the Federal army at Nashville, Tenn. At the conclusion of his duties in this connection he returned to Westfield, where for two years he acted acceptably as deputy postmaster. In 1876, after devoting six years to the drug business he sold his store and good will, and, owing to failing health, retired to a farm in Parkes Township, Clark County. Mr. Brown remained in that locality for about two years, and in 1878 came to Casey, where he remained until his death seventeen years later.

Mr. Brown's first occupation, after making Casey his home, was in connection with W. L. Laingor, and he continued in the mercantile business with Lee Wiley and H. B. Lee & Company. About 1886 he entered the drug business and was identified with it for the remainder of his life. During fourteen years of his residence in Casey he served as Coroner of the county, and, notwithstanding his uncertain health, was a busy and very useful man. He was an active Democrat, a faithful and influential Methodist, and connected with both Masonry and the Knights of Pythias, being a charter member of the Casey lodge in the latter order. The deceased was a man of many strong and admirable characteristics, which, with intimacy, became more and more apparent. He had a smile and a kind and good word for all, and the result was that he readily made friends, held them firmly and dispensed a Christian cheer throughout his sadly shortened life.

J. Frank Brown was married in Parkes Township May 29, 1872, to Miss Sarah A. Lee, a native of Westfield, born December 28, 1851, the fourth daughter of Andrew Lee, a well known, respected and wealthy citizen of Casey. The children born to their union were: Edith May, April 11, 1873; Rose Pearl, December 17, 1876, who married Clifford Vest January 28, 1898, resides in Edgar County and is the mother of Max Wayne Vest, born July 19, 1904; and Lee Andrew, the third child, who was born March 17, 1890.

BRUCE, Dr. W. W., the honored physician of Casey, is the oldest practitioner in continuous years now residing in Clark County. He is a native of the Keystone State, born at Indiana, Pennsylvania, on the 1st of January, 1844, and is the son of James H. and Margarette (Rankin) Bruce. His father, who was a farmer, was born in the same place, dying on the old farm to which he came when a boy of twelve years, and his wife, the mother of the Doctor, was also a native of Indiana County.

Dr. Bruce attended the public schools and the academy at Indiana, Pa., and early decided upon a medical career. His systematic professional education was obtained at the well known Jefferson Medical College, of Philadelphia, from which he was graduated in 1866. After practicing one year in Virginia, he came to Illinois in 1867, and settled permanently in Casey in 1868. For a period of nearly forty years, therefore, he has labored among its people bringing his wholesome cheer and wisdom into hundreds of sick rooms, doing all within human power to establish health, or, if the disease was mortal, to smooth the path of the sufferer to the great beyond. In this profession which comes, next to the ministry, closest to the soul of mankind, he is a most honored figure, both for his skill as a practitioner and his warm and enduring qualities as a man; he has given it his entire being of body, mind and soul, and has his reward.

On January 1, 1873, Dr. Bruce was married to Sarah E. Guthrie, who is a native of Anderson, Ind., daughter of William M. and Margaret (Schroyer) Guthrie, both of her parents being deceased. In politics the Doctor is a Republican and in religion a Presbyterian. He has never sought office of any kind, but is deeply interested in Masonry, belonging to the Chapter No. 70 at Marshall, and Palestine Commandery, No. 27, at Paris, Ill., and for sixteen years has been Master of Casey Blue Lodge. He is also prominently identified with the Knights of Pythias.

BRYDON, James Isham.—The stable and fundamental occupations of farming, school-teaching, journalism and banking successively have contributed to the experiences of James Isham Brydon, Cashier, and one of the organizers, of the First National Bank at Martinsville. Mr. Brydon comes of the honest, industrious and dependable agricultural stock from which the toilers of the towns yearly are recruited, and he has pushed ahead unaided through the shoals which beset the vigorous and aspiring. Born December 17, 1860, in McLean County, Kentucky, he is a son of Benjamin F. and Emily A. (Oldham) Brydon, natives also of Kentucky. In 1871 the family moved to Hamilton County, Ill., where James Isham, then ten years of age, continued the public school education begun in his native State.

Beginning with his nineteenth year, Mr. Brydon left the responsibilities of the farm behind him and engaged in school teaching in Posey County, Ind., for seven years. As on the farm, he developed tastes and resources not required in his immediate work, and a more satisfying outlet for which seemed the field of journalism. In 1887 he became editor and publisher of the Poseyville News, which flourished as a mold of public opinion under the same management four years, and then was sold. In 1890 Mr. Brydon bought the Martinsville Planet, which he sold in 1894, and the same year entered the Martinsville Exchange Bank as Assistant Cashier. In 1902 he established the bank at Annapolis, Crawford County, Ill., and the following year became the Cashier, and one of the organizers, of the First National Bank, at Martinsville.

In 1883 Mr. Brydon was united in marriage to Mary Elder, of Griffin, Ind., and of the union there is a son, Carroll. Mr. Brydon is a Democrat in politics, and for some time has been President of the Board of Education. In religion, he is a Baptist. He is a man of initiative, control and great force of character, having that knowledge of men and affairs which comes only through direct contact with the vigorous and many-sided world in which he moves. The esteem and confidence in which he is held is best indicated by the position which he holds with one of the reliable monetary institutions of Clark County.

BUCKNER, William C.—Of remote German extraction, the Buckner family has been identified with the development of the new world from an early period and several generations of the name have lived and labored in Illinois. Of those who have borne the family name none was more honorable or more honored than the late William C. Buckner, whose brief but well-spent life was passed within the limits of Clark County and whose friends were as numerous as his acquaintance. The occupation of agriculture, which he followed, was one well adapted to his abilities and he proved himself to be an excellent judge of soil, grains and the other departments of his chosen calling. Solely by careful management and constant work he accumulated a sufficient amount to purchase a farm and in 1886 he bought eighty acres near Moriah, where he made his home until death called him from his useful labors.

Clark County was the native home of Mr. Buckner and March 15, 1860, the date of his birth, his parents being Enos and Jane (Canady) Buckner, natives of Illinois and influential farmers of this county. The homestead was situated near West York and there William passed the years of boyhood, but in 1878 he removed with his parents to Orange Township, where his mother died in August, 1882, and his father in March of 1892. Meanwhile he had been given such opportunities as the neighboring schools afforded and also had been trained to proficiency in farm work, so that he was qualified to take up the battle of life on an independent basis. Upon starting out for himself he was united in marriage, December 24, 1882, with Amerika A. Riffe, who was born in Clark County August 21, 1864, and received a fair education in the country schools. In a family of seven children she was next to the oldest, her parents being John I. and Sarah (Swope) Riffe, natives of Indiana, who about 1850 crossed the line into Illinois.

The family of William C. and Amerika A. Buckner there were three children. Sarah J., Emma E., and Allen R. The older daughter is the wife of N. Mills, who is engaged in farming in Jasper County, this State. The younger daughter married Luke Frederick Mills, a farmer living near Casey, Clark County. The son, Allen R., who was born in 1894, is now his mother's assistant in the management of their farm and is being educated in the local schools. A year after the death of Mr. Buckner occurred his widow sold the farm near Moriah and purchased a farm near Casey, in the oil district, where she since has made her home. The family hold membership in the Presbyterian Church, in the work of which Mr. Buckner continued to be deeply interested from boyhood until death. Missionary movements and religious enterprises of every kind received his cordial support and sympathetic co-operation, and his generosity was limited only by his means. Nor was his interest in the public schools less ardent than that in religion. As a Director in the country schools he labored earnestly to promote their interests and advance their usefulness. In politics he always supported the Republican party and at one time he held the office of Commissioner of Johnson Township, but with that exception he declined to become a candidate for official honors, and preferred to devote himself to the management and cultivation of his land.

BURK, Charles M.—During the opening year of the nineteenth century the Burk family crossed the ocean from Ireland to America and settled among the frontier environments of Ohio, where in 1811 a son was born to them whom they named Robert. When grown to man's estate this son in 1830 left the old home and followed the tide of emigration westward, settling in Indiana, where he married Matilda Jackman, a native of that state, born in 1814, of Irish and German descent. About the beginning of the nineteenth century her parents had crossed the ocean to America and soon afterward settled in Indiana. During the year 1843 Robert Burk came to Illinois for the first time and for a year he sojourned in what is now Johnson Township, Clark County, but at the expiration of that time he returned to the old friends in Indiana. His second trip to Illinois was made in 1856, at which time he settled in Clark County as a permanent resident. For almost thirty years he was spared to witness and assist in the upbuilding of this region, and when he died, April 18, 1885, it was felt that one of the most honored pioneers had been called from the scene of his usefulness.

During the residence of Robert and Matilda Burk in Franklin County, Indiana, their son, Charles M., was born August 17, 1848. When he was eight years of age he accompanied his parents to Illinois and for the eight ensuing years he remained with them, leaving home to take his place among the volunteer soldiers defending the old flag. March 21, 1864, he was enrolled as a private in Company G, One Hundred and Twenty-third Illinois Infantry, in which he served under Colonel Biggs, remaining in the army until after the expiration of the war and receiving an honorable discharge during September of 1865. On his return to the parental roof he continued to assist in the cultivation of the farm. At this writing he owns forty acres of fine land on section 5, Johnson township, and is now embarking in the oil industry, confident of securing a flow of oil from his well.

In his marriage Mr. Burk became connected with a pioneer family of Clark County. On Christmas eve of 1872 he married Miss Jane, daughter of James and Jane (McGeath) Brooks, and one of the popular young ladies of the locality. James Brooks was born at Carlisle, Sullivan County, Ind., May 28, 1823, and died in Clark County, Illinois, July 25, 1873. Jane McGeath was born in Clark County December 28, 1818, the year of the admission of Illinois to the Union as a State. The family to which she belonged descended from Irish ancestry and her parents were natives of Loudoun County, Virginia. Not only did she have the distinction of being the first white child born in Clark County, but also at the time of her death, which occurred July 19, 1906, she was the oldest native-born resident of this part of eastern Illinois. During her long life she witnessed the development of this region from an unbroken forest to a country of homes, schools, churches and every accessory of civilization. Among the younger people she was revered and honored, while to other pioneers her name was the synonym of energy, patience and industry. The family of Charles M. and Jane Burk comprises three children. The only daughter, Ella, was born November 16, 1873, and is now the wife of John Cornwell, of Casey. The older son, James, was born May 22, 1880, and married Miss Celia Akers, of Terre Haute, Indiana. The younger son, John, born March 6, 1885, married Josephine Price, of Casey.

As might be supposed of one whose life has been passed to a large extent within the limits of Clark County, Mr. Burk is familiar with the possibilities of the locality and has an excellent knowledge of soils, crops, improvements, and indeed of every detail connected with agriculture. Enthusiastic as to the possibilities of the oil industry, he believes that business has a large future in this district and that its development will result in increased land values and a larger prosperity for all the residents of the region. Though not active in politics, he has a thorough knowledge of our national problems and always has been staunch in his allegiance to the Republican party.

BURNER, Isaac Henry.—When Isaac H. Burner, the well known and honored pioneer farmer of Johnson Township, departed this life August 9, 1906, the community lost a staunch, industrious and useful citizen, and his family and many friends grieve over a death, which from the short-sighted standpoint of humanity seems untimely. The deceased was born in Licking County, Ohio, on the 24th of January, 1854, and therefore had barely passed middle age and entered a period of life which often yields the most valuable works and the richest fruits of character. He was the son of Newton and Sarah (Fallon) Burner, both natives of Ohio, who came west in 1861 and settled in this section of Clark County, their son Isaac being then but seven years of age. The boy was educated in the district schools of Johnson Township, worked on his father's farm with faithfulness and intelligence, and remained on the family homestead until his marriage.

Mr. Bruner's first wife (nee Ida Doolittle) was a native of Crawford County and died September 22, 1892, the mother of three children. The two sons—Earlie E. and Arthur Wilson—are both deceased, while one daughter, Sarah Wilson, is living. The last named was born October 21, 1888, in Johnson Township, and was educated in the district schools.

Mr. Burner's second wife and his present widow was Amanda Cruse, daughter of Zachariah and Rachel Cruse, this union occurring August 24, 1895. Mrs. Rachel C. Burner is a native of Vigo County, Ind., the fourth child in a family of seven, her parents being married in Clark County, Ill., and died in Indiana. By this second union there was one child—Blanche May, born July 2, 1899.

The deceased was a Democrat, but had no ambition for office or public honors. He was content to do his modest part in the world to the utmost of his strength, and left an honorable name. He belonged to the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, Orange Township, and was buried in the cemetery near the church. He was also identified with the Modern Woodmen of America. Mrs. Burner is also identified with the work of the Cumberland Church and is a lady of standing and influence. At the time of his death Mr. Burner was the owner of his original purchase of forty acres, which constituted the family homestead and upon which most of his children were born. Although he had leased the land to prospectors no wells had been drilled; now, however, three fine wells are in operation, with an average flow of 250 barrels daily.

BURNSIDE, Lyman A., M. D.—At practically the outset of his professional career Dr. Lyman A. Burnside is possessed of such advantages as enthusiasm, sympathy, control, industry and public spiritedness. That these will carry him far towards his realization of success is not questioned by anyone who thus far has profited by his skill in diagnosis and treatment. His occupation is the result of natural selection, and is a frank admission that the time honored calling of agriculture, with which his forefathers on both sides of his family long have been connected, failed to satisfy his craving for a larger and more diversified usefulness.

The Burnside family came early to Clark County, and in Dolson Township, where the Doctor was born October 3, 1879, live still his parents, Charles F. and Eliza (Nicholson) Burnside, the former of whom was born in Ohio, and is of German descent, while the latter is a native of Indiana, and is of Scotch lineage. Lyman A. was reared to make himself useful around the home place, and he always had many tasks to perform both before and after school hours. For a year he attended the Central Normal School at Danville, Ind., and thereafter he taught school a year in the country, and then went to St. Louis, as a promising field of activity. After engaging in the real-estate business for a year, he came to Chicago and entered the College of Physicians & Surgeons, and upon graduating from the same in June, 1905, located the following September in Martinsville, his present home.

In 1901 Mr. Burnside was united in marriage to Anna M. Musselman, of Marshall, Ill., and of the union there are two children: Esther A. and Lyman K. Dr. Burnside is a member of the Clark County Medical Society, the Illinois State Medical Society and the American Medical Association. He has an engaging personality, gives the impression of sincerity and good will, and is an earnest and intelligent follower of noble and humanitarian calling.

BURRIS, Morton (deceased).—Many years with their changing scenes and activities have come and then vanished into eternity since all that was mortal of Morton Burris was laid to rest not far from the scenes familiar to his brief but busy life. Yet with all the changes of environment, with all the improvements of recent years, with all the transformations wrought by modern inventions, with all the passing to and fro of people, there still remain a goodly number among the people of Clark County who cherish his memory and pay a fervent tribute to his honorable existence and kindly traits. From childhood he was known among the people of Johnson Township, for this was the place of his birth and the local schools gave him his education. Like many another farmer boy, he learned many lessons from woods and birds and running brooks; habits of close observation stood him in good stead, as did also a fondness for reading, by means of which he gained a knowledge much wider than that of the country school. Diligently and faithfully he toiled as a farmer, little reckoning that the discovery of oil and gas on his land would eventually enhance its value many fold and render possible the acquisition of a livelihood by less laborious methods than he had ever known. Death came to him ere these successes were reached, but his frugal life and wise judgment laid the foundation which eventually brought prosperity to his family.

Little is known concerning the ancestral lineage of Morton Burris, for his father, John, a native of Illinois, and mother, Elizabeth (Meise) Burris, a native of Tennessee, both died when their son was quite young, hence the records were not kept for following generations. For years the homestead was in Johnson Township, Clark County, and there occurred the birth of Morris Burris, January 6, 1840. Early in life he began to be self-supporting, yet in spite of hard work on the farm he was successful in obtaining a country-school education. When the time came for him to select an occupation he drifted into that with which he was most familiar, agriculture, and always afterward remained a farmer. The farm which he left to his heirs is now worth ten times its original price, the increase in valuation being largely due to the discovery of oil and gas on the place.

The marriage of Mr. Burris took place October 16, 1863, and united him with Miss Jane Bennett, a refined and attractive member of an honored family. Her father, Joseph Bennett, was of German descent and was born in Pennsylvania in 1814; his death occurred December 20, 1894. Her mother bore the maiden name of Phoebe Geffs and was born in Virginia of Irish descent. Mrs. Burris was born in Clinton County, Ohio, January 30, 1845, and by her union with Mr. Burris became the mother of the following named children: Queenby, born August 5, 1870; Walter, June 12, 1873; Joseph, June 11, 1877; Annie, July 12, 1883; and Lura, February 17, 1884. Annie is the wife of William Orndorff, a well known young farmer of Clark County. From an early age Mr. Burris was an adherent of the Democratic party. At no time in his life did he swerve from his allegiance to that political organization. However, he cared nothing for office for himself, nor did he ever display partisanship in an undue degree, yet his convictions were strong and were seldom changed when once formed. Many of the earlier movements looking toward the permanent development of the township received his warm and sympathetic support, and he was always relied upon to assist in philanthropic undertakings and local progressive enterprises.

CAMPBELL, John W.—The Wabash Township settlers of 1855 included none who have accomplished their rise from poverty to prosperity with greater earnestness and patience than has John W. Campbell, the owner of a farm of one hundred and twenty acres in Section 21. Mr. Campbell is one of the many native sons of Ohio who have made their way to Clark County, and he was born there in Coshocton County, May 4, 1836. At a very early period in its history his father, Addison Campbell, moved from Virginia to Ohio, taking with him few worldly assets, and depending solely upon his trade of carpentering, and his knowledge of agriculture. He was a good carpenter and a good farmer, and good fortune came his way to the extent of enabling him to establish a home of his own by marrying Lucie Ann Holmes, also a native of Virginia, but an early settler in Ohio. Of this union there were two sons and one daughter, of whom John W. is the oldest. His first wife dying during the middle '40s, Mr. Campbell married Jane Crown, a native of Ohio, and who became the mother of two sons and three daughters. His death occurred in Ohio after considerable success in his useful occupations.

John W. Campbell started about where his father did when face to face with the responsibility of self-support. He was about nineteen when he came to Clark County in 1855, and he took up one hundred and twenty acres of wild land, which he tilled and set to produce and converted into one of the best farms in Wabash Township. He married, in Clark County, Mary Ellen McFarland, who was born in Ohio, a daughter of Robert McFarland, long identified with Wabash Township, and now deceased. Twelve children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Campbell, eight sons and four daughters, of whom four are deceased. Mr. Campbell has given his children a common school education, and all have been fitted, to the best ability of their parents, for useful and practical positions in life. In political preference Mr. Campbell is a Democrat, and though not an office seeker, has stanchly held for honest local government and excellent school advantages. The family are members of the Methodist Church.

CARR, Claborn A.—In the late Claborn Anderson Carr, the well known tile manufacturer of Casey, the community recognized a man of great natural force and high character. He possessed decided mechanical talents, as well as fine business ability, was successful in his private undertakings and yet public-spirited and endowed with strict moral and religious qualities. Whether considered as a family man, a private citizen or a public character of influence and standing, his record was unimpeachable, and his loss created a void in the community which can never be exactly filled.

Claborn A. Carr was a native of Clay County, Ind., born April 30, 1830, the son of John and Sarah (Comber) Carr. His parents were both natives of the Hoosier State, whose natal year was about 1800, and they were raised and educated in Indiana. The father was a man of honor and prominence, and died in 1865, a few months after his removal to Coles County, Ill. The son, Claborn, was reared on his father's Indiana farm, where he was hardened into stalwart manhood by the usual labors which fell to the lot of a faithful farmer's son. Although an eager reader and especially interested in historical and Biblical research, his circumstances barred his advance beyond the limits of the district school, but notwithstanding that he never attended college he became a remarkably well informed man, and many who were familiar with the inside of university walls were not able to talk with greater intelligence or precision than he, while in the branches noted above many a professor might listen to him with profit.

After his marriage in 1853 Mr. Carr removed to Casey and for several years was employed as an engineer at the Baughman Mills. About 1871 he established some small tile works, whose capacity was increased with the growth of his business, which became profitable and an industrial feature of the locality. Both his ability and honesty were bringing him a good competency when his sudden end came to shock and grieve his kindred and numerous friends. While making some repairs on a new kiln the supports gave way and the structure collapsed, killing Mr. Carr and two of his employes, on the 7th of May, 1893.

At the time of this sad casualty the deceased was among the most prominent and respected citizens of his section of the county. He had long been a local leader of the Democracy, having ably served as Alderman, Assessor and otherwise officially, and he had been for many years a pillar of the Presbyterian Church—an Elder, Superintendent of the Sunday-school and a liberal supporter to the cause, both in services and donations. He was also a progressive Mason and Odd Fellow, and honored for his goodness of heart and charities to the deserving.

Claborn A. Carr was married to Eliza Jane Steward, at Martinsville, Ind., February 13, 1853, his wife being a native of Knox County, Ky., whose parents died when she was quite a young girl. They became the parents of seven children—Ella, Mary C., Rebecca, Jo, Elizabeth, Jefferson, who died February 7, 1876, at the age of twelve years, and John.

CASTEEL, Harry G.—Because of the nature of its commodities, and the courtesy and business sagacity of the men directing its affairs, the enterprise of Archer & Casteel, dealers in carriages, wagons and farming implements, is one of the best known and most dependable in Marshall and vicinity. This concern was established in 1902, and the firm carry a large line of vehicles and implements, supplying a growing demand for the latter among the farmers of a large country area.

Harry G. Casteel, junior member of the firm, is one of the young and energetic business men of Marshall, and represents one of the early and honored families of Clark County, where he was born June 27, 1872. His father, S. Casteel, a farmer by occupation, was born in Zanesville, Ohio, February 2, 1838, and came to Clark county fifty-three years ago. He was a single man at that time, with few worldly possessions, but he soon got a start in life, and married Annie E. Lockard, a native of Clark County, and born January 29, 1840. Besides Harry G., there were two sons and four daughters in the family: John W., Robert, Mrs. Lulu Sangers, Mrs. John W. Lewis, Mrs. Kate Handy and Nellie.

Previous to embarking upon his present business, Mr. Casteel lived on a farm in Edgar County four years, and in fact spent his entire youth in either learning or practicing the science of agriculture. The information thus acquired is of incalculable use to him in his present venture. He was educated in the public schools, and is a young man of inquiring mind and appreciation of the fine and worth-while things of life. July 24, 1895, he married Della Riley, daughter of a prominent Clark County farmer, and of the union there is a daughter, Naomi, born March 31, 1901. Mr. Casteel is a Republican in politics, and in religion is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Though socially inclined, and a man of genial and likable manner, he is not identified with fraternal organizations.

CLARK, Thomas W.—An example of clean, interest-compelling and high-minded journalism is found in the "Marshall Republican," successor to the "Clark County Acorn," at one time a Populist organ, but since November, 1897, owned and published as a Republican paper by Thomas W. Clark. The hard school of practical experience has removed Mr. Clark a long way from the merely theoretical newspaper man. He has seen many sides of life, and rubbed up against many of its sharp corners. Of occupations he has known many, and of mankind he has made an exhaustive study.

Mr. Clark was born in a humble environment in Highland County, Ohio, July 16, 1846, and in the same State and county were born his parents, John and Sarah E. (Dunlap) Clark, the former in Marshall and the latter in Greenfield. John Clark, a shoemaker by trade, brought his family to Marshall, Ill., in 1852, and in 1859 removed to Livingston, Clark County, Ill., where he plied his trade until 1896. His death occurred in Marshall in 1899, his wife having predeceased him in 1892. Mr. Clark dignified his calling with thoroughness and conscientiousness, and he therefore was successful. He was a man of character, ideas and varied capacity. At first a Whig, he later became a Republican, and he served as Postmaster of Livingston from 1860 to 1892. In early life he was an Odd Fellow, but he afterward became a Mason, his son, Thomas W., being of those who conferred the degrees upon him. For several years he was Treasurer of the local lodge. In religion he was a Methodist, and for more than thirty years was a deacon in the church.

Widely contrasting experiences shaped the youth of Thomas W. Clark. At the age of thirteen he was working at the shoemaker's bench, and his evolution from this elementary occupation to that for which he is best fitted, and which therefore represents his largest sphere of usefulness, is an interesting one. Scientists declare that the higher or more intellectual walks of life are more largely recruited from the shoemaker's bench than from the ranks of any other tradesmen. The explanation is offered that the cobbler, in bending over his work, sends the blood to and nourishes the frontal or intellectual center of the brain. The first vista that opened to the youthful shoemaker was the Civil War, in which, at the age of sixteen, in July, 1862, he enlisted in Company H, Seventieth Illinois Infantry. He was mustered in at Springfield, and mustered out in October, 1862, at Alton, Ill. Re-enlisting in July, 1863, in Company H, One Hundred and Fifteenth Indiana Infantry, he accompanied General Burnside on the Knoxville campaign, his term of service expiring in February, 1864.

In February, 1864, he again enlisted in the service as a member of Battery H, First Indiana Heavy Artillery, and with the Department of the Gulf, with headquarters at New Orleans, participated in the battles of Fort Morgan, Fort Gaines, Spanish Fort, Blakely and Mobile, and was mustered out at Baton Rouge, in January, 1866.

The war over, Mr. Clark followed his trade for a short time, and then engaged in the grocery business in Livingston for ten years. He came to Marshall in 1876 and became agent for the American, Adams and Pacific Express Companies until purchasing the Clark County Acorn in 1897. He also is engaged in the real-estate business. Mr. Clark is a Republican in politics, and has served as Mayor of Marshall two terms. Fraternally he is connected with Lodge No. 133, A. F. and A. M. and Chapter No. 70, R. A. M. He is Commander of the W. B. Archer Post, No. 119, G. A. R.

The marriage of Mr. Clark and Sarah Jane Ball occurred January 17, 1872, at Livingston, Ill. Mrs. Clark was born near Columbus, Ohio, and is a daughter of Daniel Morgan and Elizabeth (Leach) Ball, natives of Zanesville, Ohio. The Ball family settled in Livingston in 1870, and before retiring from active life Mr. Ball engaged in both farming and merchandising. His wife died February 10, 1903. She was the mother of one son and three daughters. Mr. and Mrs. Clark are the parents of eight children: Robert H., who married Ella J. Hutchinson, of Chicago; Lillian M., who died in October, 1906; Ernest L., a resident of Marshall; Stella B., who died in infancy; Thomas W. F., who married Ethel Abbey Creal, and lives in Terre Haute, Ind.; Ruth G., who was born the day President Grant died, and who lives with her parents; Harriet Eloise, who lives at home; and Ralph A., who is Assistant Editor of the Clark County Acorn.

CLAYTON, Edward S.—One of the hard-working, reliable, independent and successful members of the journalistic fraternity, Edward S. Clayton, editor and proprietor of the "Martinsville Planet," is native to Illinois soil, being born in Shelby County, October 24, 1860. His parents are Sylvester and Salina (Trosper) Clayton, his father being born in Ohio and his mother in Illinois. The son is of democratic training, since he was reared on a farm and educated in the common schools of his neighborhood. He remained at home until his marriage at the age of twenty-five years, when he settled on a farm in Douglas County, Ill., which he conducted for two years prior to engaging in the printing business.

Mr. Clayton's first venture in the latter line was as proprietor of a job printing office at Arthur, Ill., but he soon afterward removed to Atwood, that State, where he continued the business for about three years, in the meantime (July, 1887), establishing the "Atwood Herald." In 1890 he disposed of his plant and business, and during the succeeding eight years engaged in farming in Douglas and Coles Counties, Ill. Having purchased the "Planet," of Martinsville, he became a resident and an important factor of the town in February, 1898. His job business is an important industrial feature of Martinsville, and the paper itself is an independent journal which is a credit to the community and does much in the advancement of its best interests. Personally, Mr. Clayton leans toward Republicanism.

In 1884 Edward S. Clayton was united in marriage with Alice E. Smith, and they have become the parents of Sylvester and May. He is a Modern Woodman of America, and in religion, a Methodist.

COMSTOCK, William Riley.—With the exception of the signs of human habitation wrought by three white settlers within its borders, Westfield Township in 1829 retained its primeval simplicity of appearance, having Indian trails instead of roads, wild game instead of domesticated animals, and no architecture save that devised by the cabin dweller in the extremity of his need. The following year several wagons came creaking over the prairies from the East, loaded with household necessities and manned by the stalwart souls whose mission was the redemption of the wilderness. One of these homeseekers was William Comstock, who, after a careful survey of his surroundings, drew rein and unloaded his possessions on the northeast corner of the township. He was a native of Kentucky, and was accompanied by his wife, who formerly was Martha Hollingsworth, of South Carolina. Mr. Comstock went to Indiana in early life, where it is probable that he married, and from where he came to Illinois. He was equal to the task he had set himself, and the farm which witnessed his hard and persistent early struggles was destined to remain in the family until a new century had set its seal upon history. William Riley Comstock, the youngest of his five sons, was born upon this farm June 29, 1839, and is the sole survivor of this honored pioneer family.

William Riley Comstock drew whatever advantages he had from the rude and unsettled community in which his youth was cast. He attended the district schools of Westfield Township, but his education was limited in the extreme, and his general information was gained principally while stretching himself in front of the glowing logs of the fireplace winter evenings, and reading and rereading the few standard works brought by his father from the East. He had a lovable, confidence-inspiring nature, and he grew into a lovable man. The idea of a home taker to share his fortunes occurred to him early, and in 1860 he was united in marriage to Nancy J. Lee, who died within a year. On July 16, 1863, he was united in marriage with Mary C. Dawson, with whom he lived for nearly forty years, or until his death, August 27, 1902. Rev. Colman Dawson, father of Mrs. Comstock, was a Baptist minister in Westfield Township, who, with his wife, formerly Christina Drake, daughter of Benjamin Drake, is deceased. Mr. Comstock never moved from the old homestead, and never sought outside interests. His wife left the old place in the fall of 1902, settling in her present home in Westfield, although she still owns the farm of one hundred and sixty-two acres and a half five miles northeast of Westfield.

Mr. Comstock was an intelligent voter, but never bound himself to the tenets of any one party. September 17, 1876, he united with the Baptist Church, and his wife soon after became a communicant of the same denomination. He was a generous donator to worthy causes, and kind always to those less fortunate than himself, but his farm was his life work, his comfortable home his castle, and the visits of friends his delight. Having no children, this couple were all in all to each other, and the harsh word, or momentous misunderstanding, never invaded the peace and harmony of their days.

Mr. and Mrs. Luther E. Cooley and Group

CONNELLY, Everett.—In no occupation which awaits the striving of mankind is the advantage of congeniality and natural ability more emphatic than in the profession of law. Especially is this true when, as in the law, the material compensations are rarely, if ever, commensurate with the services given. The honest practitioner must, therefore, rely upon those satisfactions which appeal to the intellect and heart, or in large degree must trust to the opportunities of politics and general business for which his training makes ample provision. To the higher understanding of his calling one must ascribe the success of Everett Connelly, who became Judge of Clark County at an earlier age than has any other incumbent of that office in the State, and who, probably, has few superiors in those essentials of equipment upon which is based predictions of permanent and worth-while renown.

The early life of Mr. Connelly was spent on the farm in Parker Township, Clark County, Ill., where he was born September 8, 1877. The same county and township witnessed the birth of his father, George S. Connelly, March 6, 1849, while his mother, formerly Catherine Rogers, was born in Marshall, this county, October 22, 1858. The father was of Irish, and the mother of Scotch-Irish descent. Until the campaign of 1896 George S. Connelly was a staunch Democrat, but he afterward as steadfastly espoused the Republican cause until his death, August 30, 1906. In religion he was a Universalist, while his wife, who died September 30, 1901, was a Cumberland Presbyterian.

The early tendency of Everett Connelly was away from the farm and out into the world of more strenuous activity. He believes so firmly in himself that the gravest obstacles seemed but temporary obstructions, to be overcome by the force of his will and purpose. He refused to let the deadly monotony or grinding routine of farming stifle his craving for knowledge, and utilized every moment of leisure for the widening of his mental horizon. While still on the farm he read many high-grade literary and historical works, and at the age of sixteen was deeply absorbed in politics, the science of which has for its object the regulation of man in his relations to the State. When two years of age his parents moved from Parker to Orange Township, and in 1888 settled on a farm a mile north of Casey. In the fall of 1894 Mr. Connelly entered the Casey high school, and in May, 1897, graduated therefrom as valedictorian of his class. Upon the advice of A. C. Garrison and other influential friends he began the study of law, and entered the law department of the University of Michigan in the fall of 1897. Graduating from that institution in June, 1900, he was admitted to practice at the bar of Illinois in October, the same year, and the following December located in Marshall, which since has been his home.

Although the scion of one of the strongest Democratic families in Clark County, Mr. Connelly has been a Republican since old enough to form opinions of his own, and he first took the stump in defense of his party in the campaign of 1896. He proved a forceful and convincing speaker, and especially at home when driving home his opinions in favor of some deserving candidate. In the campaigns of 1900 and 1904 he not only duplicated but added to his former influence. Appointed by Governor Yates to fill the unexpired term of J. C. Perdue, County Judge, January 13, 1902, Mr. Connelly the following fall was duly elected to the office, receiving in a strong Democratic community a Republican majority of three hundred and sixty votes. He retired from the County Judgeship the first Monday in December, 1906. The administration of Judge Connelly was characterized by an almost literal interpretation of the law, and by a rigorous and somewhat severe attitude toward offenders. He was especially uncompromising in enforcing laws governing the sale of intoxicants, and in this connection imposed some of the highest fines and required some of the highest bonds of any Judge in the State of Illinois. He was above favoritism and beyond the control of outside influences, and won a reputation which will commend him in future to the highest honors within the gift of the people of the State.

The marriage of Mr. Connelly and Nellie Lake, of Marshall, occurred February 11, 1906. Mrs. Connelly represents one of the earliest and most highly honored families of Clark County. Mr. Connelly is fraternally connected with the Court of Honor, having joined the same in December, 1901. In religion he is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Marshall. He is a man of strong personality and substantial traits of character, and led by rugged and practical ideals, is destined to fare far afield in quest of the noblest compensations of labor.

CONNELLY, Richard M.—When Richard M. Connelly left the scene of his earnest and successful labors in Clark County, February 13, 1905, he took with him into the unknown the regret of a devoted family and the good will of all who had ever known him. An enterprising and honorable man, he made the best of the opportunities by which he was surrounded, and though his later years were overshadowed by the adversity of ill health, he was enough of a philosopher to bear this, as well as the successes of his life, with dignity and moderation.

Mr. Connelly was born on a farm in Parker Township, Clark County, April 6, 1847, and is a son of Josiah and Sallie (Dickson) Connelly, Clark County pioneers of 1832, and both of whom died in Parker Township, the former in 1870 and the latter in 1875.

In youth Mr. Connelly displayed great energy and foresight, and was painstakingly studious while attending the district schools. He has his dreams of easier roads to wealth than following the plow and harvesting grain in the heat of an August sun, and in 1864 made an overland trip to Montana with a team and wagon, intending to work in the mines or engage in cattle raising on a large scale. The country, however, was not to his liking, so he returned to Clark County with a large appreciation of its advantages, and content to await the slow rewards of the seasons. April 18, 1883, he married Sarah J. Black, daughter of Jackson and Rebecca (Gray) Black, natives of Ohio, and of German descent. Thomas Black, grandfather of Jackson, came from Germany in 1790, settling first in Virginia, and later moving to Ohio, where he owned a large tract of land, and engaged in farming on an extensive scale.

With scarcely any business education, Richard M. Connelly made a fine success of farming, raising large numbers of blooded horses, cattle, sheep, hogs and eventually succeeding to 390 acres of land. He knew how to make a pleasant home and to utilize his land to the best advantage, and it was generally conceded that he was one of the scientific and thorough agriculturists of Parker Township. When his health began to fail he traveled quite extensively, hoping much from a change of climate and surroundings, and even returned to Montana and worked in the mines which he had visited in the '60s. He was a Democrat in politics, and fraternally was connected with the Masons. Mr. and Mrs. Connelly were the parents of four children: Argenta, born August 21, 1888; Cleveland, born September 9, 1889; Lyman S., born May 12, 1891; and Goldie M., born January 7, 1898.

CONNELLY, William Morgan.—The Illinois cabin builders of 1832 included Josiah Connelly, who, as his name implies, was of Irish descent, and who laid the foundations of a family which ever since has contributed to the up-building of the agricultural prestige of Clark County. Josiah prospered financially and generally, and left as one of many legacies the children who bear his name and maintain his reputation for honesty, industry and many sided worth. Of these children, William Morgan has been one of the most successful. He was born in Lawrence County, Ind., February 7, 1822, and therefore was about ten years old when he accompanied the rest of the family to Clark County in 1832. Though of tender years, he proved a useful factor in clearing the new land, and he grew with its growth, and developed with its increasing capacity for production. His advantages were meagre indeed, and limited to a few months of schooling during the winter season, and he was obliged to walk a long distance in the biting cold of the prairies to a little log schoolhouse, and return over the same dreary stretch when the shadows began to lengthen in the late afternoon. Many tasks awaited him at the end of his educational journey, but he performed them cheerfully, and went to sleep at night with that complete exhaustion which induces sound sleep and as sound digestion.

Mr. Connelly established a home of his own July 1, 1840, marrying Nancy Robinson, a native of Illinois, and who, with her infant, died June 15, 1852. February 5, 1854, Mr. Connelly married Lydia Hammond, a native of Vermont, and born August 22, 1834. Mrs. Connelly, who survives her husband, is a daughter of Alanson and Sallie (Tarble) Hammond, of English descent, and born also in Vermont. To Mr. and Mrs. Connelly were born six children, one of whom died in infancy. Of those living, Amanda was born December 8, 1854; Lilly was born December 22, 1858; Josiah was born November 9, 1860; Alanson was born January 20, 1863; and Francis was born October 6, 1870. Mrs. Connelly now is seventy-three years old, but her heart is young and her vigor but little impaired. She is a charitable and lovable woman, attending to her business affairs with rare good judgment, and very generous in her aid of those to whom life seems a hard and dreary undertaking.

That Mr. Connelly was more than usually successful is proved by his large accumulation of land, which at one time aggregated over a 1,000 acres. This he gained without outside help, and much of it he disposed of previous to his death. For many years he was active in local Democratic politics, was a member of the Board of Education, and served three terms as Justice of the Peace. He was inclined to sociability, liked to gather around him cheerful people, and was a devoted member of the Masonic fraternity. Honest, industrious, frugal and progressive, he inspired respect and consideration for the profession of farming, rearing his sons to follow the same pursuit, and his daughters to become the wives of farmers. His expectations in this respect have been realized, and thus his progeny occupy many farms in this fertile and productive section of Illinois.

COOK, Melvin L.—Melvin L. Cook, for fourteen years a successful traveling salesman for Holman & Company, of Terre Haute, Ind., and previously well known as a business man of Casey, is a native of Chautauqua County, N. Y., where his life commenced July 22, 1842. His parents were John W. and Lodica (Drake) Cook, both natives of New York, his father dying in Colorado and his mother in California. They came to Illinois in 1848, and for four years the father engaged in farming in Cumberland County, removing then to the town of Cumberland, where until 1876 he conducted a nursery business. His next change of location was to Colorado, where he died October 28, 1888.

Melvin obtained his education in the district schools of Clark County, worked six years in a printing office at Vandalia, and then enlisted for service in the Union Army, joining Company

G, Fifty-fourth Illinois Volunteer Infantry. This honorable record covered four long years, a portion of the time as Sergeant of his company, and after the war farmed for four years in Casey Township.

On the sixth of June, 1872, Mr. Cook was united in marriage to Miss Eliza C. Lang, daughter of John J. Lang, one of the oldest pioneers of this section of the county. As far back as the Presidency of Andrew Jackson he entered land where the town of Casey now stands, and, after keeping a hotel there for forty years died March 15, 1882. After his marriage Mr. Cook engaged in both the lines of business followed so long by his father and his father-in-law, being a nurseryman for three years and a hotel keeper for six. He was then identified with mercantile pursuits for four years, and in 1893 went on the road for Holman & Company, of Terre Haute, a position which his wide acquaintance, popularity and substantial business qualifications enable him to fill with credit to himself and profit to the house. He covers a large territory surrounding Casey, and, in the interest of the firm, drives fully 400 miles each week, his employment being both strenuous and healthful.

Only one child has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Cook, and to the deep grief of both he was taken away from them at the interesting age of two years. They own a beautiful new home in Casey, where Mr. Cook holds considerable other real estate, among his holdings being the Golden Rule Business Block, corner of Main Street and Jasper Avenue. He built the first brick business structure in Casey, pulling up the corn stalks and digging the trenches himself for its foundation, and hauling the brick from a point fourteen miles distant. Mr. Cook altogether is considered a very energetic and important factor in the foundation and growth of the town. In politics he is a Republican, and, in his fraternal relations belongs to the G. A. R. and the I. O. O. F.

COOLEY, Luther Edward.—The late Luther E. Cooley, who for nearly thirty years was an honored citizen of Johnson Township comes of an early pioneer family of Crawford County, Ill., as does his widow, who, in maidenhood was Hannah Beeles. Mr. Cooley was an Ohio man, born on the 11th of December, 1836, and died on the old family homestead in Section 26, where most of his family of fifteen children were born. His death occurred June 20, 1901, at the age of sixty-five. The deceased was the son of William and Sophia Cooley and was the youngest in a family of eleven children, his parents coming to Crawford County about 1840. There his mother died, his father passing his last years in Clay County, Ill. They lived the lives of industrious, faithful, unpretentious agriculturists, giving their children the best education within their power and rearing them to godly ways.

Luther E. Cooley obtained his education in the district schools of Crawford County, and assisted his father on the home farm until his marriage to Miss Hannah Beeles, daughter of James and Mary Beeles, on the 18th of June, 1857. They came to Clark County in 1872 and settled on sixty acres of timber land in Johnson Township, which, in the years to come was cleared, were made into a comfortable homestead. Although the original log house gave place to a modern residence the first tract was not increased in area. Not only did the wise improvements made by Mr. Cooley increase the value of the estate, but the discovery of oil has greatly added to it. The oil well drilled in August, 1907, on the property owned by the widow is already a good producer, while there are four wells on the original purchase of sixty-acres. The deceased was a Democrat of earnestness and influence, was School Director for many years, served as Road Commissioner, and was a man of practical ability in many ways. He was a leader in the religious and charitable work of the Christian Church, as is his widow and other members of the family at the present time.

Mrs. Luther E. Cooley was born in Ohio on the 16th of December, 1840, being brought by her parents first, to Indiana, and, when eight years of age, to Crawford County, Ill. She was one of twins, and the seventh in a family of ten children. Her father was a farmer and both parents died in Crawford County, being highly respected as pioneers of great moral worth and of that common-sense usefulness which makes for the best good of American communities. Her marriage in 1857 resulted in fifteen children, of whom nine died in infancy and the following six are living: Elias Franklin, born May 20, 1859, in Crawford County, married Ella Wright, and is a farmer residing in Clinton County, Ill.; Mitty Ann, born July 28, 1862, now Mrs. Chesley Ring, the wife of a Johnson Township farmer and the mother of two children; Aaron Nicholas, born August 26, 1880, who married Cora Tharp, by whom he has had two children, and who is also a farmer of Johnson Township. As stated, the widow is now living on the old homestead. She is in comfortable circumstances, and highly honored not only for her own intrinsic worth but for the substantial part she has taken in the futherance of her husband's best interests and the material and moral welfare of her home community.

COWDEN, Alfred G.—Alfred G. Cowden was born in Licking County, Ohio, in 1834. The name of his father was James and that of his mother Elizabeth. They moved to Clark County in 1839. The maiden name of the wife of our subject was Margaret Wells, and he was married to her on April 3, 1859. Six children, all girls, and all now married, were the result of this marriage of Alfred G. Cowden and Margaret Wells. Our subject has taught school for thirty-three terms, and has been Justice of the Peace for thirty consecutive years. He has been a successful school teacher, has been a good Justice of the Peace, and has been a successful farmer. He has been a representative to the Grand Lodge of the Odd Fellows Order for eight consecutive sessions. He is a Republican in politics and a member of the United Brethren Church, and was a soldier in the War of the Rebellion, having served as a member of the First Missouri Cavalry until he was discharged on account of a sunstroke, a disability received in the service and in the line of his duty. Mr. Cowden is one of the most intelligent, genial and popular men in his township. He is a man who makes friends and holds them, and on account of his conservative habits of thought and action rarely makes an enemy.

CRAIG, William B.—The success which has come to William B. Craig is of his own making, and may be traced to a disposition to make the best of his advantages and opportunities. This popular dealer in hay, coal and broom corn in Martinsville, has lived always in Clark County, and the first years of his youth were spent on the farm of his maternal grandfather,

Father P. R. Ducey

John Towell, in Martinsville Township. His parents, Robert and Susan (Towell) Craig, left no impression whatever upon the life of their son, for the mother died when he was an infant, and his father, after serving in the Civil War, abandoned his home and children and never since has been heard from.

Upon attaining his majority, Mr. Craig started out to battle for his independence, working on farms in the county by the month, and saving enough to marry, at the age of twenty-four, Alice Atkins, a native daughter of Clark County. The young couple made their home at first on a rented farm, and in 1894 moved to Martinsville, where Mr. Craig became a coal, hay and broom corn merchant on a small scale. He was even more successful than he had anticipated, and at the end of two years was in a position to own his own warehouse, which is a large and well protected structure. He carries many kinds of coal, loose and baled hay, and a large stock of broom corn, and has done much to encourage the hay and broom corn industry in Clark County.

A deep shadow fell across the home of Mr. Craig in 1901, when the wife who had aided in his success was taken from him by death, leaving to his care five of their seven children. Sylvia died at the age of twenty years; Earl; Goldie Belle; Cosy Fay, who died at the age of fourteen years; Maude; Lulu and Fred. Mr. Craig is a staunch supporter of the Democratic party, but has never had official aspirations. Fraternally he is connected with the Modern Woodmen of America. He is an energetic and capable business man, and his practical and honorable efforts redound to the permanent good of the community in which he lives.

CROUCH, James.—With the exception of a few years spent in Kansas, during which he experienced continuous reverses owing to unfavorable seasons for agricultural pursuits, Mr. Crouch has been a continuous resident of his native county of Clark, where now he owns and operates 130 acres of land situated on Section 10, Johnson Township. With the exception of ten acres of timber pasture, the land is under cultivation, and the constant labors of the owner have brought the tract into a condition of fertility second to none. The farm lies in the oil belt with excellent wells in the vicinity and while as yet oil has not been found here, indications point to its presence and at this writing (1907) different oil companies are solicitous to secure a lease of the property.

Near the old landmark originally known as the Devee mill, but later best known as the Crouch mill, stood the house where James Crouch was born December 2, 1860, and his earliest recollections are associated with the farm situated eight and one-half miles southeast of Casey in Johnson Township. His father, William, was born in Ohio of German extraction, and at an early day removed to Illinois, where he met and married Mary Dosbaugh, the daughter of John Dosbaugh, owner of the old water-mill previously mentioned. Mrs. Crouch was born in Germany, but was only two months old when in 1830 she was brought to the United States by her parents, hence her early recollections were of the new world and the frontier environment of Illinois. When Jame Crouch was a boy of six years he was orphaned by the death of his father and afterward he passed the years of youth on the old homestead, attending the country schools in the winter and helping in the fields during the summer. Knowing little of other localities, he resolved to remove further west and try his fortune where lands were cheaper. In 1885 he took his bride to Kansas and settled on a farm of one-half section area, which he had secured by purchase. From the first misfortune beset him and after he had worked for four years without securing a crop of any kind he decided to return to his old home. Since then he has had no desire to leave the surroundings of his youth, but is content to remain in a region where farming may be prosecuted with success.

The marriage of Mr. Crouch took place February 22, 1885, and united him with Miss Mary Alice Orrell, daughter of Samuel and Susan (Imes) Orrell, whose sketch will be found elsewhere in this volume. The family of James Crouch comprises the following children: William E., born February 10, 1887; Jesse Arthur, November 19, 1888; Samuel Rex, December 31, 1892; James Harlan, March 29, 1895; and John Russell, November 19, 1903. During the year 1903 the family suffered from small-pox and the eldest son, William E., has never regained his health since being attacked by that dread disease. However, although a confirmed invalid, he remains patient and hopeful and cheers others with his quiet optimism.

Owing to the illness of his son Mr. Crouch of recent years has remained at home as closely as possible. However, he neglects no duty devolving upon a public-spirited citizen, and for several terms ably filled the office of School Director. During the spring of 1907 he was elected Township Commissioner. While he usually votes the Democratic ticket, he is in sympathy with the doctrines of the Populist party and favors its platform in many of its most important essentials. Years ago he began to keep posted concerning public affairs and national problems, and nothing has been allowed to interfere with this habit, the result being that he is among the best-posted men of his township. For four or more years he was very active in the work of Camp No. 9472, Modern Woodmen of America, at Moriah, in which he officiated as a trustee, but the illness of his son prevents him from attending the meetings regularly and he therefore is less active than in former years.

CUNNINGHAM, Henry V.—The above well known farmer and citizen, connected by marriage with the revered Rev. George Sandol (whose biography will be found on another page of this work), was born in Butler County, Ohio, March 30, 1853. He was the son of Robert Cunningham, a prosperous Pennsylvania farmer of English descent, and of Diana (Yargus) Cunningham, a Virginia lady of Scotch-Irish ancestry. Henry V. was reared on the Ohio farm to which his father removed from the Keystone State, performing the usual duties attending such a life and obtaining his education from the country schools in his neighborhood. In 1860, when he was seven years of age, his parents became residents of Clark County, and until he was twenty-one years of age he remained on the home farm, where his father died in 1891 and his mother in 1899.

On the 26th of March, 1876, Mr Cunningham was united in marriage to Miss Emma Sandol, a native of Clark County, whose father was the well known Rev. George Sandol, mentioned above. Of the five children born to this union two survive—Golden C., born October 31, 1889, and Tinas S., born August 9, 1894; both are sons. The fine family homestead of 120 acres is located two and one-half miles north of Martinsville. Mr. Cunningham died March 14, 1904, leaving a widow and the two children mentioned, aged fourteen and ten years. The fall after his demise Mrs. Cunningham moved with her sons to Martinsville, having bought a home in the eastern part of the city, and rented her farm. The two boys are attending school—the elder being a student at the high school, upright, studious, bright and ambitious to be a business man, while the younger seems inclined to cling to the staid, comfortable and substantial life of the agriculturist. They are all members of the Church of God.

The deceased was not only one of the best known farmers of Martinsville Township, but was one of the best judges of horses in that section of the county, and raised some fine specimens of that noble animal. His stock was highly valued, three of his horses bringing the highest prices of any ever sold in Clark County. Mr. Cunningham was honest in every relation of life, was industrious, and planned his business and farming operations with skill, fine intelligence and judgment. He was a helpful neighbor, a kind husband and father, and a useful citizen. Although voting the Republican ticket, he never aspired to be a politician, or a public man, but was perfectly content to limit the work of his life to a comparatively small compass, cultivating that field faithfully and reaping from it a full harvest for the benefit of those nearest and dearest to him.

CUNNINGHAM, John L.—A name inseparably linked with the agricultural and mercantile development of Clark County is that of John L. Cunningham, who was born in the State of Virginia, March 5, 1824, and who died in Martinsville, Ill., February 25, 1898. Mr. Cunningham came of a fine old Southern family of Irish descent, and at the age of fourteen, in 1838, came to Clark County with his parents, his father, James Cunningham, taking up a Government farm which he faithfully tilled until his death in the early 'fifties.

John L. Cunningham was the youngest of ten children, and he acquired his education under difficulties, and mostly when the hours of leisure were lighted by the burning logs of the fireplace, and the rest of the family were lost in slumber. Notwithstanding rather hard youth, he succeeded in laying by a neat little sum, and February 8, 1863, married Mary E. Brannin, a native of Indiana, and born in Marion County, August 30, 1842. Mrs. Cunningham is a daughter of Robert and Sarah C. (Gaff) Brannin, natives of Pennsylvania and Canton, Ohio, respectively, and the former of whom settled in Indiana at an early day, becoming a large landowner and prosperous farmer. After his marriage Mr. Cunningham engaged in the mercantile business at Auburn, Clark County, for about twenty years, selling principally groceries, in which he worked up a far-reaching and dependable trade. Owing to impaired health he discontinued the business and spent about two years in Brazil, Ind., but returned to Clark County, locating in Martinsville, where the last twelve years of his life were full of physical suffering bravely borne.

Mr. Cunningham was mildly Democratic, but the man, and not his party, appealed to him. He was not a member of any church, but he nevertheless gave the impression of great moral rectitude and unquestioned honesty. He was ever generous with his means, and contributed to churches, charitable organizations and individuals. The wife, who survives him, is a member of the Christian Church, and active in its social and religious life. Four children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Cunningham: Cora C., wife of Ward Secrist, a well-to-do farmer of Clark County; Charlie J., who married Mary J. Winters; Mattie, for fifteen years an educator in Clark County; and Robert, a bachelor. This family is among the highly honored ones of the community, the daughters being well educated and refined women, and the sons strong and self-reliant business men.

DAVIDSON, Daniel J.—That Clark County ranks high among the agricultural regions of the Central West is largely due to the exertions and influence of such strong and forceful personalities as Daniel J. Davidson, who not only became a large landowner and extensive stock-breeder, but who was the main promoter of the oil business in the county, and politically prominent as Circuit Clerk, Squire and Assessor. Mr. Davidson's advent into Clark County was his birth on Walnut Prairie, Darwin Township, November 8, 1839, and his exit was the call from a higher power, when his life work was done.

Between the rude log hut which housed his cradle and the commodious rural residence and town home in which his last days were passed, Mr. Davidson crowded that kind of resource, energy and self-sacrifice which particularly distinguishes the pioneer class of men. He inherited traits sterling from his father, John Davidson, who traveled overland with wagon and team to Clark County from his native State of New Jersey in 1830, and took up Government land on Walnut Prairie. Eventually he owned 320 acres of land, and his success was promoted by a faithful wife, whom he married January 2, 1831, and who in girlhood was Pauline Fears, a native of Kentucky.

The youth of Daniel J. Davidson knew the monotony and grind which fell to the lot of the sons of farmers of half a century ago. He received a meager education in the subscription schools, for which tuition his father paid a small annual amount for each child in his family, and at the age of twenty established a home of his own by marrying Anna Sanford, whose death followed within a year. In March, 1875, Mr. Davidson married Abbie Smith, who was born in Ohio, March 27, 1851, a daughter of George W. and Mary (Travoli) Smith. George W. Smith was born in Licking County, Ohio, in 1823, and with his father, Robert Smith, a native of Ireland, came to Clark County at an early day. The family arose to agricultural and general prominence, and among other claims upon the favor of the community, Robert Smith helped to build the National Road through Clark County. At the time of his death in 1894, George W. Smith owned 240 acres of land. In politics, he was a Republican. Before her marriage, Mrs. Davidson taught school in Wabash Township six years. She is the mother of ten living children, one child having died in infancy; Lily, Robert, George Dean, Milo, Mamie, Frank, Bessie, Nina and Harry.

For many years Mr. Davidson lived in Marshall, of which he was one of the most capable and respected citizens. He made an exhaustive study of the oil possibilities of the county, and was the first and most vigorous promoter of this valuable resource. He was a politician in the higher sense of the word, considering it his duty to aid in the establishment and enforcement of the laws of the community. Though liberal in his tendencies, he was faithful to the tenets of Democracy, and acceptably served eight years as Circuit Clerk, for several years as Squire, and one term as Assessor. He entertained strong and practical ideas of popular utilities and advantages, had a keen sense of justice, and was beyond the pale of corruption or personal aggrandisement. Though of serious mental attitude, he appreciated the lighter things of life, enjoyed a good story, and the social intercourse of friends. Of high character and ideals, he greatly appreciated the advantages of connection with such organizations as the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, at Marshall, and the Masons, at York, and for many years was active in both lodges. He was not a member of any church, yet moral strength and fortitude was written in every feature of his face, and reflected in his private and judicial utterances. He was the man for his time and place, and clothed his obligations with dignity, thoroughness and rare judgment.

DAVIS, Shelton Artemus.—Though of comparatively brief existence, the livery firm of Davis & Coons, of Marshall, established in December, 1905, has worked up a paying business, and in no small degree contributes to the commercial stability of the community. Shelton Artemus Davis, the senior member of the firm, has gained his experience in various avenues of activity, and has an acquaintance which greatly facilitates his present occupation. He is a product of Clark County, and was born on a farm here August 12, 1869. His father, Chesterfield Davis, was born in September, 1847, and died in January, 1897. His mother, Catherine (Behner) Davis, was born in July, 1849, and still makes her home at Yale, Ill., and continues in the best of health and spirits.

In his youth Mr. Davis received a practical common school education, and to this he has since added by constant and many-sided research. He began his independent life as an employe of the Vandalia Railroad, with which he remained three years, and he was for two years a turnkey at the county jail, and for three years operated a freight transfer in Marshall. As before stated, he engaged in his present business with his brother-in-law, Edward Coons, in December, 1905, and he now has a number of well kept horses and the most modern vehicles. He maintains trade through the exercise of fair business methods, tact and consideration, and the firm has every cause for self-congratulation in their rapid and substantial rise to popular favor.

Although no partisan in his political beliefs, Mr. Davis is a strong supporter of the Democratic party, and in the holding of several offices he has evidenced knowledge of and interest in the needs of his progressive community. He was elected Collector of Marshall Township in 1903, re-elected to the same office in 1905, and in 1907 was elected Supervisor of the same township for the usual number of years. He is fraternally one of the prominent men of the county, and is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Order of Eagles, Prairie Aerie, No. 1315, and Red Men, No. 23, of which he has served as Past Sachem. The family are members of the Christian Church.

April 4, 1895, Mr. Davis was united in marriage to Ada Ellen Coons, who was born in Clark County, Ill., December 16, 1873, a daughter of John Martin and Amanda Catherine (Boyer) Coons, the former of whom is a retired resident of Yale, while the latter died in 1889. Mr. and Mrs. Davis are the parents of the following children: Ethel Irene, born November 22, 1897; Chesterfield, born March 1, 1899; Everett Leo, born November 11, 1900; Glenn, born February 12, 1902; Audrey Alice, born March 21, 1904; Warren Shelton, born August 1, 1905; and Ava Jeanette, born December 28, 1906.

DAVISON, Burns M.—Of that class of professional men who, though young in years, have, by meritorious service in the past, established the promise of connection with important affairs in the future of Marshall, none commend themselves more heartily to the discerning public than Burns M. Davison, formerly State's Attorney of Clark County, and at present a member of the firm of Davison & Bartlett. Mr. Davison and his partner have spent their entire lives in the community which has held their professional opportunities, and which has richly profited by their skill, integrity and public-spiritedness.

A son of Reese M. Davison, mention of whom may be found elsewhere in this work, Mr. Davison was born on a farm in Wabash Township, Clark County, February 17, 1872, and received his preliminary education in the country schools. While working in the harvest fields during the summer time he felt their remoteness from the larger and more forceful activities in which he hoped some time to participate, and the obstacles in the way of which he was determined to surmount. First of all he determined to become a teacher, and in furtherance of this plan entered the Indiana State Normal at Terre Haute, Ind. Thereafter he devoted his time to school teaching for four years, and while laboring in this antechamber of many callings, studied law under the professional guidance of Judge John Scholfield, of Marshall. Admitted to the bar of Illinois May 7, 1896, he thereafter pursued an independent practice in Marshall, and soon won confidence and support by his earnest purpose and unflinching determination to succeed.

At the time of his election as State's Attorney in 1900 Mr. Davison was the only Republican except John L. Ryan to hold that office in Clark County. His administration, while not distinguished by trials of special importance, was favorably received, and won practical approval for the enthusiastic young advocate. At the expiration of his term in December, 1904, he carried with him the good will and gratitude of all supporters of law and order. In 1901 was formed the partnership with Mr. Bartlett since so admirably sustained, from both a financial and professional standpoint.

Though a young man of great industry and application, Mr. Davison keenly appreciates the social advantages of the town, and is a member of the Marshall Lodge No. 133, A. F. & A. M., and R. A. M., the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Court of Honor and Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. In the Court of Honor he is now serving his second term as a member of the Law and Ritual Committee, having been elected to the same in both Kansas City, Mo., and Detroit, Mich. He was enrolling and engrossing secretary of the Forty-first Assembly of the State of Illinois. Through his marriage, in November, 1897, to Mary Quick, Mr. Davison became allied with one of the honored pioneer families of Illinois, established here by Homer and America L. (Hare) Quick, the former of whom is a retired merchant of Marshall, and during the Civil War was Captain of Company K, First Missouri Cavalry. Mr. and Mrs. Davison are the parents of two children: Homer R., born March 29, 1899, and Eugenia L., born November 2, 1900. Mr. Davison is honest, energetic and forceful, and has the right kind of ideals as to what constitutes success. He has a pleasing personality and address, and in his intercourse with people is tactful, convincing and magnetic. He is a brother of John H. Davison, the present Sheriff of Clark County.

DAVISON, John H.—More and more are men of intelligence and ability seeking the health-giving out-of-door life of the country, affording as it does in this generation of splendid improvements a fair amount of physical exertion with the minimum of nerve-racking diversions and responsibilities. Yet in the environment of the scientific farmer are outlets for meritorious ambition, and he who can step into them with sufficient equipment serves well the best interests of the community. To this class of broad outlook and varied capacity belongs John H. Davison, the present Democratic Sheriff of Clark County, and the owner of a farm of 100 acres of land in Wabash Township.

The family history of Mr. Davison may be found in the biography of his brother, B. M. Davison, one of the well known lawyers of the town of Marshall. Like his brother, John H. Davison was born in Wabash Township, his natal day being June 25, 1868. He was educated in the public schools and the Terre Haute Normal, at Terre Haute, Ind., and lived on the paternal farm during his bachelor days, for about fifteen years combining general farming and school teaching in Wabash Township. December 24, 1890, he was united in marriage to Zetta Cork, who was born of early and wealthy Wabash Township settlers, August 4, 1867, and who is the mother of four children: Ruth L., born September 23, 1892; Joe Miller, born January 25, 1896; and Alma and Dale, twins, born April 18, 1904.

For two years Mr. Davison studied law, for which he had unquestioned qualifications, but his failing health compelled his return to his farm in Wabash Township. He has a beautiful home, and a model farming enterprise, and his surroundings are such as might be expected of a man of exacting tastes and cultivated mind. He has taken a prominent part in county Democratic affairs, and previous to his nomination for Sheriff at the last Democratic convention had served three years as Deputy Sheriff of Clark County. He attends the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which his wife and daughter are members, and he is a member of the Masonic Lodge of Marshall. Mr. Davison has fine qualities of heart as well as of intellect, and is possessed of the confidence and good will of the entire community.

DAWSON, Benjamin.—There are few if any of the venerable native sons of Westfield Township now living whose birth antedates that of Benjamin Dawson, December 8, 1833. The infant wall of this child of the wilderness echoed against the rude shut-in walls of a house of logs, equipped with the barest necessities of living, and around which whistled uninterrupted the winds of a pitilessly long and bitterly cold Illinois winter. There already had come to the parents, Colman B. and Christine (Drake) Dawson, a son, Morris, and there followed after four other children, all of whom were subjected to the rigorous early training known to the people of the frontier. Morris was born in Virginia, from which state his parents came to Clark County in the fall of 1832. Colman B. Dawson was born in Stafford County, Va., October 8, 1808, and was a son of Bailey W. and Katie (Shelton) Dawson, the former of whom was born in Virginia January 3, 1780, and the latter in the same county and State, April 18, 1801. Colman B. was spared to realize his expectations in Illinois, to move from his log to a house of greater comfort, and to gather from the rich soil a fair competence. He was courageous and unafraid of hardship; he laughed at obstacles and was willing to own only such blessings as he had worked for and earned.

For the greater part of his life Benjamin Dawson has lived on a farm, and he now occupies a fine and well improved property of eighty acres near where he was born in Westfield Township. He attended the early subscription schools, worked hard on the home place and became a typical product of that period in American history which tried the souls of men and relentlessly weeded out the weak from the strong. Eventually he developed mercantile tendencies and moving to Charleston, Coles County, this State, engaged for a time in the milling business. Later on he operated a dry goods store in the same town for sixteen years, and in 1880 left Charleston and came to Westfield Township, where he engaged in general farming and stock-raising. Though long since relinquishing the harder burdens of farming, he maintains a keen oversight of his property, and is interested in noting the progress between the old and newer methods of agriculturists. He is a Democrat in politics, but never has been identified with the local undertakings of his party. Mr. Dawson bears well his seventy-four years and retains the cheerful and kindly disposition which has contributed so materially to his success in life. In Charleston, Ill., in 1873, he married Maggie Malone, who is the mother of a daughter, Katie May Dawson.

DEAHL, John.—The trade of carpentering is one of the oldest known to man, and its continuance rests no more upon its necessity, than upon the fact that it furnishes an outlet for the mind which delights in mechanics, order, ingenuity and creativeness. Between the skill and conscientious workman and his tools there develops a degree of sentiment found in few other occupations, for in a sense they become his companions, as well as the producers of the wherewithal of existence. John Deahl has found his trade a satisfying and absorbing one for forty-seven years, and he still looks forward to many more years of usefulness and profit in the same direction.

Mr. Deahl inherits his mechanical ability from his father, William Deahl, and he himself has transmitted the same to his son, Samuel J. Deahl, one of the foremost builders in Martinsville and vicinity. William Deahl was born in Pennsylvania, as was also his wife, Elizabeth (Barr) Deahl. For many years he lived in Lebanon County, Pa., where his son, John, was born September 15, 1831. Subsequently Mr. Deahl moved his family to Ohio, where he combined farming and carpentering, and in 1860 he settled on a farm in Martinsville Township, Clark County, Ill., where he died in his seventy-fourth year. Besides John, who was his fourth oldest child, he had five other children: Samuel; Mary; Elizabeth; William; and a son who died in infancy.

John Deahl learned to be a farmer and carpenter while living at home, and in 1860 he began to follow the latter occupation exclusively. While a resident of Ohio he married Amanda McNair, a native of Pennsylvania, and who died in Ohio leaving three children, two sons and one daughter. Mr. Deahl married for his second wife a Miss Hibshman, who died in Clark County in 1898, leaving five children: The present Mrs. Deahl formerly was Mrs. Mary H. Hilton. While engaging as carpenter and builder Mr. Deahl has become known over a large part of Clark County, and he has many patrons who have employed him for a score or more of years. His work gives invariable satisfaction, for he does the best that he can, and therefore is a success. He is a Republican in politics, and has been an active Road Superintendent and Commissioner for twelve years.

DEAHL, Samuel J.—The tendencies of Samuel J. Deahl are along practical and creative lines and thus far have been stamped upon the building, education and political development of Martinsville. Mr. Deahl is a product of the pioneer element of Clark County, and was born on a farm in Martinsville Township, February 27, 1886. His father, John Deahl, whose life is sketched elsewhere in this work, gave him average opportunities, and he grew in physical strength and mental alertness while making himself useful around home, and figuring out the relative prospects of country and city life. That he decided in favor of the latter has never appeared in the nature of a misjudgment as he has proved a public-spirited and capable business man, an excellent builder, and all around promoter of necessary and elevating community interests.

Shortly after attaining his majority Mr. Deahl married Melassa Deal, March 18, 1888. Mrs. Deahl was born in Johnson Township, Clark County, October 3, 1869, and is a daughter of Samuel Deal, a pioneer farmer and veterinary surgeon of Clark County. Mr. and Mrs. Deahl are the parents of two sons and six daughters: Cecil; Freda; Charlotte; Nettie and Nellie, twins; Herbert; Henry; Harry; and Hildred. Mr. Deahl came to Martinsville several years ago, and since then has led a life of great energy and variety. He is responsible for many of the buildings which make up his surroundings, and he has the reputation of skill and substantiality in construction.

Politically Mr. Deahl is a Republican, and among other important offices he has held that of President and Chairman of the Board of Education, Chairman of the County Fair Board, and Supervisor, having been elected to the latter office, which he still holds, in 1904. Fraternally he is a member of the Martinsville Lodge, Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He is a well informed and intelligent man of affairs, loyal to friends and interests, and possessing the confidence and respect of the entire community.

DEANER, A. R.—The roll-call of promising and capable young business men and politicians of Marshall would be incomplete without due mention of A. R. Deaner, a successful restaurateur, and the present Clerk of his native town. Mr. Deaner was born in this community May 2, 1880, and on the paternal side is of German ancestry. His father, C. J. Deaner, came from Germany to America when a young man, and allied his fortunes with the early history of Clark County. His mother, formerly Mary Ellen Holler, was born in Marshall.

Mr. Deaner received his education in the public schools of Marshall, and has been in his present business about two years. He has a thorough understanding of his calling, maintains a neat and well equipped restaurant, and has a cuisine which satisfies the most exacting of patrons. Long before attaining his majority he became interested in politics, and previous to election as City Clerk served the community as Deputy Circuit Clerk, under Daniel Emerson, and as City Treasurer. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias, Launcelot Lodge No. 67, and the Court of Honor. In religion, he is a Baptist. The wife of Mr. Deaner formerly was Temple Ed Duncan, born in Bowling Green, Ky., February 2, 1881, a daughter of Edmund and Temperance Duncan. A daughter, Mary Louise, was born to Mr. and Mrs. Deaner February 3, 1904. Mr. Deaner has many excellent qualities which win him friends and popular recognition, and politically he is regarded as one of the strongest and most incorruptible resources in the county.

DE BORD, William Harvey.—Both in private life and in public affairs Mr. DeBord proved himself eminently capable, energetic and trustworthy, and during the long period of his residence in Clark County he won the respect of a large circle of acquaintances. When the cloud of war hovered over our nation he was eager to offer his services in defense of the Union and bravely endured every hardship that came to him in his life as a soldier, meeting perils with a courageous spirit and showing himself loyal to the flag under which he fought. As he was true in time of war, so also in time of peace he displayed the qualities that commend a citizen to his fellowmen. More than once he was honored by being urged to accept offices of trust. Several times he accepted the positions of Supervisor, Assessor and Collector. One of the highest honors of his life came to him in his election as a member of the Thirty-third General Assembly of Illinois, and during his term of office (1882-84) he gave his ballot and influence to aid in the election of Shelby M. Cullom as United States Senator. Up to the end of his life he maintained a keen interest in the moral and material advancement of his town and county, gave a staunch support to educational work, aided the cause of religion through active membership in the Christian Church, and contributed generously to charitable movements and progressive local enterprises.

The DeBord family traces its lineage to France. Benjamin and Mary DeBord were natives respectively of Louisiana and Indiana, and the latter was descended both from French and from English ancestry. Their son, William Harvey, was born at Greensburg, Ind., October 1, 1834, grew to manhood on the home farm, and supplemented attendance at country schools by a course in the college at Shelbyville, Ind. Accompanying his parents in 1854, he removed to Illinois and settled in Jasper County, where he identified himself with agricultural affairs. At the outbreak of the Civil War he gave his allegiance to the Union cause, and August 2, 1861, he was accepted as a private in Company H, Thirty-eighth Illinois Infantry. Given a post as Corporal, he was promoted for gallantry to the rank of Second Lieutenant April 7, 1863, and remained an officer in the company until the expiration of his term. October 21, 1861, he took part in the battle of Frederickstown, Mo.; October 8, 1862, fought at Perrysville, Ky.; was a participant in the battle of Stone River lasting from December 26, 1862, to January 4, 1863, during which time his regiment had thirty-four killed and one hundred and nine wounded, besides thirty-four captured by the enemy; fought at Liberty Gap January 25, 1863, at which time the regiment charged across plowed ground and under heavy fire drove the enemy from the works, capturing the flag of the Second Arkansas Regiment of the Confederate troops. At Chickamauga 301 men of the Thirty-eighth Illinois Regiment entered battle, and out of this number there were lost, wounded or captured 180. In the course of the battle the death of a commanding officer gave Lieutenant DeBord the command of Company G, but the company fell into the hands of the enemy and the men were imprisoned at Danville.

After having been confined at Danville Prison from September to February the men made a daring attempt to escape by crawling through a sewer. All of them went west except Mr. DeBord, who endeavored to escape by going east. Fleeing from the enemy, he traveled through a sparsely settled region, where little to sustain life could be found. Necessity forced him to eat grasshoppers and once he captured a bird and ate it raw. Two hundred weary miles were covered in great weakness of flesh and hunger, and when at last he was within hearing of the Union guns and felt himself almost out of his troubles, he was captured by Confederate soldiers and taken to Libby Prison. Finally by exchange he was permitted to rejoin his regiment and afterward took part in the six weeks' siege at Atlanta. On being discharged September 15, 1864, he returned home with a military record of which his posterity may well be proud.

The first marriage of Mr. DeBord united him with Eliza L., daughter of Morrill Sanford, an influential citizen of Casey. Four children were by this wife, who died May 9, 1878. For years after her death he remained a widower, but established domestic ties again in 1892, being married May 8th to Mrs. Amanda Burk, daughter of Abraham and Elizabeth (Finney) Sebring, natives respectively of New Jersey and Union County, Ind., and both of English extraction. Abraham Sebring was born in 1812, migrated to Ohio with his parents in 1822, removed to Illinois during the pioneer period, and died in 1884. Mrs. Sebring was the daughter of a Vermont family who became prominent in the early days of Clark County's settlement. She was born in 1813 and died in 1866. During girlhood Mrs. DeBord received careful training at home and in the local schools and developed those beautiful traits of character that have endeared her to a large circle of life-long friends. In fraternal relations Mr. DeBord belonged to the Masonic Blue Lodge and believed in the philanthropic principles for which the order stands. He was also a member of G. A. R. Post, No. 336, Hazel Dell, Ill. His political views were always in accord with Republican principles and that party received his staunch support from the time of its organization until his life came to an end. Honored by the people of Clark County and Eastern Illinois, he passed from earth at his residence in Casey, July 30, 1905, and was followed to his last resting place by tributes of deepest affection and respect.

De LASHMUTT, William Grayson.—That a man and his work have met, and journeyed harmoniously through the changing years to the betterment of the community is evident to all familiar with the general store of William Grayson De Lashmutt, a respected and liberal minded citizen of Martinsville. In most unpretensions fashion, and with little capital to tide over trade depressions, this enterprise opened to the public in January, 1877, and for thirty years its many grades and kinds of commodities have been handed over the counters by a proprietor of quiet force and great obligingness, and his no less courteous and trustworthy assistants. People have found the store cool and pleasant in summer, and have been glad to bask in the genial glow of the big stove in winter, and receiving always fair treatment and reliable goods, have revolved themselves into a large band of steady and appreciative patrons. Mr. De Lashmutt understands the business art of making people comfortable and satisfied, and he never is too busy or tired to dispense smiles and kind words to those who stray within his premises.

In his youth Mr. De Lashmutt used to hear the Darkies sing on the plantation in Frederick County, Md., where he was born July 20, 1838. His parents, Elias L. and Eliza (Michael) De Lashmutt, represented two old Maryland families, the former of French, and the latter of German descent. Elias De Lashmutt was a man of affairs, and not only succeeded at farming, but made himself necessary in politics and local government. He was Justice of the Peace for a quarter of a century, and for many years was Judge of Frederick County, Md. He was an honorable and capable man, and lived to be eighty-four years old. Of his five daughters and four sons who grew to maturity, two sons and one daughter survive.

As his father's farm was only a mile from the town of Frederick, William Grayson found it convenient to go there to school, especially in the winter time. His life was uneventful until the breaking out of the Civil War, when he entered the Confederate service, under General Early, and served until the close of hostilities. He saw much of the grewsome, terrible side of warfare, and was wounded, captured and imprisoned. Previous to the war he had served for a time as clerk in a mercantile store in Frederick, and when he doffed the gray of the Confederate soldier he went to Terre Haute, Ind., where lived his married sister, and where he was interested in merchandising for about ten years. He next lived in Evansville, Ind., for six years, in the employ of Mackey, Nesbit & Company, wholesale dry goods merchants. While with this concern he mastered every detail of the general mercantile business, and developed the ambition to become a merchant in his own name which resulted in the establishment of his present business during the winter of 1877.

In 1866, in Frederick, Md., Mr. De Lashmutt married Virginia Reich, who is the mother of nine children, five of whom are living. Of these, Harry De Lashmutt is his father's able assistant. Mr. De Lashmutt is naturally a Democrat, but though in no sense a politician as generally understood, was elected to the State Legislature in 1888. A gentle and kindly personality, he has made and kept many friends along his pathway of life, and he is esteemed for the quiet and practical ambition which has contented itself with useful and necessary work.

DEVOL, N. B.—Among those of the residents of Marshall who have earned the right to leisure, none are held in higher esteem than Dr. N. B. Devol, a farmer in early life, later a gunsmith, and still later a dentist for more than a quarter of a century. Dr. Devol comes honestly by the mechanical ability which has shaped his career, for his father, Gideon Devol, was a blacksmith by trade, and followed the same both in his native State of Ohio, and in Kentucky, to which he moved in young manhood. For many years he was a resident of Spencer County, Ky., where he married Frances Turnham, and where his son, N. B., was born March 11, 1831. Two other children also were born in Kentucky, and three in Indiana, whither the father removed in later life, and followed farming and blacksmithing.

N. B. Devol followed the changing fortunes of his father until 1852, when he came from Indiana to Clark County, and in Marshall learned and worked at the gunsmith trade for ten years. In the meantime he had been drawn towards dentistry, as a field for finer mechanical ability, and he qualified for the profession under Dr. Poston, subsequently engaging in business for himself from 1865 until his retirement in 1906. He was a conscientious and painstaking workman, kept pace with the advance in the profession, and many were continuous patrons for years.

By no means self-centered, the Doctor has been a promoter of many phases of civic life, and especially has done much to promote clean and incorruptible political service. A long time Republican, he was for years Township Supervisor, for two years Collector, and Alderman of the town of Marshall for six years. He is fraternally connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and in religion, is one of the chief members and supporters of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he has been a Trustee many years. His knowledge of music was turned to good account during the Civil War, when he enlisted in the Fourteenth Indiana Infantry Regimental Band, June 7, 1861, and served until mustered out in February, 1862. He is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Marshall. Through the stress of an active and useful life Dr. Devol has carried a serene and harmonious nature, one which has won for him friends, material good fortune, and opportunities for kindness and benevolences.

The marriage of Mr. Devol and Martha J. Hull, a native of Kentucky, occurred January 21, 1855. Mrs. Devol died in 1869, leaving two children, of whom Frances is the wife of William Lutz, a tailor of Marshall, and Mary lives with her father. December 13, 1870, Mr. Devol married Lydia A. Killie, a native of Ohio, and daughter of Thomas Clayton and Jane (Hines) Killie, the latter a native of Virginia. Mr. Killie died when his daughter was eleven years old, but his wife survived until 1883, at the age of eighty-three years. Mr. and Mrs. Devol are the parents of a son, Harry B., who married a lady from Colorado Springs, Colo., and with whom he now lives in North Dakota. The only daughter in the family is deceased.

DIXON, Canton A.—The largest implement and vehicle enterprise in Clark County is located in Marshall, and its establishment in 1899 is due to the well directed energy of Canton A. Dixon, a young man of exceptional business sagacity and forethought, and one of the community's most promising and public spirited citizens. Mr. Dixon's place of business is centrally located, and has a frontage of forty-four feet. He is well provided with storage facilities, and carries a stock of implements and vehicles sufficiently varied to meet all reasonable demands. His patrons are scattered throughout the county, and that they are continuous customers argues well for the fair dealing and business-like methods of the proprietor.

Mr. Dixon was born in Darwin Township, Clark County, Ill., August 25, 1874, and was reared on the farm of his parents, Burns and Lydia (Holwick) Dixon. He was educated in the public schools of Marshall, and the Terre Haute Commercial College, and his first business venture was the enterprise which he now conducts in Marshall. The wife of Mr. Dixon formerly was Clarine E. Greenough, who was born in Marshall, October 18, 1880, a daughter of William C. and Mary Greenough, also natives of Marshall, and born November 30, 1852, and July 26, 1855. Mr. and Mrs. Dixon are the parents of two children: Burns G., born September 21, 1903; and Ellen Y., born December 17, 1905. Mr. Dixon is fraternally connected with the Knights of Pythias, and in religion, affiliates with the Congregational Church. In politics, he is a Republican. He is personally popular and well liked, and has built around his commendable business a strong wall of public confidence.

DOSBAUGH, Samuel.—Samuel Dosbaugh, well known as a grocer and a reliable citizen of Casey, was a native of Stark County, Ohio, born July 22, 1841, and a son of John Dosbaugh and Mary (Coffman) Dosbaugh, who were both natives of Germany. His parents came to the

R. O. Fix and Family

United States from the Fatherland about 1823 and settled in Ohio, where they lived until their removal to Illinois in 1845, locating then in Johnson Township.

Samuel Dosbaugh was one of seven children who was brought up on the home farm in Johnson Township and received his education in the ordinary district schools. He remained with his parents until his enlistment, December, 1861, in Company B, Second Illinois Light Artillery, with which he served for three years, participating in the battles of Shiloh and Corinth and others of historic note. At the expiration of his enlistment, in the winter of 1864, he was honorably discharged from the service and returned home to engage in farming in the southwestern part of the township.

Mr. Dosbaugh engaged in farming until 1879, when, on account of poor health, he rented his farm, located in Casey and entered the grocery business. He first purchased a partnership of W. R. Stith, but later formed a connection with Mr. Dunn under the firm name of Dosbaugh & Dunn. Subsequently he also became interested in the real estate business and was a busy, honest, reliable and straightforward man and a useful citizen. He was identified with the Masonic order, and in politics was a Greenbacker, when the currency question was a live issue.

September 2, 1891, Mr. Dosbaugh married Miss Rebecca Carr, a native of Indiana and daughter of C. A. Carr. Mr. Dosbaugh had one son by a former marriage, Arthur E., born October 19, 1872, and one of the promising young men of the section. Mr. Dosbaugh passed from this life March 17, 1900.

DUCEY, Rev. Patrick Richard.—The Catholic Church in Marshall, direct descendant of that first primitive structure erected in Clark County by Father Hugh Brady, in the latter '40s, is realizing the largest and most practical usefulness in its history under the direction of its present scholarly, energetic, resourceful and business-like pastor, Rev. Patrick Richard Ducey. Father Ducey is a man of the present, understanding its aims, needs and possibilities, and he applies thereto a quality of brain, heart and labor which best expresses itself in tangible results and unanswerable figures.

Father Ducey came to Marshall in September,

1900, with an established reputation as an organizer and upbuilder. He was familiar with the Central West, as practically all of his working life had been spent here. Born in Lowell, Middlesex County, Mass., May 5, 1863, he is a son of Patrick and Mary (Ronan) Ducey, natives of County Waterford, Ireland. He pursued preparatory studies in Lowell, and upon his graduation from the high school was awarded the Carney medal for scholarship. June 18, 1889, he was ordained a priest at the St. Bonaventura Seminary, in Allegheny, N. Y., and thereafter was installed as assistant to Vicar General Hickey, pastor of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, in Springfield, Ill. Three years later, in July, 1892, he was appointed pastor of the Church of the Sacred Heart of Effingham, Ill., the so-called English-speaking church of that city. The organization of this church by Father Ducey, in January, 1892, was a task accompanied by many obstacles and no little opposition, as there were comparatively few English-speaking families in the parish. However, perseverance and good management prevailed, and the cornerstone of the present substantial church was laid June 23, 1892, by Rt. Rev. James Ryan, D. D., Bishop of Alton, assisted by Vicar General Hickey, of Springfield, to whom Father Ducey had formerly been assistant. This occasion brought out the largest crowd of people ever assembled in the town. More than a thousand people accompanied Father Ducey from Springfield, nearly five hundred came from Decatur, and excursion trains brought hundreds from the surrounding towns and country. The church was dedicated October 25, the same year, by Rt. Rev. James Ryan, Bishop of Alton. September, 1892, saw the opening of the Sacred Heart School, under Miss Mary Healy, of Springfield, teacher, with an attendance larger than the building could accommodate. In December, the congregation found itself possessed of a church, school and pastorate, and in the spring of 1893 additional ground was purchased for the erection of a larger school building. In 1894 he placed a chime of three bells in the tower of the church. For the accomplishment of all this work Father Ducey received substantial assistance from the people of Springfield, among whom he lived three years, and the Effingham congregation proved exceptionally generous and self-sacrificing.

In Marshall, Father Ducey met with financial stringency, inefficient church and school equipment, and lack of personal interest on the part of many of the parishioners. All of these drawbacks have been overcome to large extent, and all intelligent observers must admit the radical and substantial changes which have taken place. The grounds, parsonage, church buildings and additions thereto are in excellent condition, finances have been strengthened, and renewed interest has been established in the church societies and other outlets for good. Regardless of creed or condition, the fine personality, intellect, and wealth of kindness and sympathy of Father Ducey have given him permanent place in the heart of a community whose best interests he is promoting with zeal and Christian fortitude.

DULANEY, Harry B.—Harry B. Dulaney, Vice-President of the Dulaney National Bank of Marshall, is a son of Robert L. Dulaney and Elizabeth E. (Bartlett) Dulaney. His father, who was a Virginian, came to Clark County in 1852, and the record of his prominent and useful life is given in detail in another part of this work. The mother was born in Portland, Ind. As stated, the elder Dulaney was a citizen of public prominence, and for ten years was a Commissioner of the penitentiary under Governors Oglesby and Cullom. Although he entered the law rather late in life, he reached a high standing in the profession, being associated with Judge Constable and Thomas Golden prior to entering the banking business. He was a charter member of the Odd Fellows' Lodge in Marshall, and a man who was foremost in all progressive institutions and movements.

Harry B. Dulaney is a native of Marshall, born June 14, 1856, and received his early education in the district schools of Clark County, completing his studies at the Notre Dame University in 1875 and 1876. He then went to Crawfordsville, Ind., where he remained from 1876 to 1879, when he became connected with the banking business recently organized by his father under the firm name of R. L. Dulaney & Company. Harry B. Dulaney had the active management of the business, which became a national institution in 1892 and so continued until the death of his father in May, 1903. A reorganization then took place, with Thomas Golden as President, Harry B. Dulaney as Vice-President, and Bert Bryan as Cashier.

On the 26th of November, 1882, Harry B. Dulaney married Miss Sarah E. Birch, daughter of Dr. J. J. C. Birch, an old citizen and leading practitioner of Clark County. She died May 5, 1896. Mr. Dulaney's second marriage, March 25, 1901, was with Miss Edith Prevo, daughter of Samuel Prevo, Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of Clark County, and a man of high standing and great popularity in the community. One child, Robert L., has been born of the second union. In politics Mr. Dulaney is a firm Republican, and he has a broad affiliation with the fraternities, being a member of the Knights of Pythias, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, Court of Honor and the Modern Woodmen. Died 1938

DULANEY, Robert L.—A prominent lawyer, banker and public character of Clark County and the State of Illinois, Robert L. Dulaney was a native of Loudoun County, Va., the son of Zachariah and Mary E. (Braden) Dulaney. The death of his mother in his early childhood caused the dispersal of the family, and Robert was placed with an uncle, Woodford Dulaney, a merchant of York, this county. This was in 1832. Upon the breaking out of the Black Hawk War his uncle went to the scene of hostilities as a Lieutenant of a company, and left the boy, at the age of twelve, in charge of the business. The period of his responsibilities was short at this time, and upon his uncle's return he continued his schooling in the district school and later completed his studies at the University of Indiana, in Bloomington. In 1840 he commenced to read law with Judge Harlin and finished his legal studies at the Transylvania University in Kentucky, being admitted to the bar in 1843 and continuing in active practice until 1879. His first partner was Judge Constable, and later he was associated with Thomas J. Golden, whose biography appears on another page of this volume.

Soon after his virtual retirement from the practice of law Mr. Dulaney engaged in the banking business, under the firm style of R. L. Dulaney & Company, for some years conducting a profitable establishment at Marshall. His bank was nationalized in 1892, and thus continued until the death of its founder, May 5, 1902.

The deceased was an old-line Whig and a stalwart Republican, being a positive quantity in politics as in everything else. He served under Governor Beveridge as one of the commissioners to locate the Institution for the Feeble-Minded, and for ten years was one of the Penitentiary Commissioners under Governors Oglesby and Cullom, during a portion of his latter incumbency being President of the Board. He was well known and much respected for the able services which he rendered the State in these and other capacities. He was an earnest and helpful friend to the cause of education in his home city and county, and was an eminently useful citizen in every field of real progress. As an individual, he was a man of exemplary habits, kind, thoughtful and charitable, and even anxious to assist those whom his sound judgment decided to be worthy of help.

On December 24, 1850, Robert L. Dulaney was married at Marshall, Ill., to Miss Elizabeth E. Bartlett, the daughter of John and Jane Bartlett, born September 3, 1833, and died at Marshall, May 1, 1882, mother of the following seven children, all of whom are natives of that place: Charles W., born January 5, 1854, married Mollie K. Rice, of Kentucky, December 5, 1882; Harry B., the banker of Marshall, whose biography appears elsewhere; Nellie B., born December 3, 1858; Mary Eliza, born August 31, 1864; Hector B., born December 19, 1860, a prosperous farmer, grain dealer and cattleman of Clark County; Robert W., born January 1, 1867; and Elizabeth Cecil, born October 19, 1869. All the children but Robert W. and Hector B. are married.

DUNCAN, Edwin.—The success, failures, and unremitting ambitions of the men of the Duncan family have been a part of the commercial world of Martinsville for the past half century. They have not represented the half-hearted, plodding members of society, unwilling to take a chance or deflect from safe financial paths, but largely have contributed to the speculative element, which adds vigor and zest, uncertainty and therefore deep interest to human affairs. Edwin Duncan, who is engaged in the drug business in Martinsville, gives promise of occupying a different position in the community from that of his father, Charles Duncan, or his brother, Frank Duncan. He is a native son of Martinsville, and was born here February 3, 1859. His youth did not differ from that of other boys living here with him, and combining the usual tasks, diversions and educational chances. He had a studious mind, and graduated with good standing from the local high school. In 1881, upon attaining his majority, he became a clerk of John Gamble, the pioneer druggist of Martinsville, and being quick witted and determined, soon picked up quite a knowledge of the drug business. After three years of association his employer died and his widow took charge of the business, retaining in her employ Mr. Duncan, and her son, Harry Gamble. In 1901 Mr. Duncan bought out his assistant and since has conducted the store alone. He is a bright and enterprising gentleman, obliging to a pleasant degree, and thoroughly conversant with the duties and responsibilities of a first-class druggist. He is a Republican in politics, a Mason fraternally, and a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He has held various local offices, and for two alternating terms was Postmaster of Martinsville. In 1884 he married Viola V. Nichols, born in Martinsville Township in 1861, and daughter of J. D. Nichols, a pioneer and extensive farmer and stock-raiser of this part of the county.

Charles Duncan was born in Indiana and came to Danvers Township, Clark County, Ill., during the early '40s. He was a natural trader, and started a small country store, the success of which led him to settle in Martinsville and establish a mercantile career. The rewards of merchandising, however, did not satisfy him, and he engaged in various side enterprises, among them the purchase and sale of hogs on an extensive scale. He had much to encourage him in this enterprise, as he did a large business with the early packing houses of Terre Haute, Ind., and he also had a contract with the Vandalia Railroad to ship over a certain division of the road. He was making money rapidly when the panic occurred in 1873, and in consequence of this he went under financially and was obliged to give up his mercantile establishment. For a number of years following he devoted his energies to speculations of different kinds. He was active in Republican politics for many years, but was always too busy to warrant official responsibility. He was a charter member of the Odd Fellows Lodge at Martinsville, and was an active and generous member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He had three children, Alice, Frank and Edwin, the former of whom is the wife of A. H. Myers, a telegraph operator and freight agent at Martinsville. The wife of Mr. Duncan formerly was Elizabeth Knotts, a native of Sullivan County, Ind.

Frank Duncan, older son of Charles Duncan, finished his education in the high school of Martinsville, and in 1880 engaged in the grain business, which he since has followed in connection with a general stock brokerage business. He is doing much to encourage the raising of grain and stock among the surrounding farmers, and is credited with honest and straightforward business methods. May 17, 1904, he was united in marriage to Ethel Harding, a native of Jasper County, Ill., and daughter of M. W. Harding, a grocer of Newton, Ill. Like his father and brother, Mr. Duncan is a Republican, and like them he is public spirited, generous and popular. He is fraternally connected with the Masons, and is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

DUNCAN, Euclid M., M. D.—Since his arrival in Marshall, October 10, 1890, Dr. Euclid M. Duncan has built up a reputation for professional courtesy, ability and faithfulness, and has become a dependable factor in an ever-widening sphere of activity. He has excellent natural and acquired equipment, and represents a substantial family of Warren County, Ky., where he was born February 4, 1850.

In his youth Dr. Duncan profited by the responsibility and discipline of farming, but outgrew this environment, and prepared himself for broader usefulness at Warren College, Bowling Green, Ky., soon after taking up the study of medicine with Dr. A. C. Wright, of Bowling Green. In 1870 he entered the Jefferson Medical College, in Philadelphia, and after his graduation, March 6, 1872, became an assistant in the Pennsylvania Hospital for the Insane for a year. For the following year he practiced medicine in Bowling Green, and in 1875 moved to Kutuwa, Lyon County, Ky., which remained his home fifteen years. In the meantime, May 25, 1876, he was united in marriage to Cora Holloway, a native of Eddyville, Ky., and daughter of J. N. Holloway, a merchant of Eddyville.

In 1887 Dr. Duncan became house physician at the Eddyville Prison, the finest penal institution in the South, resigning from the same October 1, 1890, the month of his arrival in Marshall. At the present time he is Pension Examiner at Marshall, and local surgeon for the Vandalia Railroad. He is engaged in a general medical and surgical practice, and is contributing his share toward maintaining healthy and sanitary conditions in the community. Dr. Duncan is a member of the Episcopal Church, and fraternally is connected with the Red Men. He is a member of the Illinois State Medical Society, American Medical Society, American Medical Association, Kentucky State Medical Society, Clark County Medical Society and the Aesculapian Medical Society.

DUNLAP, Theodore Newton.—A life long residence in Wabash Township has brought Theodore Newton Dunlap in close touch with its largest possibilities and most gratifying rewards, the latter being represented chiefly by a farm of 270 acres, which admittedly is one of the most productive and valuable in this part of Clark County. Mr. Dunlap was born not far from where he now lives April 3, 1856, twenty years after the arrival here of his father, Andrew Dunlap, by occupation a cabinet maker and farmer.

Andrew Dunlap was born in Knoxville, Tenn., in 1809, and in his native State worked principally at carpentering and building. However, he preferred farming, the occupation of his earlier days, and after coming to Wabash Township in 1836, devoted his energies to tilling a crude prairie farm, upon which he passed the balance of his life. He was interested in politics, and had large capacity for public affairs, serving several terms as Postmaster, and a longer time as Justice of the Peace in the township. In early life he married Nancy Smith, who was born in Mississippi in 1822, and who became the mother of three sons, of whom James R. is a farmer in this township, and Thomas C. is a resident of Terre Haute, Ind.

Theodore Newton Dunlap had the usual advantages of the central western youth of his time, but the country school was only the beginning of a liberal education gained by self-application in mature life. He received an excellent agricultural training under his father, and remained at home until his marriage, in

JOHN FUNK

AMALIDA J. FUNK

1879, to Josephine Ingalls, a native of Wabash Township, and a former student in the district school and the schools of Terre Haute, Ind. To Mr. and Mrs. Dunlap have been born six daughters and one son: Dora; Frances; Georgia and Roberta, twins; Ellen; Jessie; and Joseph. Frances is the wife of Mr. Patton, and lives on a farm in Wabash Township. Mr. Dunlap is a Republican in politics, and has been a member of the School Board for several years. He is the staunch friend of education and kindred enlightening agencies, and during his term of service an excellent standard of instruction has been maintained in the local school. With his family, Mr. Dunlap is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He is a man of high character and liberal views, and enjoys a large acquaintance among the substantial people of Clark County.

EMERSON, Daniel.—Although comparatively brief, the career of Daniel Emerson, the present Circuit Clerk of Clark County, has conformed to a variety of experiences and opportunities, and has demonstrated a kind of resource and adaptiveness which bespeak reserve and great possibilities of growth. Mr. Emerson is a product of Marshall, and was born here March 30, 1876. His father, Edward Emerson, was born in Haverhill, Grafton County, N. H., and his mother, Mary (Porter) Emerson, is a native of Carthage, Ind. The elder Emerson for many years was an instructor in bookkeeping, and now is serving as Deputy Circuit Clerk of Clark County.

Mr. Emerson was educated primarily in the great field of human equality, the public schools, but through independent application has advanced far beyond the knowledge thus laboriously gained. He is both a student and observer of the facts and philosophies of existence, and has pronounced opinions upon the subjects which interest the intelligence of the world. Upon seeking the rewards of an independent life, he was appointed Assistant Postmaster under W. W. Hogue, and after serving two and a half years, temporarily relinquished the position at the call of his country during the Spanish-American War. Enlisting in Company H, Forty-fifth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, under Captain Capps, of Springfield, and Colonel J. H. Dorst, he spent two years in the Island of Luzon, and during that time participated in the General Wheaton Expedition. He was along the firing line in many skirmishes, saw much of the natives, studied their characteristics and community life, and returned after his honorable discharge in June, 1901, with a broad general knowledge of America's latest territorial acquisition.

After his martial experience Mr. Emerson returned to Marshall and to his former position in the postoffice, which he maintained until 1904. During that year his loyalty to Republican interests was further recognized by his election to the Circuit Clerkship, which office he since has maintained with credit to all concerned. Mr. Emerson has a strong predilection for social advantages, and is identified with the Marshall Lodge No. 133, A. F. & A. M., Marshall Chapter No. 70, R. A. M., the Palestine Commandery No. 27, of Paris, Ill., the Lancelot Lodge No. 67, K. of P., and the Camp No. 355, M. W. of A. Mr. Emerson is a young man of pleasing personality, and well grounded appreciation of the duties and responsibilities of twentieth century citizenship. His genial and fortunate temperament makes him a great favorite, and it may justly be said that few young men of the community have a larger circle of friends and well wishers.

ENGLISH, Edward M.—The progenitor of the English family in Clark County was a man of high character and noble life purpose, whose setting was the unhindered prairies, and whose mission was the preaching of the gospel according to the tenets of the Methodist Episcopal Church. His name was Abel English, and he was born in New Jersey 1797. March 6, 1819, he was united in matrimony to Margaret Babcock, near whom he had grown from childhood, and who was born in New Jersey June 17, 1801. While performing his busy round of duties in his native State this old-time preacher heard the call of the edge of the frontier, and in 1835 came in laborious fashion to Indiana, and after two years had passed, again hitched up his team and traveled to Clark County, Ill., taking up land two miles north of the present town of Marshall, in Marshall Township. His dream of long years of activity in the new country was not destined for fulfillment, for his life was cut short November 11, 1840, at the age of forty-three years. Nevertheless, besides founding the first Methodist Church in Marshall, he implanted a lasting impression of nobility and self-sacrifice during his brief residency, and his memory is fragrant as are the flowers that grow upon his grave in the little cemetery at Livingston. His wife died March 2, 1857.

John English, son of the pioneer preacher, was born in New Jersey March 23, 1823, and he was twelve years of age when the family settled in Clark County. In boyhood he profited by the meagre advantages of the subscription schools during the winter time, and his muscles hardened while swinging the sythe and cutting down timber, and performing those many sided tasks which the sunset found him still occupied with. October 15, 1849, he married Angelina Plasters, daughter of James and Hannah Plasters, Virginians by birth, and Illinoisians by adoption. The young people lived on the old English farm for the balance of their lives, reared there their five sons and five daughters, and died at an advanced age among prosperous and pleasant surroundings, the father in 1880, and the mother in 1882. Mr. English was a conscientious man and painstaking farmer, and he maintained well the family reputation for upright and intelligent living.

The third generation of the English family in Clark County is represented by Edward M. English, the third son and fourth oldest of the five sons and five daughters of John English. The early development of Mr. English was along regulation lines, and he naturally picked up the thread of farming to weave it into a fabric of independence and profit. He is known as one of the most intelligent and successful farmers in Marshall Township, and occupies a place of 101 acres, forty-six of which have been added to his original fifty-five acres. He raises general produce and stock, and makes a specialty of Shorthorn cattle and Poland China hogs. He has surrounded himself and family with the many comforts and conveniences known to latter days country dwellers, and on every hand are evidences of refinement, method and progress.

June 24, 1885, Mr. English married Elizabeth Weinhold, a native of Canton, Ohio, and born August 23, 1858. Mrs. English is the daughter of Henry and Eva (Glee) Weinhold, both of whom were born in Germany and came to the United States at an early date. Mr. Weinhold was a shoemaker by trade, and followed the same up to the time of his death, in 1874. Besides Elizabeth, he had three other children: Henry, Callie and John. Mr. English lived on the old homestead for two years after his marriage, but all but one of his three daughters and two sons were born on his present farm. The children are as follows: Harold, born February 21, 1887; Walter, born June 18, 1889; Ethel, born August 16, 1892; Helen, born May 24, 1897; and Donald, born February 25, 1900. Mr. English is active in general township affairs and is a staunch Republican, a member of the Modern Woodmen of America and the Court of Honor, and in religion worships at the Methodist Episcopal Church.

ENGLISH, Isaac William.—The grandchildren of that grand old pioneer, Abel English, constitute a not inconsiderable part of the present population of Marshall Township. Knowing that a good example has no limit of duration, but travels endlessly in the wake of him who creates it, it is not surprising that the descendants of this frontiersman reflect in varying degrees his character and usefulness, and this notwithstanding the fact that few of them have ever seen the face or heard the voice of the brave founder of the first Methodist Episcopal Church in Marshall, which congregation had at that time but seven members. A goodly share of the early religionist's excellent traits have fallen to Isaac William English, son of Isaac B. English, the latter the second oldest of the nine sons and three daughters of the zealous churchman. Besides Isaac B., there survive also of this large family two sons, Able and Daniel, aged eighty-two and seventy years, respectively, and Martha, aged seventy-three years.

Isaac B. English was born in New Jersey, September 20, 1821, and accompanied his parents to Indiana in 1835, and to Clark County, Ill., in 1837. February 29, 1844, he married Sarah Black, who was born in Ohio in 1825, a daughter of John Black, one of the early arrivals in Clark County. John Black was born in Scotland in 1787, and in his early married life, November 17, 1817, embarked in a sailing vessel bound for American shores, arriving at the end of his journey February 1, 1818. The voyage was long, and perilous storms swept over the stanch craft until her creaking timbers no longer could weather the wild and untamable elements. When it became apparent that the life-boats alone could save the terror-stricken voyagers, everything available was thrown overboard but what could be tied up in pocket handkerchiefs. From among his possessions John Black chose his Bible, letting all else go, and when the passengers finally reached the port of New York, transferred hither by a friendly passing craft, this good book was more than compensation for the other losses he had sustained. To the end of his days the most vivid remembrance of the shipwreck was the wail of a newborn child, ushered into existence upon the reeling, terrifying deep, but destined for a snug place in the life-boat and a long life of energy and usefulness. This child was named Mary J. Black Dougan, who died at the age of eighty years. Mr. Black brought his family to Ohio and engaged in the hotel business until 1839, and that year he came to Marshall and piled his trade as a weaver. He was thus employed to the end of his life, in the middle of the '60s. He was a Republican in politics, but avoided rather than courted official recognition. To Isaac B. English and his wife were born twelve children, nine sons and three daughters, of whom six are deceased. Mr. English devoted his active life to farming, applying to it the principles of honesty and common sense, and living up to his faith in kindness and sympathy as means of making the world better. He died June 13, 1898, and his wife died November 12, 1892.

Isaac William English was born in Section 12, Marshall Township, December 29, 1856, and remained at home until purchasing eighty acres of his present farm in 1883. The following year, February 13, 1884, he was united in marriage to Sarah Spotts, daughter of John and Mary (Lockard) Spotts. Mrs. English was born in Wabash Township July 27, 1859, and is the second oldest of eight children. She is the mother of two sons and three daughters, of whom Roy W. was born May 29, 1885; Pearl was born February 2, 1887; Mattie was born December 10, 1890; Alice was born January 1, 1892; and Chester was born January 6, 1895. Mr. English prospered with his first purchase of land, and later added to it until he now owns 215 acres, all of which is under cultivation. He has an ideal country home and a diversified occupation, and is a keen appreciator of the advantages and refinements which differentiate the country dweller of the present from his predecessor of a decade ago. He is a Republican in political affiliation and fraternally is connected with the Court of Honor. The family are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

ENGLISH, J. W.—J. W. English, who for so many years was a hard-working farmer of Martinsville Township, is now in comfortable circumstances as the result of the fine development of oil properties on his land, and will soon move to Casey, to give his children better educational advantages, that he is here regarded as a resident of that city. He was born in the township named, on the 8th of October, 1858, his parents, Andrew J. and Amanda (Francis) English, having been natives of Ohio. Her father, who was born in Licking County about 1833, migrated to Clark County, Ill., in 1853, and lived within its limits until his death, in January, 1866. During two years of the Civil War he was absent at the front fighting the battles of the Union cause as a member of Company G, One hundred and Twenty-third Illinois Volunteer Infantry, being at Shiloh, Corinth and other engagements of note. His wife and the mother of J. W., also a native of Licking County, Ohio, was born April 14, 1837, and died February 28, 1904, at the age of sixty-seven. The paternal grandfather was of Scotch-Irish ancestry.

Mr. English, in his early years, was developed on his father's farm and in the country schools of the neighborhood, and on the 17th of October, 1886, married Miss Addie E. Sherman, a native of Clark County, born November 27, 1858, and therefore about a month younger than her husband. Mrs. English is the daughter of George and Lucy (Boyd) Sherman, her parents, like those of her husband, having been born in Ohio. Her father, a native of Delaware County, died in October, 1859, and her mother subsequently married Michael Lewis, of whom there is a biography on another page of this history.

In 1889, three years after his marriage, Mr. English bought forty acres of land in Section 4, Martinsville Township, of Mrs. Mollie Stephens, but, although he was industrious and frugal, it was extremely difficult for a long time to make even a fair living out of the property. But with the discovery of oil all changed, and his estate is now valuable and yields him a good income. Altogether he owns ninety-five acres in the oil district, and has twelve producing wells on one "forty." There are none who begrudge him his good fortune; in biblical phrase, he has had his years of famine, and now comes his season of plenty. He is one of the best known and most highly respected citizens in the township, both for what he has accomplished and for what he is. Mr. English is a Republican voter, but in no sense a politician. Besides his faithful and good wife, who has stood close by his side, whatever his lot or prospects, he has three children: Goldie, born May 11, 1887; Lester Claude, May 18, 1890, and Usher Howard, May, 1893.

FAIRGRIEF, Charles.—Identified with the Counties of Edgar and Clark from his early manhood, Mr. Fairgrief has meanwhile gained a thorough knowledge of the soil, climate and possibilities of this section of Illinois and has won a wide circle of warm personal friends through his adherence to manly and upright principles of conduct. Although much of his life has been passed in this region, he is of English birth and parentage, and was born in Kendall, England, March 31, 1846, being one of a family of eleven children. Early in life it became impressed upon his mind that his native land offered fewer opportunities for the young and the poor than were offered by the newer country across the ocean, and he was yet a mere lad when he sought the unknown land beyond the sea. After a brief sojourn in New York he came west to Illinois and stopped at Paris, Edgar County, where soon he secured employment with Mr. Simms, a farmer living five miles south of that town. Steadily working from month to month, he frugally hoarded his earnings until he was in a position to start out as an independent farmer, which result was achieved in the buying of the necessary machinery and stock and the renting of a farm in Edgar County.

After having operated as a renter for a number of years, in 1875 Mr. Fairgrief came to Clark County and settled upon a tract of timber land in Wabash Township. At once he took up the task of clearing the timber off the land and placing the tract in shape for profitable cultivation. The one hundred acres comprising the homestead have been improved with neat buildings, all of which he erected after buying the place. The land lies on Section 22 and is characterized by those appurtenances indicative of the progressive farmer and resident owner. In the securing of his present desirable position he has had the able assistance of his wife, who was Susan Cockroft, a native of Vigo County, Ind., born July 30, 1849, and from the age of three years until her marriage a resident of Edgar County, Ill. Mrs. Fairgrief is of English ancestry. Her father, James Cockroft, was born in Leeds, England, and by occupation is a blacksmith, following that trade in his native land until he came to America in 1841, at the age of thirty years. By his marriage to Mrs. Sarah (Kirby) Holley, the widow of John Holley, he had two children, of whom Susan was the elder, and she was reared and educated in Edgar County. Of her union with Mr. Fairgrief nine children were born, namely: Chauncey M., Edward H., Sarah J., James (who died in infancy), McCloud, Cornelia, Ravilla, Anna and Willelea. The children were trained under the careful guidance of their parents and attended the district schools of Wabash Township.

The fraternal relations of Mr. Fairgrief embrace identification with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, his membership being with Marshall Lodge No. 64. After coming to this country he made a careful study of national problems and is well versed in matters pertaining to governmental progress. Being a firm believer in free trade principles, he has affiliated with the Democratic party in national elections and locally votes for the men and measures he thinks for the best interests of the people. For eight years he officiated as Justice of the Peace, in addition to which he has held office as Tax Collector and at this writing is Notary Public. With his family he holds membership in the Christian Church and is a contributor to its missionary and philanthropic work.

FERRY, John.—Since casting his lot with Illinois in 1860, John Ferry has worked his way through many difficulties and extreme poverty to the ownership of a fine farm of eighty acres in Marshall Township. Upon arriving in the United States from County Donegal, Ireland, Mr. Ferry located first in Edgar County, this State, and, being absolutely without means, was glad of such menial occupations as feeding cattle and digging ditches. At the end of ten years he found himself the possessor of a neat little competence, and in a position to marry and have a home of his own. His wife formerly was Catherine Gallagher, daughter of Joseph and Eunice (Sweeney) Gallagher, who came to this county from Ireland in 1864.

In 1870 Mr. Ferry came to Clark County and bought his present farm in Marshall Township. It was covered with brush and timber, but without aid he has cleared and cultivated it, and transformed its stored fertility into products of use to mankind. He has a comfortable home and well tended garden, and his stock are well cared for and his products well housed. He places correct value upon neatness and order, and upon untiring industry as a means to a worthy end. He is a Democrat in politics, and in religion is a Roman Catholic. Mr. and Mrs. Ferry are the parents of two sons and five daughters: Margaret, Joseph, Grace Ann, Mary, Catherine, Patrick and Eunice.

FETTERS, Richard.—Not long after the close of the Civil War Mr. Feters removed from Kentucky to Eastern Illinois and settled in Cumberland County, where for a long period of busy years he followed general farming pursuits. Eventually crossing the line into Clark County he purchased property on rural route 7 from Casey and here he has since made his home, devoting himself as assiduously to the cultivation of his land and the improvement of the place as he did when stern necessity impelled his labors. Through conscientious and intelligent efforts he has become financially independent and ranks among the substantial farmers of his community, this commendable degree of success having been achieved by his unaided exertions through long years of laborious application.

Descended from German ancestry, and a son of Daniel and Sarah (Gillman) Feters, natives of Pennsylvania, Richard Feters was born October 10, 1843, and passed the years of youth in Kentucky in his native county of Lewis, being reared a farmer boy and receiving fair advantages in country schools. At the age of less than eighteen years he left Kentucky August 18, 1861, and crossed the river into Ohio, where he offered his services in defense of the Union, and was accepted as a private in Company B, Thirty-third Ohio Infantry, under Captain E.

J. Ellis. With his regiment he took part in various skirmishes as well as a few engagements of note. Owing to disability he was honorably discharged from the service June 24, 1862, after which he returned to his old Kentucky home. Four years later he came north as a permanent resident and has since lived in Eastern Illinois.

The marriage of Mr. Feters took place March 22, 1868, and united him with Ann Eliza La Fever, daughter of Elias and Rebecca (Irons) La Fever, natives of Pennsylvania, both descendants of German ancestors. Four children came to bless the union of Mr. and Mrs. Feters, namely: Jennie, who was born February 20, 1869, and died October 8, 1899; James, who was born May 31, 1871, and now makes his home in Pekin, Ill.; Mary B., who was born April 3, 1878, and married Walter Mayes, a carpenter now residing in Casey; and Charles, who was born June 5, 1882, and died October 8th of the same year. The family are respected as valued members of the farming community and as earnest workers in the United Brethren Church at Casey, in which Mr. and Mrs. Feters are leading members. Old war days are held in memory through meeting with his comrades in Monroe Post No. 100, G. A. R., at Casey, to which he has belonged ever since coming to this county. With secret organizations he has never been in affiliation and belongs to no order excepting the Grand Army, while in political opinions he always has been stanchly in sympathy with the Republican party.

FINNEY, William B.—The earliest recollections of his life Mr. Finney associates with frontier surroundings as they then existed in Clark County. Settlers were then few, schools were scattered at wide intervals and towns were mere hamlets. As far as the eye could reach in every direction there was an apparently endless stretch of woods. Children feared to go alone through the forests, for wolves abounded and bears also were occasionally seen. Nor had the graceful deer and antelope disappeared from their early haunts. There were few roads in the county, for the building of a good road through the woods was a difficult task. Township lines had not been definitely defined, nor were the county lines always fixed with positiveness. The home farm of 400 acres stood in Johnson Township and in those early days oxen were utilized in the care of the crops. The first horses were brought to the farm in 1854, but it was some years after that before the oxen were entirely superseded by their swifter competitors. There was little farm machinery and that was of a type now entirely obsolete, having been replaced by labor-saving apparatus of the most modern style. The pioneer's home was a primeval structure of logs, boasting none of the comforts of the present day, yet withal the home of a happy, contented and progressive family.

On the homestead in Johnson Township William B. Finney was born September 10, 1846. His father, Hamen, was born in New York State October 8, 1809, and married Susan White, who was born May 5, 1813, in Virginia, of German and English extraction. For a time they lived in Ohio, but as early as 1842 they traveled by "prairie schooner" to Illinois and settled in Clark County, where he took up a claim from the Government. Both passed away in 1899, the mother on the 30th of January and the father on the 22d of October. Their son, William B., was reared on the home farm and attended school when he could be spared from home. The schools of those days were far inferior to those of the present and his attendance necessarily was irregular, yet he secured a fair education. However, this was perhaps due as largely to his unaided efforts as to school-training.

The marriage of Mr. Finney took place on Christmas eve of 1871 and united him with the lady who since has been his efficient helper and devoted counselor. Miss Caroline Burke was born in Dearborn County, Ind., March 31, 1851, and was a daughter of Robert Burke, who was a native of New York State, his parents having crossed the ocean from Ireland about the opening of the nineteenth century. Immediately after his marriage Mr. Finney brought his bride to the farm seven miles south of Casey, which forms a part of the old homestead entered from the Government, and here he now lives, devoting his attention to the care and cultivation of the ninety acres comprising the farm. The land is well adapted for the raising of stock, which he has made his specialty. With the exception of four years spent in Oklahoma he has made Clark County his lifelong home and is satisfied to spend his remaining years here, in the midst of the friends of a lifetime and surrounded by the scenes familiar to him from earliest knowledge. In February of 1901 he removed to Oklahoma and entered a claim in Denny County, where he remained for three years. While greatly pleased with Oklahoma, he was content to return to the old surroundings.

Though not claiming to be an adherent of the Republican or the Democratic party, Mr. Finney maintains a close interest in political affairs. In his vote, however, he pays no attention to party lines, but supports the men and measures he considers best qualified to advance the welfare of the people. In local offices he considers the character and intelligence of the candidate as vastly more important than his views concerning tariff, imperialism and currency. In his family there were seven children, but three, Hosea B., Josiah C. and Paton H., died in childhood. The eldest daughter, Ora B., is the wife of F. F. Harris, of Casey; Dessie B. married Levi G. Weaver, a progressive farmer of Johnson Township. The older of the two surviving sons, James G., resides in Casey, and the younger, Damon W., makes Colorado his home.

FIX, Robert Ober.—Prominent among the progressive farmers of Marshall Township, Clark County, is Robert Ober Fix, a native son of Clark County, and born in Anderson Township, August 21, 1855. Mr. Fix was reared in a family of eight children, four sons and four daughters, of whom he is the third oldest, and his early advantages were similar to those of other farm-reared youth of his time and place. His father, Joseph Fix, a deceased pioneer of Clark County, was a native of Licking County, Ohio, who in youth moved to Delaware County, the same State, and worked for a man of the name of Eli Guinn, near Columbus, Ohio. In his native State Mr. Fix married Nancy Fancher, who was born and reared in Ohio, and in 1849 came to Melrose Township, Clark County, Ill., where he invested his earnings in 200 acres of land, taken up from the Government. He worked on this property for about two years, but it not proving satisfactory, he sold out and moved to Anderson Township, where he bought 205 acres. Here he lived and prospered until his death, October 13, 1901. He was a Democrat in politics, and a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Mr. & Mrs Henry Gallatin

Robert Ober Fix helped to clear the home farm. He married, October 14, 1877, Mary E. Simmons, daughter of Anderson Simmons, a farmer of Martinsville Township, and born June 4, 1857. Mr. and Mrs. Fix are the parents of three sons and one daughter, of whom the latter, Stella, who is the wife of Henry Rudy, of Marshall, is the only survivor. Mr. Fix, as did his father before him, subscribes to the principles of the Democratic party, and he has been active in its local undertakings for several years. He served as Supervisor and Road Commissioner of Orange Township. In religion he is a Methodist Episcopalian. Mr. Fix is a successful and studious agriculturist, taking advantage of all opportunities for advancement in his calling, and maintaining strict integrity in all of his dealings.

FLINT, Jacob.—As we look around on the civilization of the present day it is difficult to realize that scarcely one-half century has passed since wild animals roamed unmolested through our forests, the Indians had not yet wholly retreated to the more remote frontier, and white men had only begun the task of transforming the wilderness into a region of fertile farms and happy homes. There are still living among us men whose memories go back to the old conditions and who enjoy contrasting the refinements of the twentieth century with the struggles of the past. Among these men an influential pioneer is Jacob Flint, who as early as 1840, when a small boy, settled with his parents in what is now Johnson Township, Clark County. The hardships of those now distant days he vividly recalls. It was his task to aid in the development of a farm from the primeval wilderness. Until about 1854 the country was very sparsely settled, but early in the '50s pioneers began to come from points further east. The only school in all that region was held in a log building known as the Cole schoolhouse, but Mr. Flint attended irregularly. In the winter it was too cold for children to walk to school in their bare feet, while in the summer rattlesnakes were so numerous and dangerous that little folks were kept at home, hence opportunities for education were meager. Wild game was abundant and supplied the families of the pioneers with meat of various kinds. On the land where Casey now stands Mr. Flint frequently killed deer, and beneath his unerring aim other game often was brought to earth.

During the eighteenth century the Flint family crossed the ocean from England to America and settled in Maryland, where Benjamin Flint was born in 1795. Removing to regions farther west, he labored as a pioneer in various localities and eventually died in Illinois in October, 1850. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Elizabeth White, was born in Pennsylvania in 1800, of German parentage, and died in Illinois during June of 1879. Their son Jacob was born in Franklin County, Ind., September 6, 1832, and was eight years of age when the family settled upon an undeveloped tract of land in Clark County, Ill., where since he has made his home and engaged in farm pursuits. June 18, 1855, he was united in marriage with Hannah Shadley, who was born in Ohio July 7, 1831, and at the age of two years accompanied her parents to Indiana, where she passed the years of childhood. Possessing a gentle and amiable disposition and wise judgment, she proved a helpful counselor to her husband, and her death, September 30, 1889, was a deep affliction for the family. The children born of the union were: Albert, Clarinda, Mary, Joe Hooker and Charles, of whom Charles and Mary are deceased. The son J. H. resides on the old farm and the other children also are married and in prosperous circumstances.

Casting his first Presidential ballot for John C. Fremont, Mr. Flint became a Republican on the organization of the party and has voted that ticket up to the present day. When the Civil War began he gave his allegiance to the cause of the Union, and August 15, 1861, was enrolled as a member of Company F, Fifty-ninth Illinois Infantry, with which he marched to the front under Captain S. W. Kelley. The first battle in which he engaged was that of Pea Ridge. Later he bore a brave part at Shiloh, Corinth, Stone River, Perryville (Ky.), Franklin (Tenn.), Chattanooga and other engagements of perhaps less note, though not of less danger. The only time he received a wound was at Stone River, where he was injured in the thigh. At the expiration of his term of service in September, 1864, he returned to his Illinois home with a splendid record as a soldier. All through his life he has been loyal to the nation and believes our country to be the greatest on earth, while in his own community he works energetically to promote movements for the benefit of agriculturists and the well-being of all.

FORRESTER, Ethelbert.—Ethelbert Forrester, merchant, Postmaster and enterprising resident at Moriah, is now the chief personal factor in the thriving little village which is springing up around what, before the coming of the oil boom, was virtually only a small country store. He is well educated, a good business man, and, although still young in years, has evinced an unusual aptitude for the conduct of county affairs. Mr. Forrester was born in Johnson Township, this county, on the 31st of August, 1875, the son of Elijah Taylor and Emma M. (Chrisman) Forrester, his mother, who was born February 15, 1855, passing away on the 5th of June, 1882. His father is a farmer and a stockman, the members of his family, besides E. T., being Edwin, who is a school teacher, and Blanche, who was born August 31, 1877, and died November 25, 1889.

The paternal grandfather, John Forrester, located with his wife in Johnson Township, in the spring of 1847, where he was a leading farmer and citizen until the time of his death September 6, 1871. He was the final owner of 400 acres of land, a stanch member of the Methodist Church, a life-long Republican, a substantial member of the community and a good man. Of the eight children in his family six reached manhood and womanhood—Samuel, Lewis, John, Elijah Taylor (or Taylor, as he was more generally called), Sarah, and Orilla.

Ethelbert, the son of Taylor Forrester, was educated, primarily, in the common and high schools of Casey, and finished his higher studies at the County Normal, of Marshall, graduating from that institution with a first grade certificate in 1896. Later, for five years, he taught school in Johnson Township, but since the year 1900 has been engaged in mercantile business. In 1905 he bought the establishment of Mr. Weaver at Moriah, and, while steadily improving since that time, it has been especially good since the discovery of oil in the adjacent country. He is also Postmaster at Moriah, and in 1901 was elected Supervisor of Johnson Township, serving four years in that capacity, Chairman of the Board during the last year of his term. Mr. Forrester's reputation for substantial worth and high character are well merited and fully earned, for his father died when he was quite young, and he was left almost entirely alone with few resources except ability and an honest ambition to make the most possible of his life; and this he has achieved to the utmost, and is honored accordingly.

Ethelbert Forrester was married at Oak Point, February 15, 1899, to Miss Jennie Weaver, daughter of Louis and Adeline (Smith) Weaver, and born in Christian County, Kan., on the 11th of January, 1880. Her father was a native of Indiana and her mother was born and reared at Belle Air, Crawford County, Ill. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Forrester—Denzel Victor, December 24, 1899, and Mary Adeline, October 30, 1904. Both himself and wife are members of the Winebyonarian (or Church of God) at Oak Point. Mr. Forrester is one of the strongest Republicans in this section of the county. Fraternally he is identified with the M. W. A., No. 9472, and is a charter member of the Ben-Hur Society.

FORSYTHE, Ben.—The gift of trading, discovered in early life, and prosecuted ever since with vigor and growing capacity, is responsible for the present prosperity of Ben Forsythe, one of the younger generation of financiers of Clark County. Mr. Forsythe found the place most unsuited to his tastes to be the farm north of Marshall where he was born March 12, 1872. His parents, Benjamin Bradford and Martha (Anderson) Forsythe, born January 3, 1838, and October 13, 1841, respectively, were hard-working farmers, but the father's usefulness was seriously impaired by service during the last nine months of the Civil War, when he contracted the cold on his lungs which resulted in his death, December 30, 1895.

With due appreciation of the advantages of education, especially arithmetic, young Ben attended what was known as the old Sassafras school until about his sixteenth year. In the meantime the trading spirit had grown strong within him, a fact which became known to the surrounding farmers when he succeeded in cornering the local chicken market. He also had come under the tutelage of Lincoln

H Gasaway

Griffith, himself a thrifty trader, who put him on his huckster wagon, in which capacity he exercised his gift of persuasion for three years. At the age of seventeen he had advanced to the capitalist class, and had invested his chicken, huckster and incidental earnings in the clear title to a farm. A land owner and bank depositor, he proceeded to enjoy also some of the luxuries of life, and stirred up his faculties by taking a trip to Kansas, and later to California.

Returning from the West, it became the pleasure and duty of Mr. Forsythe to share his good fortune with a deserving little woman known as Ruth L———, whom he married and forthwith settled down to farming, stock-raising and trading for six years. He then sold his farm at an advantage, subsequently bought and sold two more farms, and in 1904 bought 320 acres of timber land in Canada. This last property furnished him the material for an extensive timber shipping business, in which he engaged with large profit for about three years. Since then he has been a resident of Marshall, a tireless, resistless force, with many years ahead of him in which to seize upon opportunity, and mould it to commercial advantage. In the hands of Mr. Forsythe, what often is regarded as a dangerous propensity, has not led its possessor astray. On the contrary, he is regarded as a level-headed and astute business man, exercising consideration and fairness towards others, even while gaining on them in the race for a competence. When allied with generosity, public-spiritedness, honesty and appreciation of the real value of money, the qualities within him should tend to great good and great usefulness to his fellowmen.

FORSYTHE, James.—The financial resource of James Forsythe is a well kept and well patronized meat market in a central part of Marshall, of which he has been the owner and proprietor for ——— years. He has a large and dependable trade, and retains the same by the observance of the homely qualities of honesty, obligingness and tact.

Mr. Forsythe is a product of Wabash Township, Clark County, where he was born January 13, 1863. His father, B. B. Forsythe, was born in Kentucky, and in early life sought the larger possibilities of the Central West, settling on the farm in Wabash Township where his death occurred in 1895. Mr. Forsythe's mother, Martha (Anderson) Forsythe, was born in Ohio, and married her husband in the then small town of Marshall, in 1857. Besides James, there were three sons in the family, Thomas G., Norman and Benjamin; and two daughters, Mrs. Ella Demster, of Poplar Bluffs, Mo., and Mrs. Lucy Hall, of Edgar County, Ill. The family all are members of the Christian Church.

The marriage of James Forsythe and Jennie White occurred April 20, 1884, Mrs. Forsythe being a native of Wabash Township, and daughter of early settlers of the State. Mr. and Mrs. Forsythe are the parents of ten children: Vernon; Harry; Charles; Mrs. Jessie Eldridge, of Paris, Ill.; Gertrude; Mable; Lillian; and Martha Jane. Mr. Forsythe is respected by all who know him, and is one of the enterprising and public spirited business men of the city.

FORSYTHE, Norman.—There are within the limits of Clark County a number of men whose entire lives have been passed here, and this class forms one of the most substantial and enterprising in the body politic, its members uniformly favoring measures for the development of local resources and for the upbuilding of schools, churches and other agents contributory to the general good. In the list of such citizens mention belongs to Norman Forsythe, the son of a pioneer whose sketch is presented elsewhere in this volume. The well improved farm lying on Section 30, Wabash Township, which is now the scene of Mr. Forsythe's activities, was his birthplace, January 19, 1867, being the date of his birth. During boyhood he was sent to the neighboring country schools and also was taught to make himself useful on the home farm, learning all of the work incident to the management of land and the care of stock.

In his establishment of domestic ties, October 25, 1893, Mr. Forsythe was united in marriage with Anna Fawley, who was born in Wabash Township, October 25, 1870, and was in order of birth sixth among eight children, named as follows: Elmer; Albert; Ida, who is the wife of William Spotts, a farmer of Marshall Township; Melville; Roy; Anna; George; and Elenora, deceased. The father, William Fawley, was a native of Virginia, whence he removed to Ohio at an early age, and there met and married Eliza Callahan, a native of the Buckeye State. After their marriage they remained for a time in Ohio and from there migrated to Illinois. About 1866 they settled in Clark County and Mr. Fawley purchased eighty acres in Wabash Township, where he engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death, meanwhile doubling the amount of his holdings. At the time of his death he was seventy-one years of age. Through all of his active life he was a staunch believer in Democratic principles and a firm supporter of the party ticket. At one time he held the office of Township Commissioner, but generally he declined official honors, preferring to devote himself exclusively to farm work.

Upon his father's death Norman Forsythe established himself permanently at the old homestead and here he now owns and operates one hundred and thirty-nine acres of land, a considerable portion of which was cleared through his tireless efforts of earlier years. He follows general farming pursuits, and disposes of a portion of the produce in the markets, feeding the balance to his cattle, of which he always carries a number of head. No startling changes have marked his life. Pursuing the even tenor of his way, he has lived from year to year at peace with his fellowmen, unburdened by the stress of conflict that darkens the industrial world. Aside from voting the Democratic ticket he has taken no part whatever in politics, nor has he ever become affiliated with fraternal organizations or secret societies. The farm where he was born is also the birthplace of his children, Nila, Fay, Alva W., Lena, Mahala, and Elmer, in whose training he and his wife are warmly interested. Throughout the community the family is respected and its members occupy the positions to which their high characters entitle them.

FOSTER, Dennis.—Examples of the result of indefatigable labor and wise judgment are to be found in every section of the country, and certainly Clark County is not wanting in the presence of a goodly quota of successful men, citizens who have achieved a commendable degree of success by their unaided efforts protracted through a long period of years. An instance of such success is to be found in the life of Dennis Foster, one of the prosperous citizens of Clark County and for years one of its extensive agriculturists, but now living in

Casey retired from active farming and business cares. Believing that he had done his share of work in the world, in 1901 he retired from the farm, gave his lands into the charge of two of his sons, and moved into town, where now he enjoys the comforts rendered possible by judicious industry in the past.

Licking County, Ohio, is Mr. Foster's native home, and December 8, 1832, the date of his birth. His father, Israel Foster, was born in Virginia about 1796 of English parentage and received an excellent education in the best schools of the Old Dominion. Early in life he removed to Ohio and there married Esther Steinmetz, a native of Pennsylvania and a member of an old German family. From Ohio they came to Illinois November 7, 1838, and settled in what is now Orange Township, Clark County, where Israel Foster entered 360 acres of Government land. April 14, 1841, the family circle was broken by the death of the mother. Her body was the first buried in Butternut Church cemetery, now one of the largest cemeteries in Clark County, but then an unbroken expanse of the forest. The death of the father occurred March 16, 1847, and his body was interred beside the remains of his wife in the country churchyard.

After the death of his father Dennis Foster went to Jasper County and made his home with Captain William Lemon. During 1855 he hired out to T. W. Hall of Janesville, Wis., with whom he took a drove of cattle from Casey to Monroe, Green County, Wis., making the trip in about two weeks. On his return to Illinois he engaged in herding cattle and made his home with Captain Lemon. During the spring of 1856 he bought four horses which he took to Woodford County, Ill., and sold them there, after which he remained in that county until fall and worked on a farm. On returning to Jasper County he assisted Captain Lemon for a time. During the summer of 1857 he was a member of a company that drove 500 head of cattle through to Minnesota and sold the drove there, then returned to Illinois. January 31, 1858, he was united in marriage with Francisca Slusser, a sister of the Slusser brothers, well known residents of Casey Township. Mrs. Foster was born in Stark County, Ohio, January 15, 1838, of German ancestry.

Shortly after his marriage Mr. Foster settled upon his farm of 150 acres lying eight miles south of Casey and here he soon became extensively engaged in general farming. However, when the war broke out he dropped his private affairs in order to serve the cause of the Union, and December 2, 1861, he was accepted as a private in Company G, Fifty-fourth Illinois Infantry, with which he went to the front and participated in numerous engagements, notably the siege of Vicksburg, where he remained from the 2d of June until the 20th of July. At the expiration of his time, August 13, 1864, he was honorably discharged from the service. On returning home he resumed farm pursuits, which he carried forward with unabated zeal and increasing success during the ensuing years, and eventually retired with a gratifying competency as a result of his labors. Fraternally he holds membership with the Masons and politically always has voted with the Republican party. At one time he filled the office of Justice of the Peace but as a rule he has declined political and other offices.

Concerning the children of Dennis Foster we note the following: Alice was born March 26, 1860, and died May 3, 1893; Harry was born December 18, 1865, and died August 16, 1878; John was born October 8, 1868, and now engages in farming on the old homestead; Katie was born March 14, 1870, and died September 24, 1900; Homer was born September 10, 1873, and now is employed as a railway mail clerk; the twins, Fred and Frank, were born August 2, 1877, the latter being now a resident of Moriah, while the former is associated with his brother John in the management of the old homestead.

FOSTER, Frank.—Frank Foster, engaged in the hotel and livery business at Moriah, Clark County, is one of the leading men of that growing little town. He was born in Johnson Township August 2, 1877, the son of Dennis and Frances (Slusser) Foster, both of his parents being natives of Stark County, Ohio. Frank was reared on his father's farm in the township named, obtained a fair education by attending its common schools, and continued as an agriculturist until the spring of 1906, when he moved to Moriah with his wife and engaged in the line of business which he has brought to a prosperous condition. He still owns the farm, which he formerly operated, and is now considered a well-to-do and progressive young man. His business prospects have been particularly bright since the oil boom commenced in his locality, with the consequent influx of new comers and the building up of the village of Moriah.

On April 7, 1901, Frank Foster was united in marriage with Miss Belle Weayer, daughter of Lewis and Adaline (Smith) Weaver, her parents being both natives of Clark County and well known and highly respected people therein. Mrs. Foster was born in Johnson Township, this county, September 1, 1881, being of a family of six children.

FOX, Charles Riley.—It is significant of the attractions of Clark County, the fertility of its soil and the possibilities of success therein to be achieved, that the sons of our pioneers to a large extent have remained within the region where their fathers gained their first successes; or, if accident or inclination takes them to other parts of the country, not a few of them return to establish themselves permanently in the vicinity of their early associations. Such has been the case with Charles Riley Fox, who was born and reared in this county, and in young manhood became fascinated by possibilities dreamed of in the far West and went to California to secure a start for himself. However, a residence in that State of considerable duration did not prove sufficiently satisfactory to induce him to remain, and we find him now settled in the county where his early life was passed.

Elsewhere in this volume will be found a sketch of Joel B. Fox and mention of the family history. Charles Riley Fox is a son of Joel V. Fox, and was born in Wabash Township, Clark County, Ill., January 30, 1879. In boyhood he was a pupil in neighboring schools and was given by his father an opportunity to attend college, but he preferred to devote himself immediately to agricultural pursuits and has never regretted his decision in that regard. After the death of his father, which occurred February 2, 1894, he left the old home and tried his fortune on the Pacific coast, settling in Butte County, Cal., where he became manager of a large estate owned by John Crouch, formerly of Clark County. Nine years were passed in California, at the expiration of which time he returned to Clark County to establish a permanent home.

The marriage of Mr. Fox took place March 11, 1903, and united him with Eliza Blanche Oaks, who was born in Clay County, Ill., June 25, 1882, coming to Clark County about one year later with her parents. William H. and Elizabeth A. (Swim) Oaks. Her father was born in Vigo County, Ind., August 12, 1856, and her mother was born in Clark County, Ill., March 7, 1857, being the youngest child of Vincent and Eliza (Bush) Swim, natives of Licking County, Ohio. The former was born August 15, 1828, and the latter was born April 25, 1827, and died November 11, 1859, and were of German extraction. The paternal grandfather of Mrs. Fox was a native of Vigo County, Ind., while her paternal grandmother, who bore the maiden name of Jane Kirby, was a native of Vigo County, Ind., and of English descent. For a year after marriage Mr. and Mrs. Fox made their home in California, but then returned to their old home and settled on a farm nine miles southeast of Casey, where they own eighty acres bought from John Foster. The land lies within the oil belt and now has four wells, said to be among the best producers in the district.

While at no time deeply interested in political questions and displaying in his disposition none of the partisanship regrettably noticeable among many politicians, it must not be inferred that Mr. Fox is lacking in patriotic spirit or deficient in intelligent devotion to the nation's welfare. On the contrary, he manifests a desire to see the present national prosperity continued until ours shall be the wealthiest Government in the world and its people the most contented and prosperous. In general elections he votes the Democratic ticket. The Christian Church, of which his wife has been a member since the age of fifteen years, receives his generous support, and its missionary movements are benefited by his contributions. Both he and his wife are identified with Rebekah Lodge, No. 285, of which she is a charter member, and in addition he long has been actively associated with Hazel Dell Lodge, No. 410, I. O. O. F.

FOX, Joel V.—The late Joel V. Fox was an honest, earnest man, of limited education, who so thoroughly believed in the nobility and saving-grace of labor that he considered the greatest gift which he could offer a man was the chance to do some useful work. In this sense he was truly a public benefactor; and it is said that no one person in Johnson Township gave so much employment to poor people as Joel V. Fox. If a possible thing he would give them work; if they were needy and unable to labor no man was more prompt to relieve them by unostentatious deed of charity. He was a practical Christian, and as industrious himself as he was earnest and kind-hearted in his preaching of the benefits of industry to others.

The deceased was a native of Indiana, born in Putnam County February 8, 1845, the son of Dr. Franklin Fox, a Pennsylvanian, and Melinda (Mass) Fox, of Missouri. Notwithstanding the prefix, or title, to his name, his father was a good, honest farmer during the most of his life. The family is of German descent and partakes of the most substantial traits of that nationality. Joel V. Fox removed from his native Indiana home to Clark County in 1869, being then about fourteen years of age, and resided within its limits, industrious, helpful, peaceable and a peace-maker, and affectionately honored for a quarter of a century. He received most of his education in the public schools of Putnam County, Ind., before he came to this county, and quite early in his business career here engaged in the lumber business and the raising of live stock. He developed these lines to such proportions as to become the generous employer of labor already noted. He was twice elected a Justice of the Peace of Johnson Township, and his wide acquaintance, with the favor in which he was universally held, made his services in this office of great value to the community. He died during his second term, February 27, 1894. He was always a Democrat, but it was not his nature to be a bitter partisan.

On April 28, 1890, in Clay County, Ind., Mr. Fox married Miss Margaret V. Weaver, a native of the county named, born May 5, 1849. Her father, John Weaver, was born in Virginia March 4, 1806, and her mother was also a native of the Old Dominion. Her parents, who were both reared in Virginia, came to Clay County, Ind., in 1837, and both died in Indiana in 1880—the mother, January 28th, and the father, in August. Mr. Weaver was a successful farmer and stockman, and had a family of eleven children, six of whom are still living.

The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Joel V.

J. P. Golden

Fox were as follows: J. A., December 16, 1873; G. F., March 28, 1876; C. R., January 30, 1879; H. M., May 31, 1881; Nora A., August 26, 1885; R. A., October 21, 1888; Arminda J., December 2, 1871, married John Foster September 21, 1890, had five children, and died April 4, 1906; an infant son, August 22, 1884, died September 16, 1884.

FREDENBERGER, John W.—Farming, school teaching and office holding have thus far enlisted the energy of John W. Fredenberger, an energetic and promising Republican, and the present Clerk of Clark County. Mr. Fredenberger was born in Auburn Township, Clark County, Ill., May 11, 1873, and is the oldest of the nine children of George and Sarah A. (Bierbaum) Fredenberger, the former of whom was born in Auburn Township, July 31, 1848, and the latter in Marion County, Ind., May 6, 1850. The parents were farmers and stock-raisers during their active lives, and made Auburn Township their home until retiring to Marshall in 1903. The father died January 23, 1907, but the mother still is living. Of the children of this couple, Flora M., an infant, died May 18, 1882; Edward W. lives on the home place in Auburn Township; Mary A. Washburn lives in Parker Township, Clark County; and Emma L., Harry L., Carrie V., Nettie H. and Ruth E. live with their parents.

The excellent education of John W. Fredenberger is due largely to his pluck and ability to overcome obstacles. After completing the training in the public schools of Auburn Township, he attended Westfield College for one year, during that time completing the first year's work of the normal course. In all, he taught about seven terms in the country schools, alternating the same with courses of study in different institutions. From the beginning of his voting days he was stanchly on the side of the Republican party, and had the kind of energy necessary to make himself a force in local party undertakings. He was elected County Clerk November 4, 1902, and succeeded himself to the same office November 6, 1906. In 1900 he was appointed Census Enumerator of Auburn Township.

Mr. Fredenberger is prominent in fraternal circles, and is a member of the Knights of Pythias and Modern Woodmen of America. He joined the latter in December, 1905, and besides his present office of Commander, has held all other offices within the gift of the lodge, including Master at Arms and Prelate. He became a member of the Woodmen in June, 1902. In Marshall Township, September 25, 1901, Mr. Fredenberger married Daisy D., daughter of M. J. and Caroline Miller, the former of whom was born in West Virginia, April 6, 1834, and the latter in New Jersey, March 26, 1846. Mrs. Fredenberger is the youngest of five children, and was born in the town of Marshall, January 31, 1878. She herself is the mother of the following children: Glenn E., born in Auburn Township, July 22, 1902; Helen C., born in Marshall, August 23, 1904; and George B., born in Marshall, June 1, 1906. Mrs. Fredenberger is a member of the United Brethren Church, of which her husband is a generous contributor. The couple are popular in a large circle of friends, and represent the general worth upon which rests the best welfare of communities.

FUNK, John.—From the time of his arrival in Clark County, about the close of the Civil War until his death many years later, John Funk held a place among the most progressive and substantial agriculturists of his locality. Coming to the State with limited means, he surmounted countless obstacles, reared a large family and assisted each of the children in securing a start in the world, in addition to which he left a competency for his widow, sufficient to surround her declining years with the comforts of existence. To accomplish results so noteworthy, a man necessarily must possess energy, industry and sagacity, and these traits were prominent among Mr. Funk's characteristics. Discouragements did not daunt his ardor nor did hardships weaken his courage. When he settled in the county he bought forty acres of partly improved land in Casey Township, where he put up a log cabin as a shelter for his wife and children. The little cabin remained their home for seven years, at the expiration of which time he erected a more substantial house, and eventually, in 1886, he had the pleasure of superintending the erection of a commodious frame residence on the original forty-acre tract. Meanwhile he had increased his holdings until at his death he owned 250 acres of land in Casey and Johnson Townships. Of the estate 100 acres, together with the residence, were left to Mrs. Funk, and the balance was divided among the children. Owing to the fact that the property lies in the oil district its value is much greater than if available for farming only, and unquestionably at no distant day the estate will command a large price.

Three dates stand out pre-eminently in a record of the life of John Funk, viz.: his birth in Perry County, Ohio, October 22, 1835, a son of David and Keziah Funk, natives of the same county; his marriage April 8, 1858, to Amanda Jane Shaw, the ceremony being solemnized in Hocking County, Ohio, by Elder John Parker; and his death, August 28, 1899, at his residence in Casey Township, Clark County, Ill. During the early period of his residence in Illinois the environment was that of the frontier, and he was foremost among the workers who were striving to evolve order out of chaos, civilization out of pioneer surroundings. Perhaps in no respect were his services more valuable than in the building of the roads. For several terms he served as roadmaster and his work in that capacity was faithfully performed and fruitful of good results. Many of the early roads were laid out and graded under his supervision, and he was ever ready to sacrifice his own interests in the effort to benefit the community. Another office which he filled zealously was that of School Director. From the organization of the Republican party until his death he voted the ticket and championed its principles. Patriotic and loyal in his devotion to the Union, he proved his spirit by serving throughout the Civil War, in which he enlisted from Ohio at the beginning of the struggle and served in the vicinity of the national headquarters at the capital until peace was declared. Identified with Masonry, he was a firm advocate of the principles of brotherly kindness and charity which the order represented, and in his upright life and philanthropic acts he exemplified its teachings.

There were thirteen children in the family of John Funk, but four died in infancy. The second child, Emma F., married William McDaniel, of Clark County, and died at the age of thirty-nine years, leaving four children, Nellie, John, Ira and Eddie. The eldest son, Washington C., was born in Ohio and now lives in Casey, Ill.; by his marriage to Ella Lindsey, of Martinsville, he has five children, Lillie, Charles, Maude, Daisy and Irene. The second son, Franklin C., was born in Ohio and now engages in farming in Johnson Township, Clark County; by his marriage to Mamie Hillard, of Casey, he has seven children, namely: Eldie, Goldie, Rowley, May, John, Ernest and Hattie. The fourth child, Reuben, was the first of the family born in Illinois, where he now farms his own land in Casey Township, Clark County. By his first wife, who was Emma Pears, he had one child, Etta. Three years after the death of his first wife he married Flora Sharp, a native of Clark County, and by that union he has three children, Clarence, Merle and Edgar. The fifth of the children, Lucy C., married Timothy A. Beasley, whose sketch appears elsewhere in this volume. They are the parents of seven children, namely: Dessa May, Flossie J., Myrtie M., Zonie Nell, Madge Amanda, Cecil Maria and T. Alta. The sixth of the family, Hattie, married William A. Shute, concerning whom mention is made on another page of this work; they have three children, Jessie, John and Amanda. The seventh of the family, Jesse, married Pearl List, of Clark County. They have one son, Wayne, and reside on a farm in Johnson Township. The eighth member of the family is Allen, who married Goldie Swim and resides in Johnson Township. The others of the children, as previously mentioned, are deceased. The family adheres to the Protestant faith. The sons and daughters have established positions of honor in the community and are respected for uprightness of character and progressive spirit, as well as for the geniality of temperament and courtesy and tact that come to them as an inheritance from their parents.

FUQUA, Clayborn.—A well balanced brain, great capacity for industry, and more than average practicability and good judgment contributed to the success of Clinton Fuqua, who, during his active life in Clark County was known as a farmer, stock-raiser and buyer, merchant and banker. Mr. Fuqua arose from humble beginnings, and at the outset of his independent career had only such advantages as he had been able to purchase with grit and determination. He was born in Kentucky May 2, 1835, and in the Burborn State were born also his parents, William and Eliza Fuqua. In him the thrift and resourcefulness of French forefathers was not diminished, and he had also a goodly share of that Gallic effervescence and cheer of outlook which smooths rough places and makes light of the obstacles of life.

The Fuqua family was established early in Clark County, and on the paternal farm young Clayborn was trained in the science of agriculture during the summer months, in the winter time pursuing his studies in the district schools, and later in the high school at Westfield. In time he became a land owner on a small scale, invested increasingly in high grade stock, and raised large quantities of grain. With the aid of his wife, who formerly was Sarah Cartwright, a native of Coles County, and born February 22, 1835, he lived well within his means, and by degrees laid by a competence for a rainy day. The Cartwrights were among the pioneers of Coles County, coming from Tennessee, where were born Eleven and Sarah (Pike) Cartwright, parents of Mrs. Fuqua. Mr. Cartwright was a distant kinsman of Peter Cartwright, the famous pioneer preacher. Mr. Fuqua's prosperity increased rapidly, and in time he owned twelve hundred acres of land in the county, besides his large town holdings.

About 1875 Mr. Fuqua came to Casey, and from then, until his death, May 2, 1900, took a prominent part in the commercial and social life of the community. He had acquired large experience of both business and mankind, and had the means necessary for a broadly helpful career. Not only did he engage in banking in Casey, but he was a stock-holder of the bank at Charleston, Coles County. He was a merchant on a scale commensurate with the needs of the community, and in connection with his farm, which he still owned, and which he operated with the aid of a tenant, promoted the stock-raising and selling industry for many years. His realty holding in the town were large, and he erected many of its finest buildings.

Politically, Mr. Fuqua was a Republican, and active in local party undertakings. He was a devout member of the Christian Church, and contributed to it as well as to many charitable and benevolent enterprises, with rare generosity. The large debt on the Christian Church was entirely paid off by him, and the day of the transaction there was quite a demonstration, when Mr. Fuqua burned the outstanding notes in the presence of the entire congregation. Mr. and Mrs. Fuqua were the parents of five sons and three daughters: Henry Webster, deceased; Owen C.; Early Houston, deceased; James Oscar; Eliza Ellen, wife of Philip Peters, of Casey; Leota, wife of M. W. Ruckle, of Casey; Otis, deceased; and Dova. Encouragement for those less fortunate arises from the career of this honored man, who first of all was a farmer, a lover of nature, and a believer in nature's goodness to the toilers of earth; and who, because of an unbroken ambition and continued capacity for affairs, spent his later days in the pursuits equally important and responsible, but of a nature to permit an enjoyment of the greater luxuries and refinements of life.

GALLAGHER, James.—As a representative of the cheerful, capable and resourceful transplanted Irishman, James Gallagher has contributed much to the promotion of agriculture in Clark County, and in his seventieth year finds him the possessor of various blessings, including a farm of 160 acres, sound health, and the esteem of the entire community.

Mr. Gallagher was born in County Donegal, Ireland, November 1, 1837, and is the second oldest in a family of eleven children, which included three sets of twins. His parents, Joseph and Uan (Sweeney) Gallagher, both were natives of Ireland, and the latter was a daughter of James Sweeney and Catherine, his wife. Early responsibility necessarily fell upon the shoulders of these children, and as the small tenant farm afforded few resources, the sons were eager to seek advantages elsewhere. At the age of sixteen James Gallagher came to America with little to recommend him but a rich Irish brogue and an honest, smiling face, but he soon secured a position in the iron works at Lehigh, Pa. Five years later, in 1858, he came to Edgar County and was employed by Elick Mann for five years, during which time he lived frugally, wore old clothes, and saved quite a little money. With this he purchased an eighty-acre farm in Marshall Township, from Jacob and Nancy McDonald, which property bore few traces of cultivation, and left much to be accomplished by the new owner. Later he bought an additional forty acres from the Duncan farm, still later adding forty adjoining acres, until he now owns 160 acres. The greater part of this is improved, and Mr. Gallagher has successfully conducted general farming and stock-raising with gratifying results. He has a comfortable home, plenty of fine shade trees, shrubs, gardens, an orchard, and meadows which yield almost unfailing crops of grain and general produce. He is a practical and methodical farmer, and keeps well abreast of the times in which he lives and moves.

A Democrat in politics, Mr. Gallagher has held the office of Commissioner of Highways for three years, but on the whole has been averse to political honors. He is a member of the Roman Catholic Church, as are also the other members of his family. The wife of Mr. Gallagher formerly was Grace Ferry, daughter of Patrick and Catherine Ferry, mention of whom may be found elsewhere in this work.

GALLATIN, Henry.—With the death of Henry Gallatin, July 23, 1906, Clark County lost a successful and worthy man, and one who, by the exercise of perseverance and good judgment, advanced from an obscure to a prosperous and prominent position in the community. Mr. Gallatin came of a well known Pennsylvania family, and his birth occurred in that State about 1832. Practically his entire life was spent in farming, the rudiments of which he learned on the farm of his parents, which he left to settle in Ohio while still a youth in his teens. October 6, 1853, in Ohio, he was united in marriage to Catherine Deahl, also a native of Pennsylvania, and with whom he came to Illinois during the first years of the Civil War. He at first rented land and farmed on a small scale, but eventually invested his earnings in a small tract, adding thereto as success made such investments possible. Eventually he owned 200 acres, all of which he placed under cultivation, and which was well equipped with buildings, machinery, and general improvements. He conducted general farming and stock-raising, making a specialty of high grade stock, and passing years found him increasingly prosperous and well conditioned.

Mr. Gallatin was never active in politics, but he was a staunch Democrat, with an abiding faith in the best tenets of his party. Our want of minute information leaves his personal characteristics largely a matter of conjecture but it is known that he was a very honorable and considerate man, making no pretense at religious observances, but yet acquiring a reputation for unquestioned fairness and reliability. Mr. and Mrs. Gallatin were the parents of eight children: Frank C.; Josiah W.; Marlon Alice; Virgil; Laura; Clarinda J.; William Henry; Elizabeth J., deceased; and Clinton E. Mr. Gallatin was a firm believer in a practical common school education, and such he gave his children, together with many other advantages which tended to their best development. His memory is revered by those he left behind, and innumerable instances are recalled of his generosity and willingness to help those less fortunate than himself.

GALLIGHER, James E.—A native son of Lehigh County, Pa., and was born on January 2, 1864, James E. Galligher is one of Marshall's energetic and prosperous young men who is conducting a growing wine and liquor business. Mr. Galligher's parents, Owen and Sarah (Galligher) Galligher, were born in County Donegal, Ireland, the former in 1839, and the latter in 1842. They were married in their native land and came to Clark County in 1865, locating on a farm in Marshall Township, which still is their home. They have a second son, Andrew F., who lives in Paris, this State, and six daughters: Catherine, Eunice, Rose, Nellie, Grace and Mary.

James E. Galligher was educated in the public schools of Ireland, and after coming to this country lived with his parents in Marshall Township until his marriage, November 22, 1887, to Emma Grimmell, born in Clark County May 5, 1868. Of this union there are two daughters: Nellie, born September 14, 1888; and Mary, born June 6, 1891. Mr. Galligher established his present business in Marshall many years ago and has met with much success. He is a Democrat in politics and in religion is a Roman Catholic. He is President of the Young Men's Institute, and holds high office in the Eagles and Catholic Order of Foresters. Formerly he was Secretary of the Liquor Dealers' Association of Clark and Edgar Counties. Mr. Galligher is a young man of education and public spiritedness, and is popular with a large class of town and country residents.

GARD, Edward F.—The funeral directing and furniture business of Prichard & Gard subscribes to a large need in Marshall and the surrounding country. It is conducted on broad and adaptive commercial principles, and its equipment conforms to the requirements of people of many tastes and stations in life. The members of the firm are in close touch with the advances in their calling, and understand embalming and the finer details of a grewsome if necessary occupation. Their work is such as to command them to further notice, and they thus have succeeded to a large share of the business in this part of the State.

Edward F. Gard, the younger member of the firm, was born in Melrose Township, Clark County, Ill., August 4, 1871, and is a son of Allen T. and Martha A. (Garner) Gard, natives of Licking County, Ohio. Allen T. Gard was a man of high character and a variety of attainments. During much of his active life he combined farming with school teaching, and for many years he was Justice of the Peace and Township Supervisor. He lived in Clark County forty-four years, and his death removed a man valued and honored in the community. He was deeply religious, and for years was one of the principal officers in the Methodist Episcopal Church.

In boyhood Edward F. Gard attended the public schools and worked on his father's farm, leaving the latter only upon the occasion of his marriage, March 11, 1891, to May Cowden. Of this union there is a son, Garnett C., who was born March 11, 1892. Mr. Gard is affiliated with the Democratic party, but as yet has entertained no political aspirations. He is fraternally connected with the Modern Woodmen of America, the Redmen and the Knights of Pythias. In religion he is a Methodist Episcopalian. He has many friends in the community who have known him all his life, and his business standing rests upon solid and dependable traits of character.

GARVER, John H.—Previous to purchasing his present grocery business in Martinsville in 1903, John H. Garver's existence swung between the extremes of farming on the prairies of Illinois, and roughing it in the rude mining camps of the far West. Both phases of life contributed to his material and mental development, but the most interesting and picturesque of his memories are centered around the wierd and strange environment created by the men whose greed for gain arose above all considerations of discomfort and control, and whose little communities were of a kind to be found in no other part of this broad land. The outlines of the great snow-capped mountains are as familiar to him as are the faces of friends, for in them for fifteen years he explored, suffered great hardships, and took out considerable of their buried treasure. Mr. Garver was born April 13, 1855, in Montgomery County, Ohio, and in the same State was born his father, Samuel Garver, during his active life a farmer and stock-raiser.

In early life Samuel Garver moved to Illinois, and there married Susan Kauffman, a native of Maryland, with whom he soon after moved back to Ohio. In 1865 he located permanently in Clark County, at first operating a farm in Dolson Township, but later living in both Parker and Melrose Townships, in which latter he died in 1890, at the age of about seventy. He was a Democrat in politics, and though not a church member, attended the Methodist Episcopal Church with his wife. Mrs. Garver survived her husband until 1902, in about her eighty-second year. She was a quiet, domestic woman, and her patient hands rocked the cradles of nine children, all of whom grew to maturity.

John H. Garver approached manhood in the atmosphere common to the average farm-reared boy, and he left the roof tree of his father at the age of eighteen to seek the rewards of an independent life. Until twenty-two years old he worked as a farm hand, when, having contracted the mining fever, he went to Colorado, and remained there fifteen years. He owned to the success of the average rather than exceptional Argonaut, but his experiences were manifold and enlarging, especially during the great Leadville excitement, in which he was an interested participant. In 1892 he came back to Clark County and engaged in farming during the spring and summer, returning each year to Colorado to look after the mining interests which he still retains.

In 1895 Mr. Garver was united in marriage to Nannie Tibbs, of which union there have been born five children, one of whom is deceased. Mr. Garver moved the year of his marriage to Martinsville, operated a restaurant about four years, and then lived on his farm four years. In 1903 he returned to the city and bought the grocery store he since has operated.

He has an encouraging trade, understands thoroughly his business, and with his many sided experiences should become a potent factor in the commercial growth of the community. He is highly respected for his enterprise and public spiritedness, and is accounted one of the well informed, approachable and progressive citizens of Martinsville.

GASAWAY, Judge Henry.—The identification of several successive generations of the Gasaway family with American history has given to its members the traits especially characteristic of our countrymen, while at the same time it has not robbed them of the sturdy qualities that characterized their Scotch progenitors. In each generation up to and including the present, there have been noticeable traits of thrift and integrity and the high sense of honor that forms the heritage of the Scotch people the world over. The life record of Judge Gasaway in every respect adds to the prestige of the honorable name which he bears. During the long period of his residence at Martinsville, throughout a career that has embraced professional connections, official activities and business relations, he has displayed the qualities that win and retain for a man the confidence of associates and acquaintances.

In tracing the record of the Gasaway family we learn that the Judge's father, Peter, who was a native of Kentucky, moved to Montezuma, Ind., when fifteen years of age, where he grew to manhood and married Lovice French, a native of Indiana. Shortly after his marriage he removed to Newport, Ind., where he lost his wife by death in 1852. Their son, Henry, was born in Indiana December 4, 1848, and was four years of age when the death of his mother led to his removal to the home of his maternal grandparents, under whose kindly care he spent the ensuing four years. The father meanwhile having married again and established a home in Sullivan, Ind., the son was taken under the paternal care and sent to the Sullivan common schools and later to the Sullivan Academy. Both in Sullivan and in Terre Haute, where later he established his residence, the father conducted a photographic business. From the latter city in 1867 he removed to Marshall, Ill., and later removed to Arkansas, whence eventually he transferred his home to the Indian Territory. There he died at the age of seventy-two years.

For some three years or more Henry Gasaway worked in the printing offices of Sullivan and also sold newspapers. On quitting the printing office he learned photography under his father, in whose gallery at Terre Haute he later became an assistant, while at the same time continuing to sell newspapers. In 1867 he accompanied the family to Illinois, and May 15, 1872, he came to Martinsville, which town has since been his place of residence. When seventeen years of age he was furnished by his father with a tent and photographic outfit and for some time afterward he engaged in the work of a traveling photographer, thereby gaining an excellent knowledge of the country as well as a versatile acquaintance with the people. Upon discontinuing photographic work he turned his attention to the insurance business.

The first office held by Judge Gasaway was that of Justice of the Peace, to which he was elected in 1877 and thrice re-elected, filling the position for ten years. In 1888 he was elected County Judge on the Democratic ticket. His administration was marked by intelligent service and an impartial application of the principles of jurisprudence. At the expiration of his first term he was re-elected, serving for eight years altogether. In 1891 he was admitted to the bar and since then to some extent has engaged in the practice of law, although he has made no special effort to gain a clientage, his preferences being toward commercial activities. About one year after the organization of the Martinsville Exchange Bank in 1892 he was chosen cashier of the new institution, and held the position fourteen years, during which time the bank enjoyed a constantly increasing and profitable business. Upon reorganization as a State Bank in 1906, he retired from the position of cashier.

In 1879 Judge Gasaway was united in marriage with Mrs. Rachael Wagner, daughter of George and Mary A. Duncan, and a woman of beautiful character, whose death in 1893 was deeply mourned by the family and a large circle of warm personal friends. The only son of the marriage, William E. Gasaway, is now employed in the freight department of the Vandalia Railway Company at Terre Haute.

As may be inferred from statements previously made, Judge Gasaway is a Democrat in political affiliations. From early manhood he has been intimately associated with local politics. No movement inaugurated for the benefit of the party fails of his support, but especially is he interested in those movements which, of broader outlook than merely partisan importance, concern the weal of the town and county and the permanent welfare of the people. In such measures, like all progressive citizens, he loses sight of party interests in the deeper needs of an uplifting citizenship. The only fraternal organization to which he has given allegiance is that of Masonry, in which he has risen to the Royal Arch Chapter, and the broad philanthropies of the order have received his heartiest support. Broad-minded as a man, progressive as a citizen, alert and penetrating in business affairs, and loyal to the people and the interests of his home city, he furnishes in his life an excellent type of those men who have brought about the highest development of town and county and State.

GILMER, Edward Lee.—The General Superintendent of the Municipal Electric Light and Water Plants of Marshall, was born in Clark County, Ill., November 22, 1874, and is a son of Benjamin and Martha (Bailey) Gilmer, natives of Rockingham County, Va., and born in 1831 and 1828, respectively. Benjamin Gilmer was a farmer by occupation, and he moved in a covered wagon from Virginia to Sullivan County, Ind., soon after his marriage, later journeying to Marion County, the same State, and in 1864 taking up his residence in Marshall Township, Clark County, of which he was Supervisor several terms. His death occurred at the age of fifty-eight, and he is survived by his wife and four of his eleven children. Of these, Mrs. Edward Howell lives in the town of Marshall; Mrs. Alice Fox lives in Marshall township; and Mrs. Nora Nay is the wife of a farmer in Edgar County, this State.

Edward Lee Gilmer, the only surviving son in his father's large family, lived on the farm of the latter until 1889, when he came to Marshall to attend and graduate in the high school. At a very early age he gave evidence of marked mechanical ingenuity, and he has qualified along this line until his services must needs be of great practical value to any enterprise commanding them. He assumed his present responsibility May 1, 1903. December 28, 1895, Mr. Gilmer married Lizzie Montgomery, who was born in Marshall, and who is the daughter of a contracting builder. Mr. Gilmer is a Democrat in politics, and is a member of the Masons, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, Red Men, Modern Woodmen of America and the Eagles. He is identified with the Christian Church. Mr. Gilmer deserves credit for the perseverance which has characterized his efforts towards success, and for his skill as a mechanic, electrician and engineer. He is one of the men who has shaped his own good fortune, and who owes little to material assistance or other external encouragement.

GOLDEN, Michael and Daniel.—To those familiar with its history and local color it would seem that Marshall Township presents few better examples of the perfect union of men and their work than is to be found in Daniel and Michael Golden. Unmarried, and with few responsibilities not touching their immediate environment, these two collaborators with nature pursue their calling harmoniously through the changing years, content to await the rewards of the seasons, to profit by the lessons of adversity, and in agriculture to find their most congenial and satisfying compensations.

Daniel Golden was born in Madison County, Ind., February 14, 1850, and Michael Golden was born in the same State and county May 14, 1852. They are the sons of Patrick Golden, of whose life mention is made on another page of this work. They are two of nine children, and the family is one of the most highly honored in Clark County, and one bearing the name has embellished with dignity and rare ability the jurisprudence of the State of Illinois. The brothers were educated primarily in Indiana, and after coming to Clark County with their parents in 1857, attended the school near their home in Marshall Township. This farm, which they have occupied continuously for fifty years, and which at first was of modest area, now consists of four hundred and eighty acres, a part of which is in Douglas Township. In the changes and departures to other missions incidental to all family associations, Daniel and Michael remained on the old place, thus showing their perfect adaptation to the agricultural life. As they helped to till the uncleared portions upon their arrival in the county, so are their more mature efforts enlisted in maintaining an unexcelled standard of agricultural practice. They are men of broad general information, and pronounced independence of thought and action. All of the family have shown great mental strength and individuality.

GOLDEN, Thomas J.—The leader of the Clark County bar, though not now in the active practice, is Thomas J. Golden. Mr. Golden is one of the best read men Clark County has ever contained, and with the single exception of Judge John Scholfield, the greatest lawyer the Clark County bar has ever had. Judge Scholfield was often heard to express profound respect for the legal ability of Mr. Golden, and no man was more capable of giving a correct opinion on such matters than he. He is of Irish parentage, and was born in Wayne County, Ind., December 21, 1841, and is therefore approaching sixty-five years of age. He came with his parents to Clark County in 1857, when young Thomas was sixteen years of age. His father died in 1868, but his mother still survives. He received the rudiments of his education in Madison County, Ind., where he, with his parents, once lived, and at Marshall, though he is essentially a self-educated man, having been a voracious reader of law and general literature all his life, as well as an intense student along many and varied lines of thought. He was a First Lieutenant in Company K, First Missouri Cavalry, and was regimental and brigade and division Quartermaster. He was at the battles of Pea Ridge, Cross Hollows, Jenkins Ferry, as well as other engagements.

He read law with Jacob W. Wilkin, now Supreme Judge Wilkin, attended law school at Ann Arbor, and was admitted to the practice in 1867. He was elected a member of the Illinois Legislature in 1872, was a delegate to the Republican National Convention at Cincinnati from Illinois in 1876, at Minneapolis in 1892 and Philadelphia in 1900. He was on the military staff of Governor (now Senator) Cullom, with the rank of Colonel. For many years he was the attorney for Illinois of the Indianapolis & Terre Haute Railroad Company, and for a time general counsel for that corporation. Not only Judge Scholfield, but John G. Williams, the general counsel for that railroad, and who is himself a great lawyer, had and now has a high opinion of Mr. Golden's legal genius and ability. Mr. Golden is in well-to-do circumstances, derived solely from his professional labors. He is a man who as a lawyer and a man would do honor for his honesty and ability, to any community.

At Marshall, Ill., October 19, 1865, Mr. Golden married Mary J. Benedict, a native of Marshall, and born September 30, 1845.

GOSSETT, Robert Allen.—When accident brought to an untimely end his busy and eventful life, Robert Allen Gossett was still a young man on the sunny side of his prime and with every reasonable expectation of attaining an advanced age. After having passed unscathed through the dangers of service in Cuba during the Spanish-American War, and after having returned to his own land in health, he fell a victim to an accident while pursuing his occupation of railroading; thus suddenly and in a moment a life of promise was crushed out and a widow with little children were deprived of a loving husband and father. To the people of Clark County, where much of his life had been passed, his death was mourned and the shock of the sudden catastrophe was felt throughout the entire circle of his friends.

Loyalty to country has ever been a characteristic of the family. John Gossett, who was a native of Indiana, served in the Union Army for four years and did not retire until the expiration of the conflict. Returning then to Indiana, he married Laura Melton, a native of that State. Later they removed to Kansas and entered a homestead of 160 acres near Parsons. However, they remained in the West only three years, removing from there to Illinois and settling in Clark County, where they yet make their home. While living near Parsons, Kan., their son, Robert Allen, was born June 29, 1870. Almost from his earliest recollection he lived in Illinois and as a boy he attended the country schools in Westfield Township, Clark County. During the progress of the war with Spain he offered his services and was accepted as a private in Company G, Fourth Illinois Infantry, enlisting June 17, 1898, and serving until May 2, 1899, when he received an honorable discharge.

During his early years in Clark County Mr. Gossett formed the acquaintance of Miss Hattie Baughman, whom he married September 9, 1897. She was born in this county June 9, 1873, and was the only child of Albert and Mary (Medcalf) Baughman, natives of this county and influential members of its farming community. Four children were born to bless the union of Mr. and Mrs. Gossett, namely: Nellie, born October 13, 1898; Laura, May 25, 1901; John, November 17, 1902; and Lillie May, who was born May 6, 1904, and died at the age of three months. While Mr. Gossett was in the employ of the "Big Four" Railroad Company in the capacity of brakeman, he was killed by falling between two cars at Brightwood, Ind., May 30, 1905, death resulting instantly. After a suit had been entered in the courts, his widow was awarded a judgment against the company for $8,875, March 26, 1907. Since the death of her husband she has continued to make her home in Clark County, where she owns fifty-five acres in Johnson Township in the oil district and has prospects for wells. Politically Mr. Gossett always advocated Republican principles and was thoroughly loyal to State and nation, believing our country to be the greatest nation on earth and its principles the most uplifting for its citizens. Along the line of his work he was identified with the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen.

Thomas Hays

GRAHAM, James William.—It is doubtful if any man thus far connected with the jurisprudence of Clark County has maintained with greater courage and good sense the best tenets of his calling than James William Graham. During a practice of thirty years there have been few prominent cases, either of criminal or cannon law, in which his services have not been enlisted, and he probably has adjusted more complications quietly, and kept more people out of the courts, than any one other lawyer in the southern part of Illinois.

Mr. Graham's life is a pronounced development, a pendulum swung from the extreme of poverty to the height of influence and prosperity. He was born in Logan, Hocking County, Ohio, April 8, 1849, and the following year his family moved in a wagon to Clark County, Ill., settling on a farm in the vicinity of Martinsville. Here his father, Richard Graham, who was a blacksmith by trade, died in 1851, leaving his mother, Eleanor Graham, with the care of four sons, of whom Samuel, George and John were older than James. As remembered by her sons, the mother was a woman of more than average intelligence and forethought, and infused into the humble home ideals of noble and useful citizenship. A natural student, and fully realizing his responsibility of self-support, James William had qualified as a teacher at the age of fifteen, and after taking charge of a school for eight months, used his earnings to attend the State Normal, at Normal, Ill. After leaving that institution in 1866, he taught a school at Kansas, Casey and other points in Illinois for six months, and thereafter began the study of law in the office of Schofield & Wilkin, both of whom have since become Judges of the Supreme Court.

February 10, 1874, Mr. Graham was united in marriage to Etta Crusen, daughter of R. H. and Harriet (Brown) Crusen, and born in Clark County, Ill., in 1855, her parents having removed from Ohio in 1851. To Mr. and Mrs. Graham have been born two children, of whom Harry C. married Annis Mason, of Washington City, where the couple now reside; and Mable is the wife of Henry H. Knipe, a biography of whom appears on another page of this work. Mr. Graham was admitted to practice at the bar of Illinois, at Mount Vernon, this State, in June, 1875, and forthwith settled in Marshall, which since has been his home. His professional and general proficiency received ready recognition, and, allied with his active participation in Democratic politics, opened up prospects for advancement which have been more than realized in his maturer years. In June, 1878, he was elected to the State Legislature, coincident with the election of John A. Logan to the Senate, and during his term of service was a member of the Judiciary Committee, and introduced many important measures. Chief among these was the measure requiring all through trains to stop long enough at county seats to let off and take on passengers, which law since has been repealed.

Mr. Graham is Vice-President of the Marshall State Bank, organized in 1906, with a capital stock of $60,000, and of which W. L. Alton is President, R. H. Brown, Cashier, and Bert Hogue, Assistant Cashier. Mr. Graham stands high in fraternal circles, and to him is due the distinction of organizing the first lodge of Knights of Pythias in Clark County. Formerly Mr. Graham was Chancellor Commander of the lodge, and he now is a representative to the Grand Lodge. He is also a member of Lodge No. 70, A. F. & A. M., of Marshall. He is a member and Trustee of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Graham's power as a lawyer is not alone in his keenness of intellect, his lucidity and aptness of speech, his logical faculty and his power of application to the matter under discussion, but in the judicial quality of his mind which forces him to weigh and consider the argument of his opponents and to meet them on the ground they select without evasion. He is highly esteemed for his fairness and integrity, and for his notable contribution to the stability and merit of the Clark County bar.

GREEN, Altemus Victor.—With the growing activity in the oil interests in Clark County a number of men, representatives of pioneer families have turned their attention to a certain degree from agriculture to the newer industry, and among the list of men thus engaged mention belongs to Altemus Victor Green, the son of one of the county's honored pioneers. The old homestead near Martinsville on Section 23 is located within the oil region and has been made the center of a growing oil business under the supervision of the present occupant, who has proved himself quick of comprehension and intelligent in the execution of plans for the development of the oil industry.

The date of the birth of Mr. Green, March 1, 1875, indicates that he now is in the prime of life, while the place of his nativity, Crawford County, Ill., indicates that Eastern Illinois furnished the environment of his infancy as well as of his maturer years. With the exception of the year 1892, which he spent in Nebraska with his parents, he has known no other home than Illinois, and his surroundings have always been somewhat similar to those of the present time. When he was a child of six years he came to Clark County with his parents, William L. and Delilah (Goodmon) Green, and here he received a common-school education, as well as gained an early practical knowledge of agriculture through assisting his father in the care of the home place. Since the death of his father he has resided on the homestead and has engaged in the oil business. With him lives his widowed mother, to whose care he and his wife have given affectionate oversight and ministrations.

During the year 1897 Mr. Green was united in marriage with Miss Mabel Walker, who was born in Johnson County, Iowa, July 15, 1880, and descended from an old and honored eastern family. Her father, David Walker, was a native of New York State, but as early as 1843 he established himself among the pioneers of Iowa, where eventually he became an influential and wealthy farmer of Johnson County. A man of resolute spirit, he was qualified for the strenuous existence of a pioneer, and abundantly merited the large success which he reaped from his self-sacrificing labors. In all of his labors he enjoyed the counsel of his wife, who was Lavina Saxton, a native of New York and a descendant of English ancestry. In the family of Mr. and Mrs. Green there are four children, namely: Doris, who was born March 26, 1898; Marley, June 19, 1900; Arestic E., September 23, 1902; and Carrol, February 26, 1905. It is the hope of the parents to give each child the best educational advantages which their means render possible and thus aid them in securing the necessary preparation for a life of usefulness. Although not deeply interested in politics, Mr. Green keeps posted concerning the political issues of the age and gives his vote to the Republican principles and candidates, but his interest never takes the form of partisanship. On the contrary he has maintained a broad spirit of toleration for the opinions of others and concedes to all that freedom of thought which he maintains as his own inalienable right. All in all, he represents the class of enterprising, energetic, capable and resourceful men, who are ably carrying forward the work begun by our pioneers and who now form the dominant element of the population.

GREEN, William L.—The life which this narrative delineates began in Crawford County, Ill., October 6, 1829, and ended in Clark County May 18, 1886. Between these two dates there is a record of years of conscientious effort, honorable living and the numberless sacrifices incident to pioneer days, a record such as endears to his descendants the name of the honored, self-sacrificing pioneer. Could the tale be told in full, it would be a story of hardships bravely borne, obstacles resolutely surmounted and exacting labor conscientiously performed. In such a story, too, due honor would be given to the pioneer's wife, who courageously stood by his side through all of his privations and sorrows, and who shared with him his joys and successes.

As early as the beginning of the nineteenth century the Green family became established in Illinois, Joseph Green leaving his native North Carolina for the unknown and then far-distant northern territory. Settling in Crawford County he married Queen Esther Lindley, a native of that county and, like himself, descended from Irish ancestry. After their marriage they continued to reside in Crawford County, where he died in April of 1856 and she in July of the following year. Among their children was a son, William L., who was reared on the home farm and received a country-school education. When news came to their quiet country home of the discovery of gold in the far West he was fired with an eager desire to see the vast regions beyond the deserts and the mountains and beside the sunset sea, and in 1849 he joined a party of gold-seekers, with whom he crossed the plains and prospected for gold in California. His success was small, yet sufficient to repay him for the hardships of the trip and the privations of existence at the mines.

After a few years Mr. Green sold out his interest in the mine he had been working and in 1854 he returned by water to New York, thence by rail to Mattoon, Ill., and from there back to the old home. Shortly after his return to Crawford County he invested his means in the purchase of the old Jacob Smith farm, which he bought from S. Bishop, and upon which for a long period he engaged in agricultural pursuits. January 8, 1857, he was united in marriage with Delilah F., eldest daughter of Isaac and Margaret (Hand) Goodmon. Her father, who was born in Tennessee in 1804, accompanied his parents to Indiana in 1809, and later became a pioneer of Illinois, where he died in Crawford County in March of 1846. For a long period he was survived by his wife, who was born in Ohio January 24, 1800, and died in March of 1882. Their daughter, Delilah F., was born in Crawford County October 12, 1836, and is now living with her youngest son on the farm which her husband purchased from William H. Bennett after having, in December, 1881, sold his property in Crawford County on the occasion of his removal to Clark County. The valuable gas wells on the farm greatly enhance its value, while its improvements are those of the first-class country estate.

Ten children formed the family of William L. and Delilah F. Green. One died in infancy. Nine attained maturity, married and reared families. They were named as follows: Almiranda E., Mary E., Margaret E. V. J. V. I. D. E. F. Isaac J., William C., Henry A., Fanny L., Eliza A., Ola Olive and Altemus Victor. The family early allied themselves with the Cumberland Prebyterian Church, and Mr. Green officiated as an Elder in the congregation for many years. Its missionary work received his generous support and its charities were the constant recipients of his bounty. Second only to his interest in religion was his enthusiasm in behalf of the free schools. While living in Crawford County he frequently was called upon to serve as School Director and always he devoted himself to the welfare of the schools, the maintaining of buildings and the employing of competent teachers. In politics he voted with the Republican party. When death called him from his labors ere yet old age had impaired his energies or lessened his usefulness, it was felt that the county had lost one of its worthy men, the church one of its self-sacrificing supporters and the schools a firm champion. Followed by the respect of all, his remains were conveyed for interment to the Butternut cemetery in Johnson Township, nor far from the home where his later years were happily and busily passed.

HALL, Isaiah.—The opportunities afforded to men of energy and sagacity in the agricultural development of Clark County find exemplification in the life-record of Mr. Hall, a pioneer of 1866, and for years a prosperous farmer of Wabash Township. When he removed here from the neighboring county of Edgar he was without means, but he possessed youth, health and determination, and with these as capital he steadily forged his way to the forefront of agriculturists. The first purchase which he made comprised forty acres in Wabash Township, and later he bought another forty acres, but this he afterward sold, and in 1872 bought 160 acres in Section 20 of Wabash Township. A few improvements had been made, but the bulk of the development may be attributed to the present owner's untiring efforts, and in addition to improving the tract he has added to the original purchase until now he owns a homestead of four hundred acres.

The Hall family ranks among the pioneers of Eastern Illinois, where Henry and Esther (Meeker) Hall settled shortly after their marriage. Both were natives of Ohio, where he was born in Butler County November 18, 1815, and her birth occurred in 1820. Edgar County was still in an undeveloped condition when they established themselves among its pioneer farmers, and from that time forward until their demise they were earnestly affiliated with movements tending to the religious and educational development of their locality. Both were earnest Christians and honored members of the farming community. In politics he voted with the Democratic party, but took no active part in political affairs. In their family were seven sons and two daughters, and of that number five are still living, the eldest being the gentleman whose name introduces this narrative, and whose birth occurred in Ohio October 25, 1840. During the early childhood years he was brought to Illinois and settled in Edgar County, where he grew to manhood on the home farm, meanwhile acquiring a practical knowledge of agriculture in its varied details.

The first marriage of Mr. Hall was solemnized in 1865 and united him with Nancy Jane Tade, a native of Edgar County. Four children were born of their union, namely: Jonas (deceased), Omer, Emma and Albert. The first wife died in 1898 and the following year Mr. Hall was united with Mrs. Elizabeth (Cox) Rhoades, who was born in Ohio, July 14, 1848, being a daughter of Elisha Cox, one of the pioneer farmers of that county, where she was reared and received a common school education. During 1866 Mr. Hall left Edgar County and came to Clark County, settling on a forty-acre tract, which, as previously stated, he disposed of in order to purchase his present property. As a farmer he is practical, progressive and patient, ever ready to grasp an opportunity looking toward the permanent development of his homestead, ambitious to maintain the most modern improvements on the land, and justly proud of the noteworthy degree of success which he has achieved as a farmer and stock-raiser.

While devoting his attention closely to the care of his land Mr. Hall has not been negligent of any duty devolving upon him as a citizen, but constantly displays an interest in movements for the upbuilding of the township and county, and as a Democrat has taken a considerable part in local politics. On three different occasions he was selected to represent Wabash Township upon the County Board of Supervisors and during each of these terms he bore an active part in measures for the good of the people. Many years ago he was initiated into Masonry and for a long period he has affiliated with Marshall Lodge No. 133, A. F. & A. M., in the philanthropic work of which he ever has felt a warm interest. Religion imparts its gracious influence to his well-rounded character, and the Advent Church of which he is a consistent member receives the constant impetus of his cheerful beneficences. He retired from active labors in the spring of 1907 and moved to Marshall.

HAMILL, Robert Emmet.—With his star of ascendancy still rising, and his goal still obscured by the tantalizing haze of possibility, Robert E. Hamill, than whom Clark County has known no better lawyer, succumbed to the inscrutable and inevitable, November 15, 1900, at the age of forty-four years. Here was a man who emphasized the value of personality, that aggregation of rare and indefinable elements which lifts one to prominence and power, even while his brother in the ranks, equally learned, equally conscientious and equally ambitious, remains the plodder to the end of his days. So strong was the purpose in this man, so great was his capacity for industry, and so exhausting were the responsibilities which clambered at his door for adjustment, that his physical makeup snapped under the strain, and he became the victim, not of the craze for money, but of a splendid and unusual selfishness.

With his birth in Auburn, Lee County, Ala., November 9, 1856, Mr. Hamill succeeded to an humble and noninspiring environment. His father, E. J. Hamill, was born in New York State, and his mother Anna (Simmons) Hamill, was born in Georgia in 1810. For a few years he attended the public schools, and after determining upon the profession of law, entered the McKendree College, at Lebanon, Ill., after his admission to the bar in 1877 becoming the partner of T. J. Golden, for several years. Seeking a larger field of activity, he went to Springfield in 1894, and for four years was a partner in the law firm of Palmer, Shutt & Hamill. He then was appointed general counsel for the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, with headquarters at Cincinnati, Ohio, in which capacity he labored with undermining strenuously for the balance of his life.

Promise of a resumption of the work of Mr. Hamill, in this or another community, and of perpetuation of the qualities which brought him usefulness and renown, exist in a son, Chalmers Martin Hamill, who was born August 2, 1884, and who, upon his graduation from Princeton College, in 1908, will take a course in law at Harvard, in anticipation of a brilliant legal career. The development of this young man will be watched with keen interest by the hundreds of admirers of his gifted father, and assurance is given that thus far he gives promise of all that is expected of him. Mrs. Hamill, who survives her husband, and who makes her home in Marshall, Ill., before her marriage was Mary P. Martin, born in Marshall, December 19, 1858, a daughter of W. T. Martin, mentioned elsewhere in this work. Mr. Hamill was a Democrat in politics, and was a sane and impartial promoter of party interests. He was a member, and for more than fifteen years high priest, of the local Masonic lodge. A member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, he was very active in church affairs, a member of the Board of Trustees, and for five years Superintendent of the Sunday school. It is in a large and noble and satisfying sense that Mr. Hamill is inscribed upon the annals of law in Illinois, and it is to the credit and distinction of Marshall that its opportunities largely laid the foundations of experience which elsewhere reached more commanding proportions.

HAMMOND, Clark H.—The venerable pioneer of Clark County, mentioned above, now in his seventy-ninth year, is President of the State Bank of Martinsville, owner of 1,000 acres of the agricultural lands in the county, still bright and active, and, somewhat eccentric, is altogether one of the most remarkable of its characters. As he says, he "has dug all his wealth out of the ground," meaning, not from any mines, but from the surface soil through agricultural processes, and the greatest satisfaction he takes today is not in the performance of any financial or public duties which devolve upon him, but in the homely, every-day work of the farm.

Mr. Hammond was born in Rutland County, Vt., on the 21st of April, 1829, the son of Samson and Sallie (Rerbell) Hammond, both also natives of the Green Mountain State, the father's day of birth being September 23, 1802, the mother's, February 22, 1804. Samson Hammond, who was a farmer, came west in 1837 and entered 300 acres of Government land in what is now Clark County, buying outright, at the same time, the forty acres upon which the old home of Clark H. Hammond still stands. Here the father died, July 7, 1846, having by hardy industry cleared his land of timber, brought from it abundant crops and made a nice homestead of a virgin tract; his wife had preceded him in 1842, the couple being highly honored by their few neighbors of those pioneer days for their worth and faithfulness to the interests of the new country which they had made their home.

Amid such crude surroundings began the eighty-year-old life of Clark H. Hammond, and they just suited his healthy, rugged temperament. He obtained very little education from the uncertain subscription schools which he attended, but was naturally eager to learn of practical things, was always a reader of instructive newspapers and magazines and is now a well informed man. In 1857 he married his cousin, Roxana Hammond, a Vermont woman born May 25, 1834, and the second oldest child of Lyman Clark and Jane E. (Dawley) Hammond, her parents coming to this county when she was three years old, at the same time as her husband's people. Lyman Hammond was a highly respected farmer, well known and fairly prosperous.

Three sons and one daughter were born to Clark and Roxana Hammond: Albert C., who is married and farming in Dolsor Township, this county; George A., a married farmer of Parker Township; Howard F., of Dolsor Township, also married, and Clara A., who makes her home with her parents. Despite his age Mr. Hammond does all the required work around the farm and takes care of his stock. He is rather grey, but altogether a hale, hearty wonderfully preserved old man. His politics, he says, were determined by the circumstance that after his father's death he was reared by a kind man who was a strong Democrat. But although Mr. Hammond is a staunch Democrat himself and has served as Supervisor several terms he would rather farm than legislate. Never a regular church member, he has never gambled, is temperate and strictly honest and moral, and has held to the faith that his chief concern should be to well order his present life.

Original in his ideas and ways, Mr. Hammond is an especially interesting character when he touches upon the pioneer days of Clark County, when wild game and beasts were familiar and neighbors were not so plentiful. When he first commenced to farm he hauled his produce by wagon to Chicago, his first business venture being in partnership with his brother in 1846, when they bought up several wagon loads of apples, sold them in that market and bartered their fruit for white fish and salt. Their next venture was to take two horses to the muddy city upon which they made the superb profit of twenty-five dollars. They hauled their wheat to Terre Haute, Ind., selling it for fifty cents a bushel; there was no dollar wheat in those days. In 1850 Mr. Hammond, in common with mmmost hardy, ambitious young men who reached their majority, made the ox-team trip across the plains to California, returning by boat, via the Panama Route. The three years which he thus spent in the West cured him of all desire to roam or to engage in any occupation except it had a relation to agriculture. Thus able, from personal experience, to picture the country when it was raw and unformed, he has not only watched with fond and proud eye its development into fertile farms, pretty hamlets and opulent cities, but has the satisfaction in his declining years of knowing that he himself has been an important factor in this wonderful transformation, and that he has retained the unqualified respect of his associates and friends.

HANDY, Sol., the popular Mayor of Marshall, elected to that office in 1903 and re-elected in 1905, was born in Melrose Township, Clark County, Ill., on the 20th of July, 1856. His parents are William A. and Sarah J. (Hull) Handy, and are now living on the old homestead, his father a prosperous farmer and stock-raiser. Son and father were born in nearly the same locality, while the mother is a native of Licking County, Ohio. Mr. Handy's paternal grandparents were Stephen D. and Marguerite (Dixon) Handy, natives respectively of the States of New York and Pennsylvania, who were married in old Fort Harrison near Terre Haute, Ind. In the spring of 1815 they came from from Post St. Vincent, not far from Vincennes, that State, and settled in what is now York Township, Clark County. The husband at once built a log cabin, broke ground and raised a crop of corn, then returned for his family and afterwards settled in Melrose Township, where the father of Sol. Handy was born. In 1816 there were signs of Indian hostilities, and the Handys erected a fort and stockade on the hill one-half mile south of West Union, called Fort Handy, into which they moved their families and in preparation for a siege by the savages, dug a generous well therein; but these extensive preparations, although wise, proved unnecessary.

Sol. Handy obtained his early education in the district schools of his native county, and advanced through the higher courses by an attendance of two years at Howard College, Fairfield, Ill., after which he worked on a farm for a time and then, at the age of eighteen, commenced his career as a teacher. This experience in his life extended from 1885 to 1895 and embraced various schools in Clark and Crawford Counties. In 1894 he had purchased the "Democrat," of Marshall, and after 1895 gave the journalistic enterprise his chief attention until December 7, 1906, when he sold the business to Norman Bennett. During the latter portion of that period he served two terms as Master in Chancery, being appointed by Judge Craig in 1903 and 1905, which were the years also of his election to the Mayoralty of Marshall. Mr. Handy has also been for some time a Director in the Marshall State Bank, as a local leader of the Democracy has been a delegate to many county and State conventions, and is in all respects one of the most popular and influential men in his section of the county. Fraternally he is identified with the Knights of Pythias and the Court of Honor.

Mayor Handy's wife, whom he married August 18, 1890, was formerly Miss Loudell Jones, born in Christian County, Ill., the daughter of Carter T. and Desha (Talbart) Jones. Both the Mayor and his wife are popular socially, being approachable, cultured, attractive, and personal factors tending both to the good fellowship and the elevation of the entire community. They have one child, a boy, Harry Edwin, born October 23, 1901. Ed. Hendry committed suicide May 1934

HARRISON, Abram.—Abram Harrison, surveyor and farmer, lives near West Union, Clark County, Ill., and was born in said county June 29, 1840. His grandfather was William H. Harrison, a distant relative of the ancestors of General Harrison. His grandfather was born in England. His son, William H. Harrison, Jr., was born in Virginia, and married in North Carolina Mary Ann Beason, who was the mother of four sons and three daughters. William H. Harrison, Jr., was a surveyor by occupation, and died in 1850. He entered land in Clark County in 1816. His son Henry was also a surveyor. His second son, Robert, was born in North Carolina in 1811, and died in Clark County in 1844. Robert Harrison, the father of Abram Harrison, came to this county in 1818, and was afterwards married to Sophronia Howerton, the mother of our subject, and who was born in Tennessee in 1815. Robert and Sophronia Harrison, the parents of our subject, were the parents of three sons and two daughters—Nancy Ann, Abram, James, William H. and Sophronia. Our subject was educated in the common schools of Clark County. He was first joined in matrimony December 24, 1872, near Sullivan, Ind., to Alice N. Goodwin, who was born in Coshocton County, Ohio, in March, 1850. Abram Harrison's first wife died in May, 1887, and he was subsequently married to Ellen Amanda Pierce in September, 1888, and who died in May, 1906. One child was born to our subject by his first wife, who has since died, and one daughter, Bonnie, was born to him by his second wife, who is married to Sylvester Mundy, and they live with Mr. Harrison on the home place. In 1861 Mr. Harrison enlisted in the First Missouri Cavalry and served for three years, when he was mustered out at St. Louis, Mo. He is a member of the Friends Church and of the Masonic Fraternity. Mr. Harrison is a Republican in politics and prominent in the councils of his party. He is the owner of 240 acres of first-class land, and is in above the average circumstances, financially speaking, all of which property he has acquired by his own industry, thrift and economy. Mr. Harrison is a great reader of current literature, as well as a close observer of his time and of men, and is one of the best-posted men in York Township. He is a good surveyor, was a good soldier and is a good, intelligent farmer, and a good citizen in every sense of the word.

HEDRICK, Millard M.—Millard M. Hedrick, ex-Sheriff of Clark County, whose term of office began November 8, 1901, has been prominent in the politics of this part of the State for many years, and is recognized as one of its most efficient and dependable public servants. Millard M. Hedrick was born in Vevay, Switzerland County, Ind., March 14, 1857, and is a son of John O. and Charlotte (Flynn) Hedrick, the former of whom was born in Kentucky in 1812, and the latter in Pennsylvania in 1830. John O. Hedrick was an extensive negro trader and steam-boat operator and owner in Kentucky, Tennessee and Louisiana, and arose to great prominence in his chosen field of activity. In later life he contracted the Western fever, and determined to settle down to farming in Indiana, where the balance of his life was spent.

Millard M. Hedrick was educated in the public schools of Indiana, and spent several years of his life on a farm. Here he has learned more from observation than books, and possesses the kind of natural ability best suited to the enforcement of law and order. At Marshall, Ill., he married Mary Payne, who was born in this town August 17, 1868, a daughter of Alexander and Emma (Harland) Payne, natives of Clark County, and born in 1838 and 1830, respectively. Mr. and Mrs. Hedrick are the parents of a daughter, Elizabeth, who was born September 11, 1900. Mr. Hedrick has always voted the Republican ticket, yet he entertains liberal and adaptive political views. He is fraternally connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Knights of Pythias, and in religion is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He is widely known throughout the county, and has warm friends and supporters in both political parties. Mr. Hedrick is at present Deputy County Game Warden of Clark County.

HELMAN, Henry.—The late Henry Helman, for many years a prominent farmer of Clark County, Ill., was born in Osnabruck, Germany, on the 15th of May, 1818, his parents being also natives of the Fatherland. In common with other really ambitious and sturdy youth of the old world he was early seized with a longing to test the much heralded advantages of the land of opportunities across the Atlantic, and in 1836, then eighteen years of age, embarked upon his long anticipated venture. The vessel on which he sailed was fourteen weeks upon the ocean before it landed him, worn but eager, at the port of New York, and, thence, by way of the Erie Canal he worked his way westward to Terre Haute. There he worked at odd jobs, and finally mastered the plasterer's trade.

The 'thirties and 'forties were periods of great development for Ohio, Indiana and what were then considered Western States, and Mr. Helman's skill as a workman was in constant demand. For nearly forty years he worked quite constantly at his trade as a plasterer, making Terre Haute, Ind., his home, and by industry and economy he not only comfortably reared a family of children but saved enough money to spend his declining years on a large and valuable farm, his own property and attractive homestead. In April, 1877, Mr. Helman moved from Terre Haute to Clark County, buying 320 acres of fine land on the Wabash River, which he continued to cultivate and improve until his death, March 15, 1894. This splendid property is still owned by his surviving widow. The deceased was a Democrat, but neither held office nor aspired to it. He was a faithful member of the Catholic Church to the day of his death.

Henry Helman was twice married, both of his unions occurring in Terre Haute. In July, 1848, he was wedded to Henrietta Burgett, who died two years thereafter, and November 15, 1852, he took to wife Catherine Wahler, a native of Wurtemberg, born in the neighborhood of Stuttgart, May 30, 1821. There were no children by the first union, and by the second marriage and the present Mrs. Helman the following: Eliza, now the widow of G. Heim, who died in Terre Haute, this daughter residing with her mother in Marshall; George, who married Lydia Johnson, has had by her three sons: Fred, Frank and Carl, and lives on a farm in Indiana; Carrie, the wife of E. A. Stephens, of LeGrand, Ore., and the mother of one daughter, Allie.

HIGHT, John A.—The accession to the farming population of Clark County has been made principally from the sons of the pioneers, who, succeeding to the estates of their fathers, have carried on the work so worthily begun by the preceding generation. An exception to this rule may here and there be found, and to this class belongs John A. Hight, who is the sole representative of his family in the county and State, and removed hither during the later period of the county's development. Soon after his arrival in the county in 1897 he settled in Johnson Township, where he owns eighty-two acres forming one of the well improved farms of the locality. By previous experience in Ohio he had acquired a thorough knowledge of agriculture, and hence was well qualified to carry forward to success such enterprises.

The genealogy of the Hight family is traced to Germany, whence some of the name emigrated to America more than one hundred years ago. Moses Hight, who was born in Hardy County, Va., October 5, 1819, was taken to Ohio by his parents at the age of two years and settled in Delaware County. There he aided in the difficult task of clearing a primeval tract of land, and there he was united in marriage, August 7, 1856, with Mary E. Meyer, who was born in Germany August 10, 1830, and at the age of three years was brought to the new world by her parents. Of their union four children were born—David H., Augusta J., John A., and Margaret C.—all of whom are married and settled in homes of their own except Augusta J., who owns and resides on the old homestead. Three continue to reside near the old home place in Ohio, John A. being the only member of the family circle to remove from Ohio. He was reared on a farm and received a country school education such as was possible in that day and locality. Passing the uneventful years of boyhood in Delaware County, Ohio, where he was born February 11, 1861, he grew to a sturdy manhood and acquired the training necessary for practical success in agriculture.

While living in Ohio Mr. Hight selected one of the fair daughters of that State to be his bride, and in Knox County, October 31, 1889, he was united in marriage with Miss Cora A. Montgomery, daughter of Samuel Montgomery, who was born in Licking County, Ohio, May 7,

E. D. Jones

1844. Her paternal grandparents, Joseph and Emily (Ide) Montgomery, were natives of Ohio, the former having been born in Licking County January 18, 1817, while the latter was born July 15, 1822. Both traced their lineage to Ireland. The founder of the Montgomery family in America was William Montgomery, of Ireland, who as early as 1803 crossed the ocean to the new world and settled in Pennsylvania. Of the union of John A. and Cora Hight there are four children, all living, namely: Mary Delle, who was born April 24, 1891; Irl V., December 6, 1892; Waldo J., November 4, 1900; and Elise Meyer, March 15, 1903. The family attended services at the Church of God, held in a building six miles southeast of Casey, and they are active members of this congregation, as well as contributors to its maintenance and missionary activities. Although well posted concerning public affairs and national problems, Mr. Hight is not deeply interested in politics and has never been an office seeker. A study of the evils wrought by the saloon has caused him to become a staunch ally of the cause of prohibition, and both by example and precept he has given his influence to total abstinence.

HILBERT, Hiram.—Hiram Hilbert, son of William Hilbert and Lanie (Bridgett) Hilbert, was born in Clark County, Ill., on the 4th day of August, 1872. His father is still living, his mother having died on her thirty-first birthday.

Our subject was married to Miss Myrtle Taylor in 1896 and as the fruits of this marriage five children, three boys and two girls, have been born, of whom Mary, Frank, Nellie and Charley are still living and Russell having died at the age of two years.

Mr. Hilbert is a Republican in politics, a Methodist in religion, a member of one of the oldest and most respected families of Clark County, thoroughly honest, industrious, temperate and in every sense of the word a self-made man, and the fine farm of over three hundred acres is the result of his own efforts, industry, economy and thrift, he having made his start in life by working for others by the month and by renting farms of other people, and by his own industry, self-denial and ability as a farmer now farms his own broad and rich 300 acres, the most of which is rich alluvial Wabash bottom land.

Mr. Hilbert and his family are good people, good neighbors, and enjoy the confidence and highest respect and esteem of all who know them. Mr. Hilbert lives in the suburbs of Darwin, once the thrifty county seat of Clark County, and one of the principal shipping points on the Wabash before the day of railroads, and where an old and long established ferry has existed and had been owned by the Shaw family for nearly one hundred years until within the last year Mr. Hilbert purchased it and is now proprietor and running same across the Wabash River in connection with his farming interests.

HILLARD, James H.—The long period of his residence in Clark County and the high character of his principles have firmly established Mr. Hillard in the regard of acquaintances. Since coming to this State from Ohio he has led the quiet and comparatively uneventful life of a farmer, contented with his surroundings, solicitous to aid the development of the county and promote the well-being of the people. For a time after settling in this county in 1866 he made Casey Township his home, but latter he moved to Johnson Township, and now owns and occupies a homestead of forty acres of fertile land. While the land has a high valuation for general farm purposes, its value is greatly increased by the fact that it lies within the oil district. Already one producing well has been drilled on the farm and preparations have been made for further work of the same kind.

The Hillard family is of English extraction and became established in Maryland in an early day. Samuel and Rebecca (Harris) Hillard were natives of Maryland and their son, James H., was born in Montgomery County, that State, June 6, 1836. At an early age he was orphaned by the death of his parents, after which he made his home with an uncle. Upon starting out for himself he migrated to Ohio in 1860 and took up farm pursuits in that State, where he remained for a number of years. During December of 1860 he was united in marriage with Julia Ann Hudlemier, who was born in Washington, D. C., December 6, 1839, being a daughter of Charles L. and Harriet (Young) Hudlemier, descended from German ancestry.

Leaving Ohio in 1866 Mr. Hillard brought his family to Illinois and settled in Clark County, where he has since busily followed farm pursuits. It was the good fortune of himself and wife to rear all but one of their large family and to see them well established in homes of their own. Their children were named as follows: Charles S., Jane E., Mary C., Robert T. (who died December 21, 1871), Elmer H., Josiah P., Walter R., Ruth Ann and William J. It is a noteworthy fact that the five sons are Democrats (following the example of their father in that respect) and all vote in the same township, where they are prosperous and enterprising farmers. One of the sons, Walter R., remains at home and has charge of the farm, relieving his father of the manual work as well as much of the responsibility, and thus enabling him in the afternoon of life to enjoy a pleasurable relaxation from the cares of earlier years.

HOLLENBECK, Washington.—A farmer during his entire active life, and at present a mail carrier in Dennison, Wabash Township, Washington Hollenbeck represents one of the fine old families of Clark County, being a son of J. M. Hollenbeck, a resume of whose life appears elsewhere in this work. Mr. Hollenbeck was born in Darwin Township, Clark County, Ill., April 20, 1866, and was educated in a log school which dispensed the merest rudiments of knowledge, his subsequent training being self-acquired during the leisure of his maturer years. When he was thirteen years old he left home and worked on a farm in Darwin Township, in 1881 went to Missouri, in 1882 came back to Darwin Township, and in 1886 came to Wabash Township, where he attended school at Dennison until 1888.

In Wabash Township, April 8, 1888, Mr. Hollenbeck married Zella Wilson, who was born January 25, 1873, a daughter of W. W. Wilson, an early settler of Clark County. Mr. Wilson was born in Ireland, and as a boy came to America with his parents, the ocean journey being saddened by the death at sea of the mother, who left her husband with the care of several children. The family located in Clark County, where Mr. Wilson attended school, and where he subsequently married Mary Marne, who became the mother of three children: John H., Zella A. and Bertha H. Mr. Wilson was a Democrat, and a Mason, and held several township offices. After his marriage Mr. Hollenbeck settled on the old Wilson farm, and in the meantime he has occupied several other places, removing to his present home in 1901. He has made a success of farming and stock-raising, and has realized therefrom a comfortable competence. Three sons and one daughter have been added to his family: John W., deceased; Elsie M.; Harry LeRoy; and Leo Verner.

In politics Mr. Hollenbeck is a Republican. He was appointed to the Government mail service April 15, 1905, and his service has been characterized by faithfulness and intelligence. He is fraternally identified with the Modern Woodmen of America and the Court of Honor. The family are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Hollenbeck is esteemed for his many admirable qualities, and has a host of friends in the township.

HAYES, Benjamin Marshall.—More than thirty years have brought their changing scenes since the busy and useful life of Benjamin Marshall Hayes was brought to a close. His two surviving children, who now are married and established in homes of their own, were so small at the time of his death that their memory of him is indistinct, and especially is this true of the son, who was only three years of age when left without a father's loving care. The daughter and son were reared by their mother, whose wise training and independent financial standing gave them advantages of inestimable value in their youth. Since they have gone away she remains in Westfield, where she owns and occupies the York residence, built by her parents in the heart of the town at a very early day.

The birth of Benjamin Marshall Hayes occurred in Rossville, Clinton County, Ind., June 9, 1837, his parents being Thomas and Margaret (Fisher) Hayes, natives, it is supposed, of Ohio. In 1853 the family removed to Illinois and settled in Westfield Township, Clark County, where he attended the district schools and aided in the clearing of the home farm. April 7, 1864, he was united in marriage to Abigail Ruth York, who was born in Parker Township, March 4, 1841. Her parents, Michael and Rachel Ann (Boyd) York, were natives of Kentucky and North Carolina, respectively, but settled in Illinois in early life, becoming pioneers of Clark County. The township of York was named in her honor. They were the parents of three children: Calvin Boyd, Abigail Ruth and Milinda Emily. Calvin Boyd volunteered his services to the Union cause during the Civil War and raised a company of men, which later was changed to mounted infantry and assigned to the brigade of General Wilder. Owing to failing health, Captain York was obliged to resign from the service in December, 1863, and his death occurred October 11, 1866. As early as the spring of 1851 Michael York came to Westfield, where he conducted a general merchandise store until 1866, in which year he retired from active business. In 1868 he erected the first brick building in the town of Westfield, consisting of two store rooms. He prospered in his undertakings, invested his savings in land, and reaped the benefit of its steady increase in valuation. At the time of his death, which occurred October 30, 1873, he was classed among the large landowners and prosperous business men of the county. His wife did not long survive him, but passed away May 7, 1874. Nature had adapted them for the difficult task of pioneering. Both possessed tact, generous dispositions, unbounded hospitality and kindly hearts, as well as the requisite physical endurance demanded of the people of the frontier. At the time of their daughter's marriage they presented her with 160 acres of land in Parker Township, upon which, years afterward, oil was discovered. This land has been leased by operators, who have seventeen wells pumping constantly, and some of these were among the first drilled in this section. Mrs. Hayes also owns 120 acres in Westfield Township, and a homestead in the town. These properties render her practically independent, and enable her to surround herself with those comforts and refinements which enhance the joy of existence. After their marriage, Mr. Hayes took charge of her land, and also followed the trade of carpenter and joiner. His death occurred December 27, 1874, while yet in the prime of life, and with his many hopes and ambitions unfulfilled.

Of Mrs. Hayes' two children, Anna Margaret married first George D. Prewett, of Marshall, Ill., and of the union there was a daughter, Juanita Lucile, now the wife of Dr. James A. Jackson, of Hewett, Cal. After the death of her husband, Mrs. Prewett married H. C. Eagon, and lives in Los Angeles, Cal. She was born June 28, 1865. Winfield York Hayes, his mother's only son, was born December 11, 1871, and is engaged in the oil business at Casey, where he and his wife, formerly Ione Miller, and their children, Rolfe Miller and Halford Winfield, now make their home. Three of the children of Mrs. Hayes died in infancy: Michael Calvin, born September 6, 1867, died at the age of one year; Nellie Malinda, born July 1, 1869, died August 30, 1870; and Hallie Marshall, born February 23, 1875, died September of the same year.

In religious views Mr. Hayes was a devout Methodist Episcopalian and his widow is a member of the same church. In politics he was a Republican, was thoroughly posted regarding the national political situation, and was one of the first Aldermen of his township, and a member of long standing of its School Board. During the Civil War he volunteered in the Union Army, but was rejected on account of ill health. Through all of this conflict, however, he was as eagerly interested as if he had been sent to the front, and no one rejoiced more than he at the final victory of Union principles. Death came to him while he was still young and full of hope for the future. Taken from the midst of loved ones and friends, he was mourned by all, and especially by those whose long intimacy with him had given them a knowledge of his sterling traits of character and high principles of honor.

HOLLENBECK, William T.—To an even greater extent than do his contemporaries, an impartial future must accord William T. Hollenbeck a foremost, if not the first place, among the firm, impartial, conservative and capable Judges of Clark County. It is doubtful if any man of more substantial, usable knowledge has ever graced the bench or bar of this part of Illinois, and this notwithstanding the fact that he has passed only forty-five mile posts of his life, and now is entering upon the seventeenth year of his professional career. Certain it is that he has had a larger experience in legal affairs and a larger clientage in probate and chancery practice than any man ever elevated to the Judgeship of this county. He also is a man of great business capacity, and has studied both government and business in many parts of this country and Europe.

Judge Hollenbeck was born October 18, 1861, in York Township, Clark County, Ill., and whereas he was ushered into life among conditions comparatively modern, his father, John Milton Hollenbeck, was born in the same county and township in a rude log cabin, May 18, 1838. The father, whose biographical record appears elsewhere in this volume, was as useful in his way as the son in his, and both, to an extent, were the products of their environment. The son was educated primarily in the public schools and later attended the Southern Illinois State Normal, at Carbondale, Ill., and Indiana State Normal, at Terre Haute, Ind., and the law department at the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, from which he was graduated in the class of 1891. Locating in Marshall, Mr. Hollenbeck engaged in a general practice of law, but gradually specialized in probate, chancery and real estate law, in all of which he has had few equals, either from the standpoint of skill or experience, in his native county.

Early in life Mr. Hollenbeck espoused the Republican cause, and he has risen to high esteem in the councils of the party. He was elected County Judge in 1894, and served until 1898, and during that time gave evidence of that energy, conviction and unusual force of character which has brought victory out of almost every undertaking of his life. He proved markedly correct in his rulings and decisions, and rarely were his decisions appealed. At the present time he is Chairman of the Republican County Committee, and is an influential factor in the judicial, congressional and senatorial districts of Clark County and middle eastern Illinois. Judge Hollenbeck received additional proof of the esteem in which he is held through his election in 1906 to the Forty-fifth General Assembly of Illinois, representing Clark, Coles and Douglas Counties.

In no sense is Judge Hollenbeck a dreamer, but rather his energies always take an intensely practical and useful direction. He never follows the line of least resistance, and admires unstintingly people who have the courage to ignore or rise above the obstacles in their way. Proof of his own possession of these valuable assets is forthcoming in Judge Hollenbeck's reclamation of a wet and practically useless fever-breeding swamp section, at Aurora Bend, on the Wabash River, in Darwin Township, at a cost of nearly five thousand dollars. One can best understand this undertaking by direct quotation from an article by H. C. Bell, in the "Clark County Herald," October 18, 1895:

"After having put in an immense flood gate of solid iron, flanked and buttressed by abutments of concrete, at the opening of the slough that leads to and out of his valuable farm of some six hundred acres of fine lands, he has now supplemented this much-needed and imperative control of the waters of the slough by the completion of nearly a mile of levee, running north and west from the flood gate and the bluff at the southeast to the hills at the northwest of his lands. William Hilibert has had the immediate control and management of this grading, and no better man for the work could have been found. The levee is a fine piece of grading and will soon be green with the timothy and red top with which it has been liberally sown. This flood gate and levee will protect not only the lands of Mr. Hollenbeck, but also some twelve hundred acres of the lands of other parties, from practically all high waters of the Wabash. Genuine public spirit this, that is willing to expend five thousand dollars, not only to protect from overflow his own lands, but also the lands of others, who, thus far, it seems, have not contributed to the cost of these much-needed improvements. When Mr. Hollenbeck bought these lands a large portion of them consisted of willow brush, slash lands, and fish and duck ponds, and the skeptics and 'doubting Thomases' were wont to smile in derision at the efforts of Mr. Hollenbeck to make a farm out of these frog ponds, as they called them, but he stuck to his work, and now has one of the largest and best single farms in the county, and that it will continue to grow more valuable every year goes without saying. Mr. Hollenbeck now has a force of men at work still under the supervision of Mr. Hilibert, cutting a ditch through the cut-off east of Aurora Bend, which will, before long, change the course of the Wabash, thus straightening the river and shortening it nearly two miles, and deflecting the rapid and destructive current of the river in high water times, from the Illinois shore at Aurora Bend, which, as it is now, is constantly cutting away the west bank of the river and destroying much valuable land."

October 28, 1896, Mr. Hollenbeck was united in marriage to Louise M. Rackerby, daughter of M. P. and Anna Rackerby, of Hutsonville, Ill. Mr. and Mrs. Hollenbeck have three sons: Neal Augustus, born August 18, 1897; John Milton, born March 19, 1899; and William Wayne, born January 24, 1905. Fraternally Mr. Hollenbeck is identified with the Blue Lodge No. 133, A. F. & A. M.; the Chapter No. 70, R. A. M.; Lancelot Lodge No. 67, K. of P.; Seminole Tribe No. 23, Improved Order of Red Men; Modern Woodmen of America, and the Court of Honor. He finds a religious home in the Presbyterian Church. Judge Hollenbeck makes strong appeal to the intellect, conscience and public-spiritedness of Clark County. He is the personification of that repose which means power, and that restraint which can control others, because it first has controlled himself. He early found his place in the work of the world, and his purpose, once defined, no hindering influences, possibilities of self-aggrandizement, or deviations from recognized and excellent standards have deterred him from his course. He is one of the strong, substantial and dependable men of Clark County.

HOWE, John T.—The environment of the frontier was familiar to the boyhood years of John T. Howe, whose earliest associations were connected with Johnson Township, Clark County, ere emigration had set in strongly toward this section of the State. It was his privilege to witness the gradual development of the agricultural possibilities of the country and to see its increasing prosperity from year to year. Eventually, during the last years of his active life, he was surrounded by the comforts of existence and saw on every hand well cultivated farms, thriving villages, neat school buildings and churches whose spires pointed the thoughts heavenward. In the securing of all these accessories he did his share, and when death called him to his final rest it was recognized that the township had lost a native-born son whose devotion to the local advancement was constant and whose public spirit was unquestioned.

About the year 1836 a "prairie schooner" brought Joseph and Letta (Foster) Howe to Illinois, where they took up a claim in the sparsely settled regions of Clark County. Both were natives of Kentucky and had lived in Indiana prior to crossing the line into Illinois.

Eventually by frugality and industry they acquired considerable land and improved a farm that is now quite valuable. Four sons blessed their union, namely: John T., who was born in Johnson Township, Clark County, July 5, 1841; Joseph B., and David, who are married and residing in Clark County; and Israel, who remains a bachelor. On the frontier farm John T. Howe passed an industrious youth and acquired a practical training in agriculture. In those days schools were few and it was not practicable for the pioneers to send their children regularly, but John T. was sent as much as possible and obtained a common-school education. His father made two trips across the plains to California. The first was made in 1850 and the second in 1856, but neither proved profitable, and disappointed in his hopes of locating claims, he returned to Illinois and remained afterward on the home farm until his death.

The outbreak of the Civil War found John T. Howe a firm supporter of the Union, and August 26, 1861, he became a soldier in the army, being enrolled in Company B, Second Illinois Light Artillery, under the command of Captain Fletcher H. Chapman. The regiment bore an honorable part in numerous engagements, those of Shiloh and Corinth being among the most important, while others of lesser note were no less fatal in their losses. After an honorable service he was discharged at the expiration of his time, August 31, 1864, and immediately afterward returned to Illinois, where he resumed the farm labors that had been interrupted by his army experiences. April 6, 1867, he was united in marriage with Miss Melvina Ray, who was born in Clark County, February 27, 1850, and is a lady of the highest refinement and greatest tact. Her parents, Virgils and Letta (Harper) Ray, were natives of Kentucky and descended from Irish and English ancestors. From the blue grass State they crossed the Ohio River into Indiana, thence in 1849 moved into Illinois and settled in Clark County.

From the time of attaining his majority until his death Mr. Howe never voted any ticket besides that of the Democratic party. In religion he was an earnest member of the Methodist Episcopal Church and a contributor to the work of the local congregation. Firm in the faith of that church he passed from earth's trials and labors to the rest of eternity, and was buried near the scenes familiar to his earthly career. Surviving him are his wife and six children, the latter being Joseph B., William D., Jane L., John T., Henry L. and Annie M., all of whom are married and reside in Clark County, where they own farms and are classed among the progressive and prosperous people of the community.

HOWELL, Henry C.—In 1852 there arrived in the then small town of Martinsville a young harness maker twenty-two years old, who, notwithstanding his Southern birth, was imbued with the rugged spirit of the Central West, and who was destined to add to the character, purpose and commercial well-being of the community until his death, July 2, 1899, at the age of sixty-six. Henry C. Howell was born in Loudoun County, Va., in 1832, and as an orphan was taken into the family of one Caldwell Carr, who raised him as one of his own children until his fourteenth year. The lad was then informed of his parentage, and given the choice of becoming a clerk in a general store or learning a trade. Uncertain as to his qualifications, he chose the former occupation for about ten months, but not finding the work congenial, and feeling seriously his educational limitations, went to school for a time, and then served an apprenticeship in the saddle and harness shop of Daniel Campbell, of Washington, D. C. After several years' association with his instructor and employer, he struck out for himself in Leesburg, Loudoun County, Va., later moving to Martinsburg, Berkeley County, the same State, where he succeeded in escaping the cholera which laid low a large part of the population of that city.

From Martinsburg Mr. Howell came to Martinsville, Clark County, and soon after found employment in the harness shop of William G. Files, a prominent citizen, who then was serving as Justice of the Peace and Postmaster. The clerk arose to high favor with his employer, and finally became manager of the business, retaining the responsibility up to and for a year after the death of Mr. Files in 1860. He already had seen considerable of the country, had been thrown with many kinds and conditions of people, but his life thus far had been even in tenor and comparatively uneventful. The Civil War opened up a new field of venture, and he readily availed himself of its stern and duty-compelling opportunity. Enlisting in the Madison Battery, in the spring of 1861, for three months, he was not mustered into service, and after a short visit to his home, again enlisted, this time in Company G, One Hundred and Twenty-third Illinois Volunteer Infantry. He participated in many battles and skirmishes, including Perryville, Milton, Hoover's Gap, Farmington and Rome, and arose to the rank of First Lieutenant, having charge of his company at the time of his honorable discharge in 1864, owing to loss of hearing.

Returning to Martinsville, Mr. Howell sought to drown out the hideous memories of war in his former peaceful occupation, and in 1874 sold out his interest and engaged in the sale of agricultural implements. This business he eventually disposed of to Wood Brothers, and in 1896 established the saddlery business now owned and managed by his son, William Carr Howell. For many years Mr. Howell was prominent in Republican politics, and soon after the war was appointed Postmaster of Martinsville. He was justice of the peace from 1867 until his death, and also held minor offices. Fraternally, he was a Master Mason, Odd Fellow and Knight of Honor, and in religion he was a Baptist. Long before success had rewarded his efforts, and when her lot was that of aid and sympathizer to a struggling young man, he married, in 1857, Catherine Alexander, who was born in Edgar County, Ill., in 1838. Of the union there were six children, three of whom are living: Mrs. Mary A. Polk; Mrs. Retta Tyler; William C. Mr. Howell is survived by his wife, who still makes her home in Martinsville. He made a substantial and lasting impression upon the history of Martinsville, and his name is enrolled among its capable and many-sided upbuilders. Honorable and upright himself, he appreciated and exacted a like honesty in others, and always was the courteous, obliging but extremely business-like official or commercialist, seeking only the legitimate rewards of his toil, and holding himself above greed, aggrandizement, or outside and deterring influence.

HOWERTON, Henry.—Henry Howerton was born near Marshall, Ill., in 1844. His mother was Mary Shaw, daughter of Joseph Shaw, one of the first settlers of Clark County, who at an early date entered some 700 acres of land in the county. The father of our subject was John Howerton, who was born in 1813 and died in 1870.

He enlisted in the Tenth Illinois Infantry at seventeen years of age, and was in twenty battles of the War of the Rebellion, but never wounded, and was discharged at Cairo, Ill., in 1865. His wife was Lydia Handy, born in York Township in 1847. From this marriage with Miss Handy our subject had three daughters, Jennie, Anna and Myrtle, but one, the last, now survives. Mr. Howerton died on September 5, 1895. His widow has a farm of fifty acres in York Township which she looks after herself. She has eight grandchildren, and, like her deceased husband, is one of the most highly respected persons in York Township.

HUGHES, Edward J.—The many and substantial qualities which contribute to successful merchandising find expression in Edward J. Hughes, to whose energy and public-spiritedness the city of Marshall is indebted for the largest department store within the confines of Clark County. Mr. Hughes is sixty-four years old, and practically all of his working life has been spent in the atmosphere of the general store. Both his ability and inclination largely are matters of inheritance, and it may be said that in choosing his life occupation he stepped into a waiting opportunity. Born in Evansville, Ind., July 22, 1843, he is a son of William and Emilia (Galway) Hughes, the latter of whom was born in Galway, Ireland, and in early life immigrated to the United States, where, in Madison, Ind., he married his Scotch wife. The general merchandise business established by Mr. Hughes in Evansville, Ind., in 1839, still is a monument to his successful pioneering, and still is conducted under his name, although now owned and operated by his near kin. His death occurred in 1887, after a life of exceptional usefulness, and he left a legacy of personal worth in full accord with the honor and standing of his ancient family, first known in the picturesque mountain country of Hollyhead, Wales. There lived the paternal grandfather of Edward J. Hughes in early life, and he subsequently located in Galway, Ireland, where he established and maintained for many years the largest paper mill in Great Britain. His death occurred in 1837. He reared a family of sixteen children, although his wife bore him twenty-one.

Edward J. Hughes was one of nine children, and he lost his mother by death when he was sixteen years old. He discontinued study at the Evansville High School at the age of fourteen, at the end of a three years' course, and as there were no other scholars prepared to go on with him, his father, who was a School Trustee, thought he did not need to review. His school days ended, he went into his father's store, and was present there during the panic of 1857. In 1867 he came to Marshall and opened a small store, but after continuing two years and a half under discouraging conditions, owing to a decline of prices, sold out at a great loss and went to traveling on the road. In 1875 he was offered in exchange for his services an interest in the firm of Tuel, Marshall & Company, of Terre Haute, Ind., a position maintained until 1879, when, owing to his wife's failing health, he returned to Marshall and began a general merchandise business in half of one of the store rooms he now occupies. Succeeding beyond his expectations, he soon afterward rented the entire floor, and finally his requirements were four floors of 113 and 115 Main Street. At the present time he has one of the most complete department stores in the State outside of Chicago, carrying dry goods, clothing, shoes, millinery, carpets, oilcloths and many kinds of general merchandise.

During the Civil War Mr. Hughes was a member of the Indiana Militia, and frequently was ordered out with his company to different parts of the South, principally Owensburg and Henderson, Ky., on the occasion of the capture of Morgan's raiders, guarding the Ohio River at Rockport, Ind. The company received four months' pay for active service after the war, and with that terminated Mr. Hughes's military experience. He is a Democrat in politics, but never has been active in the local undertakings of his party. Since 1886 he has been identified with the Catholic Knights of America, a society carrying a $2,000 insurance. February 18, 1868, he was united in marriage to Emma Duncan, of Marshall, daughter of Dr. Charles Duncan, and granddaughter of Rev. William Blundell, a Methodist itinerant minister of local fame. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Hughes, of whom Charles, the eldest, died at the age of twenty-six years, in October, 1895. This son was the father's assistant in the store for some time, but upon his health falling he was given every advantage possible to recover, but both Florida and Colorado failed to give him the boon of health. Grief over his death largely was responsible for the death of his mother in 1898. Maude Hughes married in 1890 J. A. Morton, and in 1901 Mary, the other daughter in the family, married L. P. Schwanecke. James A. Morton is a native of Clark County, and a son of John Morton, who came from Scotland and is well known as a farmer and banker. Mr. and Mrs. Morton have three children. Louis P. Schwanecke is a son of H. A. Schwanecke, an eminent civil engineer, who constructed the Vandalia Railroad through Marshall, and whose wife, Lola E., is a daughter of a pioneer physician of this county. Mr. Schwanecke is now Vice-President and constructing engineer of a railroad from Pittsburg to Albany, N. Y.

HULL, George.—Various activities have engaged the attention of Mr. Hull since he first started out for himself and in every connection he has proved to be a resourceful man and an intelligent citizen, whose life reflects credit upon his mental attainments and upon the opportunities afforded by his native county of Clark. During January of 1902 he purchased a farm five miles southeast of Casey on Section 3, the same being then the property of S. Cullop and known as the Billy Howe farm. The place comprises 120 acres, all of which has been put under cultivation with the exception of fifteen acres of wood pasture. The land lies within the Casey oil belt, and prospects are fair for the finding of oil on the land, in which event the owner would necessarily find his responsibilities heightened and his profits increased.

Ten miles south of Martinsville, in Orange Township, Clark County, George Hull was born March 31, 1860, being a son of Jacob S. and Nancy E. (Elliott) Hull, both of German descent, the former born in Virginia in 1826, and the latter a native of Illinois. As early as 1855 Jacob S. Hull became a pioneer of Clark County, Ill., where he engaged in farming pursuits and also carried on a general store in Orange Township. During the boyhood years of George Hull he was trained to a thorough knowledge of farming in all of its details and at the same time he was given such advantages as country schools then afforded. Upon obtaining his majority he began to work out by the month and continued in that way for three years, meanwhile saving his earnings for future investment. On starting out for himself he began to buy and sell cattle, horses and hogs, and the experience thus gained proved of the greatest benefit to him in giving him a thorough knowledge of stock and their values. Becoming a land-owner in 1883, he bought forty acres and turned his attention to its cultivation, but later resumed the buying of stock and also to some extent engaged in the real-estate business.

The marriage of George Hull and Ida V. Spraker was solemnized March 22, 1885. Three children were born to bless their union, namely: Ada E., born June 14, 1886; Walter M., who was born October 4, 1888, and died February 4, 1889; and Myrta V., who was born May 2, 1890. The older daughter has taught several terms of school, meeting with excellent success in the profession. Mrs. Hull was born in Clark County January 22, 1864, and is a daughter of Sylvester and Clorinda (Huckaba) Spraker. Her father, who was born in Wythe County, Va., October 8, 1828, became a resident of Orange Township, Clark County, in 1851, and for fifty years continued to be a leader in township affairs, an honored and trustworthy citizen, whose death in the township February 7, 1901, was mourned as common loss to all. In religion he was of the Methodist Episcopal faith and a contributor to church movements as well as to general philanthropies. His wife was born in Illinois in 1836 and passed away in 1869 while yet in life's prime. The religious identification of the Hull family is with the Methodist Episcopal Church, to which they are generous contributors, as to other movements for the uplifting of humanity. Politically Mr. Hull votes with the Republican party. In the main he has declined offers of political nominations. The only office he consented to hold was that of School Director, to which he was elected in 1904 and which he since has filled with characteristic fidelity and intelligence.

John R. Lansberg

HURLBURT, Clark B.—Though originally from Germany, the Hurlburt family has been identified with American history ever since the colonial period of our development, and its representatives have been leading workers in the agricultural upbuilding of the various regions whither they removed. The family history shows that Lee Hurlburt, who was born in Pennsylvania March 16, 1797, and removed to Ohio with his parents in 1803, was a soldier in the war of 1812, his service covering about one-half of a year toward the close of that historic struggle. For years he was one of the most prominent farmers of Delaware County, Ohio, and there in October, 1880, he passed from the scene of his labors, honored as an intelligent pioneer and progressive farmer. While still a young man he was united in marriage with Elizabeth Clark, who was born in Maryland June 3, 1812, descended from German and English ancestry. During the Revolutionary War her grandfather and his six brothers came to America as English soldiers, but during the progress of the struggle they were captured by the American troops. Later they joined the American army and eventually became patriotic citizens of the new nation. Mrs. Elizabeth Hurlburt died February 20, 1894, about thirteen years after the demise of her husband.

On Thanksgiving Day of 1847 (which on that year fell on November 28) Clark B. Hurlburt was born in Delaware County, Ohio, and there he made his home until 1878, when he removed to Illinois and settled in Clark County. Before his arrival he purchased his brother's interest of eighty acres in 160 acres of timber land, for which he paid $10 per acre. It required considerable arduous effort to remove the brush and timber and get the ground into condition for profitable cultivation, but this task was eventually completed, and he then had secured a farm of the highest fertility, from which could be obtained large crops of every grain suited to the climate and soil of eastern Illinois. This farm still remains his property, but its valuation has increased to $300 per acre. Eighty acres lies on Section 13, Johnson Township, and has five oil wells and one gas well, all of which are valuable. At the present time he is engaged in drilling additional oil wells. Not unnaturally Mr. Hurlburt is pleased with the thought that he now can secure an abundance of fuel much more easily than when he first came to this county and purchased a timber farm.

Through much of his maturer life Mr. Hurlburt had the advantage of the counsel of a wife more than ordinarily devoted to his welfare and wise in judgment to a marked degree. Miss Julia Moore was born in Ohio February 4, 1859, and descended from English ancestry, but her parents were born and reared in Ohio. On New Year's Day of 1878 she became the wife of Mr. Hurlburt. Seven children were born of their union, one of whom died in early childhood, and one son, William H., died at the age of twenty-one; and Ellen died at the age of twenty years. Those now living are as follows: Flora, who was born May 6, 1882, and in 1906 became the wife of Elmer Briggs, a farmer of Clark County; Ezra, born November 2, 1887; Harry, November 20, 1891; and Flossie H., March 25, 1897. When the youngest child was seven days old, the wife and mother passed away April 2, 1897, leaving the devoted family circle deeply bereaved by the irreparable loss. The oldest daughter was then fifteen years of age and she at once became the housekeeper, nobly caring for her father and the younger children until they were in a position to give her up to go into her own home. Through all of his active life Mr. Hurlburt has labored unwearyingly, but now, having accumulated a competency, he plans to relinquish some of his activities and enjoy a well-merited rest from the arduous cares of former years. Mr. Hurlburt is a Democrat in politics.

HURST, Allen—Although a resident of Indianapolis, Ind., since 1904, Allen Hurst still casts his vote in Clark County, and maintains many of his interests in the community which for so many years admitted his supremacy as an agriculturist and politician. Mr. Hurst was born November 25, 1852, in Dolson Township, Clark County, a son of Nicholas Hurst, a resume of whose life may be found in the sketch of another of the latter's sons, Seymour Hurst.

At the age of three years, Allen Hurst moved with his parents to Auburn Township, Clark County, where he was reared on a farm and attended the district schools. His youth was uneventful, and he slipped naturally into increasing responsibility upon the homestead consisting of 200 acres. January 23, 1873, he was united in marriage to Nancy Johnson, a native of Dolson Township, and born July 21, 1855. Miss Johnson represented one of the early families of this part of Clark County, her parents, Abel and Mary Johnson, having arrived here during the early '50s. To Mr. and Mrs. Hurst have been born four sons and four daughters: John H., Nicholas L., Harriet, Nora, Edith, Grover, Thurman and Irene.

After his marriage Mr. Hurst continued to live on the old farm until his election to the office of Sheriff of Clark County on the Democratic ticket in 1890. He then moved to Marshall, but at the expiration of his term in 1894, again took up farming until again elected Sheriff in 1898. He has held many other offices in the county, including that of Township Collector three years, Democratic Committeeman several years, and member of the Board of Education twelve years. He is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Clarksville Lodge, and the Knights of Pythias, Lodge No. 67, of Marshall. In religion he is identified with the Christain Church. As an agriculturist Mr. Hurst was scientific and progressive and maintained always the best tenets of country life and work. As a man he is honorable and high minded, and as a politician conscientious and capable. He has a host of loyal friends in Clark County.

HURST, Emanuel.—The fact that he has no competitors in the marble industry in Marshall is by no means a determining factor in the success of Emanuel Hurst. This popular merchant would win out in any community where energy and push were requisites for advancement, for his work bears the stamp of knowledge and experience and close studentship of the methods employed by others in the larger centers of activity. In his youth Mr. Hurst followed the agricultural fortunes of his parents in Dawson Township, Clark County, where he was born August 20, 1856. His father, Jesse Hurst, a native of Virginia, came to Indiana with his parents when a child. He married twice in the Hoosier State, and was a widower when he came to Clark County in the early '50s. His third wife, the mother of Emanuel, had entered land in Dawson Township before her marriage, and it was this farm upon which the lad was reared to maturity. The elder Hurst was a Whig in politics, but he never cared for office. As had been his family for many years, he was a devout member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. His death occurred in 1884, and he is survived by his wife, who, at the age of eighty-six years, is still hale and hearty at her home in Dolson Township. The maternal family is a long-lived one, and Mrs. Hurst has a brother and sister older than herself still living. The paternal grandfather Hurst was a well-to-do Southerner, who owned a large plantation, and had many slaves, as had also many of his relatives. During the old Tippecanoe Indian troubles he helped build the fort near Terre Haute, Ind., and he was an officer in the army which helped to subdue the same rebellion.

Emanuel Hurst combined farming and attendance at the district schools until his eighteenth year, after which he devoted his entire time to agriculture and stock-raising. After his marriage to Barbara E. Clark, who was born in Dawson Township, January 30, 1860, a daughter of Joseph and Mary Clark, he continued to farm until 1890, and in 1892 located in Marshall and established his present general marble business. He has one daughter, Ethel, who was born in Dawson Township, September 24, 1886. Mr. Hurst is a Republican in politics, and in religion is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Fifteen years' association with the business of this community has netted him a comfortable competence and possessions which include a modern home in a desirable part of the town. He is respected by all who are associated with him in any capacity whatsoever, and in his particular groove of usefulness leaves little to be desired from either a personal or commercial standpoint.

HURST, Harvey.—The extensive farming operations connected with the homestead on Section 36, Auburn Township, are under the personal supervision of the owner, Harvey Hurst, who is numbered among the leading farmers of Clark County and is a native-born citizen of the township now his home. The estate includes 402 acres, the improvements of which have been made under his direct oversight, and with the object of securing permanency combined with convenience. Few men in the township are more familiar with the stock business than is Mr. Hurst, whose specialty is the raising of thoroughbreds. It is his theory that the raising of "scrub" stock on highpriced land is unprofitable, hence he confines his attention to the best breeds. After a trial of other breeds of hogs, he now gives his attention exclusively to the Duroc-Jerseys, while his other specialties are shorthorn cattle and Shropshire sheep of the purest breeds. In each of these branches of agriculture he has built up a reputation by no means limited to his own township and county, and has become known as an authority on full-blooded stock.

Born in Auburn Township November 24, 1847, Harvey Hurst is a son of John and Martha (Craig) Hurst, and in order of birth was fourth among ten children, seven sons and three daughters, of whom five attained to manhood and womanhood. His father, who was born in Kentucky October 8, 1814, became a pioneer of Clark County as early as 1828, when all of Eastern Illinois was a wilderness, practically unimproved and sparsely settled. Elisha and Celia Hurst, his parents, entered a tract of Government land near Marshall, and this they cleared and cultivated, having in the difficult task the enthusiastic assistance of their children. Among fourteen children John was the first born, and he and three others are the sole survivors of the once large family. The days of his youth were passed principally in Marshall Township, where he met and married Miss Craig, daughter of Robert Craig, a pioneer of 1828 in Clark County. Through all of his active years John Hurst followed agricultural pursuits, but eventually he retired to enjoy the rest abundantly earned by years of strenuous endeavor. The local work of the Democratic party has received his practical support all through his life and he has never failed to vote the party ticket in all national elections. In religious views he held membership with the Christian Church. John Hurst died January 26, 1907, at the home of Harvey Hurst.

It was not until 1878 that Harvey Hurst brought a wife to his home. During that year he was united with Elizabeth Griffith, who was born in Orange Township, Clark County, being a daughter of William and Maria Griffith, early settlers of the county. As a girl she was given good advantages and after leaving school she taught in Marshall Township in the district schools for a number of terms. Of her marriage to Mr. Hurst there are four sons and three daughters, all of whom are natives of Auburn Township. The family holds membership with the Methodist Episcopal Church and contribute to missionary and charitable movements with a sympathetic liberality. Under the influence of such a decided Democrat as his father, Mr. Hurst early imbibed the doctrines of the party and remains faithful to these principles to the present time. In local politics he always has been active, and for three terms he represented Auburn Township upon the Board of County Supervisors, in which responsible position he gave his support intelligently and faithfully to measures for the welfare of the people. In fraternal identifications he is a Master Mason. Throughout the community where his entire life has been passed he holds the confidence of the people and has won the influential position to which his abilities entitle him.

HURST, Seymour.—The value of precision of character, capacity for painstaking, definiteness of purpose and unflinching integrity is emphasized in the comparatively brief but varied career of Seymour Hurst, at present engaged in the real estate business in Marshall, but who has been known to the community also as an abstract and loan promoter, merchant, builder, Deputy Sheriff, Postmaster and member of the State Legislature. Mr. Hurst is a man who in large degree was fashioned by his early environment, and fortunately that environment developed qualities of great use to him in mature years. As a boy he had the spur of poverty behind him, and the only way to get what he wanted was to go out and work for it. He never ceased to respect or follow this method of procedure.

As a boy Mr. Hurst's muscles were hardened by early and late application on the farm of his parents, Nicholas and Nancy A. (Harner) Hurst, in Auburn Township, Clark County, where he was born November 9, 1867. In his father he had an inspiration to useful effort, for from a modest beginning he arose to substantial means, and served his township in the honored capacities of County Treasurer one term, Sheriff two terms and Associate Judge one term. Seymour Hurst studied at the public schools with characteristic doggedness, and in 1889 began teaching school, which he followed until the fourth term, when he resigned to accept the office of Deputy Sheriff during the winter of 1890. He then moved to Marshall, and May 23, 1893, was appointed Postmaster, serving in that office until October 1, 1897. As Postmaster Mr. Hurst created a precedent in good management and improvement, and during his term of office did not close the postoffice on any legal or other holiday included therein.

During the four years succeeding the Postmastership, Mr. Hurst engaged in the abstract and loan business, and then purchased a half interest in a furniture and undertaking enterprise, which he operated with a partner eighteen months, and managed alone for eight months, or until selling out in the spring of 1902. Since then he has engaged in the real estate business, for which he is admirably equipped, having an excellent comprehension of values and a thorough knowledge of the properties and resources throughout the county. Mr. Hurst has added to the architectural substantiality of the town by constructing two residences, two business blocks, and by modernizing the old St. James Hotel. In the meantime he has continued his keen interest in Democratic affairs, and at present is a member of the Forty-fifth General Assembly, to which he was elected November 6, 1906. We know of no one in the community better fitted to represent the needs of the people, or who will more fearlessly carry to success, measures calculated to increase the material, moral and general good.

Mr. Hurst is an appreciator of the many benefits to be derived from fraternal associations, his active interest dating from 1891, when he joined the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In 1895 he joined the Court of Honor, and in 1900 the Red Men. He became a member of the Blue Lodge, A. F. & A. M., in 1902, of the Chapter in March, 1906, and in May, 1906, was elected a Knight Templar, but thus far has received none of the degrees. December 25, 1892, he was united in marriage to Myrtle May James, at the home of the latter's father, David C. James, in Martinsville Township, Clark County. Mr. and Mrs. Hurst have two children, of whom Nancy Esther is twelve, and Helen Ada eight years of age. Mrs. Hurst is a member of the Congregational Church. Mr. Hurst is a man of exemplary habits, and never has partaken of a glass of whiskey, smoked a cigar or taken a chew of tobacco. He respects nothing more than his own word, and people have taken him at his own estimate of himself.

JACO, J. R.—The life of J. R. Jaco, the popular liveryman of Martinsville, has been an uphill struggle, and has contained adventures not found in the beaten paths of the world. His is a story winding in and out of poverty and great loneliness, and having little to do with the average conditions in which youths develop into men. Born in Kentucky in 1845, Mr. Jaco was left an orphan while still an infant, and he forthwith fell into the hands of strangers, with whom his lot was anything but a cheerful one. With that waywardness which often proves the profoundest wisdom, at the age of nine he uprooted himself from his atmosphere of narrowness and discouragement, and, running away, found employment on a scow doing business on the Mississippi River. For some time the freedom of the river life held him willingly to its tasks, and as his expenses were light, he found little difficulty in getting ahead financially. He was apt and observing, and in the river days picked up a liberal supply of general information and sound philosophy.

In 1864 Mr. Jaco enlisted in the Union Army and served four years at guarding cattle. Even his army experience was different from the average run of people. After the war he went to Cincinnati and learned the trade of twisting tobacco, and in 1878 came to Clark County and located in Martinsville. Here he began to run a dray with encouraging success, and for twenty-two years followed that occupation without a single competitor. He also operated a hotel for a couple of years, and in 1900 engaged in the livery business, to which he still is devoting his attention. He has a large line of vehicles and some good horses, quite priding himself on the latter, which have every appearance of being well and faithfully cared for. He has a paying and steady business, and enjoys the confidence and esteem of the community.

The wife of Mr. Jaco formerly was Lottie Miller, daughter of George Miller, and a native of Kentucky. Mr. and Mrs. Jaco are the parents of three sons and two daughters, of whom one daughter is deceased. Three of the children were born in Clark County. Mr. Jaco is a Republican in politics and fraternally is connected with the Modern Woodmen of America.

JANNEY, Harry M.—The professional career of Harry M. Janney has gone hand in hand with the growth of Marshall since his admission to the bar of Illinois, September 6, 1879. The passing of twenty-eight years has witnessed a realization of many of the practical ambitions of this popular attorney, and not only has he added to the dignity and strength of the local bar, but has served the commonwealth as City Attorney and Mayor. Mr. Janney comes honestly by his predilection for law, and represents a family whose association with the jurisprudence of the State began as long ago as 1829. During that year his father, Eldridge S. Janney, came to Crawford County, this State, and there engaged in his calling as a legal practitioner for many years, removing subsequently to Marshall, where his son, Harry M., was born June 15, 1855. Eldridge S. Janney was born in Alexandria, Va., July 12, 1803, and died in Marshall December 17, 1875. In early life he married Ann E. Martin, daughter of James and Ann Martin, who came to Clark County in 1840. Mrs. Janney was born in Londonville, Ohio, January 30, 1825.

Mr. Janney owes his educational opportunities principally to Marshall, and after graduating from the high school he entered the law office of Wilkin & Wilkin, with whom he studied law from 1877 until his admission to the bar. His ability and resources met with early recognition, and he was elected City Attorney of Marshall at the expiration of his first professional year, serving two years. He was elected Mayor of the city and served very proficiently. His administrations were characterized by fairness and good judgment, and substantially contributed to the well-being of the city. In politics he is a Democrat, and fraternally is identified with the Knights of Pythias.

The wife of Mr. Janney, who formerly was Mrs. Jennie Patten (nee Strong), is one of the prominent women of Marshall, being closely connected with its social and church affairs, and exerting a wide influence as a promoter of the higher and intellectual life. She is a daughter of a well known clergyman, and her brother, William J. Strong, for many years was a lawyer and orator of Chicago. Died 1934

JOHNSON, B. F.—The loan business of B. F. Johnson has been an increasingly important commercial asset of Marshall since March, 1897. Mr. Johnson has a thorough knowledge of his calling, and invests it with dignity, fairness and consideration. His life has had its share of experience, and average advantages have fitted him for an active business career. Born at Alexandria, Va., November 1, 1865, he comes honestly by his capacity for merchandising, as his father, J. F. Johnson, for many years was a prominent merchant in Annapolis, Ill., and now is living retired in that city. The son was educated in his native city and took a course at the Valparaiso Business College, at Valparaiso, Ind., in 1885. Subsequently he engaged in the retail merchandise business with his father in Annapolis, coming from there to Marshall, which since has been his home. Deceased 1934.

JUMPER, Simon, M. D.—The professional activity of Dr. Simon Jumper is a part of the yesterday of Clark County, and conformed to many-sided and strenuous demands with which practitioners of the present are strangely unfamiliar. Arriving here to supply a need of the unformed period in 1854, Dr. Jumper settled first in Wabash Township, and the following year located in Darwin, where, for a quarter of a century, he ministered to the near and distant afflicted, winning appreciation and approval by his uniformly sincere and capable efforts. During that time there were few calls of an urgent nature to which he did not respond, no matter how far he had to ride, or what time of the night or day. Much of his work was of a purely benevolent nature, for from the beginning of his career he was intensely attracted by the possibilities of disinterested usefulness and kindness afforded by his calling. About 1881 Dr. Jumper moved to Marshall and retired from active life, purchasing a home in the eastern part of the town. In 1905 he erected the present commodious and comfortable home of the family.

A native of Richland County, Ohio, and born November 14, 1826, Dr. Jumper is a son of Henry and Elizabeth (O'Hare) Jumper, farmers by occupation, and pioneers of Ohio. This couple was thrifty and industrious, and imparted their sterling qualities to their large family of thirteen children. When Simon was very young he was taken to live at Findlay, Ohio, and there educated in the public schools. Subsequently he engaged in teaching, and at the same time studied medicine, between the age of twenty-one and twenty-seven. He has spent his entire professional life in Clark County. The Doctor is a Republican in politics, and in earlier life was active in township affairs, holding several offices, including that of School Commissioner in both the county and town. He always has had a social side to his nature, and has taken a keen interest in the Masonic fraternity, with which he has been connected many years. Unlike many men to whom science makes strong appeal, Dr. Jumper is religiously inclined, and has been an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church since early manhood. The friends he made along the years of heavy responsibility still are his loyal adherents, and his leisure is brightened by the unflinching regard of hundreds who honor integrity, ability and large heartedness.

Dr. Jumper has been a Republican since 1856, and he cast his vote for John C. Freeman, the first Republican nominee for President of the United States. January 10, 1856, he was united in marriage to Sarah Piggs, a daughter of John and Minerva (Shaw) Piggs, and native of Clark County, Illinois. Mrs. Jumper died November 1, 1856, and December 12, 1859, the doctor married Mary E. Desser, also born in Clark county, and daughter of Bates and Ollie (Hollenbeck) Desser. Mrs. Jumper died July 14, 1883. She was the mother of seven children, of whom three sons died in infancy. Of the other children, Effie E. is her father's housekeeper; Jennie is the deceased wife of Volney Gorham; Cora died in early youth; and Lillie is the wife of Fred Martin, of Terre Haute, Ind., and has a daughter, Blanch.

KEIFER, John L.—During his comparatively brief independent career John L. Keifer has won success as a farmer, superintendent of railroad construction, assistant in a railroad freight office, and since 1896, as operator of a drug store in the town of Marshall. He also was a vallant soldier in the Civil War, enlisting in 1862 in the One Hundred and Tenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, under Colonel J. W. Keifer, of Springfield, Ohio, and serving until the end of the war. As a member of the Army of the Potomac, he participated in the battles of the Wilderness, Spottsylvania, Cold Harbor, North Arm River, and many others, and was present at the capture of Petersburg and Richmond. At Cold Harbor he was wounded in the left arm and sent to a hospital for two months. He gave his services willingly, and braved danger with unflinching courage, but returned to his home with renewed appreciation of the hideousness of war as a means of settling the disputes of the world.

Born in Green County, Ohio, July 5, 1844, Mr. Keifer is a son of William and Elizabeth (Gieseman) Keifer, natives of Maryland, and pioneers of Ohio, and who had also four other children, one older and three younger than John L. Of these, Alexander and Harvey are living, and Mary M. and Frank are deceased. Reared on his father's Ohio farm, the youth of Mr. Keifer was uneventful until the breaking out of the Civil War. While in the service his parents moved from Ohio to Shelby County, Ind., and it was here that he joined them after discarding the regimentals of the soldier. In 1872 he married Anna Belle Burnside, niece of General Burnside, of Civil War fame, and distinguished also as Governor of Rhode Island and United States Senator. After his marriage, Mr. Keifer became foreman of teams on the Cairo & Vincennes Railroad, now the Big Four, under his uncle, who was superintendent of construction, and upon the completion of the road went into the freight office at Cairo, then took charge of the transfer service on the steamer Morgan until 1896.

At the termination of his railroad experience Mr. Keifer bought out the drug store of C. A. Purdum, of Marshall, and since has conducted the same as an up-to-date and progressive store. He also finds time to promote by active support many of the social and general interests of the community, including the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Lodge No. 258, of Cairo, and the Grand Army of the Republic, of Marshall. He is a Republican in politics, but thus far has steadfastly refused to be a candidate for office. Mr. and Mrs. Keifer are the parents of four children: Fred B., who is his father's partner; Minnie Pearl; Katherine; and Mary Everett. Mary Everett Keifer has won distinction as a whistler, and is considered to have no superiors in the line in this country. Mr. Keifer is a genial and approachable man, loyal to his friends, and upright in all of his dealings.

KELLEY, John Wesley.—That agriculture has come to be regarded as an exact science, embodying the charm of possible discovery and progress with the benefits of a life of surpassing interest and peace, is owing to the efforts of such enlightened and enterprising men as John Wesley Kelley, one of the painstaking and thoroughly successful farmers of Martinsville Township. Mr. Kelley was born on the farm he now owns and occupies November 24, 1847, and is a son of John and Elizabeth (Miller) Kelley, grandson of Samuel Kelley, who fought in the battle of Tippecanoe under General William Henry Harrison, and great-grandson of an Irish immigrant who transplanted the best Gaelic traits to Jefferson County, Ky., long before the Revolutionary War.

John Kelley was born on a farm in Jefferson County, Ky., November 20, 1817, and attended the early subscription schools of his neighborhood. May 29, 1842, he was united in marriage to Elizabeth Miller, also a native of Jefferson County, Ky., and born May 22, 1819. The maternal family of Miller was of German extraction, and the parents of Mrs. Kelley were born in North Carolina. The young couple's honeymoon was spent in a way which hardly would appeal to the sentimental side of human nature today, but which seemed in strict accord with the ambitions of the youth of that time. Disposing of his Kentucky interests, Mr. Kelley packed his belongings in a strong wagon, and with his faithful wife to encourage him upon the long journey, drove overland with a team of horses to Illinois, and took up Government land in Martinsville Township. This was in the summer of 1846, and the original deed to this property, which was 160 acres in extent, which deed is made of sheepskin, and signed by President Tyler, is still owned by the pioneer's son, John Wesley. Mr. Wesley and his wife found a heavily timbered tract, and they were obliged to camp in their wagon until a clearing could be made and a cabin erected. They endured many hardships, but there was plenty of game to insure them against hunger, deer and wild turkeys abounding in large numbers. On the present site of the fine cattle barn Mr. Kelley once had twelve tame deer, which were a source of great pleasure and amusement to the lonely settlers. Until his death, June 2, 1866, Mr. Kelly faithfully tilled his land, equipping it with the best improvements known to the agriculturists of his time, and prospered financially and otherwise. He was not a politician, and never aspired to or was willing to accept official recognition. Of his family of eleven children, seven of whom were sons, three died in infancy, four sons and three daughters being at present residents of Clark County.

All of his sons inherit the industry of the elder Kelley, and one of the most enterprising is John Wesley, who joined the family circle five years after his parents arrived in Clark County. He was reared to hard work on the farm to an early share of its many-sided responsibilities, and received a practical education in the district schools. September 5, 1875, he married Mary Alice Cunningham, born in Butler County, Ohio, March 19, 1857, and daughter of William Cunningham, who came to Clark County in the latter 'fifties, and now is a prosperous farmer living six miles southeast of Martinsville. Mr. and Mrs. Kelley are the parents of the following children: Daisy, born June 14, 1876; Preston Lee, born April 8, 1878; Lulu, born January 21, 1880; Opal, born June 12, 1884; and Daily E., born April 1, 1886. Daisy D. is the wife of Fred H. Sinclair, Cashier of the State Bank at Martinsville; Preston Lee married and lives in Oklahoma City; Lulu is the wife of Dr. Wilhoit, of Martinsville; and the other two are at home.

Mr. Kelley has a splendidly improved farm, and one conducted on purely scientific principles. He is a great lover of fine stock, and takes justifiable pride in his stock barns and his high-grade cattle, hogs and horses. He knows how to get pleasure and comfort as well as profit out of his holdings, and surrounds his family with the best known to the country resident of the twentieth century. While first and always a farmer, he finds time to take a lively interest in township matters, and is especially active in Democratic politics, having held the offices of Collector and Supervisor, and being at the time the youngest man ever elected in Clark County to those offices. He has also held the office of School Trustee for more than a quarter of a century and was one of the organizers of the Martinsville State Bank and is at present one of its directors. Mr. Kelley is popular socially, and is identified with the Court of Honor and the Modern Woodmen of America. In religion he is a member of the Christian Church. He is possessed of the push, energy and progressiveness necessary to success in these times of great competition, and his farm is a monument to the untiring devotion and good judgment of two generations of his highly honored family.

KELLEY, Sylvestus M.—Among the prosperous, intelligent, well read and progressive citizens of this section of Clark County, none is more worthy of commendation than Sylvestus M. Kelley, whose comfortable, attractive and valuable homestead of 440 acres is located in Section 23, Parker Township. His place is about six miles northwest of the town, his farm being nearly all cultivated, except one hundred acres of timber land, and provided with large, convenient barns and all the accessories of modern farm life, including a commodious, attractive residence and well kept horses and cows. Such is almost an ideal life of substantial comfort and healthfulness, and one of which the denizen of the city is openly envious.

Mr. Kelley is a native of the county, born October 11, 1856, and is the son of John Kelley and Elizabeth (Miller) Kelley, both of Jefferson County, Ky. His father, who was a farmer, was of Irish descent, born November 20, 1817, while his mother was of Irish and German lineage, her birthday being May 22, 1819. To their marriage May 29, 1842, were born eleven children, of whom seven are living, Sylvestus being next to the youngest. In the October following their union the young couple settled in Clark County, Ill., having made the journey from Kentucky by wagon. Locating three miles north of Martinsville, where he had entered 200 acres of Government land, John Kelley set to work to clear off the timber, build a log house and found a home. In the years to come this was fully accomplished, all his children were born here and he himself died on the old homestead June 2, 1866, a popular and universally honored member of the community. His wife survived him for thirty years, passing away June 17, 1896.

S. M. Kelley was educated in the common schools of Clark County until he was twenty-one years of age, and obtained enough experience of farm work to inspire him with an early dislike for it. For three terms he attended Lee's Academy, in Coles County, Ill., and five years prior to his marriage were passed as a school teacher. On October 19, 1883, he was married to Miss Ida Hammond, a native of Clark County, born January 13, 1861. Her father, F. A. Hammond, was a native of Vermont, born in June, 1831, and died March 29, 1889, while her mother, Patsy T. Connelly, of this county, was born November 27, 1842, and passed away on the 16th of February, 1890. Mr. Hammond came to this locality with his parents in 1837, when a lad of six years, and lived here the balance of his life, by industry and intelligent application becoming a wealthy farmer, and by an honorable life earning universal respect.

After his marriage Mr. Kelley engaged in the hardware trade for seven years at Martinsville, when he sold his business and removed to his present large and valuable homestead, already described. There were four children in the family, viz.: Ada T., born August 30, 1887, and Estella E., born January 5, 1896, who are still living, and two who died in infancy. Mr. Kelley is a Democrat and has served as Supervisor for one term, but politics is not to his liking. He has also been Town Clerk. Fraternally he is a Mason and a member of the Modern Woodmen of America, Lodge 604, of Martinsville. He is a great reader, and is remarkably well posted not only regarding the most modern methods of agriculture, but on the great public questions of the day, both at home and abroad. He is therefore most highly respected both for his general intelligence and his high qualities of morality and charity.

KELLEY, William Michael.—Among the native sons of Clark County who not only are maintaining the pioneer records of their fathers but are establishing precedents for their successors by their greater energy and greater wealth of opportunity, mention is due William Michael Kelley, the owner of 200 acres of land in Martinsville Township, and of a 280-acre tract in Parker Township. Mr. Kelley is a son of John and Elizabeth (Miller) Kelley, and his birth occurred in Clark County in January, 1846, a few months after his parents had come from Kentucky and erected their log cabin in the timber of Martinsville Township.

As the oldest born of his parents, Mr. Kelley was early taught to make himself useful around the home place, and under the wisest of paternal guidance became a methodical and painstaking farmer. He profited by the education afforded in the public schools, and to this preliminary training has added by reading and observation in the leisure of later years. His marriage to Emily M. Robinson occurred May 1, 1881, Mrs. Kelley being a native of Clark County, and born June 10, 1852. She is the daughter of Tennesseans who came early to this county, and who were of English descent. To Mr. and Mrs. Kelley have come the following children: Jennie B., born March 9, 1882; Effie A., born October 23, 1883; John R., born December 8, 1886; and Jefferson, born August 16, 1888.

Mr. Kelley is the proud possessor of one of the best farms in Martinsville Township. At its head is a man who has a genuine liking for his occupation, whose ambitions have never wandered beyond his well kept fences, and who performs cheerfully and with rare far-sightedness the many tasks which crowd upon him between the rising and the setting of the sun. He has a fine rural residence, and well constructed barns and outbuildings, special provision being made for the blooded horses which here attain rare perfection and great monetary value. At the present time he has a valuable young horse which he is training as a pacer. Mr. Kelley is a Democrat in politics, but has held no office save that of School Director. As are all of the members of his family, he is a member of the Christian Church. Mr. Kelley is an honest, straightforward and very intelligent man, keeping pace with current events, and letting no opportunity slip by to enlarge his knowledge concerning the occupation for which he is admirably fitted.

KILBORN, Lawson S.—Both in an editorial capacity and in educational circles Mr. Kilborn has a reputation that is not limited to his home town of Marshall, where, after a busy career with many diversified interests he now limits his attention to the associate editorship of the News of Rantoul. Though not a native of the United States, he is the descendant of early settlers of the colonies and himself was brought across from Canada at the age of only six weeks, so that in all save the mere accident of birth he is a typical son of his own country. His parents, William and Katherine (Powers) Kilborn, were natives, respectively, of Connecticut and Vermont, and for a time after marriage made their home in Kingston, Canada, where Lawson S. was born December 28, 1835. Of a family comprising six sons and three daughters, he was the youngest in order of birth and is now the sole survivor. When eleven years of age he lost his father by death and in the autumn of 1853 he was wholly orphaned by the death of his mother.

While making his home in New York State until seventeen years of age, Lawson S. Kilborn received such advantages as neighboring schools afforded, and in 1852 he began to teach in the country schools of Indiana. For ten years he continued as an instructor in the schools of the same locality, but eventually resigned in order to offer his services to the Union as a soldier. Accepted as a soldier, he was assigned to the Seventy-second Indiana Infantry, which afterward became one of the four regiments comprising the famous Wilder Lightning Brigade. Until the close of the war he remained at the front, meanwhile taking part in notable engagements, including the battle of Chickamauga. On entering the service he was commissioned a second Lieutenant and by gradual promotions, in recognition of gallantry, he rose to the rank of Major of the regiment, in which capacity he was mustered out at Indianapolis in July of 1865. Of recent years he has been identified with the Wilder Brigade Reunion Organization, has maintained a warm interest in the reunions and has officiated as President of the Association.

During the fall of 1865 Major Kilborn removed to Illinois and for a year engaged in farming in Shelby County. However, the call to educational work was stronger than that to agriculture, and he left the farm in order to accept a position as principal of the public schools at Kinmundy, Marion County, Ill., where he remained as teacher for two years. From there he removed to Odin, Marion County, where he engaged in educational work for five years. The year 1874 witnessed his removal to Clark County, where he was engaged as Principal of the Marshall public school for a period of seven years, after which he was Principal for two years at Martinsville, Clark County. The two following years were spent in charge of the schools at Robinson, Crawford County. The schools at Leroy, McLean County, next had the advantage of his supervision for three years, and he also taught at Hudsonville, Crawford County, remaining closely associated with pedagogical work until 1896. Meanwhile he has become widely known as a successful educator, and in 1882 his name was prominently mentioned for the office of State Superintendent of Public Instruction.

The original identification of Major Kilborn with editorial work dates back to 1882, when he bought the Clark County Herald and for seventeen years edited the sheet in association with his son. In 1895 he sold the plant, but the following year again became the owner of the paper, which he published until 1900. From 1900 to 1905 he, in connection with his son, owned and published the Piatt County Pilot, but eventually sold his stock in the company and bought an interest in the Rantoul News, with which now he is editorially connected. As a writer he wields considerable influence. While a staunch Republican in politics, his editorials are impartial, frank, and display a judicial, sagacious mentality. Partisanship is merged into progressive citizenship, and in all that he writes there is noticeable an intense loyalty to the welfare of the town and State. Prominently identified with the Grand Army of the Republic, he acted as Commander of the Post at Marshall for several terms. He is now Adjutant.

In former years he was an active worker in the Christian Church at Marshall, this State, where he still retains his membership. His marriage was solemnized at Linden, Montgomery County, Ind., March 25, 1857, and united him with Miss Samantha Aydelott, daughter of John and Abigail (Powers) Aydelott, farmers of Montgomery County. Born of their union were three daughters and five sons, as follows: Nellie, deceased wife of Claude Husted, of Marshall, who left two sons, of whom J. Walter is foreman of a large printing establishment at Benton Harbor, Mich., and Arthur L., after serving two years in the regular army at Manila, is now a stenographer in the Government Executive Department of the same Philippine city; J. W., a minister of the Christian Church, at Mount Carmel, Ill., who married Stella Buchanan, and has two daughters, Bess and Ethel; O. L., a resident of Marshall; C. H., of Marshall, who married Florence Lyon, and has a son, Wayne; Emma, wife of R. R. Lynn, of Marshall, and mother of two children, Lesley K. and Darius; E. J., of Enid, Okla., who married Bessie Day; and Martin and Sylvia, twins, the former of whom was killed by lightning at the age of nine years, and the latter died in infancy. March 25, 1907, Mr. and Mrs. Kilborn celebrated their golden wedding, and among other trophies of the occasion is a letter and handsome present received from Mr. Kilborn's old commander, General J. T. Wilder, who, in addition to his martial distinction, smelted the first iron ore sent out of the State of Tennessee, where he makes his home in Knoxville.

KNIPE, Henry H.—A fair proportion of the public spirit and enterprise which tends to the present prosperity of Marshall is vested in Henry H. Knipe, extensive dealer in coal and oil lands, well known Republican politician and office holder, and promoter of various local and distant enterprises, including the ownership and operation of telephone systems. Mr. Knipe is of English ancestry, and his birth occurred in Indianola, Vermillion County, Ill., January 1, 1869. His father, Launcelot Knipe, was born in Indianola, May 13, 1838, and by occupation was a miller and lumber dealer. His mother, formerly Emma Ernest, is a native of Paris, Ill., where she was born February 1, 1850. She at present lives with her son, Henry H. Another son, William Knipe, is engaged in the implement business in Marshall.

In youth Henry H. Knipe had the advantages of the public schools, and comparatively early in life developed a capacity for speculative ventures. His tendency and ability in this direction is backed by a level head and practical common sense, also a commendable desire that his work may be of lasting benefit to individuals and communities. As evidenced by his election to the office of Treasurer of Clark County on the Republican ticket, which he held from 1898 to 1902, he has the confidence of the town and county, and he had further served party interests as a member of the Board of Aldermen. Fraternally he is identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the

Wm. Marvin

Knights of Pythias. He finds a religious home in the Methodist Episcopal Church.

November 11, 1902, Mr. Knipe was united in marriage to Mable Graham, daughter of Hon. James W. Graham, of Marshall, and a graduate of the Marshall high school and St. Mary's of the Woods, near Terre Haute, Ind. Mr. and Mrs. Knipe are the parents of James Launce- lot Knipe, born March 31, 1904, and who is named after his two grandfathers. Mr. Knipe has energy and enthusiasm, and is a young man of promise and substantiality.

KNOX, Charles G.—Unlike the majority who were attracted by the possibilities of Clark County during the middle of the last century, Charles G. Knox brought to the country awakening from its pioneer crudity a maturity of judgment and practicability of experience invaluable in promoting the agricultural and moral stamina of the community. Not only had he outlived the vague enthusiasms of youth and settled down to the serious business of farming, but he had the tenacity and perseverance and plain honesty of his Scotch forefathers, one of whom crossed the ocean and settled in Delaware at a very early period in American history. In Maryland were born Charles and Elizabeth (Griffith) Knox, parents of Charles G., and in the same State was born the latter, January 10, 1813, the fourth oldest in a family of ten children. Three years later, in 1816, the father disposed of his interests in Maryland and moved overland with his family to Muskingum County, Ohio, where he built a hut in a timber clearing, and attained to a fair measure of success as a general farmer. His wife dying, he eventually moved to Gallia County, Ohio, and there rounded out a career in which honesty and frugality had been important factors.

The only educational advantage of Charles G. Knox was the little log school house conducted on the subscription plan in the vicinity of his home, and towards which he faithfully if irregularly strode in the face of the biting winter winds that swept over the thinly settled prairies of Muskingum County. In later years he developed a keen appreciation of books and general knowledge, but his own information was largely self-gained, and was interspersed with the practical and homely philosophy of one whose observation had been tempered with humor and close study of human nature. November 14, 1836, he was united in marriage with Sarah A. Wilson, who was born in Zanesville, Ohio, November 2, 1820, a daughter of J. W. and Elizabeth Wilson. Mrs. Knox was educated in the public schools and at McIntyre Academy. For fourteen years after their marriage the couple continued to live in Ohio, and during that time four children were born to them. The winter of 1849 and 1850 was spent in preparation for making a new home in Illinois, and when spring had melted the drifts from the highways and unloosed the icy fetters of the brooks, parents and children started upon their long journey, arriving after many trying experiences in Wabash Township, Clark County, where Mr. Knox took up a tract of land in Section 23. He was not the kind of man to rest content with a mere living, and he soon was able to add to his possessions, until he owned 360 acres in one body. Here he lived and prospered until the end of his long and useful life, his death occurring after a short illness in 1890. Six more children were born in Clark County, making in all ten to perpetuate the name and sterling worth of one of the noblest of the pioneer couples of 1850.

Mr. Knox paid little attention to interests outside of his immediate environment, yet he had at heart the well-being of the community, and was strongly in favor of education, religion and progress of all kinds. He was strongly attached to his wife and children, and found his greatest pleasure and recreation in their society. A tireless worker, and a man of great method and precision, he yet found time always to listen to the troubles and wishes of the small ones around him, and invariably found a solution of the same out of the abundance of his love and sympathy. Of his children, Eliza became the wife of E. Lewis; Ewing is a graduate of McKendree College, has traveled extensively in Europe, and married Lena Corban, a noted artist; John is a graduate of the Indiana Asbury University, single, and now is engaged in farming; Filmore married Carrie Taylor and lives at Seattle, Wash.; Lizzie is the wife of W. H. Lewis and lives on a farm; Leroy is single and lives at Seattle, Wash.; and Nelson married Emma Eversole and resides near the old home. Mrs. Knox, who survives her husband, still lives on the old farm upon which she settled in 1850. Throughout the community she is affectionately known as Grandma Knox, and in the serenity of her eighty-seven years is the repository of the confidences of a host of young people, and of the love of all who enjoy her fine and helpful friendship. To her the Clark County of long ago is an open book, and its many lessons have been well learned and remembered. Time has softened the asperity of many of her early experiences, and the reminiscences with which she delights her friends are full of wholesome humor and undoubted reliability.

LAFFERTY, John Fletcher.—A keen sense of responsibility and thoroughness in the discharge of the many-sided duties which have lined his long avenue of life have given John Fletcher Lafferty permanent place among the men of endurance, courage and large usefulness in Clark County. The master of surveying, engineering, architecture and navigation, a noble bearer of Union arms during the Civil War, for twenty-six years a teacher, most of the time in the common schools in Ohio and Clark County, Ill., for many years the chief promoter of granges in the State of Illinois, and the present Deputy Surveyor of this county, it will be seen that the qualities of energy and industry have not been wanting, or the field of practicability neglected.

Champaign County, Ohio, where he was born March 6, 1828, became the home of the family of Mr. Lafferty at an early period in its history, and within its borders was born his father, Thomas Lafferty, and his mother, Lydia (Wood) Lafferty, was born in Washington County, Ohio, the former in 1801 and the latter in 1810. His grandmother, Mary Wood, with her parents, was captured by British soldiers during the Revolutionary War, and when the long skirts worn by the women of that time interfered with the long march forced upon her, the soldiery cut her skirts off to the knees. Their house was burned and capture made to prevent her father making powder. Thomas Lafferty was a farmer by occupation, and at one time he owned several hundred acres of land, part of which had been taken up from the Government. He came to Clark County in 1847 with his family, settling in Martinsville Township, where he prospered agriculturally and politically, owning a large tract of land and holding various local offices, including that of School Director several terms. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Martinsville, in which town his death occurred in his seventy-fourth year. Lydia died in her ninety-fourth year.

John F. Lafferty was nineteen years old when he came with the family to Clark County in 1847. He was a qualified teacher, and found a waiting opportunity in Johnson Township, of which he was the first to assemble a school. He studied surveying, civil engineering, navigation and architecture in the Springfield High School, in Clark County, Ohio, and has followed surveying ever since. The work has subjected him to danger and exposure, but he has pursued it with interest and enthusiasm as an opportunity for materially promoting the best interests of the community. He followed the changing fortunes of the educator in Johnson and Martinsville Townships for many years, and was one of the best known and most popular of the men whose earnestness and patience have worked at the foundations of the noble man and womanhood of a later generation. He has known the disadvantages of heat blazing upon and biting winds charging across the prairies, of almost impassable roads, long distances to traverse when ill or weary, and the multitudinous annoyances which arise between the daily assembling and dismissal of pupils.

The first marriage of Mr. Lafferty occurred in Ohio, February 1, 1857, and was with Martha J. Nation, a native of Ohio, and who died November 13, 1863. Of this union there were three children: Charles W., Clara and Flora, the last two of whom are deceased. January 10, 1866, Mr. Lafferty married Josephine Curry, who was born in Indiana, March 10, 1849, and who is the mother of six daughters: Martha; Lottie; Alice, deceased; Lilly; Daisy; and Lulu. Mr. Lafferty has been a staunch supporter of the Republican party ever since its organization, to which allegiance, and his peculiar fitness therefor, he is indebted for his present office of Deputy Surveyor of Clark County. For a number of years he was identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. As Deputy State Granger he promoted the best interests of granges all over the State, and in all organized forty-eight granges in Clark, Crawford and Jasper Counties. In the spring of 1864 Mr. Lafferty enlisted in Company E, One Hundred and Thirty-fourth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and served for 160 days in the Civil War. He participated in many important battles, including that of Petersburg, where he was under fire for seventy-nine days. In all of the experiences of his life he has maintained a serenity of mind and definiteness of purpose which bespeak the man of judgment and control, and who never has had to learn that honesty, sympathy, forbearance and patience are among the invaluable assets of worth-while success. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and has contributed generously to this, as to many other worthy organizations in the county.

LANSBERY, John R.—Worthy of perpetuation in the annals of Clark County is the name of this honored citizen, who for years successfully prosecuted the work of a farmer and at the same time aided in the educational and religious upbuilding of his community. When eventually death removed him from the sphere of his activities there were left many friends to testify to his generosity of character and kindness of heart. In the hearts of his descendants his memory is cherished with reverence, while to the one who for years had walked by his side the loss has been an irreparable one. In every community there are a few men whose names stand out prominently as those of leading men and progressive citizens, whose influence accomplishes much for the advancement of local needs and the development of local resources, and such a man was Mr. Lansbery. Ostentation formed no part of his character. Jealousy, revenge and selfishness were entirely foreign to his nature, but the fruits of his life were peace, kindness, courtesy and a gentlemanly demeanor in every relation of life.

A work relating to prominent men of Clark County would be incomplete were no mention made of John R. Lansbery, hence especial interest will attach to the following facts relative to his life. He was born at Madison, Ind., October 6, 1845, and passed away in Johnson Township, Clark County, October 31, 1906. His parents, Anderson and Mary (Carr) Lansbery, were natives respectively of Kentucky and Ireland, and years after their marriage they removed from Indiana to Illinois, settling in Clark County. Meanwhile, at the beginning of the Civil War, their son had enlisted as a volunteer in the Union service, and had been sent to the front with Company H, Eighth Indiana Infantry, in which he remained until the close of the war. After having been honorably discharged at Louisville, Ky., he came to Illinois and joined his parents in Clark County, where he aided in the cultivation of the home farm.

The marriage of Mr. Lanesbery and Mary Elizabeth Spencer was solemnized February 24, 1867, the bride being a daughter of Ishmael and Mary (Shadley) Spencer, honored residents of Clark County. After their marriage they remained with his parents for two years and then removed to a house of their own on the same farm. From that time until his death, with the exception of one year, he remained in that place, continuing to superintend his estate of 200 acres. Before his death the land was leased to the oil company, but at this writing it is in the hands of the estate and will be a valuable property on account of its oil products.

In the family of Mr. and Mrs. Lansbery there were nine children. The eldest, James A., was born December 28, 1867, and is now engaged in farming in Cumberland County, Ill. By his marriage to Sarah Whitton he had ten children, of whom five are living—Levi, Claude, Adaline, Russell and Fern. The eldest daughter, Mary A., born August 7, 1869, resides in Johnson Township, Clark County, where her husband, William Gross, engages in farming. They are the parents of three children, all living, viz.: Carrie, Derrell and Dessie. The third child, Lizzie F., born October 27, 1871, married Edward Gross and lives on a farm in Johnson Township; they have had eight children, but only four are living, Frederick, Blanche, Myrtle and Nicholas. The fourth member of the family circle was Neva A., born January 17, 1874, and deceased April 14, 1894. The fifth in order of birth was Mark O., who was born December 14, 1875, and at his death, March 15, 1902, left a widow and one child, Edith. The sixth of the children, John O., was born July 13, 1879, and died March 8, 1904. The seventh was Willis V., born October 6, 1880, and married to Jennie Woods, by whom he has two children, Esta and George; he and his family reside on the home farm. The eighth child, Frank, was born February 26, 1882, and lives on the old homestead; by his marriage to Dora Strohl he had one son, Dean. The youngest of the nine children, William P., was born November 13, 1833, and now is engaged in business in Casey.

Although steadfastly refusing to accept any political position, Mr. Lansbery took a warm interest in public affairs and voted the Republican ticket at general elections. In religious identification he was connected with the United Brethren Church. For years he was one of the leading and popular members of Hazeldell Post, G. A. R., in the activities of which he maintained a constant interest, enjoying with unusual zest the reunions of the veterans of that historic struggle between the North and the South. At different times he consented to serve as School Director, and his labors were materially helpful in the promotion of the welfare of the schools of his district. For some time he was a member of the Republican State Central Committee, in which responsible work he ably represented his section of the State. Widely read and well informed concerning all topics of general interest, his opinion was accepted as valuable in matters relating to the general welfare. As a writer he was clear, concise and accurate, and his ability in that line was tested for many years by his service as correspondent for the "Clark County Herald" and the "Banner-Times," of Casey.

LEE, Nathaniel B.—Nathaniel B. Lee, the well known horse-breeder and stock-raiser of Casey, was born in Parker Township, Clark County, on the 4th of April, 1856, and is the son of Andrew and Lydia (Brisco) Lee. A biography of his father, who was born in Crawford County, Ill., June 28, 1822, is published elsewhere in this volume, with a record of his good wife, a native of Jefferson County, Ken., born on the 28th of April, of that year. Both parents and his paternal grandparents were among the best known people of Clark County, and merit the large space which they have received in its annals.

Mr. Lee received only a common school education, but was thoroughly trained to farm work and when little more than a boy was considered a very good judge of horses. He was always a lover of the animal, which is one of the first requisites of a good judge, and as his father was chiefly a stock-raiser he had the best of opportunities for cultivating his natural aptitude. Later in life he became extensively engaged in this line himself, buying many horses for export to London, Glasgow and Paris, and selling to every stock market of importance in the United States.

In 1878 Mr. Lee was taken with the western fever, and getting together an outfit drove by team to Leadville, Col., a distance of 1,100 miles, making the trip in sixty days. After his arrival he engaged in the stock business for about two years, and then returned to Clark County. His father having removed to Casey, he occupied the home farm, and after he had operated it for some four years went to Virginia, secured two standard stallions and, bringing them to that town, started his present business there. He is now one of the most successful horse men in this section of the county. His business has made him a familiar figure throughout the county and he is known at nearly every stock market in the United States. Although a Democratic voter, he has never accepted office, or had the time to devote to politics.

N. B. Lee was married April 25, 1891, to Miss Joe Carr, a native of Indiana born January 15, 1860, and daughter of C. A. Carr, a sketch of whose life will be found on another page of this work. They have two children—Wirt Lee, born May 1, 1892, and Joe Carr Lee, born May 1, 1892.

LEE, William G.—Much is found in the career of William G. Lee to inspire to worth while effort the youth who early in life is thrown upon his own responsibilities. On both sides of his family Mr. Lee represents old-time settlers of Illinois, who were agriculturists by occupation, and have contributed to the development of several of its counties. His father, S—— Lee, was born in Crawford County, and his mother, Cynthia (Goble) Lee, was a native of Coles County. The family came early to Clark County, where William G. was born July 4, 1853.

The early advantages of William G. Lee were the district schools, and those usual literary and social efforts which contribute to the diversion and life of country communities. He was trained in the belief that if he wanted anything he would have to get out and work for it. In early life he married Lydia Redman, a native of Parkes Township, this county, and daughter of Hilton and Hester (Briscoe) Redman. Of this union there are three children: Herman; Eli Golden, born July 14, 1884; and M——— L———, born in August, 1900. Eventually Mr. Lee became the owner of his present farm of eighty acres in Parker township, Section 32, which is one of the best improved and most fertile properties in the county. The thrift and good management of the owner are apparent to all who are privileged to enjoy his hospitality, and from its fertile acres he has amassed a comfortable competence and the most favored of surroundings.

Mr. Lee subscribed to the principles of the Republican party, and in return for many years of political activity was nominated for Sheriff of Clark County August 4, 1900, but was defeated by a small majority. He is the friend of education and progress, and is a devout member of and long contributor to the Baptist Church at Westfield. He is personally held in high esteem, and is accounted one of the honorable and high-minded gentlemen of the community.

LEWIS, John W.—For seventy-two years the Lewis family has taken part in the industries and shared in the stimulating life of Clark County. Agriculture, merchandising, politics and general interests have found in it intelligent and progressive support, and its efforts, individually and collectively, invariably have tended to the greater mental, moral and material growth of the community. We know of no more consistent development than is observed in the passing generations of this family. Jonathan Lewis, who was born in Kentucky, and who settled on Mill Creek in the summer of 1835, seemed an inseparable and necessary part of the surroundings, and the same adaptiveness characterized the career of his son, Joseph E. Lewis, who added to agriculture the occupation of merchandising and occasional political service. Both were men of deep religious convictions, and were noted for their unswerving, blunt integrity. The third generation, represented by John W. Lewis, augments the family standing by qualities and attainments which mark the most desirable and useful class of citizens of the twentieth century. Mr. Lewis in the present is known as the Treasurer of Clark County, as the owner and proprietor of the Marshall House, as the owner of extensive farming interests in the county and residence property in Marshall, and one of the most conservative and dependable municipal factors in the town.

John W. Lewis was born on his father's farm in Wabash Township, January 25, 1860, a son of Joseph E. and grandson of Jonathan Lewis. Mr. Lewis shared the limited educational advantages of the township, the more meager because of the responsibility which early confronted him on the home farm. He worked hard in his youth, and always with the idea of keeping ahead of his opportunities. In consequence the monotony of his surroundings was broken March 13, 1881, when he became a clerk in a grocery store at Dennison, and the following year he went into the store of his father at McKeen, Clark County. He took readily to merchandising, and September 4, 1883, returned to Dennison and bought the store in which he had served his clerking apprenticeship. He was a resident of Dennison for eleven years, or until his entry into the active arena of Republican politics necessitated the disposal of his business and his location in Marshall, December 3, 1894.

Mr. Lewis was Assessor of Wabash Township during 1885, 1887 and 1893, and for one year served as Deputy County Clerk. He was then elected Sheriff of Clark County in the fall of 1894, and served four years. Rarely has the incumbent of that office fulfilled its duties with more distinguished fairness and all-around satisfaction. At the expiration of his term another political honor awaited him, for he was elected to the Forty-first General Assembly in the fall of 1898, serving two years. His knowledge of the needs of the people, and his able way of presenting these needs rendered him a particularly valuable legislator, and he was appointed to several important committees, including Appropriation, Roads and Bridges, Game, Finance and others. In the spring of 1901 he was elected Mayor of Marshall, and during his two years' tenure of office instituted many improvements in the government of the city, materially lessened the city's expenditures and proved himself a wise, far-sighted and public-spirited official. In the fall of 1906 he was elected Treasurer of Clark County, and still holds that office.

In 1901 Mr. Lewis bought the Marshall House and since has transformed it into a modern and paying hotel. He is a typical hotel man, possessing the qualities which insure success in this difficult and variable business. He is the owner of considerable residence property in Marshall, and maintains large farming interests in Clark County. Fraternally he is identified with the Knights of Pythias, Sons of Veterans and the Red Men. In 1877 he became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, but his family is identified with the Congregational Church of Marshall. He is liberal in his religious views, and his means have gone towards the support of general church and philanthropic work, regardless of creeds or dogmas. No man in the community is more dependable for assistance in matters of this kind.

The marriage of Mr. Lewis and Mayme M. Castell occurred in Marshall, January 20, 1884. Mrs. Lewis was born in Clark County in 1865, and is a daughter of Salathiel and Ann (Lockhard) Casteel, the former a native of Ohio, and the latter born in Coles County, Ill. Grandfather Casteel is enrolled in the history of Clark County as one of its brave and self-sacrificing pioneer ministers of the Methodist Church, coming here from Ohio, of which State he was a very early settler. Mr. and Mrs. Lewis are the parents of four children: Mabel K., born June 7, 1896; Maud L., born February 2, 1900; Marjory J., born July 23, 1903; and John W., Jr., born September 6, 1905. Mr. Lewis is a representative business man, politician and citizen of Marshall, completely identified with all that has to do with its best interests, and an honest worker at all times for its advancement and improvement. The results of his life should satisfy the pride and ambition of any man.

LEWIS, Joseph E.—To have passed through the seven ages of man in a given community, to have profited by its schools, diversions and general opportunities, to have added to its character and material assets by promoting with ability and wisdom some of its practical resources, and at the age of seventy-four years to enjoy the dignity and ease of existence with the bounding pulse of middle age, is the fortunate position of Joseph E. Lewis, a Clark County pioneer of 1835, and at present a retired agriculturist, merchant and real-estate dealer of Wabash Township.

The accident of his birth, which occurred on a farm in Edgar County, Ill., September 23, 1834, alone alienates Mr. Lewis from life allegiance to Clark County. He is the second oldest of the eight children of Jonathan Lewis, who was born in Kentucky in 1808, and who, as a boy, came overland to Crawford County, this State, where he earned his first money as a farm hand. Grown to manhood, Mr. Lewis married Celinda Cobb, a native of Massachusetts, and sister of an eminent member of the Supreme bench of the United States. Soon after he came with his wife to Edgar County, and in 1835, when his son, Joseph E., was less than two years old, joined the few straggling settlers who were taking their chances with fertile but undeveloped Clark County. For many months existence circulated around a small log house on the banks of Mill Creek, where the food consisted largely of game which abounded in the region, and where all the tasks within were performed by a self-sacrificing and heroic pioneer mother. Eventually the land along the creek took on a semblance of cultivation, the house was enlarged and modernized, and the owner found time not only to till his own land and garner his harvests, but to assist with the making of roads and the establishment of public utilities. With an old-fashioned whip-saw he helped prepare the timber for the first county court house. His death occurred in 1854, nineteen years after his arrival in the township, and he was mourned as a just and fair-minded man who had contributed a noble example for others to follow. His wife, who was born in 1814, lived until 1882.

The youth of Joseph E. Lewis was beset with limitations and hardships hardly conceivable to the children of a later generation. But there was health in the out-of-doors of the prairies, exercise for muscles in chopping trees and guiding the nose of a plow through its straight furrow, and good appetite and digestion in the plain and wholesome fare to which the family sat down when the day's work was on the wane. As was the custom among the settlers, he established a home early in life, marrying, November 18, 1855, Eliza Knox, who was born in Ohio January 21, 1838, a daughter of Charles G. Knox, mention of whom may be found elsewhere in this work. For many years after his marriage Mr. Lewis engaged in general farming and stock-raising, perfecting the farm in Wabash Township which has been his home for more than half a century, and which is regarded as one of the notably fine landmarks in the neighborhood. In time he engaged in the mercantile business in McKeen with signal success, increasing his business from small to large proportions, and becoming known as one of the reliable and dependable merchants of the community. Having great faith in the future of the township, he invested a large portion of his earnings in land, and has both bought and sold some of the most desirable holdings in this part of the State. He had the business sense which prompts a man to spend less than he makes, and thus to make ample provision for a time of life when, realizing nothing from a financial standpoint, he yet has sufficient for all his needs.

In political affiliation Mr. Lewis is a Republican, but while never aspiring to elective offices, he was appointed Postmaster of McKeen, Clark County, and served one term. Fraternal-ly he is connected with the Masons. Mr. and Mrs. Lewis are the parents of five children: William E., born January 21, 1857, deceased; Rosa B., born October 6, 1858, deceased; John W., born January 25, 1860, married January 20, 1884; Annie, born December 4, 1861, deceased; and Catherine, born February 16, 1864, wife of J. H. Laufman. Throughout the changing years Mr. Lewis has maintained the simplicity of manner and living made necessary by his early surroundings. He never has overtaxed himself with vain ambitions or allowed aught to disturb the calmness and serenity of his tendencies and disposition. He may best be characterized as a man who has clearly seen his duty, has applied to it the best energy and heart of which he has been capable, and who knowingly has never abused human confidence or lessened by a shade the honor and esteem which has gathered around his well directed life.

LEWIS, Michael S.—Ever since coming to Illinois during the year 1871 Mr. Lewis has engaged in agricultural pursuits in Clark County and has made Casey Township his home. On his neat and well improved farm of sixty-five acres he and his wife have a comfortable and pleasant home, brightened and made joyful by the presence of the two children of their deceased daughter. In common with many farmers of the county, Mr. Lewis has oil interests. Within the oil district he owns twenty acres of timber land and has five wells that are producing. While he has reached an age and a financial standing which renders labor a matter of choice rather than necessity and while he has relinquished the more arduous activities of farming, we find him still heartily interested in everything that pertains to the improvement of the land, while at the same time he keeps in touch with the development of the oil industry.

The Lewis family descends from German ancestry, but long has been identified with American history. Jacob and Eliza (Sowers) Lewis, natives of New Jersey, removed in 1841 to Pennsylvania, where they continued to reside until death. Prior to their removal from New Jersey their son, Micheal S., was born August 14, 1832, and he accompanied them to Pennsylvania, where he grew to manhood upon a farm. The family became scattered and one of his brothers went to Florida, where he engaged in raising cotton and eventually acquired large wealth. Since his retirement from business he has remained in that State. From Pennsylvania Michael S. Lewis removed to Ohio in 1850. In both states he followed the occupation of a canal boatman. During 1860 he sold his canal-boat and turned his attention to farming in Ohio. At the close of the war he sold his farm and removed to the West, traveling through the Pacific coast region and spending some time in Montana.

The first marriage of Mr. Lewis took place in 1853 and united him with Sallie McCullough, of Indiana, who died in April of 1872. Five children had been born of their union, but death bereaved them of all in infancy. February 17, 1873, Mr. Lewis was united with Mrs. Lucy (Boyd) Sherman, the widow of George Sherman, at one time an influential farmer of Clark County. An only child blessed this union, Bernice L., born January 2, 1874. To their only child the parents gave every advantage which their means rendered possible. At the age of sixteen she became the wife of William Kilborne, their marriage occurring September 26, 1890. At her death June 28, 1902, she left two children, who since have been tenderly cared for by their grandparents. Mrs. Lewis was a daughter of Jacob Boyd, who was born in Pennsylvania, of German lineage; her mother, who bore the maiden name of Elizabeth Anderson, likewise traced her ancestry to Germany and was born in Pennsylvania. In the family of Mr. and Mrs. Boyd there were twelve children who attained mature years, namely: Henry, Mary Ann, George, Alcina, Lucy, John, Bishop A., Eliza, Harvey, Jasper N., Sarah and Elizabeth.

During the years of his youth Mr. Lewis was accustomed to hear much concerning the two parties, Democrats and Whigs. The pros and cons of politics were constantly and intelligently discussed. Later different issues evolved other political organizations, but he has remained a staunch Democrat to the present day. Desire for office is entirely foreign to his disposition, for he is more fond of home than of public life, and has never consented to serve in any of the township offices. Yet he is a progressive citizen, willing to aid in any movement for the benefit of the people and his support has always been given to local enterprises of permanent value.

LINN, John.—The genealogy of the Linn family is traced to Ireland, but many generations have been identified with American history and have accomplished much in the upbuilding of our country. In the early history of the United States they were established in the region adjacent to Mason and Dixon's line. Levi, son of Caleb Linn, was born in Maryland in 1809, and was bereft of his father by death while he was yet a small child. Being the eldest of the family, he at once began to aid his mother in rearing and supporting the younger children, and thus were developed in him traits of self-reliance and tireless industry. When the younger members of the family became self-supporting he started out in the world for himself. For some years he lived in Morrow County, Ohio, but in 1864 he removed to Clark County, Ill., and settled on a tract of improved land in Parker Township. During early manhood he married Malinda Truax, who was born in Pennsylvania in 1814 and traced her lineage to an old Quaker family of that State. It was his privilege to live through almost the entire period of the nineteenth century, and his death occurred in Westfield Township at the age of ninety-two years. His wife had died in Parker Township at the age of seventy-one years. From the time of attaining his majority until his death he voted the Democratic ticket and gave his support to its candidates. During the greater part of their lives he and his wife held membership in the Predestinarian Baptist Church. Widely known among the pioneers of Clark County, they were universally honored for the possession of those sterling traits that mark progressive citizens.

In the family of Levi Linn there were seven children, of whom three daughters and two sons are living. Among these John, whose name introduces this sketch, was fifth in order of birth, and was born on a farm in Morrow County, Ohio, October 11, 1844. Primarily educated in the country schools of his native county, he finished his schooling at Martinsville, Ill., whither he removed with his parents at the age of twenty years. Shortly after his arrival in Clark County he secured employment as a school teacher and for thirty years he continued in the same work, meanwhile winning a reputation as one of the most thorough and successful teachers in the entire county. Alike by pupils and patrons he was honored and esteemed, and when finally he retired from educational work he was followed into retirement by many tributes of respect on the part of those who received the benefit of his fine methods of instruction and intellectual training. Meanwhile he had been as successful in farming as in teaching and had managed with signal ability a neat estate in Parker Township, from which he removed to Martinsville in 1900, and since then he has made his home in town.

On the last day of the year 1866 Mr. Linn was united in marriage with Nancy Jane Shawver, daughter of Milton and Mary Emaline (McDaniel) Shawver. Her father was born in Fayette County, Va., December 14, 1826, being the eldest son of William Shawver, whose father, George, was a native of Virginia. Upon the death of William Shawver, which occurred during the early boyhood of his son Milton, the latter began to make his own way in the world, and about 1842 he accompanied an uncle, Alexander Shawver, to Hendricks County, Ind. During the fall of 1854 he came to Illinois and settled in Clark County, where ever since he has made his home. While living in Indiana, during 1847, he married Mary Emaline McDaniel, who was born in North Carolina, but in childhood accompanied her parents to Morgan County, Ind. Her death occurred in 1896, when she was sixty-six years of age. Mrs. Linn was born in Hendricks County, Ind., August 2, 1849, and was one of ten children, four of whom are deceased. When about five years of age she accompanied her parents to Clark County, where she received a common-school education. Of her marriage nine children are living, six of whom are married. In order of birth they are named as follows: Cora B., Walter Benton, Ma-linda Myrtle, Mary Jane, Ada O., John Milton, Bessie Opal, Levi O. and Nella A. Three children, Rosa, William and Mattie, are deceased.

Actively associated with local councils of the Democratic party, Mr. Linn has held a number of minor offices and in earlier life was one of the party leaders in his township. A stroke of paralysis, from the effects of which he still suffers, caused him to resign from the office of Police Magistrate at Martinsville, which he was filling at the time of his sickness. Besides teaching for many years he has otherwise been identified with educational affairs, including his service as School Treasurer of Parker Township, and, more recently, his service as President of the Town Board of Education at Martinsville. For many years he and his wife have been sincere members of the Christian Church and generous contributors to its missionary enterprises. In 1877 he was initiated into Masonry and now is a Master Mason. Few men have to a higher degree commanded the confidence and esteem of associates that has Mr. Linn, whose name is a synonym for integrity and honor, and whose personality is of that substantial and stable character so important in the citizenship of any community. Mr. Linn owns nine producing oil wells on his land in Parker Township.

LINN, Walter Benton.—Representing the second generation of one of Clark County's prominent pioneer families is Walter Benton Linn, who was born in Parker Township, this county, May 10, 1872, being a son of John and Nancy Linn. To the knowledge acquired in the country schools of his home township he added by a thorough course of study in the Central Normal at Danville, Ind., from which he was graduated in 1893 with an excellent record as a student. At the age of eighteen years he had commenced to teach school and for five years he engaged in that work, but afterward embarked in the clothing business in Martinsville under the firm title of Linn & Hammond. At the expiration of two and one-half years he sold out and later acted as Assistant Cashier of the First National Bank, in which he was a stockholder. This position he resigned in 1904 in order to take charge of the western business of J. Crouch & Son, of Lafayette. In addition to the supervision of the interests of this firm he finds leisure for the management of his farm in Clark County, where he maintains twenty-five head of standard-bred mares. His financial associations are further enlarged by his interests in oil. Politically, he votes with the Democratic party, and fraternally he is a Master Mason and a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In 1895 he was united in marriage with Miss Estella Hammond, and lived the first year after his marriage on a farm in Parker Township, and since then they have made their home in Martinsville.

LOCKARD, James P.—The late James P. Lockard, for many years identified with merchandising in Marshall, was a man of strong but unassuming character, the best part of whose nature was only fully appreciated by those closest to him. There is no more vigorous test of character than this—to be scrutinized by those who have an insight into the secret chambers of the soul—wife, husband, father, mother, children and other kindred of the blood. Under this test Mr. Lockard emerged strong and triumphant, a credit to himself and his good Scotch-Irish ancestry.

The deceased was born near Livingston, Clark County, Ill., on the 1st of July, 1843, the son of William H. and Diodame (Ramsey) Lockard. The boy had only the advantages of district schools, working industriously on his father's farm and obtaining as much of an education as possible, considering the time at his disposal and the facilities at his command. His attendance at the country schools was supplemented by a course of a few years in the public institutions of Marshall, and at the age of eighteen he joined the Seventieth Illinois Regiment, Volunteer Infantry, under the call for three months' service issued by the Government in 1862. He served his short term of enlistment and greatly desired to return to the service after his honorable discharge, but at the earnest solicitation of his parents he refrained from doing so. After his return from the front he taught school for about four years, but with these exceptions his life avocations of farming and merchandising were virtually never interrupted.

On the 2d of November, 1865, James P. Lockard was united in marriage with Miss Emma C. Stephens, the ceremony being performed by the Rev. Dean Andrews, in Clark County, which was the birthplace of the bride. Their marriage was a noticeably happy one, and two children added to this harmony—a son, who died in infancy, and Ada A., now the wife of Mr. R. B. Miller, of Marshall, who herself is the mother of Mary E.

The young couple first settled on the old Elam farm, which Mr. Lockard rented for about eight and a half years, when he bought the Stephens place of 100 acres in Wabash Township, removing thence to Terre Haute, Ind., where for two years he engaged in the grocery business. The Kimball place on Dolson Prairie was his next home, and here, Mrs. Lockard says, they spent three of the happiest years of their lives, her husband being profitably engaged in general farming and the raising and dealing in fine cattle. Selling this farm, they moved to about a mile south of Marshall, and the former property of Montgomery Archer, comprising 193 acres of fine land, remained the family homestead for five years and is still in the possession of the widow. In 1887 the family came to Marshall and Mr. Lockard engaged in the agricultural implement business with Edward Howell, this partnership continuing for about two years, when the latter became sole proprietor and Mr. Lockard purchased the establishment of J. R. Archer, on Main Street, and continued there until his death. In addition to his agricultural business he was quite extensively engaged in the buying and shipping of cattle, and was in this line also at the time of his death. He also dealt in farms and city property and owned several business houses, the widow still being in possession of the building occupied by J. D. Shoemaker, the dry goods merchant.

The cause of Mr. Lockard's death was a rupture which he received in May, 1895, caused by one of the axles of a surrey which he was unloading striking him in the stomach. During the later months of his life the deceased was a member of the Christian Church, and, throughout his life, his kindness, charity and helpfulness in all good works evinced the true spirit of Christianity. In his fraternal relations he was a Royal Arch Mason and a member of the G. A. R. He was a Republican, but cared nothing for office, else his popularity, ability and trustworthiness might have given him prominence in politics.

Mrs. James P. Lockard (nee Emma C. Stephens) is a daughter of Elijah and Ann (Smith) Stephens, the father a native of Kentucky and the mother of Iowa, their marriage occurring in the latter State. They had a family of five children. Mr. Stephens was a farmer and a tanner, being the owner of a tract of 400 acres in Wabash Township, Clark County, at the time of his death, March 12, 1873. He was a Republican and an earnest member of the Congregational Church. Mrs. Lockard's mother died when Emma was only three years of age, and Mr. Stephens married for his second wife Deborah Norris, who passed away about 1887. Mrs. Lockard is a faithful member of the Methodist Church and stands high in her community.

LUSK, William.—Prosperity has come to William Lusk through the medium of a liquor business which he has conducted in Casey since 1891. Mr. Lusk was born May 6, 1868, in Lancaster, Garrard County, Ky., where also were born his parents, William and Mary (Bryant) Lusk. From Lancaster the family moved to Greencastle, Warren County, Ky., and from there to Casey in the fall of 1870.

Since his second year Mr. Lusk has lived in Casey, and he was educated in its public schools. He married early in life, Nancy Jane Huddleston, born in Jasper County, Ill., in 1864, a daughter of William and Lucy J. Huddleston, natives of Virginia. Of this union there are four sons and two daughters: Leonard, Charles, Roy, Samuel, Maria and Mildred. Mr. Lusk has the thrifty qualities of his German forefathers, and he takes a keen interest in the social and general development of his adopted town. He is a Republican in politics, but entertains no political aspirations. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Lodge No. 747, and the Masons, Lodge No. 442.

McDANIEL, William K.—For the maintenance of its present commercial stability Martinsville is peculiarly indebted to its intelligent and forceful younger generation, among whom none enjoys greater confidence than does William K. McDaniel. This popular merchant, who, since July 28, 1899, has contributed to the public need along the line of clothing, shoes and general furnishings, represents the third generation of his family in Clark County, of which he is a native son, born on a farm two and a half miles west of Martinsville, in the township of Casey, August 1, 1874.

Mr. McDaniel comes of a substantial family of Morgan County, Ind., where his father, Eli H. McDaniel, was born, and from where he came with the paternal grandfather to Clark County in the early 'fifties. Eli McDaniel subsequently returned to Indiana, where he still lives, and at the age of ten his son, William K., went to live with his maternal grandfather, William Kimlin. He was educated in the public schools of Martinsville and vicinity, and at the Terre Haute Commercial College, where he laid the foundation of his present business success. Since establishing his present business he has more than realized his expectations, for in the meantime he has started another store in Neoga, Cumberland County, this State, which seems destined for a long and useful career.

March 20, 1895, Mr. McDaniel married Pearl White, and of the union there are four children: Claude, Mary, Roy and Paul. Mr. McDaniel has been active in local Republican politics for many years, and in addition to other offices, has served as Supervisor and President of the Village Board of Martinsville on the anti-license ticket. He is prominent and active fraternally, and is a member of the lodge of Master Masons, Modern Woodmen of America and the Woodmen of the World. Mr. McDaniel has the push, energy, good judgment and business resource which insures success, aided by a pleasing and confidence inspiring personality and keen interest in the best interests of the community.

McNARY, Ebenezer.—The Martinsville Telephone Exchange is one of the town's most satisfactory adjuncts. Particularly has its scope enlarged and its methods improved since its purchase in 1900 by Ebenezer McNary, for many years a prominent business man of Clark County. The exchange at present operates 800 telephones, and gives employment to a large force of assistants. Patrons are gratified with the consideration and courtesy received at the other end of the lines, and the facility with which repairs are made, and difficulties adjusted.

Mr. McNary was born in Putnam County, Ind., August 24, 1855, and is a son of Ebenezer and Mary Elizabeth (Fry) McNary. Ebenezer, Sr., was a farmer and miller, and for many years operated a saw mill and a farm in Indiana. He left the Hoosier State in 1841 and settled in Clark County, but returned again to his native State, and became a permanent resident of Illinois in 1856. His death occurred in Coles County, Ill., at about the age of fifty-one. Seven of his thirteen children are living. Subsequently his wife married a Mr. Stafford, and in her ninety-third year is quite an active member of the community of Horton, this State.

In his youth Ebenezer, Jr., worked at farming and saw-milling, but abandoned these occupations to learn the tinner's trade. For thirteen years he was connected with the firm of Byron, McNary & Company, and after selling out his interest engaged in another business for a short time. For a few months he was connected with Mr. Robinson in the hardware business, but burned out with considerable loss, and his next venture was the telephone exchange with which he now is identified. Mr. McNary married, in 1884, Cornelia Cline, and of the union there are three children. He is socially inclined and popular in the lodge of the Modern Woodmen of America. For years he has been active in local Democratic undertakings, but never has been willing to accept official honors. Mr. McNary started in life a poor man, and that he today ranks among the substantial citizens of the community is due solely to his ability to recognize and use the opportunities by which he has been surrounded. He is honest and fair minded, and as the owner and manager of one of the community's greatest accommodations, has materially added to the confidence and esteem in which he is held.

McNARY, Herschel V.—The son of the honored and prominent physician, pioneer and public-spirited citizen, Dr. William H. McNary, and his first wife (Lydia A.), Herschel V. McNary is a native of Martinsville, where he was born March 21, 1861. There he has virtually passed his life, his acts have been open to all, and in the face of such a test he has established a substantial reputation as a merchant, a citizen, a public official and a well-rounded member of the community. After laying the groundwork of his education in the local schools, he prepared for a business career by taking a course in the Commercial College at Terre Haute, Ind. He was then in the employ of Mr. De Lashmutt for a year, engaged in farming for a time, and for the succeeding three years and a half held the postmastership of Martinsville, under President Cleveland, serving to the mutual satisfaction of the department and the public.

Following his term as Postmaster, Mr. McNary formed a partnership with T. L. Clemons in the hardware business, and from 1890 to 1893 was a member of the firm of Clemons & McNary, of Robinson. The latter business was closed out by sale, and in 1893 he opened his present flourishing and growing establishment, which embraces a trade in buggies, stoves and general hardware. Mr. McNary also owns a farm of 320 acres in Clark County and is what may be called "well fixed" in this world's goods. In addition to the good record which he made as Postmaster, his standing in the community is illustrated by such facts as that he has held the Presidency of the Town Board and is School Treasurer of Martinsville Township. As previously intimated, he is a stanch Democrat. In fraternal matters he is in affiliation with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Modern Woodmen of America, and his religious faith is of the Baptist denomination.

Herschel V. McNary has been twice married, his first union being with Mary J. Randall, September 23, 1884. By the death of his first wife December 26, 1890, he was left with a little daughter, Lydia V. On December 21, 1892, Clara Jaco became his present wife, and by her he has become the father of Mary Helen.

McNARY, William Henry, M. D. (deceased).—Although a faithful, brave physician of the old school, the late Dr. William H. McNary was a pioneer of the Western plains and the California coast, as well as one of the revered founders of Martinsville, Clark County, Ill. A man of warm blood and stirring nature, inspiring and helpful to others, and practical and successful in his own private affairs, he was blessed with a long span of life in which to develop his high and broad character and bring to useful fruition the many useful and elevating projects of his career.

Dr. McNary was born in Mason County, Ky., July 14, 1821, and died at Martinsville on the 28th of May, 1898. His father, John McNary, moved from his native State to Indiana at a very early day, and about 1840 came to Clark County, Ill., where he died at the patriarchal age of ninety-three years. William H. was the youngest in a family of ten children, and had nearly attained his majority when his father became a resident of Illinois. His boyhood days had been passed in Putnam County, Ind., where he was trained to hardihood on the farm in the country schools, afterward pursuing a higher course at De Pauw College, Greencastle, that State. He did not complete his collegiate studies, but was sufficiently advanced to make a most creditable record as a teacher when he removed to Clark County. As his brother, Dr. Samuel McNary, was a practicing physician, he soon became deeply interested in the subject of medicine, and interest led to the decided and energetic action which was so characteristic of the man. His first professional studies were under the tutelage of his brother, and they were supplemented by an attendance at Rush Medical College, Chicago. The years from 1850 to 1853 were passed in the flood of California gold seekers, his outward trip being across the plains by ox-team as one of that interminable caravan which crept toward the golden West in 1849-50. The young physician was six months in making the overland journey. Upon his arrival at the coast he feverishly prospected for gold, but fortunately for his finances and peace of mind he had a profession which "panned out" better than his mining ventures. This was the commencement of his active practice, and, upon his return to Martinsville, by sea and isthmus, he continued his professional work with immediate success.

Dr. McNary's continuous and invaluable connection with Martinsville and Clark County began in 1853, his practice in the years to come extended over a wide area, and his strong personality gladdened thousands of sick rooms and materially assisted the beneficial results of his medicines. He combined farming with his labors as a country doctor, and in the course of time owned several pieces of agricultural property, which he operated to advantage.

Mr. and Mrs. T. W. Phillips

He was an active promoter of the old Vandalla Railroad, and was enterprising and progressive in all projects which he judged promised well for Martinsville and the county. As illustrative of the broad life of the deceased it may here be mentioned that before he became a California argonaut he had enlisted for service in the Mexican War, but that hostilities had ceased before his command reached the seat of the conflict.

Dr. William H. McNary was a member of the State Medical Society and the American Medical Association and was a man of substantial standing both in his profession and in the practical affairs of the community. He was a staunch Democrat and served creditably in the State Senate, Thirty-fourth General Assembly.

The deceased was twice married, his first wife, Lydia Milligan, bearing him three children, as follows: Byron, Herschel V. and Clement, the last named dying in childhood. This wife and mother died in 1863, and the Doctor married as his second wife Mary V. Steel, by whom he had two children, one of whom died at the age of three or four years, and Robert P. McNary. Mrs. Mary McNary, the second wife, died in 1906, at the age of sixty years.

Byron McNary, the oldest child by the first marriage, was born in Martinsville, Clark County, Ill., on November 15, 1859, and was reared and educated in his home town. In 1885 he engaged in the hardware business, being the member of a partnership concern, but in 1888 became sole proprietor, and has since successfully conducted its affairs. Mr. McNary is not only at the head of a good business, but is the owner of considerable real estate. In politics he is a Democrat, and well upholds the name of his worthy father. In 1880 he was married to Sallie Randall, who died in 1899, leaving one child, William H. Mr. McNary's present wife, whom he married in 1903, was formerly Celestie E. Newman. He is quite prominent in Masonic circles, having reached the thirty-second degree and being a Mystic Shriner.

MADDEN, Thomas.—Marshall Township has an earnest and practical farmer in Thomas Madden, who follows his calling on a well tilled farm of eighty acres. This native son of Clark County was born in Douglas Township, January 4, 1874, and is the fifth oldest of the four sons and two daughters of Thomas and Mary (Walsh) Madden, the former of whom was born in Ireland in 1832, and the latter in Martinsville, Clark County, Ill., in 1841.

Finding little in his native land to conform to his ambition, Thomas Martin, Sr., came at an early age to America, and soon after bought forty acres of wild land in Douglas Township, which he cleared and cultivated and added to until he owned 240 acres. He had energy and industry and good common sense, and became an important factor in the political and general life of the community. He served as Supervisor for several terms, was a staunch supporter of the Catholic Church, and promoted the cause of education by giving his children the best advantages the township afforded. In politics he was a Democrat.

MADDEN, Thomas, Jr.—Thomas Madden, Jr., remained under the parental roof until his marriage, in 1897, to Mollie McManus, daughter of Walter and Sarah (Wilson) McManus, old settlers and large land owners of Clark County. In the Madden household are two daughters, of whom Julia was born in 1899, and Gertrude in 1902. After his marriage Mr. Madden rented the Dick Reynolds farm of eighty acres, but at the end of a year moved elsewhere, and in 1900 settled on his present farm. All of his land is under cultivation, and he raises stock and the general produce of the Central West. He is a generous provider and kind husband and father, and his neighbors are his friends and well wishers. In politics and religion he sustains the family precedent, being a Democrat and a Catholic.

MARTIN, Benson.—The career of Benson Martin has contributed to the wellbeing of the town of Marshall for almost half a century, and within its borders he has grown from child to manhood, has enlisted and gone forth to the Civil War, and besides other public services has held the office of Justice of the Peace for the past thirty years.

Born in Ashland County, Ohio, January 28, 1838, Mr. Martin is a son of James and Barbara (Sigfoos) Martin, natives of Pennsylvania, and early settlers of Ohio. The elder Martin was a tailor by trade, which he followed in his native State, Ohio, and Illinois, arriving in the latter in 1840, when his son Benson was two years old, and settling in Clark County, where his death occurred in 1876. Mr. Martin was an old-time Whig, and later a Republican, and he was for years a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In his family were thirteen children, two of whom died in infancy. All of the children were given common school educations, and the majority graduated from the Marshall high school. Benson, the twelfth in order of birth, had an uneventful youth, and remained under the family roof until his marriage, November 19, 1857, to Sarah G. Donaldson, daughter of John and Nancy (Burnham) Donaldson. Mrs. Martin was born in Vincennes, Ind., and reared in Clark County, of which her parents were early settlers. Mr. and Mrs. Martin are the parents of seven children: Lillian, deceased; William; Foster; Charles; Nanny; Wilton; and Harry.

In 1862 Mr. Martin enlisted in Company K, One Hundred and Thirtieth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, for three years, and during that time was in active service many times, including the siege of Vicksburg. At the battle of Louisiana, April 8, 1864, he was captured by the enemy, taken to Camp Ford, in Texas, and confined there for the balance of the war. Returning to Marshall, he engaged for a couple of years in the grocery business, then sold out and began clerking for his brother, who owned a hardware store. In 1875 he withdrew from this connection, and in 1876 was elected Justice of the Peace, a position which he since has held with credit. He is a Republican in politics, and has done much to promote good government and clean office holding. He is not connected with any church, but is a man of high moral standards and noble ideals of citizenship. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and he is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic of Marshall.

MARVIN, Cary.—Cary Marvin was born on Walnut Prairie in 1843. In 1868 he was married to Hannah Rariden, and five children, three girls and two boys, were the result of this union. Only three of these children, one boy and two girls, survive. The boy is now in Oklahoma and employed by the Rock Island Railroad Company.

Cary Marvin enlisted in 1862, in the three months' service, in the Seventieth Illinois Infantry. He was also a member of the Seventy-ninth Illinois Infantry, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Franklin, Tenn., and taken to Andersonville Prison, where he lingered and suffered for five months. He was also in the great battle of Chickamauga, the most destructive, that is to say, the percentage of killed, wounded and missing was greater in this battle than of any battle of modern history, with the exception of Borodino, there being twenty-nine per cent. killed, wounded and missing at the battle of Chickamauga. Our subject was mustered out at Springfield, Ill., June 30, 1865. He is a member of the Friends Church, a Free Mason and now is a retired farmer living at West Union.

The father of our subject was Abraham Marvin, and moved into York Township when a mere boy. Both parents of our subject died in his early youth, when he was bound out to be raised by friends, and had to fight his own battles in life and make of himself the upright citizen and honored man that he now is. To be exact, he was married on the 24th day of December, 1868. The family of our subject on the mother's side was the McGriff family, who moved into this county in 1818. The grandmother of our subject, Mrs. McGriff, lived on the original homestead until 1875, for a term of over fifty years. Cary Marvin was the first man to plant a flag on Missionary Ridge, and this blood-stained flag is now in the State Capitol at Springfield, Ill. He entered the army a private and came out a First Lieutenant. There are no better men in York Township or Clark County than Cary Marvin.

MARVIN, John.—The name of Marvin is one of the oldest and most honored in Clark County. Its association with this part of Illinois dates from 1820, when arrived in the boundless wilds Barnabas Marvin, who had driven across country from Vincennes, Ind., his home since 1816. This courageous pathfinder was born in New York State, and the long and perilous journey to Indiana, with its interruptions, adventures, physical and mental suffering and uncertain outcome, was a feat the details of which he never tired of recalling. Barnabas Marvin bought a farm of old Colonel Archer, that boundlessly courageous adventurer who gave vent to his civic tendencies by laying out and starting upon its municipal way the town of Marshall. Mr. Marvin subsequently added to his original purchase, and became one of the wealthy, substantial farmers of Walnut Prairie. He lived to see homes, barns, fences and tilled fields succeed the endless stretches of useless land, yet much remained to be done for the comfort of the settlers at the time of his death, May 17, 1838. His devoted wife, Rachel (Butterfield) Marvin, was born and reared in Vermont, and became the mother of four sons and three daughters: Adaline, born November 17, 1821; Eli, born July 31, 1824; Albert, born September 25, 1826; Eliza A., born November 2, 1828; Eleanor, born November 20, 1830; William, born July 2, 1833; and John, born November 20, 1837. Mrs. Marvin died April 8, 1860.

John Marvin, the youngest of his father's family, and who for thirty-three years has engaged in the milling business in Marshall, was reared on the Walnut Prairie farm, and his youth knew the burden of responsibility and hard physical exertion. Such education as came his way was acquired during the leisure of the winter season, when it was possible to complete his tasks by rising at daybreak and working until nightfall. He married, on the old farm, March 20, 1862, Marie Hall, daughter of Franklin Hall, a merchant of Darwin, Ill., and who was born in Clark County, December 23, 1843. In 1866 the young couple moved to Darwin and Mr. Marvin sold general merchandise for his father-in-law until 1874, in which year he located in Marshall and established his present milling business. During all of these years he probably has done more to encourage grain raising among the farmers of the county than any one other man in the town of Marshall. He has bought and ground and sold thousands of bushels, and is known to every farmer almost within the boundaries of Clark County.

In addition to his large town interests, Mr. Marvin owns four hundred acres of the old home farm on Walnut Prairie. He is a staunch though not active Republican, and a member of the Masons of Marshall, having joined that fraternity at Darwin in 1867. To himself and wife have been born four children, one of whom died in infancy. Those living are as follows: Lily, born February 22, 1865; Jennie, wife of W. A. Vaughan, of Greencastle, Ind., born June 17, 1867; Emma, born November 11, 1875. Mr.

Marvin is esteemed for his many admirable traits of character, and for his temperate, wholesome and honorable life.

MARVIN, William.—William Marvin is a farmer, and his postoffice address is Walnut Prairie, Clark County, Ill. He was born July 2, 1833, in York Township, Clark County, Ill. He is a son of Barnabas Marvin, who was born December 23, 1795, in the State of New York. Barnabas Marvin was married March 5, 1820, on LaMotte Prairie, near Palestine, Crawford County, Ill., to Rachael Butterfield, who was born July 5, 1792, in Vermont, and who died April 8, 1860, at the home of our subject. She was the mother of seven children, of whom only William and his brother John, a prominent miller of Marshall, Ill., are now living. The father of the subject of our sketch was a soldier of the War of 1812, and took part in the battle of Fort Meigs. He died May 17, 1838, in York Township. William Marvin was educated in Clark County, and was married on February 12, 1861, to Susan C. Jordon, who was born May 15, 1839, in the State of Virginia, and died June 8, 1861, in Clark County. William Marvin was joined in marriage a second time September 17, 1865, to Miss Lucetta Johnson, who was born May 18, 1845, and who was a daughter of William and Mary Johnson. By his second wife Mr. Marvin has had four children: Julia F., born September 12, 1866; Flora A., born March 24, 1869; Mary L., born September 20, 1871, and Anna P., born January 27, 1876. Mr. and Mrs. Marvin are members of the Presbyterian Church. He has been School Treasurer and Justice of the Peace of his township. Mr. Marvin has one of the finest farms of over 500 acres of land to be found anywhere in Clark County. He was a soldier in the Union Army, having served for three years in the Tenth Illinois Infantry, and was mustered out at East Point, Ga. He was in the battle of Mission Ridge and Lookout Mountain, in fact, in thirty skirmishes and battles, all told, during his term of service. He is a member of the Masonic Fraternity and a Republican in politics, and one of the most upright and progressive, intelligent and honorable citizens of York Township.

METZ, Jacob.—An old soldier of the Civil War, now a retired builder and contractor, Jacob Metz is now nearing his eightieth birthday, honored by a fond circle of children and grandchildren and held in high esteem by the many friendships which he has made and retained during his residence in Clark County. He is now living with his daughter, Mrs. Mary E. Perdue, the Postmistress of Marshall, a biography of whom appears on another page of this volume.

Jacob Metz is a native of Germany, born December 27, 1827, and his parents lived and died in the Fatherland. He came to the United States when he was twenty-two years of age, to avoid being drafted into the German army, and spent many years as a farmer in Vigo County, Ind. At the breaking out of the Civil War, instead of attempting to avoid military service, inspired by gratitude for the opportunities offered by his adopted country and through which he became fairly prosperous, he enlisted for its preservation in the Eighty-fifth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and served for three years under Grant and Hooker in all the battles and campaigns of his regiment. He was Sergeant of his company, and was honorably discharged from service in June, 1865. After the war Mr. Metz came to Marshall to permanently reside, establishing a good business as a builder and contractor, which he conducted until his retirement in 1899.

Since acquiring the right of suffrage in this country Mr. Metz has always voted the Republican ticket. His substantial standing as a business man and a citizen has been repeatedly attested by his calls to the local public service, he having creditably discharged the duties of the Collectorship for four years and those of the Assessor for two terms. His popularity has been extended by his earnest efforts in behalf of the Grand Army of the Republic, and his benevolent and religious activities have been especially identified with the work of the United Brethren Church.

Mr. Metz was married, near Marshall, this county, January 26, 1861, to Harriet Smith, daughter of Samuel and Lydia (Lutz) Smith, both natives of Pennsylvania. Her father was born in Lancaster, February 18, 1840, and is still living, being a citizen of Marshall and eighty-seven years of age. They were the parents of eight children, four of whom died in infancy and four of whom survive, as follows: Anna Laura, wife of Robert Lynn, who lives in Altamont, Ill., the mother of five boys and two girls, Ray, Tracy, Lynn, Daniel, Walter, Jessie,

Mary and Etta; Mary Etta (Purdue), widow, whose biography appears elsewhere; Charles, who married Lulu Deans, and is a resident of Marshall, the father of one child, Harriet; and Maggie, wife of William Knipe, also a resident of Marshall and mother of Ruth and Ralph.

MILAM, Lafayette.—Lafayette Milam was born in Sullivan, Ind., February 14, 1843, and moved to Clark County in 1859. Both his father and mother were natives of Kentucky, his father having died in 1850, and his mother in 1877. His parents were the father and mother of ten children, six boys and four girls. Mr. Milam has lived on the same property ever since he came to this State, and is now the sole survivor of his father's family. He enlisted April 15, 1861, in the Twenty-first Illinois Infantry, General Grant's old regiment, for three months. He then enlisted in the Thirtieth Illinois Infantry and served in this regiment for three years. He then re-enlisted as a veteran in the same regiment, and was finally discharged at Louisville, Ky., August 7, 1865. He marched to the sea with Sherman's Army. Mr. Milam was a good soldier, and is one of the most highly respected and honored citizens of his township. He is justly proud of his military service, as he has a good right to be, seeing the many marches and skirmishes and battles he took part in in the service of his country during the trying days of the War of the Great Rebellion.

MILLER, Henry T.—The homestead occupied for years by Jacob Miller, situated on Section 15, Johnson Township, Clark County, has been in charge of his son, Henry T., ever since the father retired from active labor and removed to Casey. The land has been placed in an excellent state of cultivation and returns profitable crops as a result of the care and attention bestowed upon it. The family has been identified with the agricultural interests of the township for a long period and has won a reputation for thrift and energy. Elsewhere in this volume mention is made of the father, as well as of an older brother, Jacob James, who occupies a portion of the old homestead. While in the main success has rewarded the energetic efforts of Henry T. Miller, he has not been without his share of misfortunes, one of the greatest of these having been the loss of his house by fire, in June of 1906, when the building was destroyed and all of its contents excepting a few articles of furniture on the first floor. Since then a neat five-room cottage has been erected on the foundation of the old house, and the family now are comfortably established in their little home.

Coming as a boy from Germany, where he was born about 1836, Jacob Miller became a pioneer of Clark County, and married Jemima Lockhart, who was born in Indiana about 1844. Among their children was Henry T., born April 20, 1877, at the old homestead seven and one-half miles southeast of Casey. During the years of boyhood he attended country schools in winter and helped to cultivate the farm in the summer. Upon starting out for himself he decided to travel through other regions with a view to finding a location, where land was cheap and opportunities plentiful. However, a trip to Missouri in 1898 convinced him that Clark County was not to be surpassed by the Southwest and accordingly he returned home with the intention of establishing himself in the midst of friends of his boyhood. After his marriage he settled on his father's farm, where since he has engaged in agricultural pursuits.

The Miller farm lies within the heart of the oil belt, but Mr. Miller made three attempts at locating wells before he was successful, the fourth well, which was shot April 16, 1907, having proved an excellent producer. It is his expectation to combine the oil industry with agriculture, and the eventual drilling of a good well has enhanced the value of his home place. As yet he has not been an office-holder nor has he taken any part in politics aside from voting the Republican ticket, but he may be relied upon to support projects for the benefit of the community, and is particularly concerned as to good schools, good roads and favorable market facilities. His marriage occurred January 28, 1903, and united him with Lulu A. Graham, who was born in Cumberland County, this State, April 9, 1886, being a daughter of Elias and Katherine (Yellton) Graham, also natives of that county, and of German descent. Throughout Cumberland County few pioneers are better known and none more highly honored than her grandfather, Dr. Henry Yellton, who was one of the earliest settlers of Hazeldell and practiced medicine there for a long period. As the family physician of people for miles in every direction, he was called to and fro, and no night too stormy and no day too cold for him to respond to the appeal for medical aid. At the bedside of the pioneer his was the most welcome figure and his the most helpful skill. Nor have his acts of mercy and helpfulness been forgotten; on the contrary, everyone has a kind word to say for Dr. Yellton, and it is a matter of rejoicing to old friends that, although eighty-seven years of age, he retains his mental and physical faculties and still enjoys all the good things of life. The family of Henry T. Miller and wife comprises one living child, Ruby Violet, who was born November 7, 1905. The other child, Jacob Elias, was born April 14, 1904, and died January 23, of the following year. The family are well known in the township and have many friends among its most substantial residents.

MILLER, Jacob James.—The substantial element forming the farming population of Clark County owes not a little of its strength to the intelligent efforts of the sons of the pioneers, among whom not the least conspicuous personality is that of Jacob James Miller, residing on a portion of the old family homestead about seven miles southeast of Casey on Section 15. On this farm, in the old farm house standing seven and one-half miles from town, he was born April 27, 1871, and since his marriage he has resided one-half mile west of the old home, on twenty acres belonging to the estate. While maintaining excellent improvements on the land and superintending its management, he has been more interested in the oil business than in agriculture and is an enthusiastic supporter of the new industry and its possibilities.

The family was established in Clark County by Jacob and Jemima (Lockhart) Miller, natives respectively of Germany and Indiana, and now honored residents of Casey. Upon another page of this volume will be found mention of Jacob Miller and his association with the early agricultural development of Clark County. Among his children was Jacob James, whose name introduces this article and whose early life was uneventfully passed on the home farm. In the winter months he was sent to school, while in the summer he aided in tilling the soil and harvesting the crops on the farm. All of his life has been passed in this neighborhood with the exception of a brief period in the Indian Territory. Like his brother, Henry, he left Clark County to ascertain if he could find a more desirable location elsewhere, and sought the cheaper lands of the Southwest, settling in the Indian Territory during the spring of 1890, but a sojourn of one year in that location proved that new countries have their drawbacks and he was content to return to the old surroundings.

Shortly after his return to Clark County Mr. Miller established a home of his own, being united in marriage, October 1, 1891, with Miss Lucette Wilson, youngest child of Hardin and Sarah (Hiers) Wilson, natives of Clark County, Ill., descended from Irish ancestry. The Wilson family is well known throughout Clark County and its members are honored for sterling qualities of head and heart. Mrs. Miller was born in this county October 3, 1874, received a fair education in local schools, and is a lady of refinement, a devoted wife and mother, and a cultured member of the best society of the community. Five children were born of her marriage, namely: Lawrence C., born July 24, 1892; Henry Glenn, October 30, 1894; Oliver H., May 21, 1896; Annie B., October 21, 1899; and Edna Leone, June 21, 1904. In political views Mr. Miller believes in the principles enunciated in the Republican platform and supports his belief by his ballot. Fraternally he holds membership with the Modern Woodmen of America, belonging to the camp at Moriah. In the community where practically all of his life has been passed he has a reputation for energy, intelligence and progressiveness, and is worthily filling his appointed station in life.

MITCHELL, Orlando.—From the time of his arrival in Marshall in 1880 until his lamented death May 3, 1901, Dr. Orlando Mitchell maintained an enlightened and continuous oversight of the health of a large portion of the community, winning appreciation as much by his kindness of heart and humanity as by his skill in diagnosis and treatment. The craving for scientific investigation which led Dr. Mitchell to adopt medicine and surgery was both inherited and acquired. His father, Dr. J. D. Mitchell, was one of the pioneer practitioners of Clark County, and came here from his native State of Tennessee when these prairies demanded large hope and patience of the men who would mould resources to their advantage. While a resident of Kentucky, Dr. Mitchell married Elizabeth Walch, a native of the Bourbon State, and while he rode long distances across country in rain and shine, day and night, responding with unfailing cheerfulness to the call of rich and poor alike, a large family gathered around his fireside, five sons and four daughters, of whom Orlando, the fourth oldest, was born in Darwin, Clark County, January 1, 1855.

Educated in the public schools of York Township, Clark County, Orlando Mitchell knew a youth devoted to hard work and increasing responsibility, yet he was fortunate in his environment of professional activity which in no way conflicted with his ability or natural tendencies. Subsequently he completed his training begun under his father, in Indianapolis, graduated from the Indianapolis Medical College, and thereafter practiced for some time in Terre Haute, Ind., from where he came to Marshall in 1880. His engaging personality, clearly defined purpose, and ready grasp of the obligations and amenities of his calling soon won him the confidence of the community, and he continued an increasingly important and necessary local factor during the balance of his active life. For years he was pension examiner of Marshall, and for a number of years was surgeon for the Vandalia Railroad Company.

In Carthage, Ill., October 8, 1885, Dr. Mitchell was united in marriage to Mrs. Mary (Santmyer) Robinson, widow of James Robinson, member of the John Robinson Circus Company, and mother of James Robinson. By her second marriage Mrs. Mitchell has a son, Joseph. Dr. Mitchell was a Republican in politics, but never took an active interest in the local undertakings of his party. Fraternally he was a member of the Knights of Pythias and the Red Men. He left the legacy of a good name, innumerable disinterested kindnesses and an example of labor dignified by thoroughness, progress and high ideals.

MOORE, Fred E.—Educational and political activity have been prime factors in shaping the usefulness and influence of Fred E. Moore, the present Mayor and one of the most cultured and resourceful of the citizens of Casey. The early environment of Mr. Moore was a farm in Fayette County, Ind., where he was born February 2, 1873, and where he developed those tendencies which were to have their setting in various towns of the Central West. His father, D. O. Moore, was born in Everton, Ind., May 6, 1843, and his mother, Katherine (Hubbell) Moore, was born at Mount Carmel, Ind., September 11, 1849. The parents were married January 5, 1868, and after many years of successful farming and stock-raising, still reside at Everton, their native State.

Largely owing to his own ability to create advantages Mr. Moore received excellent educational training. From the public schools he went to the academy at Rushville, Ind., where he studied a year in the teachers' department, and for two years he studied both pedagogy and business at the Central Normal College. For the following four years he engaged in educational work at Bentley, Ind., and for three years was similarly employed at Bentonville, the same State. Since coming to Casey he has entered into the progressive spirit of the community and as a politician has rendered effective and altogether dependable service. In the spring of 1903 he was elected City Clerk on the Democratic ticket, serving until 1905, and in April, 1907, was elected Mayor of Casey by the largest majority ever accorded any chief executive in the history of the city. He has ever staunchly adhered to Democratic principles upon national issues, but locally is no partisan, giving his vote to the man best qualified to serve the public good.

The marriage of Mary E. Ward and Mr. Moore occurred in Casey, Mrs. Moore being a native of this town and daughter of B. F. and Elizabeth (Cook) Ward, the former for many years a local publisher.

To Mr. and Mrs. Moore was born a daughter, Lillian. The present Mrs. Moore, formerly Mrs. Grace (Millhouse) Callahan, who was born in Murphysboro, Ill., June 19, 1874, a daughter of Clarence A. and Margaretta (Kunkle) Millhouse, natives of Philadelphia, Pa. Mr. Millhouse died in 1894 and his wife now is a resident of St. Louis, Mo. Mr. Moore is an enthusiastic fraternalist and is identified with the Masons, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, Modern Woodmen of America and the Red Men. The family are members of the Christian Church. Mr. Moore is an earnest, high-minded gentleman, an exceptionally well informed and conscientious politician and a friend and neighbor whom to know is to unqualifiedly like and respect.

MOORE, Mike.—On the farm which still is his home in Section 37, Marshall Township, Mike Moore was born October 13, 1857. This well known farmer in no way belies his name, for he has inherited from Irish parents a genial and happy disposition and earnest purpose which gathers up warm and lasting friends all along his journey of life.

Frank Moore, father of Mike, was born on a small tenant farm in Ireland in 1824, and at the age of twelve sailed away to America and settled in the State of Pennsylvania. There he married Jane Kennedy, also a native of Ireland, and who had come from the old country to Pennsylvania at the age of twelve years. Six children were born of this union, four sons and two daughters, of whom Mike is the second son and child. Mr. Moore came to Marshall Township in 1850 and bought 112 acres of land which he cultivated and lived on until his death in 1877. He was a very industrious and capable man, and he had the liking of his race for the bright and pleasant things of life. He could tell a good story and pass along the word of encouragement as well as any, and he was always friendly and on the best of terms with his neighbors. In politics he was a Democrat, and in religion a Roman Catholic.

In addition to general farming and stock-raising, Mike Moore has actively participated in politics, and for years has been one of the staunchest local supporters of the Democratic party. He has held many offices within the gift of his fellow-townsmen, including that of School Director for two terms, and he is the present Commissioner of Highways. He is the owner of 147 acres of land, well stocked, well housed, and equipped with the most modern of labor-saving implements. He is a member of the United Brethren Church, and has done much to further the religious and financial interests of the same. In 1895 Mr. Moore renounced a bachelor existence and married Elizabeth Renner, daughter of Daniel Renner, one of the early settlers and prominent men of Marshall Township. There are four children in the Moore family—Fred, Cecil, Ruth and Harrold.

MORGAN, Benjamin Franklin.—The value of perseverance in the face of difficulties is emphasized in the life of Benjamin Franklin Morgan, a farmer of Westfield Township who has lifted himself from poverty to the ownership of a farm of 104 acres in his home place, and of another tract of twenty-five acres elsewhere in the township. Mr. Morgan is of humble parentage, and his birth occurred in Martinsville, Clark County, December 28, 1853. His father, William Morgan, came of one of the pioneer families of Ohio, in which State he was born and married Sarah Curtis, also a native of the Buckeye State.

Mr. Morgan was left fatherless at the age of five years, and thereafter he continued to live on a farm with his mother and the four other children in the family until he was twenty-two years old. In the meantime he had attended the district schools and gained a thorough knowledge of agriculture, and he felt sufficiently prosperous to marry, in 1875, Susanna Barr, daughter of E. L. and Eleanor (McKinsey) Barr, early residents of Clark County. For a time after his marriage Mr. Morgan occupied a rented farm, and upon leaving this moved on to the place he now occupies, and where he since has engaged in general farming and stock-raising with gratifying results. His comfortable home and well constructed buildings bespeak practical and well sustained ideas, and the general appearance of his surroundings indicate regard for method and order. His two children, Irvin and Charles, are both established in homes of their own, the former having married Mr. Ketcham, and the latter Lola Goldsmith.

His home interests have by no means absorbed all of the energy of Mr. Morgan, for he has amply justified his reputation for public spiritedness by a score of public services. For the past six years he has served as Township Commissioner, and he has ever been the friend and active promoter of education and religion, being a devout and helpful member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Fraternally he is identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

MORTON, Ezra Daniel.—Added to a capacity for successful merchandising, in which he is engaging in Marshall, Ezra Daniel Morton has many sides and qualities not usually associated with men who deal in the practical commodities of life. First and foremost he is a man of outlook, and never has lost the inquiring mind which led him as a child beyond the horizon of his immediate environment. A continuous association for many years with good books and informing periodicals has led him to expect much, and give much, as he journeys through life, and the delights and broadening effect of travel have left their stamp upon a nature most genially and kindly disposed.

Mr. Morton was born April 5, 1865, in Edgar County, Ill., and is a son of John and Minerva Morton, the former of whom was born February 18, 1819, in Warren County, Ohio, and the latter in Simms Township, Edgar County, Ill., a daughter of Hall Simms, after whom the township was named. The paternal grandfather, Benjamin Morton, and his wife, Hannah (Janney) Morton, were born in New Jersey, and the former moved to Ohio in 1813, after completing his service in the War of 1812. He was a second cousin of Oliver P. Morton, once Governor of Indiana. The family has been prominent in New Jersey, Ohio, Illinois, and always has represented strong and substantial attainments.

Always a student, Ezra Daniel Morton graduated with highest honors from the high school at Nevins, Edgar County, this State, and while yet in his teens accumulated a large and useful fund of information. He began to feel the limitations of the farm when only ten years old, but perseveringly adjusted his discontent to its demands until about eighteen years of age. He then went overland to Kansas, where he roughed it for a year, returning then to Edgar County, where he further qualified for school teaching, in which he began to engage upon attaining his majority. After five years of teaching, in 1891 he conducted a general store in Martinsville, Ill., the following year opening a similar business in Lawrenceville, which he disposed of at a profit at the end of a year. For the following two years he worked for his brother, A. J. Morton, in Paris, Ill., then went to Brocton, and for two years conducted a general store in partnership with his brothers. The disposal of this business netted Mr. Morton a considerable sum of money, and in 1896 he purchased a farm in Clark County and engaged in general farming and stock-raising for seven years. The desire for more active business again taking possession of him, he sold his stock, rented his farm, and started the general store in Marshall which he has since conducted with increasing success.

Mr. Morton's appreciation of the climate, resources and general advantages of Illinois remains undiminished after a residence within its borders of practically his entire life. He never has found a place which conforms more nearly to the demands of a large and wholesome nature, and certainly Clark County never had a more enthusiastic and faithful supporter. When his day's tasks are done he goes for rest to a beautiful suburban home, equipped with all modern conveniences, and as in the past, he has the means to come and go as he pleases, no matter how distant his goal. Four times has he crossed the boundless prairies intervening between Lake Michigan and the Rocky Mountains; he has sailed upon the waters of the Pacific and wandered over the historic Southern California; has viewed the splendid panorama from the top of Pike's Peak, and hunted for gold in the mines of Montana; he spent a winter in Canada, and has stopped at hotels upon one side of which waved the Stars and Stripes, and upon the other side the Union Jack; in all has he visited twenty-two States and Territories, but his heart and home always will be in Illinois.

In political affiliation Mr. Morton is a Jeffersonian Democrat. He has been a member of the Masonic order since he was twenty-one years old, and he has been a Royal Arch Mason since 1888. In 1904 he joined the Fraternal Order of Eagles, and now is Past Worthy President of Prairie Aerie, No. 1315. In religion he is a Unitarian. The marriage of Mr. Morton and Edna May Laufman occurred November 17, 1895, Mrs. Morton being the oldest of the eight children of Jonas and Ellen Laufman. There are two children in the Morton family: Eula, born September 23, 1896; and John Jonas, born July 11, 1906. Mr. Morton has both digested and enjoyed his opportunities for self-improvement, and in consequence is a very interesting, informing and companionable man.

MOUNT, James A.—James A. Mount was born January 27, 1836, in Clark County, Ill., and was the son of John L. Mount, who was born in Kentucky and died in Indiana. The father of our deceased subject was married to Tamar Megath, who was born in Virginia in 1812. She was married a second time to Jonathan Hoge, both of whom are now dead. Mrs. Megath-Hoge was the mother of three children: John L. Mount, who married Priscilla Bishop, and who now resides at West York, Ill.; Mary A. married Edward Fitch, both deceased; James A. Mount, deceased, the subject of this sketch.

Mr. Mount was a farmer all his life. He was joined in matrimony April 2, 1863, to Mary C. Brown, who was born December 27, 1839, in Indiana, and is the daughter of James and Hannah Brown, both deceased, the mother died in Indiana and the father in this county. James A. Mount, by his wife, Mary C., was the father of six children: Clayton B., born April 2, 1864; John C., born April 7, 1866, and who died February 26, 1883; James V., born November 7, 1869, married Miss Mary Marvin and lives in West Union; Madison H., born May 20, 1871; Mary Ann, born March 4, 1875, and Emma H. Mount, born November 29, 1879. Both Mr. Mount in his lifetime and his widow now, were and are members of the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Mount died April 6, 1904. Mrs. James Mount still resides on the same farm where she has lived for over forty years. The farm consists of one hundred and sixty acres of as fine land as can be found anywhere in Clark County. Mrs. James A. Mount was, as before indicated, the daughter of James M. and Hannah Brown. In her early womanhood she was a school teacher, and a good one, and she is a woman of much more than average intelligence and force of character. The grandmother of Mrs. Mount at one time rode one hundred and fifty miles on horseback to attend one of the first conventions held in Indiana and which was held at Vincennes, Ind. She represented her district in that convention, all the men of her neighborhood having been killed at the Battle of Tippecanoe. The mother of Mrs. Mount was the first child born in Orange County, Ind. The grandfather and uncle of Mrs. Mount were both killed in the Battle of Tippecanoe. Her grandfather on her mother's side and his three brothers were all killed at the same battle. Mrs. Brown's people were originally from South Carolina, and her father's people from Rochester, N. Y. The Brown, Mount and Hoge families were among the earliest, most prominent and most respected and honored people of Clark County, and neither the subject of our sketch, James A. Mount, Mrs. James A. Mount, nor their daughters or sons have allowed its reputation to fall in the slightest degree in the estimation of those who know them best and have had business transactions and social relations with them.

MYERS, James H.—The extremes of activity in the life of James H. Myers are represented by the arms of the soldier in the Civil War and the implements of the farmer in Ohio and Illinois. Mr. Myers was born on a farm in Muskingum County, Ohio, May 29, 1841, and is the oldest of the three children of George L. and Sarah (Howell) Myers, natives of Pennsylvania and New York, respectively, and the latter born in 1814. The other children in the family were Lewis E. and Sarah Jane. George L. Myers moved from Pennsylvania to Ohio at an early day, and worked at tailoring, which he had learned in his native State in his youth. He was a Democrat in politics, but never held any office, or interested himself in matters not directly connected with his chosen occupations.

The youth of James H. Myers passed uneventfully on the Ohio farm, and in 1861 he enlisted in the Seventy-eighth Ohio Infantry, taking part, among others, in the battles of Shiloh and Kenesaw Mountain, and the sieges of Vicksburg and Atlanta. He was with Sherman on his famous March to the Sea, and participated in the Grand Review in Washington. He was mustered out of the service at Columbus, Ohio, July 13, 1865, and immediately after the war came to Marshall and engaged in the butcher business until 1897. A man of steady habits and inclination toward economy, he made money as a meat merchant, and upon disposing of the shop which he had operated thirty years, invested his earnings in a farm of one hundred and ten acres in Section 17, Marshall Township. At the present time his land is nearly all under cultivation, and he has made many fine improvements, expending quite a sum of money in agricultural implements. He raises the regulation products of this part of the Central West, and makes a specialty of high-grade stock, including horses, cattle and hogs. The home is commodious and comfortable, and shade trees and gardens add to the appearance of homelikeness and refinement.

April 21, 1864, Mr. Myers was united in marriage to Margaret Shaw, who was born in Muskingum County, Ohio, December 22, 1840, and whose parents, Shedrick and Mary Shaw, came to Marshall Township, Clark County, in 1865. Mr. and Mrs. Myers are the parents of three sons and two daughters: Emma Jane, born February 7, 1865; George L., born October 25, 1866; William H., born June 4, 1868; James E., born September 18, 1872; and Carrie F., born November 1, 1873. Mr. Myers subscribes to the principles of the Republican party, and he has held a number of local offices, including that of School Director. He is fraternally connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Lodge No. 64, of Marshall, and he is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Marshall. The family are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Myers is enterprising and public spirited, and is unusually well informed on the current events of the day. He enjoys a wide popularity throughout Marshall Township, and his business standing rests firmly upon honesty, ability, and long experience. Mrs. Myers died December 12, 1905.

MYLES, Oliver C.—As a representative of the third generation of the family resident in Illinois and as a progressive land-owner and retired farmer, Oliver C. Myles occupies a substantial position among the people of Clark County. The first of the name to come to Illinois was Isaac Myles, who was born and reared in Pennsylvania and in youth served an apprenticeship to the carpenter's trade. While yet a young man he sought the larger opportunities of the further West and became a pioneer of Edgar County, Ill. There he met and married a young lady who was born in Ireland, but lived in America from very early childhood. Seven sons and four daughters were born of their union, of whom the tenth child and sixth son was Richard C., born in Illinois July 31, 1832. When only two years of age he was orphaned by the death of his father and mother and shortly afterward he was brought by his brothers from Edgar to Clark County, where he passed the years of boyhood in Darwin Township. During early manhood he married

Miss Lowell, who was born in York Township, Clark County, in August of 1833. About the time of his marriage he bought forty acres of timber land in Darwin Township and this, after having accomplished the arduous task of clearing, he began to till, cultivate and improve. By subsequent purchase he became the owner of 200 additional acres, thus giving him the title to a large and valuable property.

The family of Richard C. Myles comprised three sons and one daughter, namely, Oliver C., Julia Ann, Bruce A. and Clark A. The only daughter is the wife of LeRoy Craig. In politics the father voted the Republican ticket from the organization of the party until his death, which occurred at the age of sixty-two years. The commendable success which he achieved was due to his unaided exertions and indomitable energy. The fact of being orphaned from his earliest recollections and of being unable to secure advantages in boyhood did not deter him from gaining a substantial position in his community, where he was rated as a prosperous farmer and honorable citizen.

Darwin Township, Clark County, is the native place of Oliver C. Myles, and January 11, 1856, the date of his birth. Following the usual custom of farmer boys, he attended school in the winter and worked on the home farm during the summer months. April 18, 1877, he was united in marriage with Martha E. Chickadannze, who was born in Anderson Township, Clark County, July 28, 1854, and was the eldest daughter in a family of eleven children (eight) sons and three daughters). Her father, Nicholas Chickadannze, was a native of Germany, but at an early age crossed the ocean with his father and other members of the family, settling among the pioneers of Illinois. Some time afterward he married Anna Craig, who was born in Edgar County, but grew to womanhood in Anderson Township, Clark County, where the marriage was solemnized. With the aid of his energetic wife he became prosperous and acquired considerable property. After attaining his majority he voted the Democratic ticket, and through all of his long life he never swerved in his allegiance to that organization. When eighty-two years of age he passed from the scenes of earth, mourned by a host of warm personal friends. In the family of Oliver C. and Martha E. Myles there are six children, namely: Nicholas A., Anna, Theresa, Laura,

Logan and Nunda, all of whom were born and reared in Darwin Township.

Though now retired from agricultural pursuits and making his home in Marshall, where he has a comfortable residence, Mr. Myles still owns considerable farm property, having 380 acres in Clark County, Ill., and forty acres in Vigo County, Ind. Politically he votes the straight Republican ticket and now officiates as Chairman of the Republican Committee of Darwin Township, besides which he has held other township offices. Active in public affairs and well posted concerning current events, he affords an illustration of the possibilities of Clark County and adds another name to our list of successful agriculturists. The Modern Woodmen of America has his name enrolled as a member of the Camp at Marshall, and in addition he belongs to Lodge No. 776, I. O. O. F., at West Union, in the work of which he has been interested.

NEAL, Fleming Rice.—At an early period of its development, Eli Neal came to Wabash Township, Clark County, and combined the clearing of a prairie farm with the operation of a sawmill. Subsequently he retired on a competence, and died in Marshall at an advanced age. After settling in the new country Mr. Neal married Jane McCampbel, daughter of a Clark County pioneer, and to whose economy and thrift he attributed a large share of his prosperity.

Fleming Rice Neal, son of the pioneer, was born in Marshall, July 19, 1854, and received his education in the district and city schools. Tiring of the farm and sawmill of his father, he learned the trade of brick masonry, and after following the same a short time drifted into the saloon business, in which he was engaged twenty-four years. November 26, 1899, he was united in marriage to Clara G. Wallis, who was born in Marshall, March 28, 1875, a daughter of Henry C. Wallis. Henry C. Wallis was born in Germany, May 16, 1828, and as a young man came to Marshall where he engaged for many years in the butcher business. He married Rosanna Behner, who was born in Pennsylvania in 1836, and reared a family of fourteen children, of whom Mrs. Neal is the second youngest. Mr. Wallis had the thrift and perseverance of his German ancestors, and besides making a comfortable living for his large family, was known as an honorable and dependable man. The comparatively brief married life of Mr. and Mrs. Neal was a happy one, and the death of the former, June 12, 1906, shadowed a life devoted to housewifely duties, and of great consideration and thoughtfulness for the welfare of friends and associates.

O'BRIST, Benjamin H.—Two generations of the O'Brist family have supplied energy and resource to the business enterprises of Marshall, the first represented by John W. O'Brist, woolen manufacturer, and the second, by Benjamin H. O'Brist, formerly also engaged in woolen manufacturing, but now a member of the firm of O'Brist & Sullivan, wine and liquor dealers.

John W. O'Brist was born in Mount Holly, Burlington County, N. J., May 16, 1825, and from the farm went to the city, where he began at the bottom round of the latter and learned every detail of the woolen manufacturing business. Subsequently he operated woolen mills in Greenville, Darke County, Ohio, where he married Harriet Williams, a teacher in the Greenville public schools, and who was born in Darke County October 5, 1826. Mrs. O'Brist's father was Treasurer of Darke County for twenty years. From Ohio Mr. O'Brist came to Marshall in 1877, and thereafter operated a woolen mill here for the balance of his active life. He was public spirited and popular, and held the office of Township Collector several terms. Besides Benjamin H. he had two other children: Mrs. Jennie Lemen, of Indianapolis, and James, who lives with his brother in Marshall.

Benjamin H. O'Brist was born in Greenville, Darke County, Ohio, August 23, 1857, and at an early age became familiar with his father's woolen mill, in time qualifying as a practical manufacturer with the firm of Merritt & Coughlin, of Indianapolis, Ind. In 1878 he came to Marshall and assisted his father in the mill, remaining in that capacity until embarking in his present business in 1905. August 5, 1896, Mr. O'Brist married Sophronia Dillman, a native of Newton, Jasper County, Ill., and daughter of a general merchant of Yale, Ill. Two children have come into the family of Mr. and Mrs. O'Brist, Martha, born May 16, 1898, and John, born September 7, 1900. Mrs. O'Brist is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Mr. O'Brist is a Republican in politics, and fraternally is connected with the Eagles. He is a shrewd and successful business man, and has the reputation of being honorable in all of his dealings.

ORNDORFF, T. A.—T. A. Orndorff, the well known insurance agent of Marshall, is a native of Wabash Township, this county, born June 11, 1869. His family is of German ancestry, the American founder coming from the Fatherland and settling in Pennsylvania toward the close of the eighteenth century. There, in early life, he followed the good old custom of his country by marrying and rearing a large family. By his first union twelve children were born to him, of whom nine were sons, and upon the death of this wife he moved with his family to Frederick County, Va. There he was married a second time, and, singular to relate, again became the father of a dozen children, nine of whom were of the male sex and seven served as members of the same company in the War of 1812. Four of the latter nine brothers married, settled in the Old Dominion and each had a family of eleven children, conclusively proving that had there been a Roosevelt in those times the Orndorffs, in family matters, would have met with his approval. It was from this prolific branch of the tree that the Orndorffs of Clark County are descended.

Thomas L., the father of T. A. Orndorff, was a native of Guernsey County, Ohio, born March 24, 1839, his parents being Phineas and Catherine (Jennings) Orndorff. The paternal grandfather was born in Frederick County, Va., came to Clark County, Ill., in the fall of 1854 and died there in December, 1864; his wife, a native of Muskingum County, Ohio, died in that county in November, 1859. Thomas L., one of the children by this marriage, received the bulk of his education in the public schools of Zanesville, Ohio, and passed his early years upon his father's farm, with the exception of several months in 1865, spending the period from 1858 to 1874 either in teaching or agricultural pursuits. In February, 1865, he was mustered into Company G, One Hundred and Fifty-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry, as First Lieutenant, his immediate superior officer being Captain Pitman. He completed his eight months' service with honor and was mustered out of the company on the 15th of September of the last year of the war, after hostilities had ceased. In 1874, then thirty-five years of age, Thomas L. Orndorff became a resident of Marshall and entered the law office of James C. Robinson as a student, being admitted to the bar in 1877. Although entering the profession thus late in life, he was a man of wide practical information and possessed the faculty of readily making friends and warm supporters. Consequently he soon became recognized as an influential Democrat in his section of the State, and in 1880 was elected State's Attorney of Clark County. He prospered also in a financial way, and at the time of his death he owned several farms in Wabash Township and considerable property in Marshall. The deceased was a Mason in good standing, and a citizen, all in all, of strong and superior qualities of intellect and heart.

Thomas L. Orndorff was twice married—first, in Clark County, Ill., on January 1, 1858, to Sarah A. Pitman, daughter of William and Sarah Pitman, a native of Frederick County, Va., born in January, 1840, and died in this county in November, 1864. Mr. Orndorff's second wife, whom he married in October, 1868, was Elizabeth Fishback, of Wabash Township, Clark County, and a daughter of Jacob Fishback. She was born September 17, 1850, and was therefore a little over eighteen at the time of her marriage, by which she became the mother of three children: Thomas A., born June 11, 1869; William E., born March 8, 1872, and died June 23, 1872; and Pearl, born August 29, 1875. There were also three children by the first marriage, as follows: Sarah C., born October 27, 1858, died December 24, 1881; Josephine, now the wife of William McGregor, and Alice A., born on the 8th of January, 1863.

T. A. Orndorff received a good education in the district and high schools of Wabash Township. He began railroading in 1890, being employed on the Vandalia Railroad as brakeman, baggageman and in the passenger department, his work bringing him into contact with many citizens throughout the county. In 1898 his wide acquaintance induced him to enter the fire insurance business as an agent for the Phoenix Company, and the choice of a new occupation proved to be founded on good judgment, as he has continued the business with such progressive results that at the present time he has both the cream and the bulk of the fire insurance which is placed in Clark County.

On the 6th of September, 1888, Mr. Orndorff was wedded to Miss Belle Nusbaum, a native of Paris, Ill., and daughter of Job and Rosina Nusbaum, her father being a well known merchant of Marshall. They have had two children: Russell C., born February 23, 1890, and now a high school student, and Mary Catherine, who died at the age of six and a half months. Mr. Orndorff is a Democrat and in his religious faith, a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, while among the old-time fraternities he has a wide and prominent connection. He is Past Master of Marshall Lodge, No. 133, A. F. & A. M.; Past Chancellor of Lancelot Lodge, No. 67, Knights of Pythias, and Past Grand of Eureka Lodge, No. 64, I. O. O. F.

Mrs. T. A. Orndorff passed from this life April 27, 1907.

ORR, Harry F.—Doubtless there are few men residing within Clark County who possess a more thorough knowledge of its oil interests or a more enthusiastic belief in the oil industry than does Harry F. Orr, who since 1903 has been an employe of the Standard Oil Company and now occupies a responsible position as manager of their interests in the oil belt of Clark County. In this important position he has proved himself to be trustworthy, efficient and reliable, as well as experienced in every department of the business which he follows. Confidence is reposed in him and with justice, both by the firm he represents and by the people among whom all of his life has been passed.

The Orr family ranks among the pioneers of Clark County, Hosea C. and Mary (Matheny) Orr having come hither in an early day from their native Ohio. On another page of this volume mention of this worthy couple will be found. Their son, Harry F., was born in Clark County January 2, 1876, and received a common-school education in the country schools near his home. At an early age he gained a practical knowledge of agriculture and when the other children in the family had married and started out in the world for themselves he remained with his mother on the old homestead, proving of practical assistance to her in every detail connected with the management of the property. When he decided to establish a home of his own he bought from Mr. Rittler a small farm in Johnson Township in the fall of 1898 and January 8, 1899, he was united in marriage with Miss Cora Hunt, a native of Jasper County, Ill., and a young lady of refinement and excellent education. The family of which she is a member belongs to the pioneer class of Jasper County, where her father, Joel Hunt, was a native-born son and eventually a well-to-do farmer; her mother, who bore the maiden name of Nancy Hudspeth, was a native of Indiana and descended from German ancestry, as was also the father.

The union of Mr. and Mrs. Orr has been blessed with three children, namely: Mabel, born May 31, 1900; Ralph D., January 13, 1902; and Stanley F., October 31, 1905. Upon leaving his farm in 1903 Mr. Orr removed to Casey and began to engage in the teaming business, but in a very short time he took up the oil business, which he still follows. The constant development of the oil industry in the county entails upon him many duties and responsibilities, all of which he discharges with tact, discretion and sagacity, while at the same time by industry, integrity and sobriety he has gained the good-will of business associates and the general public. While he has not been deeply interested in politics, he votes the Republican ticket and stanchly advocates the principles of the party. As yet he holds membership with no fraternal organization other than the Knights of Pythias, preferring to devote his attention to his home and family circle in such intervals of leisure as he enjoys from the cares of business.

ORR, Hosea C.—In the lives of all pioneers there is a certain resemblance: the severing of the ties that bind to the home of one's childhood; the long journey in a "prairie schooner" through regions sparsely settled and through forests where the roads were indicated by blazed trees; the securing of a Government claim or the purchase of a raw tract at a low price; the hewing of logs and the putting up of a small cabin; the turning of the first furrows in the primeval soil; the killing of wild game to provide the family with meat; the gradual development of an improved farm; the gradual increase of settlers in the neighborhood; the opening of roads, the building of schools and churches, and briefly the gradual transformation of a region from the primeval condition of nature to one of the highest civilization. Such in a general way was the life of Hosea C. Orr and such his experiences as an early settler of Illinois, but in addition to the usual work of pioneering he endured all the hardships common to the soldiers who served through the period of the Civil War, and thus both in war and in peace proved a valued addition to the citizenship of the country.

Licking County, Ohio, was Mr. Orr's native place, and February 14, 1834, the date of his birth, his parents being John and Candace (Cooley) Orr, natives of Ohio, and the former of Scotch-Irish descent. The schools common to his locality in the days of his boyhood did not give Mr. Orr many advantages, and the information he displayed in later years was acquired through habits of close observation and general reading. During 1853 he came to Illinois and settled among the pioneers of Jasper County, where he bought ninety acres from David Baughman. Later he purchased forty additional acres of the same man, and the land thus secured he brought to a high state of cultivation. When the Civil War began he made his preparations to leave home and serve the Union. December 2, 1861, he was accepted as a member of Company G, Fifty-fourth Illinois Infantry, in which he served until the expiration of his term of enlistment and was honorably discharged December 31, 1863, as a Sergeant. On the following day he enlisted in the same Company and regiment, with which he remained at the front and participated in noteworthy battles. When the war was over the regiment was held at the front for a time, and October 16, 1865, received an honorable discharge from the army.

Shortly after his return home from the army Mr. Orr sold his farm in Jasper County and moved to Johnson Township, Clark County, where he bought eighty acres on Section 31, in the southwest corner of the township, and here he engaged busily and successfully in general farming until February 18, 1890, when he passed from the scenes of earth to his final rest. The religion that had inspired his working years remained his comfort in death. From youth he had been deeply interested in the work of the Christian Church and had been one of its active members and generous contributors. From the time of casting his first ballot he gave his support to the Republican party. For several terms he filled the office of School Trustee, in which capacity he proved helpful in promoting the welfare of the country schools. The building of good roads he felt to be a matter of vital importance to the township and when elected Road Commissioner he did all within his power to advance this work. Throughout this locality he is remembered as an excellent citizen and substantial farmer, one who lived uprightly and in his transactions with others showed the utmost consideration.

Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Romines

Surviving Mr. Orr is his widow, who for thirty-five years was his devoted helpmate and sagacious counselor. She bore the maiden name of Mary M. Matheny and was born in Licking County, Ohio, August 27, 1837, being a daughter of Isaac and Katherine (Stultz) Matheny. Her father was born in Virginia in April of 1813, of Irish descent, and about 1820 accompanied his parents from the Old Dominion to Ohio. In that State he met and married Katherine Stultz, who was born there in October, 1813, of German ancestry. The marriage of Mr. Orr and Miss Matheny was solemnized August 9, 1855, and was blessed by eight children, namely: Margaret, Cynthia, Sarah, Hosea H., William, Isaac D., Edward J. and Harry F. Five of the number are still living, the eldest son, Hosea H., living only one-fourth of a mile from his mother, across the line in Jasper, County, where he owns and operates a well improved farm.

ORRELL, Samuel.—The advantages which those of strong character derive from early limitations and even adversity seem emphasized in the life of Samuel Orrell, the owner of 130 acres of land in Johnson Township, and one of the highly honored and substantial farmers and stock-raisers of Clark County. Many lessons emerge from the career of this active and sensible man which should greatly encourage the youth left to fight out his independence unaided. Born in Franklin County, Ind., June 19, 1833, he was very young when deprived of the love and protection of his parents, Gregory and Margaret (Partlow) Orrell, the former of whom was born in North Carolina in 1810 and the latter in Indiana in 1815. With his brother James, who was a few years younger than himself, Samuel went to live with his maternal grandfather, Isaac Partlow, and here James died at the age of twenty years, leaving Samuel the sole representative of the once promising family.

Until his twenty-second year Samuel Orrell lived with his grandfather, and then alone came to Clark County to engage in farming on his own responsibility. He had received a fair education in the district schools, and had acquired a practical knowledge of farming; and he was naturally industrious, economical and thrifty. In 1857 he united his fortunes with those of Susan Imes, daughter of William and Susan (Frank) Imes, natives of Ohio, and to the sympathy and co-operation of his wife he attributes no small measure of his success. To Mr. and Mrs. Orrell have been born ten children, of whom James and Floyd died in early childhood. Those living are: Elizabeth, Mary, Emma, Theodore, Albert, George W., William and Bert. In 1859 Mr. Orrell had the misfortune to lose his left leg because of blood poisoning, but he rallied with wonderful courage from the catastrophe, and his loss has been of practically slight importance, as much of the hard work of the farm has been performed by him. He has a rich and finely improved property, equipped with a comfortable home, well constructed barns and outbuildings and the best of farm machinery. He bought his home place of eighty acres in 1870 of David Baughman, and some time later purchased fifty acres half a mile south of his home of S. Dosbaugh.

Mr. Orrell subscribes to the principles of the Democratic party, but he never has been active in its councils or offices. Ending with 1907, his work-shop had been the township voting place for the long period of thirty-five years, and around it cluster memories of many ardent and interesting political discussions. Mr. Orrell is an approachable and genial man, having much faith in his fellowmen, and in many ways contributing to the prosperity and well-being of the community.

PAYNE, Alexander M.—There are few occupations which lie closer to the practical needs of mankind than that of milling. As it is one of the oldest, it also is one of the most interesting of the avenues of labor, affording endless entertainment to the layman who chances within its noisy and whitened atmosphere. Marshall, surrounded by an excellent grain area, has held opportunity for the miller almost from the time when the land was first upturned by the plow and seed planted for the sustenance of wanderers who had strayed hither to enrich the human and material character of the future. Of these cabin millers one of the earliest was Ebenezer Payne, father of Alexander M. Payne, the present retired miller of Marshall.

Ebenezer Payne was born in Ohio in the dawn of the nineteenth century, and as a youth came with his parents to Indiana, where he remained until his marriage to Sarah McKeen, a native of Warren County, the same State. Mrs. Payne was a young woman of rare character and great simplicity of life, having been reared by the Shakers upon the death of her parents when she was a baby. With his young wife Mr. Payne came to Clark County when but few as yet had gathered within its borders, and took up eighty acres of land, which he cultivated and subsequently sold. In 1848 he established a milling business with William McKeen, his brother-in-law, conducting the same in successful manner until his death in 1855. He left one son, Alexander M., and three daughters—Elizabeth, Rebecca and Mary—the first two of whom are deceased. Mr. Payne was a Whig politically, but never cares for office. He was a veteran of the Black Hawk War.

The only son born to his parents, Alexander M. Payne, stepped into the waiting opportunity of his father's milling business, and after the death of the older man succeeded him in its management. He also dealt extensively in grain, and for two years was interested in the lumber business. These resources of the county were fostered by his activity and support, and for many years the busy hum of industry might be heard emanating from his mill. When he had commanded sufficient means to enable his family to live in comfort for the balance of their lives, Mr. Payne stepped aside to let others carry on his work.

March 8, 1860, Mr. Payne was united in marriage to Emily Harlan, born in Marshall March 2, 1842, and daughter of Justin and Lucinda Harlan, the former of whom was born in Warren County, Ohio, December 6, 1800, and the latter in Knox County, Ind., October 4, 1812. The Harlan family is an old and honored one, and its genealogy, traced on page 25 of this history, is instructive and interesting. The three sons and three daughters of Mr. and Mrs. Payne were all born in Clark County, and were educated in its public schools. They were named William, Edwin, Sarah, Mary, Clara and Curtis. Mr. Payne has given little attention to affairs outside his immediate business, but to this he has given the fine qualities of uprightness, perseverance and good judgment. Of him it may be said that his word is as good as his bond, and that in extent his usefulness and benefit to the community has been far beyond the average.

PEARCE, (Dr.) Edward.—The above named well known physician, of nearly thirty years' practice in Clark County, has made not only a first-class record in the profession of his permanent choice, but previously stood high as an educator and has shown remarkable aptitude for public service. He is a native of Anderson Township, this county, where he was born December 24, 1849, and is therefore still in the prime of a life sustained by a hardy constitution and habits of wise temperance. The Doctor is a son of John and Mahalia (Craig) Pearce, his father being a native of Maryland and his mother of Edgar County, Illinois. Edward Pearce, the paternal grandfather, removed from Maryland to Pennsylvania and thence, in 1838, to Clark County, Illinois, where he continued his occupation as a farmer. The grandfather on the maternal side became a resident of the county about three years earlier, or in 1835. Of the three children born to John Pearce and his wife, Thomas is a prosperous farmer of Darwin Township, this county, and Sarah E. is the wife of E. A. Craig, a substantial agriculturist of Vigo County, Ind.

Dr. Pearce's early education was obtained in the district and subscription schools of Clark County and Marshall, and, like many other intelligent and ambitious young men, he taught for a number of years as a stepping stone to the realization of his final professional aim. He was thus employed eight years in Clark County, his medical studies commencing in the fall of 1873, and being pursued under his first preceptor, Dr. Bradley, in 1874-5. In the winter of these years he attended lectures at the Chicago Medical College, after which he returned to his home and practiced for several months, or until his election to the office of

A. N. Ross

Superintendent of Schools of Clark County. He filled that position with zeal and credit from December, 1875, until 1877, when he returned to Chicago to complete his medical studies, and graduated from the Chicago Medical College in March, 1878.

Having thus obtained his professional degree, Dr. Pearce established himself at Darwin, Clark County, where he continued for more than twenty-one years to advance in standing as a physician and surgeon, and to endear himself to a large clientele as a family counselor and a sympathetic man. Since November, 1899, he has been located at Marshall, where his former reputation for everything honorable and skillful as a physician and a citizen has been sustained and extended. His long practice has been encouragingly remunerative, and besides owning valuable property in Marshall he possesses a farm of one hundred and sixty-eight acres near Darwin and one of one hundred and sixty acres in Vigo County, Ind. In politics he is a firm Republican and has held a number of township offices in Clark County. In his professional relations he is connected with the Esculapian Society of the Wabash Valley, the Clark County Medical Society and the State Medical Society, and is Medical Examiner for several lodges and insurance associations. Fraternally he is identified with Marshall Lodge, No. 133, A. F. & A. M., and with Eureka Lodge, No. 64, I. O. O. F., of which he is secretary.

Dr. Pearce has been married, his union with Martha E. Huffington occurring in Clark County, January 1, 1874. His wife was born near Indianapolis, Marion County, Indiana, and was the daughter of Edward and Harriet (Turner) Huffington, natives respectively of Maryland and New England. She died March 11, 1904. By this marriage there were five children, four of whom are living: Homer, residing at Bloomington, Illinois, who married Effie Baker, of Clark County, and has three children; Effie Estella, wife of Ira Morrill, who is living in Adrian, Mich., the mother of two children: Edmund R., who married Jessie Hanley, resides at Darwin, Illinois, and is the father of one child; Milo, who died at the age of ten years, and John, who lives at home.

Dr. Pearce died 1905

PERDUE, John Charles.—John C. Perdue, the late Postmaster of Marshall, and a high-minded citizen and public official, was a native of Clark County, being born near Westfield on the 14th of August, 1863. He was the son of Charles Wesley and Martha (Malloy) Perdue, his father, who was a bridge contractor, dying five years ago. The Malloy family came to Clark County when the daughter was a child. Both parents are now deceased, and the son whose life is to be briefly here reviewed passed away on the 28th of December, 1904, his death being a sharp blow to those who were his intimates and the occasion of widespread regret to the community, which considered the loss of his earnestness, usefulness and honorable ability as little short of a public calamity.

John C. Perdue was educated in the district and high schools, graduating at the Marshall High School and entering a successful career as a teacher which covered a period of eight years. His talents both for imparting knowledge and maintaining discipline were of such a noticeable order that his friends and Republican constituents put him forward as a candidate for Superintendent of Schools of Clark County, and he was placed in that office by a handsome majority, retaining the position by efficiency, impartiality and general ability as an educator for four years. Mr. Perdue had previously studied law for three years, chiefly under the guidance of Messrs. Golden and Hamil, and was therefore well qualified to assume the County Judgeship, with which he was next honored. Pressing private duties had prevented him from finishing his course and being admitted to practice, but his mind was naturally logical and he absorbed sufficient legal information, with his practical wisdom and broad experience of the world, to enable him to fill the office to the satisfaction both of lawyers and litigants. He continued as County Judge for three and a half years, and then resigned from the bench to accept the Postmastership of Marshall under President Roosevelt. This position he was admirably filling at the time of his death in December, 1904, when the duties devolved upon his wife, Mrs. Etta (Metz) Perdue, who was reappointed by the Government as Postmistress on January 28, 1905.

The deceased was a faithful member of the Methodist Church, and was widely and prominently known in fraternal circles, being identified with the Masons, I. O. O. F., Court of Honor and American Workmen. He was Secretary of the Odd Fellows' Lodge for fifteen years, was long a member of the Committee on Laws and Rituals of the Court of Honor and had passed all the chairs in the Knights of Pythias.

John C. Perdue was married at Marshall October 27, 1886, to Miss Etta Metz, daughter of Jacob Metz (whose biography appears elsewhere) and Harriet (Smith) Metz, natives, respectively, of Germany and of Stark County, Ohio. Mrs. Perdue was born in Clark County and her father and mother are both living with her. She is a woman of unusual intelligence and executive ability, and under her management the affairs of the postoffice are conducted with promptitude and smoothness. Six children were born of her union with Mr. Perdue—Earl M., Artie J., Benjamin W., Harry, Mary E. and Theodore Charles.

PETERS, W. S.—One of the most venerable and honored citizens of Clark County is W. S. Peters, of Casey, for many years a successful and respected merchant and one of the best known raisers of hogs in this section of the State. The Peters and Bennett families, who are connected by marriage, originated in Germany, their American founders settling in Pennsylvania at an early day.

W. S. Peters is a native of Butler County, Ohio, born September 3, 1823, the son of Philip and Anna (Bennett) Peters, both natives of the Keystone State. His father was born September 25, 1771, and his mother, September 12, 1776, and both were of the sturdy farming class for which Pennsylvania has always been noted. Philip Peters lost his parents when quite young, and is said to have been raised by an Indian squaw, who had been a domestic in the family and become deeply attached to the boy. He was a life-long farmer, and eventually the father of eleven children, his migration from Pennsylvania to his homestead in Butler County, Ohio, occurring in 1807 by means of a keel boat down the Ohio River. In his new home he became a leading farmer and citizen—in politics, first a Jacksonian Democrat and later a Whig—and died on the Butler County farm August 17, 1855, his wife surviving him until July 29, 1863.

Jacob Bennett, the maternal grandfather, was a Pennsylvania cavalryman in Washington's army, serving in that branch until the close of the Revolutionary War, and it was during the progress of that conflict that Anna Bennett, who was to become the mother of W. S. Peters, was brought into the world by his wife, Anna (Hoagland) Bennett. Jacob Bennett died July 26, 1829.

W. S. Peters received most of his literary education in a little log schoolhouse in Butler County, but by self-application he was able to make such advancement in his studies as qualified him to teach for about four years. He also worked on his father's farm, and finally became manager of his interests, later entering a general store as a clerk and continuing in that capacity for six years. On January 7, 1858, he married Miss Elizabeth Wilson, and located four miles south of Casey, where for about two years he worked rented land. Mr. Peters then bought 190 acres of partially improved land in Johnson Township, which he cultivated and made more valuable by the addition of new buildings and other agricultural conveniences. After being thus busily and profitably engaged for five years he sold the property at a profit, and in 1866 moved to Hamilton, Ohio, where he engaged in feeding hogs. As illustrative of his good judgment and foresight in this business, it may be stated that upon one occasion he bought ten thousand head at ten cents a pound, gross weight, paid forty-five cents per bushel for the corn with which he fattened them, and then sold his hogs at a figure that netted him over three thousand dollars that season. After his first wife's death, in 1866, he returned to Casey, and continued in the same line of business, in company with his brother-in-law, Glennon Wilson. In the spring of 1867 Mr. Peters opened a general merchandise store, conducting it for two years and then disposing of the business to Wilson Brothers resumed the raising of hogs, in which he continued for two years. In this line he has always been remarkably successful, and finally brought himself to a position which insured him an ample competency for life.

Mr. Peter's second marriage occurred October 12, 1870, at Terre Haute, Ind., to Mary J. (Lang) Thom, daughter of John and Mary (McLaren) Lang, both natives of Scotland. Mrs. Peters had four sisters and two brothers, three of the former being still alive. Her father died March 10, 1872, and her mother, July 20, 1877. Allie, the only child of Mr. and Mrs. Peters, married Harry B. Lee, now deceased, became the mother of two sons, and is now living with her parents.

Mr. and Mrs. Lang, the parents of Mrs. Peters, were married in Scotland and came to Harper's Ferry, Va., about 1830, and in 1840 located at Casey, Ill., selecting land upon which the Peters residence now stands. Mr. Lang afterwards platted his land into lots, selling some and dividing the rest among his children. The paternal grandfather was a tea merchant, and died at Jamaica, while Grandmother McLaren was a descendant of Lady Mary Balfour and died in Alvin, Scotland.

After his second marriage Mr. Peters went into the hotel and livery business in Casey, conducting the National House, situated where Rudey's new block now stands. He continued the combined business for six years and the livery alone, six years thereafter, practically retiring from all active work in May, 1877. He still owns one hundred and ten acres of finely cultivated and modernly improved land. At one time he owned one hundred and fifty acres which he platted and laid off into lots, and sold as Peters First and Second Additions to the city. The First Addition was made in 1893 and the Second in 1896. Mr. Peters still retains the ownership of fifty-two acres of the old Ohio homestead. Mr. and Mrs. Peters are members of the Methodist Church, the former contributing to the support of both the Methodist and Presbyterian organizations.

Mr. Peters' voting period extends into the days when the Great Compromiser was in his prime, and he records the fact that he cast his first ballot for Henry Clay, the Whig candidate for President. Later he voted for Abraham Lincoln, the Republican candidate, with equal enthusiasm, and has never changed his politics since, although in local elections he votes on the score of personal fitness and the best interests of the home community. His fraternal identification is confined to Odd Fellowship.

PHELPS, A. S., M. D.—Evolution in the world of affairs presents no more startling and apparently permanent phase than the substitution of young in place of older men as bearers of the great responsibilities of the commonwealth. And whereas wealth of years and gray hairs formerly seemed the necessary accompaniment of those who enjoyed the largest confidence as overseers of the life, health, government and finances of the community, ready recognition now is given the qualities which produce results, irrespective of the time supposed to have been spent in the development of these qualities. It is this augury of the increasing wisdom of the race which is bringing into the limelight and encouraging men of versatile and early development, men with purpose, who unerringly plow their way through the stubble of obstacle and opposition, to places of high honor and preferment. An expression of this sort of energy and determination is found in the comparatively brief career of Dr. A. S. Phelps, who, at the age of thirty-five, is prosecuting a successful medical and surgical practice at Martinsville, and in addition is the present Mayor of the town, and President of the First National Bank.

For the doggedness and perseverance which are characterizing his activities, Mr. Phelps is partially indebted to his English ancestry. He was born in Delaware, Delaware County, Iowa, March 20, 1872, while his parents, Roderick and Mary (Snow) Phelps, were natives of New York State, and were married in Oneida County, the same State. They moved from New York to Iowa in 1857, where the father continued his occupation as contractor of railroad construction, and from where he moved to Edgewood, Iowa, in 1885. In 1890 the family located in their present home in Martinsville, the elder Phelps being at present eighty-seven years old. Both of his sons, A. S. and C. R., are physicians, and the latter is a resident of Casey, Clark County.

A. S. Phelps followed the changing fortunes of his parents until he entered a Chicago high school in the fall of 1892. After completing the course he entered Hahnemann College, Chicago, and after his graduation in 1900 located in Martinsville, with the affairs of which he since has been conspicuously identified. Dr. Phelps is a member of the Illinois Medical Society, the Eastern Illinois Medical Society and the American Institute of Homeopathy. He is fraternally active, and is identified with the Masons, Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Modern Woodmen of America. Ever since casting his first Presidential vote he has presented such claims upon official recognition as public-spiritedness, rare executive ability and keen knowledge of community government and requirements, and he was elected chief executive of the town of Martinsville in the spring of 1904, his tenure of office extending until the spring of 1907. He became President of the First National Bank in 1903, and that institution thus is assured a safe, conservative and dependable management.

March 15, 1902, Dr. Phelps was united in marriage to Viola Sanford, of Casey, Ill. Dr. Phelps is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Professionally, he represents the sanest and most practical tenets of homeopathy, and his usefulness is augmented by a knowledge of many sciences, and such philosophies of life as more and more go hand in hand with the prevention as well as cure of human ills. He has initiative, force of character, a high ethical culture, and that keen sense of genial humor without which men ascend with difficulty the tortuous ways of distinction.

PHILIPS, Thomas Whitaker.—The substantial position occupied by Mr. Phillips among the farmers of Clark County results from his recognized worth of character and energy of temperament. Since coming to his present farm about the year 1893 he has devoted his attention largely to its cultivation, but in addition, since February, 1903, has operated leased oil lands which, at this writing, have five wells producing about 4,000 barrels weekly. The farm comprises seventy-five acres in Section 10, Johnson Township, all of which presents an appearance of thrift and comfort indicative of the owner's resource and determination. In his work he has been patient, persevering and sagacious; discouragements have not proved a handicap to his determined spirit, nor have successes caused him to become unduly elated, but whatever the nature of his ventures, he has preserved his equanimity of disposition, and his faith in his country and commonwealth.

During much of his life Mr. Phillips has made his home in Clark County, Ill., to which his parents came from Clark County, Ind., in July, 1851, settling in Dolson Township. Born December 15, 1844, he is a son of James and Elizabeth Phillips, natives of Knox County, Ohio, and Clark County, Ind., respectively, and who, after their removal to Clark County, Ill., entered forty acres from the Government and laid a land warrant for 160 acres, on which they made their home for a long period. After the death of the mother in Dolson Township, the father removed to the Indian Territory, and eventually died there near Tulsa, in the Creek Nation. Of his five children, Thomas Whitaker was the first born; another son was in Flagstaff, Ariz., when last heard from, while two daughters are still living, one being the wife of Ammishah Murphy, of Auburn Township, Clark County, while the other, Arabel, is married to Jennings Mappings, of Martinsville.

Few of the present generation of Clark County realize the hardships endured by the old settlers. Where now are fertile farms and populous towns, there then were vast forests inhabited by game, with here and there a rude cabin sending forth its hospitable smoke into the clear, unpolluted air. It has been the mission of Thomas Whitaker Phillips to help clear away this timber, to till the land and gather the harvests, and to form, out of limited assets and educational and other opportunities, his present substantial competence. The turning point in his life was his marriage, April 9, 1865, to Rachel A. McDonald, a poor girl who had made her living working out for from twenty-five to fifty cents a week, remuneration which in those days was considered eminently fair returns. Mrs. Phillips was a daughter of Edward and Nancy McDonald, natives of Ohio, and who removed to Indiana at an early day, later becoming pioneers of Dolson Township, Clark County, Ill., where they occupied rented land. Mr. and Mrs. Phillips had no assets save the clothes on their backs when they undertook the responsibility of uniting their fortunes, and the clothes were of a very inferior quality. At that time Mr. Phillips's everyday clothes were spun by his wife and made by his mother. The first year the young people occupied a farm in Dolson Township, which they farmed for the third, the next year for the half, and the third year for the first horse and cow he had ever owned. For three years he continued renting, each year getting two-thirds of the profits. In 1867 he moved to Johnson Township and bought forty acres of land for $500, and it took twenty years to pay back at ten per cent. the $200 which he found it necessary to borrow at that time. Money was scarce and wages extremely low, and Mr. Phillips used to cut down timber for sixty-five cents a day, and split rails for seventy-five cents a thousand. Eventually he sold his farm for a thousand dollars, and bought the place where he now lives, and which was so thickly covered with timber that there was hardly room for a single building. He soon, however, had enough cleared for a cornfield, but he worked steadily and almost uninterruptedly, and midnight often found him still engaged in burning brush or clearing away stumps. At present his farm is mostly tillable, and is entirely unincumbered, and he has added land adjoining until he now owns an extensive tract, besides 111 acres of oil land valued at a hundred thousand dollars.

Besides rearing a family of their own, Mr. and Mrs. Phillips have given a home to four motherless grandchildren: Rosie, William, Maggie and James Phillips. These children are the sons and daughters of their son, Hosea, who was born September 11, 1868, and married Cyndia Hendricks, who died in November, 1904. Hosea was the second son, the oldest being Homer, born November 30, 1866, and now deceased. The third son, James, was born October 21, 1871, and operates a farm in Casey Township. By his first marriage to Abarrilla Robinson he has two children, Lela and Bessie, of whom the former is deceased. The fifth son, Henry, was born August 6, 1875, married Nora Devol, and has three children, Charles, Mayme and Myrtle. The sixth son, Charles, was born January 22, 1878, married Maude Connelly, and has one son, Glenn; his home is in Johnson Township. The seventh son, John, born December 16, 1881, is still with his parents, as is also the tenth son, Alba, born November 25, 1887. The eighth son, Omer, born August 30, 1883, married Essie Floyd, and has two children, George Thomas, born February 13, 1905, and Theo Marie, born January 15, 1907. The ninth son, William, born February 26, 1886, and the only daughter, Minnie, born May 3, 1890, are both deceased. The fourth son, born in 1874, also is deceased.

The cause of the public schools has had a firm supporter in Mr. Phillips, who, by a service of six years as School Trustee, and by continuous interest in the upbuilding of the country schools, has been of the greatest aid to the educational work of this district. In politics he always has supported Democratic men and measures. For four years he served as Constable and for three years as Road Commissioner. His interest in good roads is only secondary to his interest in good schools. Both movements he considers of vital importance to his community, and he contributes intelligent assistance to other local enterprises, being at all times in thorough sympathy with progress and enlightenment. Mr. Phillips's mental and physical vigor would seem to refute the lines which he has penned as indicative of his present condition—

"I am getting old and useless,
My hair is turning gray,
For sixty years of frost and snow
Have quickly passed away;
I know I'm fast declining,
My race is almost run,
But few the tasks I've left behind
That one could call undone.
Soon other flowers will blossom,
And other hands than mine
Will reap the harvest that I've sowed,
And in death have left behind."

POORMAN, Arthur Garfield.—Though brief in extent, the professional career of Arthur Garfield Poorman has been filled with meritorious achievement, and may be taken as typical of what might reasonably be expected of a young man reared among the largeness and freedom of the Western prairies, and whose equipment, ideals and purposes seemed in harmony with the demands of the beginning of the twentieth century. Mr. Poorman was born on a farm near Anthony, Harper County, Kan., August 25, 1880, and is a son of Benjamin F. and Beulah A. Poorman, the former of whom was a miller by trade and a farmer by preferred occupation.

Mr. Poorman was educated in the common schools and in Union Christian College, which he entered in 1896, and from which he graduated in 1900. His professional training was acquired in the Law Department of the University of Illinois, where he remained during the scholastic year following the fall of 1900, and at the University of Michigan, which he entered in the fall of 1901, and from which he graduated in 1903. From early youth he had made himself useful around his father's mill, and his summer's continued devoted to this occupation until entering the University of Michigan. Arriving in Marshall in the fall of 1903, he met with almost instant encouragement, and the following year became interested in politics as a candidate for State's Attorney, his election following in November, 1904. His official services were well received throughout, and his reputation perceptibly strengthened as a conscientious, capable and thoroughly equipped pleader at the bar.

Fraternally, Mr. Poorman is identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, which he joined in West Union, this State, in January, 1903, and he became a member of the Knights of Pythias, of Marshall, in January, 1905. During the Spanish-American War he enlisted for service, but owing to a fracture of the left arm did not get farther than Columbus, Ohio. Mr. Poorman has a magnetic and pleasing personality, and seems destined for a life of great worth and usefulness.

PORTER, James.—The business of the Post-office Department in Martinsville has been ably and energetically dispatched since 1900 by James Porter, one of the most popular Postmasters that the community ever has known. During his administration a continuous advance in the efficiency of the department has been noted, and in 1902, coincident with Mr. Porter's reappointment, it was raised to the third, or Presidential, class. A faithful and competent corps of assistants work in harmony with their chief, and reflect his method, courtesy and appreciation of responsibility.

The son of Jesse C. and Harriet (Miller) Porter, natives of Muskingum County, Ohio, Mr. Porter was born in Martinsville November 15, 1873, and is indebted for all of his advantages to the town which he now is serving in an official capacity. His father came here during the latter part of the Civil War, and for several years operated a general store in partnership with his brother, Samuel Porter. He was a progressive and useful member of society, and at the time of his death in 1888, left both a material and moral legacy to those dependent on him. He lived to round out sixty-three years, while his wife, who died in 1881, was forty-eight years old. They were the parents of a large family of children, nine of whom are living. Mr. Porter was not active in politics, but he was a zealous member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

James Porter inaugurated his independent career as a clerk for W. G. De Lashmuth, general merchant of Martinsville, with whom he remained several years. He next engaged in the fire and life insurance business, with which he still is connected. He was educated in the public schools, but has gained more from practical experience and observation than from between the covers of books. In 1896 Mr. Porter married Hattie Bean, and of the union there are two children. Mr. Porter is a prominent fraternalist, and identified with the Masons and Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He has sufficient push, good judgment and general knowledge to win success in several lines of activity, and a code of business ethics which is bound to win respect and confidence wherever practiced.

PREVO, James.—James Prevo was born in Clark County, Ill., in 1846. He is the son of Ira Prevo, who was a native of Clark County, Ill., and who moved into the county in the year 1815. The mother of our subject was Amanda Hurst, a native of Virginia. She died in 1857. James Prevo was married to his first wife, Anna Kirby, in 1879. The results of this marriage was the birth of five children, one boy and four girls. Two of these girls are married and one is dead. The son resides at Shelburn, Ind. Mr. Prevo's first wife and the mother of these children died in September, 1891. Mr. Prevo was married the second time to Katherine Smith, on November 11, 1896. Mr. Prevo leans to the Quaker faith, while his wife's preference in religious matters is that of the Lutheran Church. Ira, the father of our subject, was a brother of Henry, William and Samuel Prevo, all prominent citizens in their day in Clark County, all early settlers and all now, including the father of our subject, gone to that bourne from which no traveler returns. They all lived long, laborious and useful lives, and the world was made better by their having lived.

James Prevo knows how to farm, and he is one of the most upright and respected citizens of York Township, the township in which he was born and raised, and in which he will probably live until death.

PREVO, Samuel, Sr.—Samuel Prevo, a prosperous retired farmer and the present Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of Clark County, was born December 29, 1840, on the banks of the Wabash River, York Township, Clark County.

Rev Geo. Sandoe

He comes of a long line of American yeomen, and his parents, Samuel and Elizabeth (Evans) Prevo were both natives of North Carolina, although they came as children with their fathers and mothers to this county, where they were married and with which they were long identified.

Samuel attended the district schools of his township, then held in the rude, typical log houses, and his education therein was as crude as it was limited. When the boy was eight years of age he had the misfortune to lose his father and his mother at about the same time, and, thus orphaned, he was placed in the family of his uncle, where he was reared to the age of twenty years. He then enlisted in Company A, Thirty-first Indiana Volunteer Infantry, being mustered into the service at Terre Haute, Ind., September 20, 1861. His company was first moved to Kentucky (the regimental commander being Colonel Cruft), and subsequently participated in the battles of Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Perryville, Stone River, Chickamauga, and lesser engagements, being also a part of Sherman's grand army on its march to the sea. Three years were covered by this arduous and perilous service, and although Mr. Prevo escaped unscathed he fell temporarily into the clutches of the Confederates at Stone River. He was honorably discharged from the service of his country at Louisville, Ky., in September, 1864, and returned at once to his home in Clark County.

Since the war and until his retirement in the fall of 1901, Mr. Prevo has engaged continuously in farming on a large and scientific scale. After renting land for a time he saved sufficient money to buy (in 1865) 250 acres situated in York and Darwin Townships, Clark County; he purchased the land at from ten to forty dollars per acre, but by careful methods of fertilization, rotation and generally modern cultivation, added to his industry and judgment in the addition of building improvements, he has more than doubled the value of the property. When the estate came into his hands part of the land was timbered; this he has mostly cleared. As all the transformation from virtually raw land to a comfortable, attractive, modern country homestead was accomplished by his individual labors and management he took just pride in the property, a portion of which he still retains. In October, 1901, upon his removal to

Marshall he purchased a pleasant home for the declining years of himself and his good wife, who has been so large a part of his progressive and useful life. Mr. Prevo is a leading Democrat of his section, has held several township offices and for the past two years has been honored with the Chairmanship of the County Board of Supervisors. He has been connected with the Masonic fraternity since 1867, when he joined the order at Old York, Clark County, and both his sons are also identified with it. Specifically, he is a member of Euclaid Lodge, No. 573, of Terre Haute.

On November 25, 1868, Mr. Prevo married Miss Mary Mitchell, daughter of Dr. John and Elizabeth (Welsh) Mitchell. Mrs. Prevo's father was an old practitioner of Clark County, who died in 1891, and her mother was a typical Kentucky lady. Six children were born to the union of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Prevo: John D., a resident of Marshall; Stanley and Carlton, who died at the ages respectively of fourteen and thirteen months; Edith, wife of Harry Dulaney, whose biography is elsewhere published; who died February 20, 1901, at the age of twenty, and Samuel, Jr., who resides in Marshall and is a civil engineer with the Ohio Oil Company. Sam Prevo Jr. died 1934.

PREWETT, G. W., M. D.—For a score of years Dr. G. W. Prewett has ministered to the physical woes of the people of Marshall, and in connection therewith has made himself a valuable and many-sided adjunct to the prosperity of the town in general. Having a thorough knowledge of his profession, he has won confidence and support by his able diagnosis and treatment of perplexing and apparently hopeless cases, and by the great good he has done regardless of financial remuneration. His cheery and inspiring presence has come to be regarded as a household necessity in many parts of the town and surrounding country, and he is especially the friend and helper of the children of the community.

Dr. Prewett is a native of Marion County, Ill., where he was born May 18, 1849. He is the eighth oldest of the five sons and five daughters of Stokes and Minerva (See) Prewett, natives of Virginia, and the former born in Mason County. The family was early established in Illinois, and all of the children started in life with a thorough knowledge of farming. In order of their birth the children are as follows: Analine; Dr. R. C.; Bernard; Vernal F.; Dr. S. D. and Ava, who are deceased; Margaret, wife of A. W. O'Brien, of Ashley, this State; Dellia, wife of Dick Markle, of Marshall; Dr. G. W.; and Angelin, widow of Simon Cockrall.

As will be seen, medicine seems to have been a family attraction, for three of the sons have qualified as practitioners, and two of them preceded the present representative as popular professional men of Marshall. Dr. G. W. Prewett, gaining his preliminary education in the public schools of Marion County, was the youngest son of his parents to seek professional honors, and he graduated from the Missouri Medical College in the spring of 1882. The following five years he practiced medicine and surgery in Livingston, this State, and in 1887 came to Marshall, his present home.

As a staunch Democrat Dr. Prewett has held many important local offices, including that of Mayor, to which he was elected in 1898, as opposing the saloons. He was a member of the Board of Education for twelve years, and during President Cleveland's administration was Pension Examiner for four years. He is prominent in fraternal circles, and is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Modern Woodmen of America and the Court of Honor. Since early manhood he has been connected with the Baptist Church, of which he is a Trustee and Moderator. The marriage of Dr. Prewett and Susan M. Crozier occurred in Salem, this State, September 4, 1873. Mrs. Prewett is a native of Illinois, and daughter of Archibald and Martha (O'Melvaney) Crozier. Dr. and Mrs. Prewett are the parents of two children—Gertrude died at the age of four years, and Edna is the wife of Frank Brosman, of Marshall. Dr. Prewett is numbered among the substantial and cultivated gentlemen of Marshall, and his life and labor reaches out in practical helpfulness to hundreds of grateful people.

PRICE, Joseph V.—The pursuit of agriculture, as much as any of the vocations which combine art and science, prepares the intelligent and observing follower for many of the wage earning thoroughfares of existence. From the open fields he has gained courage and outlook, initiative has come from his importance as a part of a whole, the necessity of saving and the limitations of his needs have made him a natural economist, and the advantages of realizing as much as possible from many and sometimes small sources has cast him in the mold of the finished trader, whether he will or no. At best the young man of twenty-one who is thoroughly trained in agriculture has gained strength of character and definiteness of purpose which cannot but apply to the betterment of the town to which he transfers his allegiance. To this class belongs Joseph V. Price, President of the Eagle Bank, and since 1882 engaged in the lumber business in Casey.

Mr. Price is a native of Licking County, Ohio, and was born December 3, 1850. His forefathers were of the South, and his parents, O. E. and Margaret (Van Metra) Price, were born in Maryland and Virginia, respectively, the former in 1818, and the latter in 1825. The family moved from Ohio to Crawford County, Ohio, during the latter '50s, and there Joseph V. combined farming and schooling to the end that he developed ambitions towards other lines of activity. At the age of twenty-seven he engaged in the mercantile business in Annapolis, Crawford County, and in 1880 came to Casey and devoted his energies to a grocery and restaurant business. In 1882 he engaged in the lumber business with Morrell Sanford, and the year after the death of Mr. Sanford, which occurred in 1885, succeeded to the lumber business, which in the meantime he has greatly improved and enlarged, until it is one of the best in the county. He became President of the Eagle Bank in 1903, and since its organization, has assisted in making that monetary institution one of the substantial and confidence inspiring ones in this part of the State.

In political affiliation, Mr. Price is a Democrat, and while not aspiring to official distinction, he has lent practical support to the local undertakings of his party. He is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of Casey, and in religion, is a Methodist, as is also his wife, who formerly was C. Naomi South, daughter of Henry P. and Matilda (Parson) South, the former of whom was born in Kentucky, and the latter in Nova Scotia. The South family has been connected with Indiana history for many years. The marriage of Mr. Price occurred January 30, 1881. He is the owner of a valuable farm of 192 acres in Casey Township, near the oil district. Having the elements of popularity and influence, he is accounted one of the strong and forceful business factors of the township.

PRICHARD, I. F.—For the past eighteen years the furniture and undertaking business of I. F. Prichard has weathered the rise and depression of trade in the town of Marshall, and has drawn to itself the constant and increasing recognition of people widely scattered over Clark County. Mr. Prichard carries a large line of general furniture, and on occasions has a showing of really elaborate and artistic designs. Starting in with the art of funeral directing as then conducted, he has made rapid advancement in the scientific part of his profession, and his methods now conform to the highest standards and methods known to his contemporaries in work.

Mr. Prichard was born September 18, 1857, in Bluffs, Ind., and in the same State were born his parents, A. D. and Jane (Wishard) Prichard, in 1825 and 1835, respectively. He was educated in the common schools and the university at Greencastle, Ind., and began his present business in Marshall, Ill., May 26, 1888. Mr. Prichard married Emma Wolf, also a native of Indiana, and born in Terre Haute, April 16, 1859. Mr. and Mrs. Prichard are the parents of three children: Amos D., born October 15, 1887; Helen, born October 24, 1889; and Elizabeth J., born September 7, 1903. Mr. Prichard is fraternally connected with the A. F. & A. M., Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias and the Red Men, of Marshall. He finds a religious home in the Congregational Church. He is one of the most intelligent, well educated, and well liked men following his business in Clark County, and he is the owner of an enterprise which reflects great credit upon his progress, sagacity and appreciation of the needs of the community.

PURDUNN, Charles A.—An index to the character of Charles A. Purdunn is to be found in the fact that during a business career of thirty-five years he has allowed himself but seven weeks of leisure. That such unusual application is not attended by a breakdown of mental and physical vigor is due largely to moderation, method and preservation of reserve force, and to an even distribution of the energy so variously directed. Also he is a master of detail and completeness, leaving no task unfinished to encroach upon the time or prerogative of another.

Without any special encouragement or advantages in his youth, Mr. Purdunn has filled a large place in the community of Marshall. Born in Trenton, N. J., June 27, 1854, he is a son of George and Mary Purdunn, the former of whom was born in New Jersey and the latter in Ireland. His father was connected with the Pennsylvania Railroad for many years, but with his wife now is deceased. Charles A. went from the common schools to the normal, remaining in the latter but a year. He subsequently spent two years in a college of pharmacy, and with this preparation for self-support moved from New Jersey to Ohio in 1873, in 1878 locating in Champaign, Ill., where he engaged in the drug business until 1880. He then disposed of his stock and moved to Marshall, where for sixteen years, or until 1897, he conducted an up-to-date and successful drug business. Since then he has engaged in other lines of work.

Parallel with his business life has gone almost uninterrupted political activity, for which Mr. Purdunn has evidenced marked capacity. He subscribes to Democratic principles, and was elected to the Thirty-fifth, Forty-first and Forty-second General Assemblies of Illinois, filling the office of Mayor of Marshall during 1900-1901. He has made a profound and practical study of penal, industrial and benevolent institutions in the State, and now is President of the Board of Prison Industries of Illinois, and a member of the Board of Managers of the Illinois State Reformatory. In all, he has held appointive offices under Governors Altgeld, Tanner, Yates and Deneen. He is a member of the National Democratic Club, of New York City. Fraternally, he is connected with the Masonic order, having joined the same in 1880.

In Wyoming, Ohio, in 1878, occurred the marriage of Mr. Purdunn and Jennie Carson. Mrs. Purdunn died in 1889, leaving a son, George G., now twenty-four years of age. In April, 1900, Mr. Purdunn married Mattie Mayer, of Marshall, Ill., and of the union there are two children: Alice, aged four years; and Carson, aged two years. Mr. Purdunn is a public-spirited and highly esteemed gentleman, and is a sincere believer in those advanced agencies which secure to the greatest number of people the largest health, prosperity and happiness.

RATTS, Robert B.—Since its establishment in Martinsville in 1898, the furniture and undertaking business of Robert B. Ratts has proved of stable and increasing importance to the community. Mr. Ratts is a man of diversified business experience and from it has gained a broad knowledge of human nature, and an adaptability and resourcefulness in dealing with the purchasing public. He carries a large stock of furniture, and is in a position to meet the most exacting demands in the line of funeral furnishings and service.

In Dalson Township, Clark County, where he was born July 9, 1861, Mr. Ratts received a practical education in the district schools, and as he was the oldest son and second oldest child of six sons and five daughters, he was taught to shoulder responsibility at a comparatively early age. Rinehart Ratts, the father of this large family, came from Indiana to Edgar County, Ill., in the early '50s, bringing with him his wife, formerly Mary Heinze, who died soon after. He subsequently married Lydia Wilson, a native of Illinois, and with his new wife settled in Dolson Township, where he eventually became the owner of 400 acres of land, and where he died at the age of sixty-three years. He was an enterprising and public spirited farmer, promoting education, politics, and the general good of the community, and honored for his strict integrity and loyalty to friends and interests.

The marriage of Robert B. Ratts and Bula T. Kester occurred August 30, 1886. Mrs. Ratts was born in Westfield, Clark County, in 1863, and is a daughter of Jackson and Rebecca Kester, early settlers and prosperous farmers of Clark County. Soon after his marriage Mr. Ratts came to Martinsville Township and operated a farm two years, in 1885 locating in Martinsville proper, where he engaged in the carriage manufacturing and repairing business until starting his present business in 1898. For a time also he engaged in the implement business in connection with the manufactory. Politically Mr. Ratts is a Democrat, and he has served as a member of the Town Board two terms and of the School Board one term. He is fraternally identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, No 134, of Martinsville, and he is a member of the Christian Church. He is ambitious and enterprising, has the confidence of the community, and that determination and perseverance which should weather all depressions of trade and spirit.

READ, P. E.—The qualities of reliability, sagacity and progressiveness essential to successful merchandising are possessed by P. E. Read, dealer in harness, vehicles and farming implements in the town of Marshall, and since 1888 one of the active business men of this part of Clark County. Mr. Read was born February 11, 1861, in Athens County, Ohio, the Buckeye State being the birthplace also of his parents, William and Mahala (Bean) Read, who had in all two sons and three daughters: Wallace, Fannie, P. E., Eva and Eliza. William Read was a farmer by occupation, and in politics a Democrat. His death occurred in Clark County in 1903.

P. E. Read was five years old when his family settled in Dalson Township, Clark County, and he was educated in the public schools of Dalson and Auburn Townships. At the age of twenty-three years he was united in marriage to Mary Michael, a native of Auburn Township, and daughter of A. H. Michael, one of the pioneers of Clark County. Mrs. Read's mother was formerly Frances Hurst, who was born and reared in Clark County. She was the parent of four sons and four daughters, all of them born in Clark County. Mr. Read started housekeeping in a home of his own construction on his father's farm, and in 1888 bought out the harness business of C. H. Michael, in Marshall. Success crowned his efforts as a merchant, and he gradually has enlarged his business, adding buggies, wagons and other vehicles, and finally agricultural implements. He has a steady patronage, including many of the foremost people in the town and county, and his reputation for reliability and obligingness insures him a continuation of his present good fortune.

Although not hidebound in his convictions, Mr. Read upholds the principles of the Democratic party, and has actively supported many of his office-aspiring friends. Fraternally, he is connected with the Court of Honor, of Marshall, and in religion he is a Baptist. Mr. and Mrs. Read are the parents of five daughters:

Flossie, Ethel, Jessie, Celia and Alma. Mr. Read is public-spirited and enterprising, and fully deserves the confidence of the community in which he lives.

REECE, Lot M.—Lot M. Reece was born in Licking County, Ohio, October 10, 1844, and moved to Clark County in 1869. He is a son of John and Nancy Reece, natives of Wales and New Jersey, respectively, and both of whom died in Ohio. August 12, 1869, Mr. Reece married Hannah Handley, a native of Ohio, and daughter of David and Rebecca Handley. Mr. and Mrs. Reece are the parents of ten children, seven daughters and three sons: Lucy Mandy, born May 3, 1870, married William Bartlett, and lives in Melrose Township; John David, born April 14, 1872, married Ellen Jackson, and lives in Anderson Township; Forest Myrtle, born February 22, 1874, married David Elston, and lives in Marshall, Ill.; Alma Estella, born February 22, 1876, married Lyman Wright, and lives in Dudley, Mo.; Edward Beecher died in infancy; James Frederick, born March 16, 1880, lives at home; Fannie Merandia, born November 27, 1884, lives at home; Sarah Milindia, born July 17, 1886, died June 8, 1904; Susan May, born November 17, 1888, lives at home; and Goldie Greetle, born December 26, 1892, is also at home. Three of the Reece daughters are married and all of the sons live in Clark County.

During the Civil War Mr. Reece served in the One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and he also has been a national guard. His farm of 160 acres is one of the best improved in Clark County, and speaks volumes for the thrift and energy and good judgment of the owner. He is a Republican in national politics, and has served as Assessor of his township for three terms. Although not members, he and his wife attend the Methodist Episcopal Church. He is highly respected by all who know him, and is one of the progressive and well informed men of his community.

ROBERTS, John H.—From 1864 until his lamented death, April 29, 1901, John H. Roberts was a resident of Martinsville, and during the greater part of that time was practically and honorably connected with the business interests of the community. For seven years he operated a grocery business and hotel with signal success, upon disposing of them, engaged in the restaurant business for about eleven years. Owing to ill health he then retired from active life, and spent his later years in the enjoyment of the competence won through industry and economy and fair dealing with his fellowmen. He was variously connected with the social life of the town, was very prominent in the lodges of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Masons, and was a member for sixty years of the Baptist Church. In politics he subscribed to the tenets of the Democratic party, and held several township offices, including that of member of the School Board and Collector.

On the whole Mr. Roberts led a calm and uneventful life, especially that part of it which preceded his arrival in Martinsville. He was born on a farm in Adams County, Ohio, March 10, 1822, and was a son of William and Elizabeth Roberts, natives of Virginia, and who settled in Ohio about 1818. In 1828 the family fortunes were shifted to Shelby County, Ind., where the parents died at advanced ages, the possessors of a fine and valuable farm property. John H., who was one in a large family of children, was educated in the public schools of Indiana, and in 1844 married Mary E. Laneger, a native of Indiana, and daughter of a neighboring farmer. In 1854 he came to Illinois and engaged in farming, and in 1860 his wife died, leaving five children: William, Phoebe, Levi, Calvin and George. In 1864 Mr. Roberts married Mary E. Welsh, a native of Ross County, Ohio, and born February 18, 1843. Mrs. Roberts is a daughter of James and Anna (Lockard) Welsh, natives of Virginia, early settlers of Ohio, and Illinois arrivals of 1848. The Welsh family is of English descent. Mr. Roberts left a small property and a name which, after the passing of six years, is recalled as that of an honest, generous and dependable man.

ROBERTS, Thomas Corwin.—Several successive generations of the Roberts family have been identified with American history, they having been established upon American soil prior to the War of the Revolution. The genealogical records show that John Roberts was born in Pennsylvania in 1761 and married Elizabeth Windows, of German descent, who was born in Pennsylvania, and, being left an orphan in early childhood, was reared by an aunt named Mary Bennett in the Keystone State. John Roberts brought his family to Jasper County, Ill. Among their children was a son, Harrison, who was born in Delaware County, Ohio, January 11, 1814, and there passed the years of youth and early manhood. There he met and married Mary Ann Jackson, who was born in that county August 14, 1814, being a daughter of John and Hannah Jackson, natives of Pennsylvania.

During the year 1842 Harrison Roberts brought his family to Illinois and settled in Jasper County, where he entered 240 acres of Government land. Shortly after his arrival in Illinois he enlisted in the Black Hawk War and aided in quelling the savages. With that exception he gave his attention closely to farm work and in due course of time improved a valuable tract and moved to Clark County in 1869, where he remained until his death on New Year's day of 1879. His son, Thomas Corwin, was born in Delaware County, Ohio, June 4, 1840, and was two years of age when the family settled upon their new land in Illinois. The hardships incident to existence on the then frontier were great, the difficulties many, and every child was put to work as soon as old enough to guide a plow or turn the spinning wheel. It being before the date of free schools in that locality, T. C. Roberts had few advantages. Indeed, his entire attendance at school was limited to a part of two winter terms in subscription schools, and it was not until he was serving in the Union army that he learned to read and write. Notwithstanding that late beginning he gained a fair education and today ranks among the well informed men of his locality.

When the Civil War began Mr. Roberts at once became an enthusiastic supporter of the Union cause. August 5, 1862, he was enrolled as a member of Company E, Ninety-seventh Illinois Infantry, in which he served for three years, being honorably discharged July 30, 1865. Among the engagements in which he took part were the following: Yazoo Swamp, Miss.; Arkansas Post, Ark.; Bayou Sears, La.; Blakely, Warrenton, Raymond, Magnolia Hill, Port Gibson, Champion Hill, Black River Bridge, siege of Jackson and siege of Vicksburg. In the latter siege he was injured May 16th by falling through a bridge on his back during a charge the regiment was making, but the injury did not prove serious, and on the Fourth of July he had the honor of placing the Union flag on the headquarters at Vicksburg when that city surrendered. At the close of the war he returned to Jasper County and resumed farming pursuits. April 7, 1870, he was united in marriage with Miss Palmyra, daughter of Cornelius Cohoon, and a native of Ohio. Her father was a son of John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, but through a misunderstanding with his family he refused to use their name, which he altered to Cohoon, and moved to Clark County in 1876. The children of Thomas C. and Palmyra Roberts were named as follows: Mary Etta, who was born July 25, 1871; Thomas Elmer, who was born October 15, 1873, and died October 21, 1898; Ora Victor, born September 3, 1875; Osa Everett, January 28, 1878; Rutherford E., January 8, 1880; Ida Purl, May 21, 1882; Cora Ethel, who was born November 1, 1885, and died when only one day old; Isa Dora, born June 15, 1887; and Truly Blanche, who was born January 31, 1891, and died September 17, 1892. By a previous marriage Mr. Roberts had a son, Joseph Tillman, born January 4, 1861. His first wife, whom he married March 11, 1860, and who bore the name of Eliza Ann Chapman, was a native of Illinois, of Kentuckian parentage, and died on New Year's day of 1869 at the family home in Jasper County.

The political views of Mr. Roberts have always been in accord with the Republican party and he has been a life-long supporter of the same. As a member of Coblenz Post, No. 272, G. A. R., he keeps in memory the stirring days of the 'sixties and his participation in the struggle for the preservation of the Union. Of his record as a soldier he has every reason to be proud, for he proved himself faithful, brave and loyal. Through all of his life he has never tasted tobacco or liquor, and when invited to indulge during his travels from home and during the hardships of army life he invariably declined, preferring weariness of flesh to artificial stimulants. Thus it was that he has never crossed the threshold of a saloon. High moral principles have governed all of his actions and among his acquaintances his name is a synonym of uprightness and honor.

ROMINES, William F.—The honesty, wholeheartedness and resourcefulness of a certain and indeed predominating class of our pioneers is nowhere better exemplified than in William Truly &c.

John Schofield,

F. Romines, with whose name and that of his father, Jasper Romines, is connected a kind of practical usefulness without which this State had never achieved its present splendid prosperity. Jasper Romines accompanied Clark County for about fifteen years of its history, or from the time of his arrival in 1832 until his death in 1847. William F. Romines and the country have grown old together, and his transformation from a lad of one year into a man upon whose shoulders rests the weight and experience of seventy-six years, is in no sense more remarkable than are the changes which have taken place in the county since his name first became associated with it.

Jasper Pomines was born in Tennessee and in early life moved to Virginia, where he married Mahala Wyrick. From Virginia to Clark County the couple traveled overland with wagon and team in 1832, locating first in Wabash Township, but later moving to a farm of one hundred and twenty acres south of Marshall, which Mr. Romines partially cleared and cultivated. Prior to his death he had surrounded himself and family with many comforts, and he left his name honored among the men who could endure hardship and patiently await the turn of the wheel of fortune. Of their three sons and three daughters three are deceased. After his death the wife sold the old place and bought another farm nearer Marshall, in 1854 moving into the town of Auburn, and still later locating on a farm to the southwest.

The oldest of his parents' children, William F. Romines was born in Wythe County, Va., January 25, 1831, and was but a few months old when the family started on their long overland jaunt. He thrived among the crudest surroundings and with the plainest of fare, and when old enough to walk the long distance gathered around the stove of the subscription school held in a log cabin on the prairie. Later he attended school in Marshall, and after completing the course engaged in farming on the home place for four years. In 1855 he moved to the town of Auburn and engaged in the grocery and gunsmith business for ten years, and in Auburn, in 1856, married Barbara Meskimen, a native of Guernsey County, Ohio, and born March 24, 1835. Mrs. Romines was a daughter of Abraham and Amelia Meskimen, farmers and early settlers of Ohio.

In 1865 Mr. Romines moved his family to his present farm of one hundred and sixty acres on Section 3, Auburn Township, and his good judgment and business ability soon enabled him to purchase more land until he owned seven hundred acres. No one disputes the fact that this farm is one of the most valuable, fertile, resourceful and well equipped in Clark County, and indeed in the Eastern part of the State. The labor and patience of forty-two years are apparent to all who would observe and profit by what they see. The beneficence of nature has been enlisted to serve the best purposes of mankind, the crops are the finest and the stock the best possible of development in the Central West. Nothing has been allowed to go to waste and scientific principles, as far as they were known to the owner, have been applied to the various departments of activity. The refinements as well as the profits of existence are apparent on every hand, and nowhere in the State are there more beautiful shade trees, finer fruit trees, better fences or more appropriate architecture for dwelling and general purposes. This farm is known throughout the breadth and length of Clark County, and stands as high in popular appreciation as does the honored family of which its owner is the capable and progressive head.

The three sons and one daughter born to Mr. and Mrs. Romines were christened Viola, LeRoy, Charles and Fred, and the last named died January 21, 1906. Le Roy married Minnie Snyder, of Casey, this county, and has four children; Don, Emil, Helen and Grace; Charles married Nora Blankenbeker, daughter of S. C. Blankenbeker, an old resident of Clark County, and they have had four children, three of whom are living: Romona, Denain and an infant. Viola, the only daughter, is the wife of D. C. Cleaver, a farmer of Auburn Township, and has a son, Bayard. Mr. Romines entertains liberal political ideas, but usually subscribes to the principles of the Republican party. His conservative and substantial efforts have made permanent impress upon the history of Clark County and allied with those of his father establish an unrivaled family record.

ROSS, Albert N.—The progenitor of the Ross family in America was a British soldier of Scotch birth, who served during the Revolutionary War under General Cornwallis, and who, with the rest of his defeated countrymen, was surrendered to General Washington at Yorktown. He married a Scotch girl, and after the war continued to make his home in America. Albert Nicholas Ross, to whom is due much credit for a successful agricultural career in Clark County, was born in Loudoun County, Va., February 8, 1829, a son of John and Susan Ross. His education was that of the early subscription schools, and consisted chiefly in the rudiments of reading, writing and arithmetic. He began to work on the Virginia farm as soon as he was tall enough to reach the handles of a plow, and between work, school, church and Sunday school his youth slipped by uneventfully until he left the roof-tree of his parents in 1850.

Desiring larger opportunities than were presented on the Virginia plantation, Mr. Ross went to Arkansas for a year, then returned to his home, and in 1851 spent seven months in Campbell County, Va. February 27, 1855, he was united in marriage to Susan Ann Adams, of Loudoun County, Va., and daughter of a man who in early life was a farm manager and later a miller, and who died in the prime of manhood. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Ross, Claudius Lyssius married Ida Williams, Susan Virginia married Greenburg Welsh, Nancy married Charles Duncan Dawson and Sextus married Georgia Drake. Mrs. Ross was born July 21, 1820, and at the age of fifteen years united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which she was a consistent member up to the time of her death, May 17, 1907, at the age of eighty-six years and twenty-six days.

During the Civil War Mr. Ross was a Confederate soldier in Colonel Chancellor's regiment, and was stationed at Leesburg, Loudoun County, Va. Not long after his enlistment, however, the Confederate Government passed a law forbidding the service of visitors to the State, and he therefore became immune from conscription. Mr. Ross came to Jasper County, Ill., the fall of his marriage, but owing to ill health returned to Virginia, where he chanced to be at the outbreak of the war. In the spring of 1864 he returned to Illinois, and located in Clark County, which ever since has been his home. He is now one of the retired residents of Marshall, the owner of a comfortable home, and of a sufficient competence to maintain him in comfort for the balance of his life. For fifty years Mr. Ross has voted the Democratic ticket, but he has never had official aspirations. During the middle '50s he united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and ever since has been a dependable attendant at the local church, taking also an interest in the Sunday school and the social and other departments of the organization. He is a well posted and thoughtful man, a profter of his various life experiences, and a keen sympathizer with the aims and undertakings of the younger generation arising around him.

ROSS, John H.—Within the oil district lies the little farm owned and operated by John H. Ross, who is one of the enterprising and progressive agriculturists of Clark County. Although born and reared in the South and unfamiliar with the soil and climate of the North, he has proved himself quick of comprehension and sagacious in judgment, and since coming to Illinois in 1894 he has worked his way forward from the humble position of a man without capital to a responsible and substantial standing among the men of the county. Descended from an old southern family, remote German extraction, he was a son of Harry and Emma Ross, natives of Mississippi, and was himself born in Jackson, that State, December 25, 1869. The death of his parents when he was only seven years of age left him an orphan without a home, but an uncle at once took him to the shelter of his roof and gave him the best educational advantages his means afforded. This uncle, H. Ross, was a prosperous farmer living in the vicinity of Jackson, Miss, and there the boy passed his youthful years, meanwhile attending the local schools.

After leaving his uncle's home and starting out in the world to earn his livelihood, John R. Ross went to Texas and secured work as a cowboy on a ranch. The work was lonely and many of the experiences were trying and unpleasant; there nevertheless lingers in his memory many happy thoughts of those days of care-free existence on the broad prairies of the Southwest. On the whole the work was not such as he cared to follow permanently, and he therefore sought another opening. During 1894 he came north and settled in Illinois, where since he has made his home in Clark County. December 25, 1894, he was united in marriage with Miss Elizabeth A. Miller, daughter of Jacob and Jemima (Lockhart) Miller, and a native of Clark County, born February 5, 1873. After his marriage Mr. Ross cultivated the old Miller farm for three years and then purchased a part of the homestead of George Floyd, since which time he has lived there. The value of the land is greatly enhanced by its location in the oil belt, but as yet no wells have been drilled on the farm.

From early life Mr. Ross has been fond of reading and many of his leisure hours are devoted to posting himself concerning national issues. As a consequence he is one of the best-informed men in the neighborhood. Nor is his information limited to national problems, but extends into every domain of thought. One of his most interesting studies has been that of political economy. How the prosperity of the masses may best be promoted is to him a matter of deep interest, and in his views he has been an admirer of Henry George and a staunch advocate of socialistic doctrines, for he believes that the massing of wealth into the hands of a few cannot but work permanent injury to the well-being of the people.

ROSS, Sextus L.—The photographic business of Sextus L. Ross has been an increasingly important adjunct to Marshall for the past thirteen years, and in its management is found an expression of the benefits of congeniality and aptitude as applied to the labor of humankind. Mr. Ross is thoroughly in accord with his work, believes in its mission as a perpetuator of the interesting people and things of the world, and as an occupation with practically exhaustless artistic and scientific possibilities. His patrons come from all parts of Clark and the surrounding counties, and having found one who understands and caters to their needs, become permanent customers and never-failing advertisers.

Mr. Ross swells the list of people which Loudoun County, Va., has contributed to Clark County. He was born in the Old Dominion April 23, 1863, and was about a year old when his people moved to Clark County, settling on the farm which they continuously occupied until 1890. They then located in Marshall, where Sextus became interested in photography, although earlier in life he had planned to follow his more than average mechanical bent.

A not overly strong constitution suggested his present pursuit, and in 1893 he established a studio at Greenup, this county, and the following year came to Marshall, which offered a much larger and more encouraging field. In the meantime he has been a constant student of good literature, especially that which has to do with delineation and art generally, thus adding to his excellent start in the public schools in Marshall and Wabash townships.

In politics Mr. Ross has always acknowledged that personal responsibility felt by all large-minded citizens, and as a Democrat has filled a large need in local offices. In 1888 he was elected Clerk of Wabash Township, in 1905 was elected to the same office in Marshall Township, succeeding himself in the election of 1906. In 1901 he joined the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, passing through all the chairs during that and the following year. Mr. Ross is of a deeply religious nature, and in 1877 united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, with whose interests he since has been continually concerned. For years he has been a member of the Epworth League, and was a delegate to the International League Convention at Detroit, Mich., in 1903. October 12, 1898, he was united in marriage to Georgia Drake, in Marshall, and of the union there is a son, Robert Van Gilder. Mr. Ross is a genial and adaptive man, winning and keeping friends by his many sterling qualities of mind and heart, and in business representing that fairness and consideration which bespeak an honest and commendable intent.

ROWLAND, George T.—During a professional career covering thirty-one years, Dr. George T. Rowland has contributed to the health and wellbeing of three different communities, in all of which he has pursued his calling with unquestioned zeal, conscientiousness and ability, and has drawn around him patrons and friends who always will remember him as a purposeful and excellent practitioner. Martinsville, the last and present field of usefulness claimed by Dr. Rowland, has been his home since 1898. He has a practice extending over a large town and country area, and affording large opportunity for the general application of medicine and surgery. The Doctor is a graduate of the Louisville (Ky.) Medical College, class of 1876, and in 1896 he pursued a post-graduate course in Chicago, Ill. He is a member of the Illinois Medical Society and the Clark County Medical Society, and has been President of the latter organization for two years.

Dr. Rowland is of Southern ancestry, and was born in Louisville, Ky., December 31, 1852. He is a son of James W. and Elizabeth E. (Young) Rowland, natives of Kentucky, and early settlers in Louisville, where Mr. Rowland for many years was a commission merchant. The parents are both deceased. Young George T. graduated from the Louisville high school with honors, and after qualifying at the medical college in his native town, located near Marshall, Saline County, Mo., where he remained five years. From there he went to Homer, Champaign County, Ill., and remained eighteen years. Of Homer he was one of the foremost and influential citizens, taking a keen interest in politics, serving in various local capacities, and in many ways meeting the noblest and broadest ends of citizenship. There, as in Martinsville, his genial and sympathetic personality was an invaluable asset, and his readiness to help humankind, often at great financial sacrifice, was many times apparent.

A Democrat in politics, Dr. Rowland is by no means an unchangeable partisan, firmly believing in voting for the man best qualified to advance the general welfare. Fraternally he is identified with the Tribe of Ben Hur. While living in Saline County, Mo., in 1878, Dr. Rowland married Allie Steele, and of the union there are four sons: George A., James L., Claude K. and Howard F. Of these, George A. is engaged in the real-estate business in Martinsville.

RUEDY, Bruno S.—Since adding the name of Bruno S. Ruedy to its citizenship in 1899, the town of Casey has profited by the well directed efforts of a man of large business capacity and public-spiritedness, and who, among other claims to recognition, is known as the owner and proprietor of a well patronized furniture and undertaking establishment. To Clark County Mr. Ruedy owes practically all of the advantages of life, for he was but six years old when brought here by his parents, Christian and Catherine (Ambuehl) Ruedy, from Franklin County, Ark., where he was born November 10, 1872.

Christian Ruedy was born in Western Illinois, December 18, 1838, and in early life developed more than ordinary business and general ability. Left fatherless at the age of thirteen years, there fell upon his immature shoulders a large share of the family responsibility, and he learned to manage a farm and in a manner frame his own purposes and requirements. During early manhood he married, his wife being a native of Illinois, and born in 1841. Of this union there were eight children, of whom Mrs. Katherine (Ruedy) Davatz lives in Cleaverville, Mo.; John S. is a resident of Colorado Springs, Colo.; Christian A. lives in Moore, Okla.; Edward A. makes his home in Casey, Ill.; Ben A. is in Denver, Colo.; Bruno S. lives in Casey; Joseph is a resident of Chanute, Kans.; and Mrs. Mathilda R. Rhoads lives in Philipsburg, Mo. The head of this large family removed from Western Illinois to Franklin County, Ark., in 1868, and for eleven years engaged in stock-raising and selling. With his family he came to Clark County, Ill., in 1879, continued his former business with moderate success, and in 1881 his life was saddened by the death of his wife, Catherine. In 1898 he abandoned farming, and at present lives retired in Winchester, Tenn.

As have many of the well known business men of Clark County, Bruno S. Ruedy approached commercial life through the doors of both farming and school teaching. He began the latter occupation at the age of twenty years, and during the summer time worked in the fields and otherwise conformed to an active pastoral life. However, his tastes and inclinations failed to conform to the monotony of farming, and in 1898 he took a course at the Terre Haute Commercial College, in 1899 establishing a furniture and undertaking business in Casey, Ill. He had no actual knowledge of the business which he had undertaken, but with characteristic determination and adaptiveness readily applied himself to a mastery of its many details. In his line he now is one of the leading men of Clark County, and his trade is of wide extent and assured dependability.

Politically Mr. Ruedy has materially contributed to the unity and strength of the local Republican party, and his discharge of official obligations has been characterized by faithfulness and far-sightedness. From 1902 to 1904 he was Supervisor of Casey Township, and during that time was Chairman of the Building Committee which constructed the new Clark County court house. Fraternally he is associated with the Masons, Knights of Pythias and Modern Woodmen of America, and in religion he affiliates with the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Casey. The marriage of Mr. Reudy and Nora L. Johnson occurred April 6, 1898, Mrs. Reudy being a daughter of Thomas L. and Jane Johnson, of Martinsville, Ill. Mrs. Reudy was a woman of broad scholarship and keen appreciation of the, excellent in literature, and for a number of years engaged in educational work in the Clark County public schools. Her death occurred February 25, 1904. Mr. Reudy is a well informed, well educated and progressive business man, and by integrity, good judgment and perseverance has advanced to a foremost place in the community.

RUSH, James.—There are few men in Clark County more familiar with or experienced in the insurance and real-estate business than James Rush, of Martinsville. For thirty years and more he has successfully weathered the changes in values and usage of properties in town and surrounding country, and during that time has located the homes and industries of many scores of people. There are few more necessary factors in community existence than the man who buys and sells houses and lands, and insures them with their appurtenances and the lives of their owners, against devastation or extinction. It is the sane and intelligent methods pursued by this practical and successful business man which make strong appeal to those seeking results along similar lines, added to which is the faculty of accumulation and wise investment which place him among the wealthy and substantial men of the community.

On a cold winter's day, December 3, 1845, the family of Francis Rush arrived with him in Clark County, having traveled by wagon from Licking County, Ohio, where James Rush was born November 3, 1843. The lad therefore was two years and a month old, and he was one in a family of nine children, five of whom are living, and two of whom, himself and two sisters, still are residents of Clark County. Francis Rush was a native of Ohio, while his wife, formerly Rachel Malone, was born in the Old Dominion. The newcomers to Clark County settled on a farm four miles south of Martinsville, at Hickory Grove, and there underwent many privations and suffered many discouragements, ere their toil seemed warranted by practical results. The location eventually proving unsatisfactory, they moved to Dawson Township, and there the father died April 4, 1862, at the age of fifty-four years. He was a Democrat in politics, but never held any township offices. His wife died in 1871, at the age of sixty-three.

The advantages enjoyed by the youth of today were unknown to James Rush, yet he was studious and inquiring, and devoted much of his leisure to the pursuit of knowledge. He gives out the encouraging impression of having gained his material and mental riches by the sternest application and self-sacrifice. He made himself useful around the paternal farm until his marriage, in 1870, to Theresa E. Purdum, a neighbor in Balson Township, and daughter of John and Nancy (Huls) Purdum, natives of Kentucky. Mrs. Rush was born in Shelby County, Ind., October 1, 1841, and with her parents came to Clark County in 1859, settling in Balson Township, where her father died in 1861, at the age of fifty-one years, and her mother in 1864, at the age of fifty-four. Of their seven children, Mrs. Rush is the only survivor. Mr. Rush bought out the interest in the home farm of his brothers and sisters, and with his wife occupied the same until disposing of the property in 1878. He then bought a farm in Casey Township, upon which he lived ten years, and in 1889 he moved to Martinsville, which since has been his home.

In addition to a thorough knowledge of insurance and real-estate, Mr. Rush is well grounded in law, and has practiced the same to a considerable extent, although not regularly admitted to the bar. He has considerable land and eight wells in the Casey oil field, a quarter interest in the Illinois Oil and Gas Company, and a half interest in the Rush & Jones leases. He is a wideawake and public-spirited citizen, unostentatious and quiet in demeanor, and taking the good his energy has provided with the philosophy of one who believes that industry and perseverance rarely miscarry.

SANDOE, Rev. George.—"He was whole-souled to all, and never accumulated wealth." In brief this describes the character of the able and much beloved elder of the Church of God, pioneer missionary, brave soldier of the Civil War and public man, widely known for his Christian, charitable and helpful life throughout Southern Illinois. If ever a soul accumulated the wealth of pure and substantial character and the warm affection which may be taken to the Great Beyond, that soul was known on earth as George Sandoe.

Mr. Sandoe was of French descent, his forefathers being of that famous historic colony which settled at the mouth of the Kaskaskia River in Illinois. He was born in Lancaster County, Pa., on the 31st of December, 1826, the son of Adam and Nancy (Moore) Sandoe, also natives of the Keystone State. His father was a miller throughout his life. His grandfather, also named George Sandoe, was a native of La Belle France, emigrating to America in 1850, and was one of the colonists composed of his countrymen who settled at Kaskaskia and laid the foundation of the great permanent civilization of the northern Mississippi Valley. He finally returned to the East and died in Pennsylvania about 1825.

George Sandoe was the second in a family of nine children, and of his parents his mother died in 1845 and his father in 1858. He passed his early years amid the industries of the farm and mill, in the acquirement of an education and even in his youth his thoughtful, studious mind turned to higher subjects than either physical labor or intellectual studies. In 1851 the Board of Missions of the East Pennsylvania Eldership of the Church of God, of which denomination he had become a member in 1848, sent him to Clark County to found churches and do whatever other good work fell within the scope of his Christian zeal and faith. His work was so successful that he was placed in charge of a mission which finally extended into Macon County, being thus employed until when he enlisted in the cause of the Union, joining Company G, One Hundred and Twenty-third Mounted Infantry, as sergeant of that command. But his warm character and the godly influence which his spirit possessed over strong men earned him the deep respect of his superiors, and in 1865 he was appointed chaplain of his regiment, being also placed on detached duty as Ordnance Sergeant.

After his faithful and gallant service at the front Mr. Sandoe returned to the religious field and resumed his missionary work as a general evangelist throughout Illinois. In 1888 he became a resident of Charleston, traveling in Cumberland and Edgar counties and contiguous territory. His influence in matters both worldly and spiritual became broad and deep, and in 1884 he was chosen by the Republicans as a delegate to the State convention which nominated Richard J. Oglesby for Governor. Mr. Sandoe was a life-long and earnest Republican and an ardent admirer of Governor Oglesby. He was also one of the most popular men of the Grand Army of the Republic.

Rev. George Sandoe married Miss Mary Rupp, a native of Clark County, on the 4th of February, 1854. Mrs. Sandoe was born August 31, 1835, the daughter of Henry and Sarah (Hitchman) Rupp, both Pennsylvania Germans. Five children were born to Rev. and Mrs. Sandoe, of whom the following are living: Emma, who became the wife of H. Cunningham; Eva, who married S. Cook, of Michigan, and George B., a resident of North Dakota. Although generous and giving to the needy to the limit of his means, Mr. Sandoe was an ideal husband and father, having always in mind his duties to those most closely attached to him; while, therefore, it was against his teachings and inclinations to accumulate wealth, at his death, May 22, 1890, he left a small farm and a comfortable city residence to his faithful helpmate, the honored surviving widow.

SCHOFFSTOLL, Samuel R.—The family represented by this sterling agriculturist ranks among the pioneers of Clark County and ever has borne an honorable part in the development of local resources, the promotion of educational affairs and the upbuilding of all those interests that are conducive to the permanent prosperity of the community. Descended on the paternal side from German progenitors, he is a son of Isaac Schoffstoll, who was born in Pennsylvania about 1811 and at an early age settled in Illinois, where he followed the trade of brick-mason. As early as 1848 he was employed in the building of a brick residence in Johnson Township on what is known as the old David Baughman farm. The mother, who bore the maiden name of Julia Adams, was born of English descent in Canton, Stark County, Ohio, about 1815, and passed away in Illinois during the year 1896.

At the homestead in Johnson Township, Clark County, Samuel Schoffstoll was born July 27, 1842, and there he spent the uneventful years of youth, alternating work on the farm with attendance at the country schools. Nothing occurred to break the routine of life until the outbreak of the Civil War, when, fired with zeal in behalf of the Union, he at once offered his services in defense of the old flag. September 3, 1861, he was accepted as a private in the Seventh Illinois Cavalry, and remained at the front until the expiration of his time, when he was honorably discharged February 9, 1864. On the same day he again enlisted in the same company and regiment, with which he continued until the expiration of the war, and from which he received his final discharge at Nashville, Tenn., November 4, 1865. During the period of his first enlistment he was made a non-commissioned officer in Company A and continued as a sergeant until the close of the war. When his regiment engaged in its first battle at Charleston, Mo., the equipment was so meagre that each company of 100 men boasted of only six or eight guns, yet, as history shows, the old Seventh won that skirmish in spite of its handicap. Among the engagements in which Mr. Schoffstoll participated were those at Shiloh, Farmington (where he was under General Pope), the second battle of Corinth (where he was orderly to Rosecrans), Estanola, Tenn., and Iuka, Miss. (in both of which battles he was wounded), Nashville, Moscow and Franklin, Tenn., as well as other skirmishes and battles in which his regiment bore a part.

Returning from the fields of war to the quietude of agricultural life in Clark County, Mr. Schoffstoll threw the same industrious activity into private affairs which he had displayed in his army service, and the honesty shown in every business transaction, the desire to accommodate neighbors and friends, the patient round of well-doing, the persistence used in overcoming the many obstacles confronting an agriculturist, all these qualities brought him the good-will of associates and the respect of a large circle of acquaintances. While still in his early manhood he established domestic ties, and January 26, 1870, was united in marriage with Elizabeth J. Sewall, who was born in Breathitt County, Ky., and who died in Clark County, Ill., February 5, 1889. The children of the union were as follows: Annie Mabel, born January 15, 1871; Isaac Franklin, who was born January 29, 1872, and married Luella Main, of Clark County; Charles Ernest, who was born June 9, 1875, and died at eight months of age; Cora Lenora, who was born January 29, 1877, and died April 26, 1902; Fanny Olive, who was born February 11, 1881, and married Bert Bailey, a farmer of Clark County; and James Allen, who was born August 5, 1883, and is now engaged in the oil business. The eldest daughter, Annie Mabel, first married Frank Snearly, and some time after his death she became the wife of Joseph Boldrey, a farmer of Clark County.

The second marriage of Mr. Schoffstoll was solemnized October 30, 1892, and united him with Thirza J. Ross, who was born in Kansas December 2, 1859, being a daughter of James H. and Mahala (Floyd) Ross. Her father was born in Pennsylvania July 20, 1817, and died May 12, 1876, while her mother, a native of Ohio, died August 13, 1884. Mr. and Mrs. Schoffstoll have had three children, one of whom died in infancy. Those now living are Viola, born July 7, 1898, and Nellie, born January 1, 1901. The family hold membership with the Christian Union Church. The home farm, which bears the improvements characteristic of the twentieth century, is located within the oil district, but as yet no attempt has been made at drilling, the owner preferring to devote his attention to the cultivation of the soil and the raising of farm crops, in which he has met with noteworthy success. It is significant of Mr. Schoffstoll's temperament that he has made a study of political issues and governmental problems, and has kept posted concerning the issues of the age. The tenets of the Republican party receive his staunch support. For sixteen years he ably filled the office of Constable in his township and since then for five years he has been Justice of the Peace. Another office which he has filled with intelligence and faithfulness is that of School Director. Movements for the benefit of the community, whether from the standpoint of education or agriculture, receive his active sympathy and hearty co-operation. It is to such men as he that the township and county owe their development and the degree of prosperity which is among the first impressions made upon the mind of the visiting stranger.

SCUDAMORE, William D.—The practical and developing tendencies of William D. Scudamore have found various outlets in Illinois, and at present are revolving around the oil business in Clark County, and general merchandising enterprises in Casey, and Flora, Clay County. Mr. Scudamore is a product of the agricultural element of this State, and his first experience was gained on a farm in Wayne County, where he was born June 28, 1868. His parents were Thomas F. and Caroline (Baker) Scudamore, the latter of whom was born in Illinois.

Mr. Scudamore was educated in the public schools of the country and the town schools of Eldorado, Illinois. As a youth he was good at driving a bargain, and as he advanced to maturity and could focus his energy sought a wider field for its exercise. Many of his strong qualities come from paternal English and maternal German ancestors, and much of his success comes from acquiring familiarity with the resources and possibilities of the State in which his lot is cast. He is an enthusiastic promoter of the oil industry, and bases large financial expectations upon its development in this State. His stores are conducted along progressive and modern lines, and he is open to practical suggestions for improvement which may sift in from larger centers of activity. He has the tact, resourcefulness and consideration for others which goes far towards successful merchandising, and gives the impression of expecting only fair and legitimate returns for labor and capital invested. Some years ago he established a home of his own, marrying Anna Nathan, a native of Illinois, and daughter of K. C. and Jennie (West) Nathan. Mr. Scudamore has an excellent commercial and private reputation, and enjoys the confidence and support of the communities whose integrity he so well sustains.

SHAFFNER, Nelson.—The industry and good judgment of years find Nelson Shaffner one of the fortunate men of Auburn Township, one of its most successful producers, and the owner of a farm of 160 acres in Sections 2 and 3. Among other of his ancestral blessings Mr. Shaffner counts the Teuton qualities of thrift and economy, and dogged perseverance in pursuing the goal of his desires. These were directly transmitted by his father, John Shaffner, who came from Germany with his parents when four years old, and located on a farm in Lebanon County, Pa. John Shaffner grew to maturity in the Quaker State, and finally married Mary Fiddler, a native of Pennsylvania, to whom were born two sons and two daughters: Susan, Nelson, John and Mary. The family came to Clark County in 1850, where Mr. Shaffner farmed in Auburn Township until his retirement to Martinsville, where his death occurred at the age of seventy-five years. He was a Democrat in politics, and a life-long member of the Dunkard Church.

Nelson Shaffner was fourteen years old when his father came to Illinois, and he attended school in the country and the town of Martinsville. He settled on his present farm in 1862, and since has labored faithfully to bring it up to a high standard of excellence. A day's journey would hardly lead one to a more delightful home or better improved property. Mr. Shaffner married, in 1856, Elizabeth Curtis, who was born in Knox County, Ohio, July 25, 1838, a daughter of David and Rachael Curtis, Clark County pioneers of 1850. Mrs. Shaffner died in April, 1898, leaving seven of her eight children. In 1902 Mr. Shaffner married Mrs. Margaret (Curtis) Rubottom, widow of Malan Ru bottom, a millwright of Indiana. By her former marriage Mrs. Shaffner had two daughters, both living in Indiana.

The success of Mr. Shaffner as a farmer is not more commendable than his success as a politician. He is a staunch Democrat, and served as Supervisor of Auburn Township four terms. He also was Highway Commissioner several terms, and Justice of the Peace four years. His public service invariably has redounded to the improvement and credit of the community, and has evidenced sound practical sense and fine regard for integrity.

SHAW, Gilead.—Six weeks after the clearing of the last battlefield of the Civil War, Gilead Shaw passed from the ken of those who, as business associates and friends, had known him as an honorable, industrious and public spirited citizen and merchant of Marshall. Mr. Shaw was an example of average, temperate manhood, and though more than forty years have elapsed since his exit from the stage of local affairs, his influence continues through those of his descendants who still are a part of the community, thus keeping unbroken a chain of Clark County occupancy extending back to practically the beginning of its written history. Mr. Shaw was born June 15, 1817, in Knox County, Ind., to which his parents, Joseph and Sarah (Walker) Shaw, came from Kentucky in 1817, settling on Walnut Prairie.

Joseph Shaw and his wife were born in Kentucky, as also was his former wife, Nellie (Goben) Shaw, who died leaving two children, William and Niniva. Of his second union there were three sons and five daughters, all of whom are deceased. When Gilead, the youngest, was two years old, in 1817, the family came to Clark County, which at that time had been settled by the whites but three years. The elder Shaw entered land in Walnut Prairie, and, having shrewd business ability, succeeded in his agricultural pursuits. A considerable portion of this land was under cultivation at the time of his death, at the age of seventy-two years. He was a man of character and determination, possessed great physical and moral courage, and as a partaker of the hardships as well as successes of the earliest pioneers of the county, is indelibly inscribed among its hardy and influential pathfinders. Upon his arm was a scar denoting a wound received at Fort Wayne, Ind., during the Indian War, and while his family, for safety, was living at the fort at Vincennes, the same State. In politics, he was a Whig. Mr. Shaw carried through all of his pioneering experiences a certain manner and mode of thought which stamped him as a born aristocrat, a man who held dear the traditions and ancestry of a fine old southern family. To a limited extent only did his aristocratic tendencies alienate him from his fellows among the settlers, for he worked as hard as they, lived at first as frugally, and projected himself into the heart of things with as much enthusiasm and public spiritedness. Yet today even he stands out clearly as the aristocrat of the neighborhood in which he lives.

Gilead Shaw studied first in the subscription schools of Walnut Prairie, and later secured the best general and business training procurable in Jacksonville at that time. September 16, 1841, he married Mary W. Drake, of Clark County, thereafter locating in Marshall, where he engaged in the dry-goods business with Dr. Payne, who had married one of his nieces. As a merchant he established a wide acquaintance with the people living in and around Marshall, and he subsequently became interested in some business ventures which proved financially disastrous. Chief among these was a contract on the proposed Wabash Valley Railroad, the falling through of which left him nearly bankrupt. In 1852 he contracted the western fever, but being unable to join the ceaseless caravan of Argonauts wending their way towards the Pacific, spent a thousand dollars in equipping Edwin Clapp, Mayberry Davis and William Cooley, who, alas, were unsuccessful and never could return him the money expended for them.

At the beginning of the Civil War Mr. Shaw enlisted in the Sixty-fifth Illinois Sharpshooters, and served in this capacity until after being appointed Clerk under General Ore after the battle of Pittsburg Landing. He remained in the office at Corinth until the soldiers were ordered discharged, then went to Memphis for about five weeks, and there received his honorable dismissal from the army. He saw many sides and participated in many phases of warfare, and his constitution was seriously undermined by the long marches and exposure in the trenches. The exultation that fills the heart of every soldier that he has escaped death and can return to those who await him found its realization ere the cannon scarce were cooled, but he was destined to reach the end of his work and ambitions in a little while, and in the splendid prime of forty-four years, just six weeks after returning from the war. He took with him into the uncharted sea the good will of all who knew him, and his craft, following the inevitable laws of compensation, doubtless has found mooring upon peaceful and pleasant shores. In religion, he was a Universalist.

The wife of Mr. Shaw was born February 9, 1825, a daughter of Rivers and Elizabeth (Turner) Drake, the former a native of England. Mr. Drake came to America from London, England, in 1804, settling in Richmond, Va., where he engaged in the mercantile business until after the war of 1812. He then located on a farm near Richmond, installing as mistress of the same his newly wedded wife, Elizabeth, who subsequently bore him six sons and six daughters, one of whom owed its nativity to Illinois. The family came overland with teams and wagon from Virginia to Illinois in the summer of 1832, enduring many hardships on the way, and sleeping out under the stars many nights. Arriving finally at Darwin, Clark County, Mr. Drake rented land on Walnut Prairie, and there engaged in farming and stock-raising until shortly before his death at the age of sixty-two years. He was a Whig in early life and later a Republican, but he never was active politically. Mr. and Mrs. Shaw were the parents of two sons, Edward and Alphonzo, both of whom were educated in Marshall. Edward married Clara Carter, has one daughter, Camilla, who is the wife of Vern Cole, and lives in Marshall; and Alphonzo married Nancy D. Macoskey, lives in Terre Haute, Ind., and has three children; Minnie, wife of Emil Stang, of Indianapolis, Ind.; John married Mollie Bernie, lives in Terre Haute, and has two sons, John G. and Spencer B.; and Rochford married Fannie Laws and lives in Terre Haute.

SHERMAN, Lewis C.—The removal of the Sherman family to Illinois and their settlement in Clark County when Lewis C. was a very small child, leave him no memory of associations save those of the present and render him a typical citizen, as devoted to the welfare of the county as are its native born sons. No sensational events have marked the even tenor of his life, which has been passed quietly and busily in his chosen occupation of general farming. Affable in his intercourse with others, accommodating in disposition, energetic in temperament and resourceful in action, he belongs to that substantial class of "everyday" farmers whose presence in any community is wholesome and uplifting. Ever since his marriage he has engaged in the cultivation of the farm he then purchased and which lies five miles southeast of Casey on rural route six from that town.

Elsewhere in this volume appears a sketch of William Henry Sherman, father of Lewis C., and one of the honored pioneers of Clark County, having removed hither in 1851 with his wife and settled in Casey township. From that time until his death, September 7, 1891, he was one of the leading farmers of the township, and since his demise his widow, Mary Ann (Boyd) Sherman, has made her home in the town of Casey. Five of their children are living, among these being Lewis C., who was born in Delaware county, Ohio, October 22, 1848, and was quite a small child at the time of coming to Illinois. In boyhood he was a pupil in the country schools of Casey Township.

The marriage of Mr. Sherman was solemnized February 2, 1876, and united him with Tamar K. Bennett, whose father, Joseph Bennett, is ranked among the honored pioneers of Clark County. Born in Pennsylvania in 1818, he was a son of parents who removed from England to America a few years before his birth. As a boy he made his home in Pennsylvania and in young manhood removed to Ohio, whence in 1857 he came west as far as Illinois and settled among the pioneers of Johnson Township, Clark County, where he soon occupied himself actively with agricultural pursuits. Meanwhile he had established home ties through his marriage to Phoebe Jeffs, who was born in Virginia about 1825, her parents having crossed the ocean from Ireland and settled in the Old Dominion about the beginning of the nineteenth century. The eldest son of Lewis C. Sherman was William, who was born October 25, 1876, and died May 13, 1879. The children now living are named as follows: John, born September 20, 1879; Edgar, December 15, 1884; Phoebe, June 8, 1892, and Leta, September 27, 1894. The family holds membership with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to the work of which they give in accordance with their means, and whose missionary movements receive their sympathetic support. Reared in the Democratic faith, Mr. Sherman says he has always been too busy to find time for changing his politics, hence he continues to vote the old ticket at all general elections.

SHERMAN, Mortimer P.—While some of the native-born sons of Clark County have sought other fields of activity, many of them have remained amid the scenes familiar to their childhood years and have taken the places once filled by their fathers in the management of business or agricultural enterprises. Unattracted by the allurements of other regions, Mortimer P. Sherman has remained on the homestead once owned and operated by his father and has devoted himself with single-hearted devotion to the tilling of the soil and the improvement of the estate. While the land lies in the oil district, as yet he has not put down any wells, but continues to devote his attention to the general work incident to farming and superintends 190 acres of farm land.

On the homestead situated four and one-half miles southeast of Casey, Clark County, Mortimer P. Sherman was born February 20, 1862, being a son of Henry and Mary Ann (Boyd) Sherman. The mother was a native of Virginia born April 12, 1826. The father was born in New York State May 16, 1826, and died September 7, 1881. Elsewhere in this volume will be found mention of his life. Educated in the country schools of Casey Township and the grammar schools of Marshall, Mortimer P. Sherman has always been a farmer, in which occupation he received a practical training during youth. After the death of his father he purchased a part of the homestead and here he continued to reside, his mother having moved into the village of Casey some years ago. His marriage was solemnized February 7, 1892, and united him with Fannie B. Brewer, daughter of Jonathan and Sarah Ann (Grimes) Brewer. Her father, who was a native of Illinois, was born in Coles County November 28, 1841, and now makes his home at Herrick, Shelby County, this State. Her mother bore the maiden name of Sarah Ann Grimes and was born in Illinois January 26, 1842. Mrs. Sherman received a common-school education. Born of her marriage are the following-named children: Annie Pearl, born July 8, 1893; Maude Opal, February 7, 1895; Grace Ethel, March 10, 1897; Clarence Henry, February 2, 1899; Mary Ruth, who was born August 4, 1900, and died February 11, 1901; Hazel Clara, born March 11, 1902; and Bruce Everett, July 9, 1905. The family hold membership with the Methodist Episcopal Church South, in the doctrines of which the children are being trained, while at the same time they are being given excellent secular educations.

Those who enjoy the pleasure of Mr. Sherman's friendship know him to be a man of positive convictions, a stalwart adherent to the Democratic party, a loyal citizen and patriotic in his devotion to county and commonwealth. Since about 1890 he has held membership in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, being identified with Lodge No. 747 at Casey. While his life has moved along in an even current, yet it has been a busy and useful existence, and it may be said truly that his township is benefited by the residence therein of men possessing the resolute character, kind heart, energetic disposition and accommodating spirit that have marked his life and actions.

SHERMAN, William Henry.—From an unimportant beginning with no capital save a robust constitution and a pair of willing hands, Mr. Sherman rose by force of sheer pluck and energy to a position among the substantial land-owners of Clark County. When he made his first purchase in 1851 he secured a tract of forty acres partly improved, and with this as a nucleus he worked his way forward until at the time of his death, which occurred September 7, 1891, he owned 200 acres, of which twenty acres of timber land was situated in Johnson Township, and the balance in Casey Township. The estate is still owned by his heirs and twenty acres of the original farm lies in the oil belt, which renders its value greater than that for farm land. On the tract there are now four producing wells, and the development of the oil industry promises to bring substantial returns to the family.

The eldest in a family of nine children, William Henry Sherman was born in New York State May 19, 1826, and was a son of William H. and Sarah (Kennedy) Sherman, also natives of that State. Four of his brothers enlisted in the Union army during the Civil War and one of them, John, rose to be Captain of his company. At an early day the family removed from New York to Ohio and later followed the tide of emigration drifting toward the undeveloped West. Arriving in Illinois they became pioneers of Casey Township, Clark County. Prior to his removal to Illinois Mr. Sherman was married in Delaware County, Ohio, October 17, 1846, to Mary Ann Boyd, daughter of Jacob and Elizabeth (Anderson) Boyd, natives of Pennsylvania and early settlers of Ohio, where they died. The young couple came to Illinois in 1851 with the family of Mr. Sherman's father and soon afterward bought land in Casey Township, where he engaged in farm pursuits with gratifying success.

From the time of his settlement in Clark County Mr. Sherman bore a prominent part in the local councils of the Democratic party. Always interested in politics and maintaining a warm interest in local affairs, he was chosen repeatedly to represent his fellow citizens in positions of local trust and honor, among the offices held being those of School Director, Assessor, Collector and Supervisor, while in addition he served as a member of all the important committees of his party and was a leader in county conventions of the party. In 1881 he was honored with election to the office of Sheriff and for two years he filled the office with recognized efficiency, enforcing law and order with an impartial spirit. Again in 1887 he was elected Sheriff, and he continued in the position until his death. Soon after his demise the family removed from Marshall, the county seat, back to the old homestead in Casey Township, but two years later they moved into the village of Casey, where Mrs. Sherman is now an honored resident.

Eight children comprised the family of Mr. and Mrs. Sherman, and of these five are now living. The eldest, Lewis C., born October 20, 1848, resides on a farm in Johnson Township; by his marriage to Katherine Bennett he has four children, John, Edward, Phoebe and Leta. The oldest daughter, Ann Eliza, was born June 23, 1853, and died December 21, 1863. Lenora E., born April 4, 1857, was married February 20, 1884, to John Warren Boyd, of Clark County, a farmer of Casey Township, and they have two children, Arthur and Opal. Minerva L., born July 13, 1861, resides with her mother in Casey. Mortimer P., born February 20, 1862, lives on the home farm in Casey Township; by his marriage to Fannie Brewer he has six children, Pearl, Maude, Grace, Hazel, Clarence and Bruce. The sixth member of the family circle, John C., was born March 22, 1864, and died June 2, 1867. Annette, who was born September 13, 1867, married George Edward Baird, of Clark County, November 6, 1892, and they reside on a farm in Casey Township; they have five children, Jean Roy, Vera, Charles and Ernest.

During the active years of his life Mr. Sherman was an earnest member of the Methodist Episcopal Church and a generous contributor to its maintenance, and his wife also affiliates with that denomination. Fraternally, he held membership with the Casey lodges of Masons and Odd Fellows, and both organizations benefited by his generosity and wise leadership. At different times he engaged in contracting and building in Casey, where now stand a number of houses erected under his oversight. Possessing versatile ability, he was able to engage in varying lines of labor and in each met with success. As an agriculturist he was judicious, enterprising and industrious; as an official, he was impartial and prompt; as a builder, he was progressive; and as a citizen he presented that ideal type which sinks partisanship beneath patriotism and aims to promote all enterprises calculated to bring the greatest good to the greatest number. In the annals of the county his name is worthy of perpetuation as that of a man honored in life, faithful to every trust, decisive in action and upright in every transaction.

SHIPE, Theodore W.—There are few men in Clark County better posted in the hardware business than Theodore Shipe, who owns to twenty-five years of experience, the greater part of it gained in the town of Marshall, of which he now is an honored hardware merchant. Mr. Shipe derived the impetus towards his calling from his father, John Shipe, a tinner by occupation, who was born in Pennsylvania, and there married Rachel Warren, who was born near Mount Pleasant, the same State. The elder Shipe brought his family to Crawford County, Ill., during the '50s, and there his son, Theodore W., was born January 30, 1861. He had also two older sons, Charles and William. Mr. Shipe came to Marshall in 1862, took up the occupation of his earlier years, and at the present time still plies his trade with comfortable financial results. He is a Democrat in politics, and fraternally a member of Lodge No. 65, I. O. O. F.

Accustomed from earliest youth to his father's methods of work, Theodore W. Shipe learned the more responsible part of the hardware business with the firm of J. C. Bryan & Sons, later adding to his knowledge in the employ of other hardware merchants. In 1902 he established a hardware business of his own, disposed of the same in December, 1903, to J. Swern, and thereafter represented on the road the firm of E. H. Huenefeld, of Cincinnati, Ohio. In October, 1903, he re-entered the hardware business in Marshall, and now is doing a steady and promising business. His store is equipped with a general line of hardware necessities, and he is contemplating adding to his stock agricultural implements.

July 26, 1884, Mr. Shipe married Emma Myers, who was born in Ohio February 7, 1865, a daughter of James H. and Margaret (Shaw) Myers, farmers of Clark County. A daughter, Madge, was born into the Shipe family September 28, 1886. Mr. Shipe is a Democrat in politics, and his fraternal connection is with the Court of Honor. He is a progressive and up-to-date citizen, promoting the social as well as business life of the town, and conducting his business in an atmosphere of success and encouragement.

H. R. Snively

SHULER, William Wood.—The advantage of specialization, increasingly admitted in all departments of activity, applies with particular conviction to the profession of law, so that the votaries thereof receiving the most satisfying compensations and fulfilling the largest usefulness invariably are schooled in the adjustment of some preferred line of human complications. To this class belongs William Wood Shuler, a prominent member of the Casey bar, and one of the best known oil and gas attorneys in Clark County. Mr. Shuler is a native of Findlay, Ohio, and was born January 9, 1861. His father, Henry Shuler, was born in Westmoreland County, Pa., August 10, 1823, and his mother, Margaret (Funk) Shuler, was born in the same State in 1826. The latter, who was of German parentage, and the granddaughter of Johann Funk, a great German historian, died in August, 1861. Henry Shuler was a millwright by trade, but he retired from active business several years before his death, September 11, 1900.

William Wood Shuler graduated from the Findlay High School, read law in his native town with State Senator N. Walter Dody, and in Hutchinson, Kans., with Vandervere & Martin, and was admitted to practice at the Ohio bar in June, 1900. He practiced in Findlay and Chicago previous to coming to Casey, and in both Findlay and Hutchinson, Kans., engaged in educational work as an aid to his professional preparation. Since allying his professional fortunes with Casey he has correctly estimated the enormity of the region's oil and gas possibilities, and has been engaged principally in litigation along these lines. He has rendered practical and satisfactory support to those who have enlisted his abilities, and rightly is known as one of the most erudite and well posted of the men similarly employed in the Central West. Well grounded in the principles of law, he is alert and resourceful in their application, and his career is adding materially to the dignity, integrity and dependability of the local bar. He was appointed City Attorney of Casey to fill a vacancy, and subsequently was elected to that office with but one dissenting vote.

While no partisan, but on the contrary liberal in his political inclinations, Mr. Shuler staunchly supports his party, and while living in Hutchinson, Kans., served as Township Trustee. In Casey he has served as a member of the Board of Education six years, and during two of those years was President of the School Board. In 1899 he tendered his services in the Spanish-American War, but owing to ill health was not accepted as a volunteer. He is prominent fraternally, and is identified with the Masons, Knights of Pythias, Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, and in religion is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The marriage of Mr. Shuler and Frances DuPerow occurred in Indianapolis, Ind., Christmas day of 1906. By a former marriage there were two children, of whom Ernestine was born June 12, 1885, and Henry Marks was born May 26, 1891. The latter now is attending the Culver Military Academy. Of pleasing and tactful personality, Mr. Shuler is a keen student of human motives, and an appreciator of those qualities which make for stable, useful and dependable citizenship.

SHUTE, William A.—Not a few of the young men who maintain a deep interest in the oil industry in Clark County and who are among the most enthusiastic advocates of its possibilities, have spent their entire lives in this county, of which they are native born sons. Numbered among such men is William A. Shute, representative of a pioneer family and himself an influential citizen and prosperous farmer. Since 1892 he has made his home on a farm which three years previously he had purchased from John Funk and which comprises eighty acres of well improved land situated near Casey. At the present writing (1907) work has been commenced at drilling for oil on this farm and prospects for success are encouraging.

The Shute family traces its genealogy to Germany, but has been resident in America for several generations. Thomas F. Shute, whose parents were natives of New York State, was born in Ohio in July, 1846, and during 1858 removed to Illinois, settling in Clark County, where he engaged in farm pursuits. His death occurred August 22, 1884. Early in life he had married Caroline Dunn, who was born in Indiana May 30, 1846, and now (1907) resides in Cumberland County, Ill. Descended from Irish and Scotch ancestors, she was of southern parentage. About the year 1825 her father and mother, who were natives of South Carolina, migrated to the North and settled at Philadelphia, Ind. From that locality they removed to Illinois about 1858 and settled in Clark County.

Passing the years of youth in attendance at school and in farm work, nothing of importance marked the life of William A. Shute from his birth in Casey Township, Clark County, January 17, 1869, until his marriage in this county November 29, 1890. His wife, Hattie, was born January 25, 1873, and was one of the nine children of John and Amanda J. (Shaw) Funk, whose record appears on another page of this volume. The family of William A. and Hattie Shute comprises three children, namely: Jessie V., born December 17, 1891; John F., September 13, 1896; and Amanda C., August 21, 1899. The children are attending district schools and are being fitted for the responsibilities that await them in mature years. Among the people of the locality Mr. and Mrs. Shute have an enviable reputation. They are honored as kind-hearted, energetic, sagacious and progressive, and belong to that class of enterprising citizens whose residence in any community is beneficial to all. In political views Mr. Shute always has advocated Democratic principles and votes the party ticket at all general elections. When plans are inaugurated looking toward the advancement of educational or other interests of the township and county he readily gives his assistance to the same and in all respects has proved himself to be a citizen of the type so valuable in a county's upbuilding.

SIMMONS, Anderson.—During 1849, the year that in American history shall ever be associated with the fortune seekers whose white covered wagons dotted the way to the Pacific, Anderson Simmons, preferring the slow but sure rewards of farming, halted the conveyance containing his family and household possessions in Mar-tinsville Township, where for three years he rented a farm from Ezekial Moore. He then took up the 160 acres of land which now is his home, from the Government, and by dint of hard work and patience converted it into a property which should satisfy the most exacting and fastidious of agriculturists. And thus, at the age of eighty-four years, this honored farmer finds his lines cast in pleasant places, and has the satisfaction of knowing that all the good that has come his way has been of his own making.

Born in Monroe County, Va., December 25, 1822, Mr. Simmons comes of excellent family, and in his youth enjoyed the companionship of devoted and God-fearing parents. His father was Joel Simmons, and his grandfather was of the same given name, both being natives of Monroe County, Va. Grandfather Simmons carried a musket in the Revolutionary War, and was present at the surrender of Cornwallis, at Yorktown. As a soldier he arose to high favor and finally became aide de camp to the immortal Washington. His son and namesake grew to maturity on the Virginia farm, and finally married Nancy Manon, of Virginia, who became the mother of four sons and two daughters, of whom Anderson is the oldest. The other children were named Andrew Jackson, who died January 17, 1907, James, Wesley, Martha Ann and Lucinda. Of these, James is deceased. Joel Jr. and his family moved to Lawrence County, Ohio, from Virginia, then located in Indiana, where occurred the deaths of himself and wife. In politics, he was a Democrat, and to the end of his life retained the deferential manner and great courtesy of the men of southern birth.

In Franklin County, Ind., to which his parents moved when he was a small lad, Anderson Simmons had the usual advantages of his time and place. He took naturally to farming, and has ever found the occupation a congenial and profitable one. Four times married, his first wife was Mary Jane (Nichols) Simmons, of which union there were eight children. The next Mrs. Simmons formerly was Sarah Curtis, who became the mother of two children Mary Greenwell, who became Mr. Simmons's third wife, lived but a short time, and he subsequently married Mary Jeffreys, who was born in Martinsville, Clark County, Ill., June 2, 1845. Mrs. Simmons is a daughter of William

G. W. Spangler's Old Residence

G. W. Spangler's New Residence

Jeffreys, one of the pioneers of Clark County, who came from Kentucky and succeeded as a farmer and stock-raiser. Mr. Simmons is liberal in his views, and though preferring Republican principles, has often cast his vote independent of party lines. He is an old-time Odd Fellow, and for many years a member of Martinsville Lodge, No. 134. The pressure of years and responsibility has taken little from his appreciation of the world about him, and he still is interested in his farm, his friends, and the pursuits and ambitions of the younger generation. He has led a clean and honorable life, and is both respected and liked by those among whom he has sojourned for fifty-four years. He came to Clark County November 21, 1849.

SIMPSON, John William.—John W. Simpson is of a leading pioneer family of Clark County, and is himself of that class which constitutes the progressive, yet stable element upon which rests the substantial prosperity of the West. He was born in Franklin County, Ind., on Christmas of 1839, and is the son of Daniel and Mary (Partlow) Simpson, natives of Ohio and Indiana respectively. They were married in the Hoosier State and came to this county in 1851, the grandfather having already purchased a farm here. Daniel entered a farm of forty acres in Johnson Township, but remained with his parents until his marriage in 1865. His father finally died in the township, his mother passing away in Crawford County, Ill.

Mr. Simpson's wife was, before marriage, Miss Sophia Bartlow, who died July 9, 1890, at the age of fifty-one years. The union resulted in ten children, of whom three died in infancy; William Oliver, at the age of fourteen years; and six are still living, as follows: James Newton, born January 8, 1870, who married Bettie Cribeler; Mary Melissa, who was born October 4, 1871, became the wife of Jeff Sandeford, lives in Johnson Township on a farm and is the mother of five children. Neoma, born July 9, 1874, married Francis Gailey, a farmer in Martinsville Township, this county. Sheldon, born February 8, 1876, who married Ora Thorp, is a farmer of Johnson Township, and has had three children, two living and one deceased. Lennie A., born February 15, 1878, who is the wife of Morton Jackson, of Casey, and is the mother of two children; Milo, born March 17, 1882, who married Pearl Nash, became the father of a son, Lloyd, and resides on a farm in Cumberland County.

Mr. Simpson bought out the other heirs to the old family homestead of forty acres, which he now owns. The land contains two good flowing oil wells, and on December 8, 1905, was leased for development purposes, as experts believe that the entire tract will prove an excellent field. The flowing wells already produce about 250 barrels weekly.

Mr. Simpson has been a lifelong Democrat, and has been honored locally by being elected to such offices as School Director and Constable, having held the latter position for several years. His religious affiliations are with the Church of God, located in Johnson Township, and he is every way an upright, useful member of the community, industrious and faithful in every relation of private life and never shirking his just share of public responsibilities. His present good wife, to whom he married February 25, 1896, in Johnson Township, was Anna E. Lane, a widow. Mr. Simpson built the log house in which the family now reside, and, though modest in construction, it is looked upon as the abiding place of a most highly honored pioneer couple.

SINCLAIR, Fred H.—The assertion that mathematics is the only exact science is matched by the other assurance that the mathematician is an exact personality. One is the complement of the other. The mathematician occupies the plane of his own uncompromising deductions; whether morally or commercially, he is safe and sure, because he looks at everything from the standpoint of accurate conclusion. Just as a child in learning to draw a straight line is learning to speak the truth, so has the mathematician learned the uselessness of deviation, the cost entailed by circumlocution, the fallacy of untruth. He never is a dreamer of theorist, a plunger or experimentalist. He deals with facts, and the community therefore knows no more stable, conservative or dependable factor. To this class belongs Fred H. Sinclair, Cashier of the Martinsville State Bank, and Secretary of the Martinsville Creamery Association, and at present one of the Directors of the Martinsville Loan and Building Association.

Mr. Sinclair is conceded to be one of the best mathematicians in Clark County, if not in the State. He is only thirty-three years old, having been born on a farm in Parker Township, Clark County, August 7, 1874. This farm still is the home of his parents, William T. and Mary C. (Ferguson) Sinclair, the former of whom was born in the State of Indiana. Mr. Sinclair studied first in that great field of human equality, the public school, later in the State Normal, of Indiana, gained his first business experience in the Terre Haute Commercial College, from which he graduated in June, 1900, and studied higher mathematics in the Austin College, at Effingham, Ill. In the meantime, at the age of eighteen, he had qualified as a teacher, and for nine years taught in the country schools of Clark County. For three years, from 1897 until 1900, he was Clerk of Parker Township, and in 1902 was elected Assistant Cashier of the Martinsville State Bank, being advanced to the position of Cashier upon the re-organization of the bank in 1906.

In April, 1902, Mr. Sinclair successfully passed the Civil Service examination and received a Government position in the Philippines, but owing to the pressure of other responsibilities, was unable to accept the honor. He became Secretary of the Martinsville Creamery Association in May, 1905. He is fraternally connected with the Masons, of which he is a Master and Secretary of the Blue Lodge, and with the Modern Woodmen of America. He finds a religious home in the United Brethren Church. Mr. Sinclair married Daisy D. Kelly in 1903. He is a young man of energy and purpose, and has that control over the affairs of business that brooks no lack of system, no waste of effort, no neglect of opportunity, but which accomplishes results inevitably and relentlessly.

SNAVELY, H. R.—As the present Judge of Clark County, H. R. Snavely has won the distinction of being the youngest incumbent of that office in the history of this part of Illinois. When elected in 1906, on the Republican ticket, he was twenty-four years old, having been born in Martinsville, Clark County, February 2, 1882. Martinsville city and township has been the family headquarters ever since the arrival there of John Snavely, in the very early days of the county. John Snavely was the grandfather of H. R., and he came in a wagon from his native State of Ohio, purchasing land to which he added, and occupying the same until his death at an advanced age. On this farm was born Lewis C. Snavely, father of H. R., who for many years has been a brick and tile manufacturer of Martinsville. Mr. Snavely married Phebe Jane Roberts, a native of Indiana, and of the union there were four sons and three daughters, one of whom is deceased. Mr. Snavely is one of the prominent and highly respected citizens of Martinsville, is a member of the Woodmen and Ben Hur Lodges, and is active in the cause of prohibition, to which he changed from the Republican party.

H. R. Snavely gained his preliminary education in that great field of human equality, the public schools, and two years after graduating from the high school of his native town in 1898, entered the law department of the University of Michigan, from which he was duly graduated in 1903. Locating in Marshall, he soon evidenced marked capacity for his calling, working up a large practice in general law in both town and county, and entering with zest into politics, the natural complement of the legal profession. As Judge of Clark County he has appealed to the approval of the community by the sagacity and wisdom of his decisions, and his desire to adhere to the best tenets of the legal profession. He has youth, energy, high ideals and great capacity for industry, paramount qualities in advancing men to the front ranks of useful and intelligent citizenship. In religion he is a Methodist Episcopalian. He is a member of Clark Lodge No. 603, A. F. & A. M.

SNEARLY, George.—The early history of every locality contains the names of certain men whose progressive spirit adapted them for the difficult task of subduing the wilderness, whose robust constitutions qualified them for the physical privations to be undergone, whose brave natures remained undaunted by misfortunes, and whose genial temperaments made them brothers to all struggling pioneers within the influence of their cheerful optimism. The names of such men are worthy of perpetuation in local history, for their labors were of a value greater than can be estimated and the results of their efforts were for the enhanced prosperity of later generations. Such a man was George Snearly, who came to Clark

Dr. P. F. Thornburg

County in an early day and aided in the material upbuilding of the region. By trade a carpenter, he was skilled in his chosen occupation and built a number of houses and stores that even to this day remain in use, notable specimens of the substantial character of his work.

Born in Pennsylvania March 15, 1815, George Snearly was a son of George and Margaret Snearly, also natives of that State, and both descended from German ancestry. At an early age George was left an orphan, after which he was reared on a farm by brothers of his father. Early in manhood he married Margaret Gables and removed to Ohio, where he engaged in tilling the soil of a farm in the midst of what was then a primeval wilderness. As early as 1850 he came to Illinois and settled in Jasper County, where his wife died July 5, 1856, leaving the following children: Louise, Edgar, Hiram, George, Margaret and Lucille. The second marriage of George Snearly was solemnized October 1, 1857, and united him with Mrs. Marie (Hurlburt) Hardway, who was born September 14, 1833. Her parents, Reuben and Ellen (Imes) Hurlburt, were natives of Ohio, and became pioneers of Illinois. When Mrs. Snearly began to attend school about 1840, her father would take her and the other children the entire distance from home, as wolves and other wild animals were numerous, and it was unsafe for children to be out alone. Often at night she could hear the fierce cry of the wolves and panthers, and frequently these animals would come within sight of the cabin. Windows and doors were securely fastened every night in order to prevent the intrusion of these dangerous prowlers. On one occasion two deer in fighting each other in the Hurlburt doorway became entangled by the horns, and Mr. Hurlburt took his axe and killed them, thus providing the family with an abundance of venison. Those were days of privation and toil, but Mrs. Snearly looks back upon them with pleasure and cherishes their memory with delight. While she was still a very young girl she became the wife of James Hardway, a farmer of Jasper County, who died in 1850 during his travels overland to the California gold fields.

The family of George and Marie Snearly consisted of seven children, of whom Millie is deceased. Those now living are James, John, Viola, Charles, Walter and Frank. Charles, who remains with his mother, is an old bachelor of about forty and a well-known, capable farmer, whose reputation among the people of the locality is the highest. The death of George Snearly occurred in November, 1889, and his body was laid to rest in the old Butter-nut graveyard. This was the first cemetery started in Clark County, and the adjoining church and school were also among the first buildings of their kind in the county. The pioneers attended worship in the church, from which they could see the burial place where many of them had placed loved ones in the ground to await the final resurrection day. Always earnest and sincere in his religious views, Mr. Snearly held active membership in the United Brethren Church and lived the life of a devout, God-fearing Christian. Politically he voted the Republican ticket. In the days when schools were few he was one of their most enthusiastic supporters and believed that the acquisition of a good education should be made possible to every child in all the land over whose domain floats the stars and stripes. On the organization of the Marshall Lodge, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, he became one of its charter members, and afterward continued to be interested in its work.

SNIDER, Joseph E.—Joseph E. Snider was born in Louisiana in 1838, and left there after the flag had been torn from the Custom House in New Orleans in 1861. He came to Clark County, Ill., in March, 1861. He was married to Mary Ingle on February 25, 1863. By this union there were born to our subject five children, three boys and two girls, only one of which boys and the two girls are now living. The son is engaged in the pearl fishing industry, and has made a success of it. The father of our subject was born in Washington, D. C., and homesteaded a farm on Walnut Prairie, in Clark County, in 1818. He died in 1862 in Louisiana. The maiden name of the mother of our sketch was Susannah Porter, and she died in 1867.

Our subject enlisted in November, 1862, in the Forty-eighth Illinois Infantry at Olney, Ill. He was detailed in 1864 to Courtland, Ala. He fought in the battles of Vicksburg, Red Church, Nashville, Murphysboro, Tusculum, Ala., and returned to his command by way of Jeffersonville, Fortress Monroe and Beauford. He was mustered out at Little Rock, Ark., after the Grand Review at Washington in 1865. He was wounded by a bayonet charge at Murfreesboro, Tenn., and the Confederate soldier who wounded him did not survive to boast of his act.

Mr. Snider, while still retaining his fine farm in Walnut Prairie, now resides in Marshall, where he has a nice home. He is a genial, pleasant gentleman, having many friends and no enemies.

While now nearly seventy years of age, he is still, despite this fact, one of the most graceful dancers in Clark County, and it is safe to say there are few men of his age anywhere who know more different kinds of dances and who can execute them more correctly and with more grace than can Mr. Snider. Long may he live to enjoy life.

SPANGLER, George W.—George W. Spangler was born in Muskingum County, Ohio, February 28, 1836, and moved to Lee County, Ill., in 1854, and to Clark County, Ill., in 1871. His father was Benjamin Spangler, who was a native of Maryland. The mother of our subject was Lydia Bell, who was a native of Ohio. Our subject was married in 1865 to Sarah Jane Leisure, who was born in Muskingum County, Ohio. She died in 1891. By this wife our subject had seven children, four boys and three girls: Elizabeth Spangler, married Henry Strome, lives in York Township, and has eight children; James Benjamin, married, lives in Anderson Township, and has two children; George L., lives at home; Perry Harrison, deceased; Fannie D., who married Jefferson Heline, and is the mother of two children; Lizzie Zane, married Edward Grant, living in Melrose Township, and they have three children; Oscar, married Cecil Bartlett, lives on the home place, and they have two children.

Mr. Spangler enlisted in 1862 in the One Hundred and Twenty-second Ohio Infantry and was mustered out at Alexandria, Va., and came home by way of Columbus, Ohio, where he was discharged. He was in the battles of Cold Harbor, the battle of the Wilderness, the siege of Petersburg and the battle of Spottsylvania. Our subject was thus engaged in some of the most desperate and hard-fought battles of the War of the Rebellion. He was also in the battle which took place when "Sheridan was twenty miles away," and which battle was first lost and then recovered by the timely arrival of General Sheridan on the field of battle, and was at Appomattox and present at the surrender of General Lee.

Mr. Spangler has a fine residence and one of the most beautiful farms in Clark County, consisting of eighty-five acres. He is a Methodist in religion and a Republican in politics, as well as one of the most respected and intelligent citizens of this township.

STEPHENSON, Oliver G.—For a considerable period of its history, Oliver G. Stephenson was connected with the surveying interests of Clark County, and until his enforced retirement because of ill health was accounted one of the best in his line in this part of the State. Mr. Stephenson was born in Coos County, N. H., September 16, 1829, and died in Marshall, Ill., December 16, 1903. His father, Reuben H. Stephenson, was a farmer.

Oliver G. Stephenson interspersed farming with attendance at the district school near his home, and as manhood approached sought a larger field. Taking up the study of surveying, he eventually secured a position as surveyor for the Wabash Valley Railroad Company, with stipulated headquarters in Marshall, Ill. Upon the dissolution of the railroad company he was elected Surveyor of Clark County, an office which he held continuously and discharged with great credit until his retirement from active life.

In Clark County, January 3, 1855, Mr. Stephenson was united in marriage to Minerva Shaw, a native of Clark County, and born July 26, 1835. Mrs. Stephenson is a daughter of Linezvah and Mary (Latshaw) Shaw, the former of whom was born in Jefferson County, Ky., in 1796, and was a son of a soldier of the War of 1812. The Shaw family settled in Clark County while yet there were few white men's habitations, and they drew a comfortable fortune out of land which they had taken up from the Government. They had a family of nine children: Albert, Louise, Sarah, Eleanor, William, Mary Jane, Minerva, John and Joseph. All of the children were born and reared in Clark County, but Mrs. Stephenson alone survives. Mr. and Mrs. Stephenson were the parents of two daughters, Nellie and Lola, the latter of whom is the wife of Walter Cole, an abstract broker in Marshall. Mr. Stephenson was a Democrat in politics, but held no offices not connected with his special calling.

SWEET, J. A.—The grocery business of J. A. Sweet not only is a potent factor of supply to the citizens of Marshall and vicinity, but in its character and management reflects the strength and capability of a man whose career is fashioned after broad and liberal and progressive standards, and whose standing is reflected in the many positions of trust and responsibility which he has occupied.

Mr. Sweet was born September 15, 1866, in Martinsville Township, Clark County, Ill., and represents the third generation of his family to contribute to the growth of this part of the State. His paternal grandfather, Nathaniel Sweet, came here from Danville, this State, in 1851, and purchased 360 acres of land in Martinsville Township. This was crude and untilled property, and its soil was upturned with a primitive plow and six yoke of oxen. With Nathaniel Sweet came his son, Thomas B. Sweet, the father of J. A., who was born near Hamilton, Ohio, in 1836, and who moved to Danville with the other members of the family. Upon the shoulders of this lad devolved much of the labor of breaking the prairie and gathering the first harvests, and his duties were so confining that he found scant opportunity for schooling or the lighter pastimes of existence. In Clark County he married Adeline Ashby, daughter of a pioneer, and in his family were reared three sons and three daughters, of whom J. A. is the fourth oldest. Politically the elder Sweet was a Democrat, and he held several offices of importance in the community. His death occurred in July, 1904.

When J. A. Sweet had arrived at years of usefulness there still remained some of the old place to clear and cultivate, and in the process he developed both physical strength and practical ideas of economy and expenditure. In spite of obstacles he secured a good education, and at the age of eighteen became a school teacher, continuing the same in connection with farming for seven years. He came to Marshall and established his present business April 8, 1905. Almost parallel with his independent life has gone creditable political service. In 1892 he was appointed Deputy County Clerk for two years, and in 1896 was appointed Deputy Circuit Clerk for the same length of time. In 1900 he was elected Circuit Clerk, serving four years, and in 1902 was elected a member of the Board of Agriculture, serving two years. For seven years he was Secretary of the Farmer's Institute, and he was one of the organizers and most active promoters of the Clark County Fair Association.

October 22, 1890, Mr. Sweet was united in marriage to Sarah Eitle, born in Clark County January 18, 1866, and daughter of Fred and Cynthia (Fuller) Eitle, natives of Clark County. Mr. and Mrs. Sweet have six children: Fred; Myrtle; Gertrude; Edna Belle, deceased; Olive; and Ruth. Fraternally Mr. Sweet is connected with the Knights of Pythias, Modern Woodmen of America and Red Men, of Marshall. He is a member and one of the Trustees of the Christian Church. Mr. Sweet is one of the well informed and prosperous men of the community, and though not yet at the meridian of life, has drawn to him responsibilities which call for maturity of judgment, clearness of insight, and broad knowledge of the needs, possibilities and resources of the Central West. One of his most invaluable assets is a good name, unshadowed by the doubts and enmity which often beset the capable and officially honored.

SWERN, Ferdinand.—The present dependance upon sanitation as a means for securing health to communities, renders the plumber a man of vital and indispensable importance. Such a useful position is occupied by Ferdinand Swern, whose plumbing and steam-fitting enterprise was established in March, 1906, but who, notwithstanding the comparative brevity of his business life, has been well known in the town and county for many years.

Born in Wabash Township, Clark County, Ill., May 10, 1880, Mr. Swern is a son of Perry Swern, mention of whom may be found elsewhere in this work. The family is an early one in Clark County, and has contributed its share towards the development of its agricultural resources. Tiring of the hum drum life of the country, young Ferdinand went to Robinson, Ill., at the age of sixteen years, and worked for his brother in the jewelry business. Returning to the farm two years later, he remained a year, or until his marriage, March 12, 1903, to Bertha Machlan, a native of Wabash Township, and daughter of William and Jennie (Broadherst) Machlan. Mrs. Swern was born January 21, 1884, and was reared on the farm of her parents in Wabash Township. She is the mother of a son, Paul Warren, born June 17, 1904.

A year after his marriage Mr. Swern moved to Marshall and purchased a home, and for two years worked in the tin shop of his brother, at the same time studying plumbing and steam-fitting until starting his present business. Mr. Swern is a Democrat in politics, is fraternally a Knight of Pythias, and in religion is a Methodist. He is an energetic and conscientious young man, devoted to his family, and holding broad and practical ideas of the duties and prerogatives of citizenship.

SWERN, Jay.—Of the many Ohioans who are helping to maintain the commercial stability of Marshall none are better or more favorably known than Jay Swern, owner and proprietor of the only store exclusively devoted to hardware in Clark County. This business came into the possession of Mr. Swern in December, 1903, and in the meantime he has received gratifying encouragement from the people who formerly knew him as a tiller of the soil, as well as from those who know him only as an energetic and obliging merchant. He carries a large line of the best makes of hardware, and in a comparatively brief time has acquired a thorough knowledge of his business.

Mr. Swern was born on a farm in Licking County, Ohio, February 8, 1863, and is the second oldest of the four children of Perry and Mary E. (Holmes) Swern, natives also of the Buckeye State. The other children were William C., Minnie and W. H., the latter of whom lives in Robinson, this State. The family was established in Clark County in 1864, and the father succeeded to a farm of one hundred and eighteen acres in Wabash Township, where he continued to live until his death in 1901, at the age of sixty-five years. His wife's father, W. S. Holmes, came also in 1864, and died here in 1895. After the death of his first wife in 1873, Mr. Swern married, in 1877, Jane Montgomery, a native of Edward County, Ill., and of which union there were three children: Mary E., Ferdinand and George.

In 1887, at the age of twenty-four years, Jay Swern uprooted himself from the associations of his father's farm and married Lydia Tobias, who was born in Michigan, July 10, 1864, a daughter of J. J. and Elizabeth (Reed) Tobias, natives of Michigan, and early settlers of Wabash Township, Clark County, where they still reside. Mr. Swern started housekeeping on a farm in Wabash Township, where he owned one hundred and twenty-five acres of land, and where he remained until December, 1903, the time of his arrival in Marshall. He sold his farm in 1906, and purchased property in Marshall. Mr. and Mrs. Swern are the parents of a son, Fred T., who was born in Wabash Township, May 3, 1888. For many years Mr. Swern has taken an active interest in Democratic politics, and for two years served as Clerk of Wabash Township. He is active in the Methodist Episcopal Church. To a reputation for strict integrity he adds a pleasing and tactful manner, and evidences at all times a sincere desire to please.

TAGGART, Claude.—The hay, coal, broom-corn and teaming business of Claude Taggart fills a large and practical need in the town of Martinsville. Its owner is a young man of strong physique and untiring ambition, who has arisen largely through his own efforts, and who is highly esteemed for his integrity, obligingness and general worth. Mr. Taggart is a native son of Martinsville, and was born February 14, 1868. He is a son of Martin Taggart, a harness merchant and prominent citizen of this town, and his education was acquired in the public schools, and through the studious application of latter years.

At the age of fifteen Claude Taggart began to work in his father's harness shop, and after twelve years determined to embark in the business of teaming. He later added hay, coal and broomcorn to his resources, and at the present time does an extensive and lucrative business. His large and airy warehouse was erected in 1902, and he has a fine barn, lighted with gas and piped for water, in which he keeps his teams. He has a justifiable pride in his well groomed and well fed horses, and after the true horseman's habit, pays much attention to their general comfort and welfare. It is safe to say that no horses in the town are treated with greater kindness and consideration. In 1892 Mr. Taggart established a home of his own, marrying Ella Moulden, of Martinsville. Mr. Taggart is a Democrat in politics, and at one time was Clerk of the town. He is socially inclined, and is identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Modern Woodmen of America.

Martin Taggart, father of Claude, was born in Richland County, Ohio, December 20, 1836, and is a son of Samuel and Elizabeth (McDonnell) Taggart, natives of Pennsylvania. The family moved from Pennsylvania to Richland County, Ohio, in the early days, and from there came to Illinois in the fall of 1851. The long journey was undertaken with a prairie wagon and a strong team of horses, and settlement was made about two miles north of Martinsville, in a thinly settled district. There were in the family at that time the father and six of his seven children, the oldest, a daughter, remaining behind in Ohio with her husband. Martin Taggart was fourteen years old and took his turn at driving the horses from Ohio to Illinois. He was a stout-hearted lad, and well brought up, notwithstanding the fact that he had lost his mother at the age of six years. The father subsequently married in this State, and prospered as a farmer and stock-raiser until his death at the age of sixty-six years.

Martin Taggart began learning the harness trade in Martinsville at the age of fifteen, and when twenty-two years had passed over his head established a harness business of his own. During the latter '50s he went to Omaha, Neb., and ran a grocery store for a couple of years, then returned and again engaged in the harness business during the Civil War. In 1869 he sold his business and moved to a farm near Martinsville, at the expiration of thirteen years disposing of the same, and returning to the more congenial occupation of harness-making. For the past twenty years, with an intermission of two years, he has steadily plied his trade, and now has one of the best equipped general harness and horse furnishing establishments in Clark County.

In 1867 Mr. Taggart married Elizabeth Hogue, daughter of William and Harriet (Babcock) Hogue, and who was born in Darwin Township, Clark County, August 17, 1844. Mrs. Taggart was left an orphan when three years old. She is the mother of three children: Claude, born February 14, 1868, Thaddeus, born March 30, 1870; and Laura, born July 12, 1871. Mr. Taggart is a Democrat in politics, but has never given much attention to anything outside his immediate business. He is an energetic and persevering business man, honorable in all of his dealings, and the possessor of comfortable wealth. His wife is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church and the lodge of the Rebekahs. The family is highly esteemed, and represents the thrifty and industrious element of the community.

TAUBENECK, Victor C.—The Marshall representative in this and other states of the firm of Russell & Company, engines and threshing machines, Victor C. Taubeneck is credited with being a young man of energy and resource, and one who puts into his work the best of brain and heart that he possesses. Mr. Taubeneck is a native of Clark County, and was born in Darwin Township, July 19, 1860. He is of German parentage, and a son of Charles H. Taubeneck, a retired pioneer and farmer of Clark County, who was born near Leipzig, Saxony, Germany, December 30, 1820.

Charles H. Taubeneck was reared on a Saxon farm and received a limited education in his youth. He arrived in America during March, 1849, and soon after came to Darwin Township, Clark County, where he purchased 160 acres of land. In Darwin Township he was united in marriage with Bertha Nonnenbruch, who was born in Germany and came to the United States at the age of twenty-two years. For a year Mrs. Taubeneck lived with her people in Covington Ky., then came with them to Darwin Township in 1848. She is the only daughter in a family of five children, of whom herself and Emil are the only survivors, Barnett, Charles and Mathilda being deceased. Mr. Taubeneck was a Republican in politics, and an active member of the Lutheran Church.

On his father's farm Victor C. Taubeneck learned lessons in thrift and economy, and remained at home until his marriage, November 1, 1881, to Hettie A. Scott. Miss Scott was a popular and well educated young woman of Melroad Township, Clark County, where she was born on the farm of her parents, Jacob and Hettie Scott, pioneers of this part of the State. Mr. and Mrs. Taubeneck have three children: Carroll S., Victor Everett and Florence. After his marriage Mr. Taubeneck bought a farm consisting of 109 acres adjoining that of his father, and remaining thereon about four years. He then moved to Marshall and engaged in the threshing and saw-milling business for ten years, at the end of that time purchasing the old family farm in Darwin township, upon which he lived five years. Disposing of this farm, he purchased two hundred acres of valuable land in Walnut Prairie, which he rents and while engaging in his present business has made his headquarters in the town of Marshall. Mr. Taubeneck is independent in politics, voting always for the man best qualified to promote the popular well-being. Fraternally he is connected with the Modern Woodmen of America. A genial nature and unfailing optimism are among the valuable business and general assets of this traveling salesman, and he has many friends to encourage him in his efforts towards success.

THORNBURG, Dr. Peter Fletcher.—The venerable Dr. Peter F. Thornburg, of Martinsville, Clark County, Ill., has performed faithful service in several fields. He has done pioneer work as a minister of the Gospel in the Methodist Church, has been a soldier in the Union Army of the Civil War, and for many years of his long life has given the strength of his body and mind to alleviate the physical ailments of suffering humanity. These are the main heads of a record which should justly constitute the solace of old age, irrespective of the affectionate support given by those near and dear who have both admiration and love for characters of such faithfulness and broad usefulness.

Peter Fletcher Thornburg was born in Morgan County, Indiana, on May 9, 1825, and is the son of Benjamin and Susanna (Monical) Thornburg, both of whom were born in Virginia in November, 1747, but on different days of the month. The paternal grandfather, Amos Thornburg, was also a native of the Old Dominion, and the son of Eli Thornburg, a North Carolinian, whose father (also Amos) is believed to have been born in Scotland. Benjamin Thornburg, the father, entered land in Morgan County, Ind., as early as 1825, and engaged there in agricultural pursuits up to the time of his death. The mother was a daughter of Peter and Hannah (Yates) Monical, both Virginians of English lineage. About 1810 the parents removed from Kentucky to Indiana, having brought into the world fourteen children, thirteen of whom reached manhood and womanhood.

Dr. Thornburg received his early education in the district schools of Morgan County, Ind., taught school for a time, was married in 1847, and three years later began traveling as a circuit rider in the Indiana Conference of the M. E. Church. He preached in Southern Indiana until 1861, and for the two following years was on the superannuated list. During this period he commenced to read medicine under Isaac Furnis, who was located near Indianapolis. In 1864 he enlisted in Company D, One Hundred and Twenty-fourth Regiment, Indiana Volunteer Infantry, Captain Gibson, serving for one year, when he was honorably discharged for disability. After spending two years more in professional reading and practice, in 1867 he located for practice at Casey, Clark County, Ill., and, with the exception of two years, has continued in that county engaged in professional work ever since. After remaining in Casey three years and practicing two years at Martinsville, he spent about two years in Coles and Edgar Counties, Ill., and then located permanently on his farm five miles southeast of that town, which has since been his home and the headquarters of his many-sided and useful activities. When the Doctor came to this county he was a local preacher, but in 1870 was readmitted to the Illinois Conference of the M. E. Church, a position he still holds; and there are few figures in the denomination in this part of the State who are better known or more highly honored.

Dr. Thornburg has been twice married, his first wife being Maria McCreery, daughter of John and Mary McCreery, of Indianapolis, Ind., to whom he was wedded in 1847 and who died in 1875. Of his six children by his first union, five are still living, viz.: Amanda J., Mary C., Ida, J. W. and Don Alonzo. William B., the second born, is deceased. On January 6, 1881, occurred his marriage to his present wife, who was formerly Mrs. Sarah K. Hamilton, of Martinsville, a native of Pennsylvania, whose family name was Jennison. The Doctor is a Republican, but has never been a politician or an officeholder. He is a Master Mason, a Knight Templar, and has long been a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He was also early identified with the temperance cause in Indiana, and is in every sense a man of morality and strength.

TIBBS, Newton.—In the passing of Newton Tibbs, September 15, 1899, Clark County sustained the loss of a man whose career fell far short of completion, and whose character, professional equipment and capacity for general good justified the expectation of many more years of usefulness. In extent, Mr. Tibbs' life swung between the two extremes of farming and law. Incidentally he was a school teacher, as have been many before him, and as will be many to come, the nearest opportunity to the farm for the elevation to larger occupations.

Until his tenth year Mr. Tibbs lived on a farm near Bowling Green, Ky., where he was born July 19, 1854. His parents then located in Clark County, Ill., and he went to live with a prosperous farmer who, in addition to clothing and feeding him, gave him ample opportunity to attend the district school. In 1873, at the age of nineteen, he became the faculty of a country school, and while subscribing to its needs and obligations for six years, devoted his leisure to the study of law. In 1878 he moved to Kansas as a possible larger field of effort, was admitted to the Kansas bar in 1880, and the following year returned to Illinois, where in June, 1881, he was permitted to practice at the bar of this State. Locating in Martinsville, Clark County, he remained there until 1884, in which year he was elected State's Attorney, and moved to Marshall for professional expediency. At the expiration of his four years' term as State's Attorney, he engaged in private practice, and in June, 1890, formed a legal partnership with J. W. Graham, and for the balance of his life conducted a lucrative and extensive practice under the firm name of Graham & Tibbs.

August 30, 1877, Mr. Tibbs was united in marriage to Nancy J. Redman, who survives him, and who is the mother of two sons, Otho and Herbert. Mr. Tibbs subscribed to a definite and well defined life purpose, from the highest tenets of which neither personal ambition or the clamour of the unprincipled ever swayed him. He lived always true to the high ideals fashioned in the open of corn field and meadow, and his thought and work seemed tuned to all that was true, harmonious and worth while in American citizenship. His home was his castle, impregnable to the dissention and littleness of that which does not count; and to those who dwelt therein he gave of his rich and gentle nature, and of that invariable fairness which is as inspiring as it is rare. He was a genial and companionable gentleman, and his memory is enshrined in the hearts of an appreciative and grateful community.

ULREY, Isaac.—As evidencing what may be accomplished by the conscientious and industrious farmer who cultivates the soil of Martinsville Township, the property of Isaac Ulrey, in Section 20, may be studied with profit by the seeker after agricultural success. Mr. Ulrey has occupied his present farm since 1881, and he has clear title to its 160 acres, all of which is under cultivation. The general improvements of his land are modern and practical, his house is commodious and comfortable, and his barns adequate for all needs, and he maintains a garden, orchard and other conveniences for the pleasure and diversion of his family.

The family which Mr. Ulrey so well represents was established in Clark County about 1850, by his father Michael Ulrey, who was born in Knox County, Ohio, January 20, 1830. The elder Ulrey bought a farm in Parker Township, later moving to Westfield Township, where he married Sarah Bean, a native of North Carolina, and daughter of Isaac Bean, a pioneer who entered land from the Government in the very early days of Clark County. Mr. and Mrs. Ulrey had three sons and two daughters: Rosanna; Isaac, Martin, Belle, deceased; and Clarence. Of these, Isaac was born December 21, 1856, and when he was six years old the family moved to Martinsville Township, where he was reared on the farm and educated in the public schools.

The marriage of Isaac Ulrey and Mattie Smith occurred August 20, 1881. Mrs. Ulrey was born in Coles County, Ill., August 9, 1866, and is a daughter of John R. and Sarah (Gould) Smith. The Smith family came to Martinsville Township in 1877, where Mr. Smith worked as a mechanic for the balance of his active life. He was the parent of seven children, of whom two died in infancy, and of whom Mrs. Ulrey is the third child and second daughter. Two sons, Bertie and Gould, have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Ulrey, the former of whom is deceased, while the latter, a daughter named Zoe, was born January 27, 1907. Mr. Ulrey has voted the Democratic ticket ever since attaining his majority, but with the exception of School Director, has served in no official capacity. He is possessed of commendable social inclinations, and his pleasing personality is warmly received at the Martinsville Lodge, No. 134, I. O. O. F. For years he has been a member and generous supporter of the Baptist Church, the tenets of which he upholds in his everyday as well as Sunday life. He is a broad-minded and well informed agriculturist, and his home and himself add materially to the present standing and future prospects of this section of Clark County.

The Smith family was established in Orange Township, Clark County, Ill., by John S. Smith, grandfather of Mrs. Ulrey, in 1848, Mr. Smith trading his Indiana farm for 320 acres of Government land. He had a family of sixteen children, of whom twelve grew to man and womanhood, nine sons and three daughters. Nine votes were cast by this family for Lincoln during the latter's second run for President. Five of the children were in the Civil War, their aggregate term of service being eighteen years, six months and fourteen days. All escaped death. John S. Smith was born in Jamestown, Va., in 1800, and his wife, Hannah (Ford) Smith, was born in Kingsport, Tenn., in 1804. John R. Smith, son of John S. and father of Mrs. Ulrey, moved from Orange Township to Mattoon, Ill., in 1858; married, January 3, 1860, in Cumberland County, Sarah J. Gould, of Edwards County, and eldest daughter of Nathan Gould; moved from Mattoon to Mount Vernon in 1871, to Charleston, Mo., in 1872, and to his present home in Martinsville, Clark County, this State, in 1875. He served two years, seven months and eighteen days in Company H, One Hundred and Twenty-third Illinois Volunteer Infantry, until the battle of Farmington under Colonel Monroe, and thereafter under Lieutenant-Colonel Biggs. The Smith family broke sod with ox teams where the rattlesnake has lived uninterrupted, and split rails to fence and cross fence 320 acres of land, practically all of which was placed under cultivation.

WALLACE, Joseph W.—The varied interests that have engaged the attention of Mr. Wallace since starting out for himself have not prevented him from identifying his life with that of the community, and we find him alert to promote the welfare of his township and zealous for the wellbeing of his fellow citizens. Besides carrying on business as a saw-miller and conducting general farming pursuits, he fills with efficiency the office of Supervisor of Auburn Township and may be found in his place at the meetings of the board, ready to offer suggestive plans or support progressive enterprises. The fact that he has spent his entire life in Clark County renders him familiar with its advantages and its needs, and his service as a County Supervisor is in accord with his ability and progressive spirit.

Among the pioneers of 1852 in Clark County was Joseph C. Wallace, who was born in Indiana and remained there until about fifteen years of age, removing then to Illinois. Immediately after his arrival he settled with his parents in Anderson Township and aided in the clearing and cultivating of a tract of 120 acres. In early manhood he married Mary Day, who was born in Ohio, but in childhood accompanied her parents to Illinois, settling in Clark County, and there receiving a fair education. Born of the marriage of Joseph C. and Mary Wallace were four sons and one daughter. One son died in infancy. The other children are John, Joseph W., Anna and Robert, all of whom were born in Anderson Township. The daughter married John Adgison and lives on a farm in this county. Ever since coming to this State the father has lived in Anderson Township and has borne a prominent part in township affairs, filling the most of the offices and promoting all enterprises for the local welfare. For a number of terms he served as a member of the County Board of Supervisors. Politically he has always voted the Democratic ticket.

On the home farm in Anderson Township, Clark County, Joseph W. Wallace was born November 11, 1874, and there he passed the years of early life. At the age of fifteen he came to Auburn Township and began to work in the saw-mill operated by his brother-in-law, with whom he remained for a period of about twelve years. Meanwhile he established a home of his own, being united in marriage December 23, 1896, with Myrtle Murphy, who was born in Auburn Township February 15, 1877. Her parents, Amaziah and Missouri (Phillips) Murphy, were pioneers of Clark County, and influential residents of Dolson Township, where she received fair educational advantages. Born of her marriage to Mr. Wallace there are three daughters, Sylvia, Goldie and Pearl. For two years after their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Wallace remained on the farm in Auburn Township and he devoted his attention exclusively to agriculture, but at the expiration of that time he again became interested in saw-milling. During 1902 he embarked in the business for himself and has since given considerable attention to such work, sawing for people all through this section of the country.

Reared in the Democratic faith, Mr. Wallace adopted its views for his own and has never seen reason to change his ideas on political subjects. Formerly he held office as Constable and at one time he served as Township Clerk, while since the spring of 1904 he has been a member of the Board of Supervisors. In fraternal relations he holds membership with the Eagle Lodge at Marshall and maintains a deep interest in the work of the order.

WELSH, Joseph B.—Of the men who have lent dignity of character, excellence of labor and largeness of general co-operation to affairs in Clark County for a considerable part of the last half century, few are more widely or favorably known than Josepa B. Welsh. It has been the privilege of this retired farmer of Marshall to live close to the heart of nature, to partake generously of her rewards, and respond with enthusiasm to her opportunities for advancement. He comes of sturdy and honorable lineage, and one which, in a variety of ways, furthered the universal gospel of industry. His father, J. Harvey Welsh, was born in Ohio, February 9, 1803, and in his youth became proficient in the occupation of farming and blacksmithing, which he combined with profit for many years of his life. He married Anna Lockard, also of Ohio, and in 1848 located in Wabash Township, Clark County, and purchased eighty acres of raw land. This land he improved and cultivated, and lived on until his death, November 19, 1866. He was a Democrat in politics, but held no offices of importance in the township. His shop and farm supported through their irresponsible years a family of five sons and four daughters, of whom Joseph B., the second oldest child and son, was born in Ross County, Ohio, January 30, 1833.

Fifteen years old when he accompanied his parents to Clark County, Joseph B. Welsh already was a capable farmer, for while his father wielded the hammer and anvil in his little shop the sons fell heir to the manifold tasks around the farm. Living in Wabash Township was a still earlier family, that of Samuel Hickman, who had come from New Jersey with his wife, Agnes (Babcock) Hickman, during the '50s, and whose daughter, Hannah E., was born in Wabash Township, January 21, 1841. Joseph Welsh and Hannah Hickman shared the diversions of the neighborhood for several years before their marriage, February 26, 1857, and they afterward settled on a farm of one hundred and ninety-six acres in the same township, where were born their three sons and three daughters, of whom three are deceased. Of those living, John is a farmer in Wabash Township; Lucinda is the wife of Maker Hall, a farmer of Edgar County, this State; and Frank is engaged in the real-estate business at Heron, Ill. The mother of this family died September 3, 1885.

In the spring of 1903, Mr. Welsh permanently laid aside his implements of labor, and purchased his present home in the town of Marshall. His life occupation, intelligently and diligently followed, netted him a comfortable competence, and the shadow of want never will fall across his threshold. Since attaining his majority he has voted the Democratic ticket, and for the greater part of his life has been an active member of the Christian Church. He is appreciated for his honesty, approachableness, large heartedness and sympathy, and for his considerable contribution to the purpose and advancement of the community.

WILCOX, H. E.—Enviably prosperity has come to H. E. Wilcox through his devotion to the oil industry. What he does not know about the oil business it is surmised no one in Casey or this part of the country can tell him. Its study has taken the greater part of his active life and his efforts have spread over a large part of the oil regions of the United States. His name is as well known in Texas and Oklahoma as it is in Illinois, but his operations are centered principally around Casey, in which town he owns by far the finest residence and exerts an influence in finance second to no other of its citizens. Mr. Wilcox emphasizes the need of specialization in this progressive age; it is the man of one idea, at least from a business standpoint, that towers above his all-around competitor. He has the kind of enthusiasm that not only serves his own ends, but inspires others to follow his example, and the result is that the oil business has a tireless, unremitting and monumental promoter.

Mr. Wilcox was born in Lima, Allen County, Ohio, and is a son of Thomas E. and Margaret (Dolph) Wilcox, natives of Pennsylvania and Connecticut, respectively. The elder Wilcox was employed by the Standard Oil Company for many years after locating in Ohio during the early '70s and he still makes his home in the Buckeye State. He also was a farmer in early life and a man of resource and shrewd business sagacity. H. E., his only child, spent his youth on a farm, and in hard outdoor work laid the foundation for the excellent constitution which since has stood the wear and tear of much roughing it through the country. After graduating at the Illinois State Normal the youth began to earn his living as a sort of roustabout in a store at Round Head, and eighteen months later he was sent on a salary to the newly discovered oil wells of Lima and St. Mary's, Ohio, for the Standard Oil Company. Later he went to drilling wells for Mr. Moore and after completing three wells went to Spencerville and took charge of the oil leases of Boyd, Hamilton & Company for about nine months. During that time he secured his first lease of twenty acres for $500, took the same amount out of it and sold it for the same price. He continued to lease properties having oil on them until 1893, then engaged in drilling and tool dressing. He also spent some time in field leasing around Peru, Ind., but not realizing expected profits therefrom, went to Corsicana, Tex., for two years and six months in the employ of the Standard Oil Company. Returning north to Montpelier, Ind., he contracted for lands and also had charge of the property of the Pennsylvania Oil Company.

From Warren, Ind., Mr. Wilcox came to Casey, Clark County, Ill., February 27, 1906, and started leasing under an allowance. He soon went into independent leasing, however, his first stake being the Baker lease of four hundred and seventeen acres, for $2,300. With few exceptions he has been successful with his leases, but some time since disposed of his Lawrence County leases, still retaining control of a large amount of property elsewhere. He has at present forty-one thousand acres of land in Oklahoma Territory, a large acreage in Texas, and in the Illinois field, near Kansas, is operating property which yields from one well alone fifty barrels of oil a day. In December, 1906, Mr. Wilcox bought the Dr. Phelps residence, the finest and most artistic in the town of Casey. Here he lives with his wife, whom he married June 1, 1897, at Athens, Tex., and who formerly was Margaret Mitchell, daughter of G. G. and Elizabeth Mitchell, now of Effingham County, Ill., but formerly of Ohio. Mr. and Mrs. Wilcox have two children: Sylvester Edwin, born June 12, 1899, and Lascelot Ivan, born May 20, 1901. Mr. Wilcox has risen to wealth and prominence upon great energy and resourcefulness wisely applied. He maintains always a reserve fund of brain and physique, lives a moderate and methodical life and gives promise of indefinite usefulness as a developer of one of the great and useful resources of the Central West.

WILHOIT, Dellie L. (M. D.)—Ten years of continuous residence in Martinsville has gained for Dr. D. L. Wilhoit an enviable reputation as a man of large mind and broad sympathies, and of great usefulness and promise as a physician and surgeon. Dr. Wilhoit is a recruit from the farming element of the State, and his birth occurred in Edgar County, November 24, 1871. His parents, Robert and Ellen (Chronic) Wilhoit, were early invaders of the wilderness of Edgar County, coming from their native State of Kentucky and engaging in farming with moderate success. Both are now deceased.

The youth of Dr. Wilhoit did not differ materially from that of other farmers' sons, and he early developed habits of thrift, industry and scholarship. While still on the farm he attended the district schools, later profiting by the schools of Paris, and from his seventeenth to his twentieth year engaged in educational work. As a boy he was enthusiastically interested in medicine, read such books pertaining thereto as came under his notice, and at the age of twenty-one years entered the Kentucky School of Medicine at Louisville, and graduated therefrom in the class of 1896. His entire professional life has been spent in Martinsville, and he has won success as much because of his personal popularity and excellent general qualities as because of his profound knowledge of his calling. He is a member of the State Medical Society, Aesculapian Medical Society and is a Master Mason.

In political affiliation the Doctor is a Democrat, and he has served four years as County Surveyor, and now is a member of the local Board of Education. Fraternally he is connected with the Masons. In 1901 he established a home of his own, marrying Miss Lulu Kelley. Dr. Wilhoit has a large country as well as city practice, and is esteemed as a representative man and practitioner of Clark County.

WILLIAMS, Thomas W.—For the past twenty-three years Dr. Thomas W. Williams has represented the conservative and dependable tenets of medical and surgical science in Clark County, and as the community has grown in appreciation of his skill and knowledge has drawn around him a patronage including hundreds of the foremost families in this part of the State. Owing to the almost invariable correctness of his diagnosis and caution with which he accepts innovations he has gained great authority in professional circles, and in addition has enjoyed opportunities for observation and research rarely accorded men of his calling.

Dr. Williams spent the first years of his life in Westfield, Clark County, where he was born February 7, 1857. His father, Dr. Richard F. Williams, was born in Kentucky, November 2, 1820, and as a young man came to Clark County, Illinois, where he married Cordelia White, a native of York, this county, and born June 5, 1834. Thomas W., after completing his training in the public schools of Marshall, entered the Medical College of Indiana, from which he was duly graduated in 1883. Locating in Clark County, he pursued his calling with zeal and excellent results, but possessing the unrest of those who labor in ever widening channels, he took a course at the New York Post Graduate College in 1890, and in 1890 pursued a similar course in the New York Polyclinic. He has been a member of the American Medical Association since 1887, and he is also a member of the Illinois State Medical Society and the Aesculapian Medical Society. He was a delegate to the medical convention at Philadelphia, in 1897, to the convention in Denver in 1898, to that in Portland, Ore., in 1905.

The wife of Dr. Williams formerly was Sarah J. Chambers, who was born in Knox County, Ind., in 1856, a daughter of Thomas Chambers, a native of Kentucky. Dr. Williams is Independent in politics, and in religion is a Baptist. He was on the Board of Pension Examiners under President Cleveland and was a member of City Council of Casey. He has thrown himself into the work of his life with rare singleness of purpose, and has proved the invaluableness of concentration as an aid to achievement. He is personally popular, and leavens the coldness of science with the warm sympathy of benevolence.

WOOD, John.—That the business career of John Wood has been characterized by progress along safe and conservative lines is apparent to all who have watched his rise from a humble and inconsequent position. Known all over Clark County as an implement merchant, his start in Martinsville was a small stock of goods in a frame store purchased January 1, 1894, from Rush & Ulrey, and his present status is indicated by the ownership of a large two-story brick store, equipped with a complete line of farm implements, vehicles, hardware and stoves, and gas fitting department, as well as another implement store in the town of Annapolis, Crawford County, this State. For some time Mr. Wood has profited by the assistance of his brother, W. F. Wood, a partner in business, and together the young men handle a dependable and increasing trade reaching practically over the entire county.

Mr. Wood was a year old when he came to Clark County from Crawford County, Ill., where he was born May 16, 1867. His father, Henry Wood, who is mentioned elsewhere in this work, settled on a farm in Orange Township, where the lad grew to maturity, spending his days as do the average children of prosperous and industrious farmers. He married Melsena Spraken, daughter of Sylvester Spraken, one of the very early settlers of Clark County, and with his wife came to Martinsville as before stated, in January, 1894. Since then, a daughter, Ima, has been added to the family.

Though not a rabid partisan, Mr. Wood is a supporter of the Republican party, but thus far has held no office in the community. He is an appreciator of the social side of life, has an obliging and genial nature, and is both popular and prominent in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Lodge No. 134, the Modern Woodmen of America, Lodge No. 508, and the Tribe of Ben Hur. He has a thorough knowledge of the practical utilities which he dispenses to the public, and which are sufficiently varied to identify him with all classes and conditions of people. He early learned the value of integrity and fair representation, and along these lines has built up his present large and useful enterprise.

YANAWAY, Samuel S.—An illustration of the possibilities afforded by Eastern Illinois to men of energy and industry is presented by the life and success of Samuel S. Yanaway, a prosperous retired farmer who since 1891 has made his home in Casey. Although no longer actively engaged in agricultural pursuits, he still retains the ownership of 800 acres in Cumberland County, of which 300 acres comprise the old family homestead. The income from the property forms no inconsiderable amount, as, in addition to that portion now under cultivation, a considerable acreage lies in the oil belt, and at this writing there are on the estate thirty oil wells producing 1,000 barrels per day. Naturally the owner is enthusiastic as to the possibilities of the oil industry and believes its development to be of inestimable financial value to the people of this region.

Referring to the personal history of Samuel S. Yanaway, it may be stated that he was born in Fairfield County, Ohio, March 3, 1840, and at the age of four years came to Illinois with his parents, Isheral and Effie (Sturgeon) Yanaway, natives of Ohio. Settling in Cumberland County, the family devoted themselves assiduously to agricultural pursuits. The mother eventually died on the farm there and soon afterward, in 1880, the father removed to Casey, Clark County, where in 1892 he passed from the scenes of earth. Samuel S. received a common-school education in the country schools of Cumberland County and later had the privilege of carrying on a course of study in the college at Westfield, Clark County. Immediately after leaving college he began to assist his father as a junior partner in the farming enterprises and in the buying and selling of cattle. The passing years brought an increasing degree of prosperity, and with the accumulation of added means he became the ready investor in farm property; thus was acquired his large landed tract in Cumberland County. Meanwhile he was chosen by the people of Union Township to represent them on the board of Supervisors of Cumberland County, where he proved an able counselor in matters relating to the prosperity of the community. Politically a Democrat, he has never been a partisan in his preferences and has proved himself thoroughly loyal to the highest interests of the county and commonwealth.

When about twenty-four years of age Mr. Yanaway established domestic ties. April 14, 1864, he was united in marriage with Mary E. Decker, a native of Cumberland County and a daughter of Henry and Elizabeth Decker, early settlers of that county, but both now deceased. Born of the union were five children now living. The eldest sons, Isheral and Thomas R., have charge of the homestead in Cumberland County. The younger sons, Samuel Bement and Jacob, are engaged in the mercantile business at Union City. The only daughter, Mary, is married, has one child, Munson, and resides in Indiana.

Having passed practically all of his life in Eastern Illinois and being a man of close observation, Mr. Yanaway has few superiors as a judge of lands, soils, etc., and his opinion is often sought in matters relative both to agriculture and the oil industry. In spite of the fact that he retired from farming many years ago, his life has not been an indolent existence since that time; on the contrary, he is eagerly interested in the management of his own affairs, keeps posted concerning local enterprises, gives of his time and influence to the support of movements for the benefit of the people of the county, and all in all has proved himself to be a progressive, substantial and patriotic citizen, an excellent type of that class of men to whose presence in the county its high financial and commercial standing may be attributed.

YELEY, John Cyrus.—The career of John Cyrus Yeley is an expression of well-directed industry along agricultural lines in Wabash Township, where he was born on the farm of his parents, John and Rhoda (Pryer) Yeley, and where he owns a valuable farm of one hundred and seventeen acres in Section 27.

John Yeley was born in Muskingum County, Ohio, and was reared on a farm taken up from the Government in the early days of the Buckeye State. He had great mechanical ingenuity, and learned a trade which he subsequently combined with farming for many years in Ohio. He married in his native State, and when he came to Clark County in 1852, brought his wife and two children, Sturgis and Sarah, both of whom are now deceased. After locating in Wabash Township six other children were born: John Cyrus, Minerva, Mary, Martha, May and Dora. Mary died many years ago. Mr. Yeley bought eighty acres of crude land, which he cleared and cultivated, and upon which his death occurred in 1887. He was a quiet and unassuming man, very charitable with his money, and very kind in his judgment of others. In politics he voted the Republican ticket, but was extremely tolerant of the political opinions of those of the other party.

John Cyrus Yeley has known no other occupation than farming, and that he takes keen delight in the same is one of the chief causes of his success. He purchased his present farm in 1881, and has lived upon it ever since, devoting it to general farming and stock-raising, and adding continually to its equipment and general improvements. All of the buildings now on the place have been built by him, those of the former owners having been removed. He has a fine modern barn, with a large capacity for produce and stock, and a home in which comfort has been made the keynote. He owns one hundred and seventeen acres in Clark County and three hundred acres in Benton County, Ore. April 16, 1883, he married Laura Meadowcroft, who has followed intelligently and helpfully her husband's rise in life, and has been a never-failing source of sympathy and encouragement. She was born in Muskingum County, Ohio, in 1857, and is a daughter of Robert and Sarah (Piper) Meadowcroft, the former of whom was born and reared in England. Mr. and Mrs. Yeley are the parents of the following children: Rody Rex; Jay Townsend; Walter; Wealthy, a daughter, deceased; Josie, deceased; Ruby; and Grace.

In political affiliation Mr. Yeley is a Democrat, but he never has desired or been willing to accept official honors. He is a well informed and progressive farmer, keeping in close touch with the literature devoted to his work, and feeling justifiable pride in the neatness, thrift and prosperity indicated in his surroundings.

YOUNG, Wallace, M. D.—The former Treasurer of Clark County is one of Casey's substantial citizens, and one who, in his ability and preparation, represents a variety of human interests. Dr. Wallace Young was born in Stark County, Ohio, November 8, 1845, and inherits the sterling qualities of two old-time families of Bedford County, Pennsylvania, where was born his father, Samuel Young, June 2, 1816, and his mother, Elizabeth (Harklerode) Young, September 20, 1820. The paternal great-grandfather, Michael Young, came to America from Hamburg, Germany, before the Revolutionary War, and served in that memorable combat under George Washington in a Pennsylvania troop. He married an English Quakeress, named Betsy Barnett, who was a strong sympathizer with the English. With some friends, Mr. Young had built a log house in Pennsylvania, and when he returned to the same after the war, found that the Indians had burned their homes, and scattered general destruction.

Dr. Young came to Clark County, Ill., with his parents in 1851, settling on a farm six miles southwest of Casey, and occupying a school house during the first summer. The beginning in the new country was not auspicious or encouraging, for the children were taken down with malaria, ague, Illinois scratches and other ailments peculiar to the time, and the family endured many hardships ere they saw a way out of the troubles. Casey at that time was an embryo community known as Cumberland, and containing only two or three houses. Mr. Young possessed untiring ambition, and finally became the owner of four hundred acres of land, which he continued to improve until shortly before his death, in January, 1881. He was survived by his wife until in May, 1903. Mr. Young in early life was a carpenter, and he also operated a saw-mill.

Mr. Young was educated in the public schools of Marshall, and received his professional training in the medical department of the Northwestern University, at Evanston. In 1875 he located in Hazedell, Cumberland County, Ill., and after two years of medical and surgical practice engaged in the drug business for ten years. He has lived in Casey since 1892, and has been very active in Republican politics, to the practical support of which he owed the office of County Treasurer, to which he was elected in 1902.

Through his marriage to Emily Kelly, Dr. Young became identified with one of the very early families of Indiana, where his wife was born in Bartholomew County, April 22, 1854. In Clark County, the same State, was born in 1814, Silas W. Kelley, and his wife, Mary Jane (Carnes) Kelley, parents of Mrs. Young, the former of whom was a minister in the Christian Church, and a Captain during the Civil War. Mr. and Mrs. Young have a daughter, Nellie, who is the wife of Roy J. Howe, and a son, Samuel Harold. Dr. Young is respected for his many dependable traits of character, for his well trained and adaptive mind, his large fund of useful information, and his oft manifest desire to be of practical use to his fellow residents of Clark County.
